For even the two weeks of excitement of which they went through in this beautiful city, and of their admiration in the parks, Violet and her sisters soon forgot all about the war. The three boys who had deserted Glandelinian wicked cause, and Roswell and Herrod, and the other four little Glandelinian friends were also with them, having been requested to come by Hanson's friends were also with them, having been requested to come by Hanson himself, and so most of the greatest of friends were together again. To the joy of the reunion was like the joys of reunion in heaven so to speak, and indeed Violet and her sisters knew full well now that only a few of their old time friends had been killed in the war, and though they did not come back as back with generals Hanson or Vivian it was because they perished to remain in the ranks and help keep down any uprising that may occur in Glandelinia...

Throughout the nation the word was spread that Violet and her sisters, whom all had known as such great heroines, had come back to their own homes and that they had increased by the adoption of one of Annie Aronburg's sisters who had survived also the frightful fury of the Glandelinian soldiery during the great and bloody war.....

For fear that they would be killed by praise, Violet and her sisters kept themselves hidden from public eyes, until forced to show themselves by general Hanson. The entire inhabitants of the city desired to see Violet and her sisters, and so the little girls felt too ashamed of it all and now wished it had not happened. Nevertheless they were happy, for the people meant good, as Violet and her sisters during the four years and seven months of war had shown themselves the greatest heroines of the world, though little children as they were, had proved themselves greater in their bravery than the bravest soldier and also the most able to defy the seeming enemies of God on every hand, without disastrous adventure, or without meeting their destruction.

So it was no wonder that every time Violet and her sisters went outside to buy something for their mother or for themselves, or to go out on a stroll with the great heroes of the nation, or playing alone with their boy friends in the streets, they were looked upon with awe, and spoken of in whispers as great heroines who have themselves saved the nation and no one else outside of the great Williams a burger Zimmermann who had been the one to help Mc-Hollester, and Zimmermann to capture the city of Vivian Wickey, and the Mc-Hirshian fort if not Ions.

Most of the Abbeian children were in awe of Violet and her sisters and their little boy companions. And what did Violet and her sisters think of it all. They remembered when at the first outbreak of the great child slave rebellion, they had met the little girl Aronburg before she had been slain, and then all their adventures during and after the great rebellion of the Cal e Calverinians, and then during the war, and wondered where it was that their heroism came in when most of it was all only misery and suffering. They remembered how they feared during the past frightful carnage at the battle of Brignano and who would call that heroism they wondered. Nevertheless the Abbeianians were in great awe of them, and when King Cannon returned, he was indeed surprised at the sensation the nation had at the news of the return of the Vivian girls.

He was not surprised, but nevertheless, he went to see the little girls three weeks later after he returned.

After he had been greeted by all of his friends, and the brave little girls in particular, Cannon said:

"You brave little girls have set my whole country and with their praises and admiration of your brave deeds. The whole nation, may the whole world know of all the dangers you children have faced during the fearful war, and now are wishing to see you in pictures. So if you are willing you could give me one of your pictures to have published for the world itself."

For a moment Violet and her sisters did not answer but Evans said: "If you'll wait for a minute I'll bring the pictures. The little girls do not wish to have too much praise but then I don't think it will hurt the n."

Violet and her sisters started to protest gently but Evans went and got their pictures, and handed it to Cannon who put them into his pocket....

Every one of the Vivian girls were slipped, all dressed in white, and all around where ever they went seemed to bring sunshine with them, and the smiles upon their faces for King Cannon, with the light of confidence in their eyes seemed to make a hint of spring. Flowers invisible were blooming all about them. Violet and her sisters tripped around so lightly, tripping where ever Evans took them with such grace of motion and looked up out of deep blue eyes so smilingly into Cannon's that a that--coupled in tiny slippers, white stockings, and flimsy white dresses, that Cannon felt as though eight visits visitants from the celestial regions had somehow slipped into the big Abbeianian city. As King Cannon looked long upon the dear brave Vivian girls now so happy, and contented there finished through his mind Francis the poem exquisite quatrain:

The hills look over the south,
And southward dreams the sea;
And with the sea-breeze, hand in hand Came innocence and she.....

Violet and her sisters even in their earlier days had flitted and hopped about the rooms like little brandishing birds in the branches of a tree. It seemed great indeed to the little girls to be in the presence of the righteous Abbeianian monarch, and at his first entrance, had made a profound courtesy--across profound that that of any person. They literally sank and rose like the crest of eight beautiful little waves. The Abbeianian king was a tall and handsome but nevertheless majestic looking man, more Christ like in his features and face, and had a bearing that would beat any general that ever served in the existing existence of the world. All children admire heroes, are hero worshippers, and so Violet and her sisters were in awe of this great Abbeianian ruler, a man who was even so holy and reg righteous, so righteous that he was well fitted to be called the Saint king. His early life had been one of intolerable sorrow, the loss of his wife, father and sister, in one blow, and he had stood it so long without punishing Glandelinia until this great war broke out.

As Cannon was invited to remain for the night, general Hanson broached to him the question:

"What is going to be done about the wicked Glandelinian nation. It is true we have captured all her wicked leaders, the queen and princess, and so on. She has agreed to every term, but will not agree to the fine. The fine desired of the Angelinians was one hundred million dollars. Glandelinia agrees to pay. But that fine was not imposed upon her. You know your self dear Cannon that Calverinia and Angelinia had been ruthlessly devastated by the Glandelinians; and of the sad homecoming of many soldiers who will find themselves as childless. Angelinia's loss of fines imposed upon Glandelinia had been cast down to earth. Abbeianians demanded a fine of one hundred billion, three hundred sixty five million, eight hundred ninety nine thousand dollars, for the damage alone and one trillion dollars for the slaughter of children, and for the loss of churches, the sacrilegious, and for the flags torn and ripped during the battles she fought against us. Glandelinia refuses to pay this fine, as she stated to general Zimmermann who telegraphed to me. This is the reason of the gon government of seizing the large state called Mc-Hollester. And she is also in danger of losing Omnia and Condennancia!"

Cannon gave Hanson a furious look. "She'll pay that fine whether we take her two states or not." He said coolly. "I've received the report also from Zimmermann and had wired back to him that Glandelinia will be given two weeks to come to terms or other wise I'll destroy the nation and seize its property. I've suffered in my boyhood with the loss of my dearest mother father and sister, and Glandelinia will pay for it damn her or she'll go down to hell."

Hanson and all the rest were surprised at his sudden answer for it had been entirely unexpected. They knew now that there was no monkey business with Abbeiania. Glandelinia will have to pay, either the fine or her own country. And to save her country from destruction she must and shall pay the fine. And not until the fine was paid would the other big christian armies be withdrawn out of her soil.

"It think it is the best thing to do to get." Said general Robert Vivian. "All the Glandelinian armies have been committed in those two countries, Calverinia and Angelinia. It has shocked the whole christian world and will have to pay for it or go to hell as you say. And we ought to keep the two states just the same."

Cannon taking out of his pocket a sheet of paper, said to Violet:

"I would like to look at your geography..."

Violet promptly brought it and Cannon looking through a portion spread at a certain particular page and pointing said:

"Those are all the islands belonging to Glandelinia that Abbeiania demanded also in the fine, and which our warships and the fleets have already taken possession of by force."

"Why they are quite a distance from the Glandelinian eastern coast," said Hanson. "They resemble the countries, where the Americans are living, and the others are Europe and Asia. Are those really the country, and are they peopled by such nations?"

"No indeed," answered King Gannon. "They are peopled by Glandelinians also, and all those Glandelinians in those two big islands will be under out sublet or leave for Glandelinia one or the other. It took quite a long while for our fleets to take possession of these two big islands. But they yielded to our demand when Glandelinia fell without resistance."

"But where is the country called the United States?" asked Evans.

"The western world shapes like it anyway," said Gannon. "Don't you

But there is no such countries on this map. "said Gannon. "Don't you poor books remember the world that nation is on is our moon!"

"But then those states on that nation has the same name protested

Hanson. "And they are the same names."

"Yes the United States of Glandelinia on west or north island."

Has Gannon rejoined. "And they are all in Latin. If any of you have a bigger geography I'll pronounce the names of the States. They are written in Latin and are fifty four in number."

A larger geography was brought in by Jennie it being her own school geography."

"It is true," she said. "And they are all Latin names. Too good a meaning in the words for such a wicked nation. All names for words in prayers."

The names of the states were as follows: Apostolia, Martyria, Joanne, Stephano, Barnaba, Ignatio, Alexandro, Marcelino, Petro,

Felicitate, Perpetua, Agatha, Lucia, A Agnate, Gascilia, Anastasia, Angus

Del, Beatus, Gloria Patri, Domine, Forwest, Laudate, Dominum, Dominus, Quandam, Isidorio, Benedictus, De us, Christi, Pater, Misericordiam, Comolitionis, Tribulationem, Deo Gratias, Iuscia, Misericordiam,

Deo, Salutari, Mac Domini, Vobiscum, Confitebor, Fidelia, Ne Hagum, Magnificencia, Nationibus, Dixit, Gloriam, guereges, Regina Concepta, Pecantundi, Rosarii, Martyrum Genitrix, Domus Aurea, Janna Coeli,

Stella Matutina, Rosa Mystica, Mater Salvatrix, Virgo Potens, and

Sancta Maria, really over fifty states. The names of the states of the other and bigger island are not known. That big island had been so hostile since Glandelinia became wicked that all aircraft was afraid to approach its shores. So the names of those countries are not known. But may be known later on. But these islands are going to be taken possession of by Abbie anna.

Abbieanna it will be then," said Hanson. And the fine will also be paid or we'll take the whole nation under our possession. If she pays the fine she can have her old states, but if not she'll lose all. She won't be warned again. She has only two weeks to come to terms."

Violet and her sisters were interested in the conversation, and when late the next morning Gannon prepared to leave for his palace violet and her sisters strolled outside, with Evans and the boy friends in to the beautiful garden, and neared the same pond where they had seen the creatures in the water which had been driven out by the vand planglin mean serpent. The same creatures were there once more or at least one of them but of huge size, but at the appearance of the children, it suddenly dis appeared under the water and did not show itself. It was evidently afraid of so many children coming to the waters edge with such unexpected suddenness.

Violet and her sisters showed the boys where the planglinian serpent had its resting place in the garden, and also showed where it had killed the rascally Glandelinian who had kicked it in the face.

"But where is the Blanglinian serpent now?" asked starring.

"We do not know," answered Violet. "We would not take him when he had to leave, and he is grown about this time, for we are sure we saw him once, during the war, and he was oh such a big creature. When small he looked to us much like a Crabeian, but he was a roverine."

"They are almost alike but one is larger than the other and more powerful than the other," said Evans. "I've seen Roverines and a Crabeian in my day and the Roverines have shown themselves to be the biggest in the natural history of these creatures. They are alike in form, of body, wings and tail and head, but vary in the length of necks, color and size. A roverine has a very long neck, and the Crabeian a short one. The wing wings are designed with all kinds of starry shapes in a colored background, while the Crabeian are striped in their spangled wings. The roverine are considered the biggest planglin Blanglinian Serpents in the world but in fact they are not. The largest kind has not come to Abbieanna or galver in yet."

circulations had recaptured after most sanguine fighting all the ground they had lost in yet."

"I do think they have," said Gerald. "At least I believe I did see sometime ago when we first came to Abbieanna after the last of the war a peculiar serpent that was most strange, and which I believe was exactly over two thousand feet long. He was so beautiful in color that I was spell bound with awe, and he had antlers on his head like a reindeer. He had a very long neck, and thick but without scales, and his head had exactly the form of a child's head. It was a she I mean. Only its hair was longer, and of brilliant golden blonde. It was indeed the most beautiful color, and at as it observed me, it fluttered its large wings and flew away with a tremendous roar. I'm sure the creature may have been a kind of me."

Evans laughed.

"You are wrong boy," he said. "They are not afraid of any one."

"But why did he fly away then?"

"It is no doubt he did not wish to intrude upon your premises," answered Evans. "They are very polite creatures. But what you observed was not the biggest one. You did not know it and you actually was viewing a big uncommon one."

"But what do they call those biggest ones then?" asked starring.

"They are the planglinian serpents," answered Evans.

"They are only seen in the Bay King and planglinian islands. They are as few as flies on a thousand small barrels full of decayed matter and slop. No wonder those islands are considered to the world a regular serpent land. There are so many planglinian serpents that no one to this day have been able to estimate their number. Once in Galverinia before the war a certain man reported to the government that he saw flying over the sea near He-whirther about 10,000 of them in one large group. It made a sight for him that would have awed a saint or a celestial being. I've seen many flying in the sky in my day but not so many as he reported. He said claimed that they were all alike and were the baby headed planglins.

Planglins are not so huge as its other kind, but before enemies are the wildest, and the most ferocious of them all."

WAS GALVERINIA ALSO.....
FINISHED!!!!

In the early years of child a slavery Angelina had delayed so long in putting in her say that the Galverinian country had for a time lost faith in her power, and also had rejected her mercies. Thus when at the terrible war broke the Galverinians had become careless and though many of her men joined the Angelinian armies, the Galverinians in the western portion of the country, had not really seen to it that the Galverinian fortifications guarding the city of Vivian Wickey was strongly guarded. It was guarded, there is no doubt that the city and its western and southern fortifications, were guarded, but not with a force strong enough to resist the greatest Glandelinian drives. The city and the fortifications had offered resistance that could never be described here, even when the Glandelinians assaulted it before its capture by them, and thus the reason no battle of the place was really described. Hanson estimated it took the Glandelinians to fight seven hundred desperate and bloody battles to capture the imperfectly guarded fortifications. Glandelinia knew that when the war broke out, the Abbieanna nation Angelina's sister country would immediately put in her own armies to crush her, and thus it had been her ambition to capture these fortifications, and also Julio Gallo and Jorma which the Abbieannians could have easily forced their way through had the Galverinians been able to hold out until the Abbieannians came. Glandelinia felt confident that as long as she could keep Abbieanna away from the war stricken countries no effort whatever on the part of Galverinia and Angelina could crush the slightest Glandelinian invasion. Glandelinia was right. Had Abbieanna been a week too long after the recent battle of Randall, Glandelinia would have conquered the Christian nation Angelina, as she had almost annihilated all of the Angelinian armies. Abyssinika could not lend the help desired because of the Glandelinian front extending along the northern Galverinian boundary line. She had made most efforts to tear her way through, and so had Abbieanna but it took nearly three years of hardest fighting to do so.

It was Abbeinnia who broke through the glandelinian strength there and not until after three years of fierce and most pugnacious fighting, and hellish resistance from the foe there. But what happened to Galverinia before Abbeinnia managed to break through the northern and western glandelinian barriers. Glandelinia played the game properly and magnificently. She made up the song as already written:

Beneath our banners bright
We go bravely to the fight,
And the spirits of the patriots will hover o'er us,
We will always shot and shell
We will always do our work right and well/
In memory of the heroes gone before us.

With our nation all united,
No foe can need we fear,
Join in with us altogether,
And our enemy shall pay us dear.

And indeed both Angelinia and Galverinia did pay greatly and most dearly to glandelinia for starting the war, without being fully prepared with the main help of Abbeinnia. For three years or over well say nearly four years, since the first Angelinian invasion of glandelinia had been crushed and smashed down the glandelinians had invaded both Angelinia and Galverinia, and destroyed so much property that it seemed impossible to guess the total amount destroyed.

Galverinia was practically wiped out not only soldiers, but every body. Angelinia had a last army standing, when Abbeinnia broke through the barrier, and though general Evans finally checked the enemy at Marie Osborne, he could not prevent the enemy armies from skipping his armies, and getting northward which the Angelinian and Abbeinnian generals wished to prevent. It is believed that Galverinia was really the one that was punished, not glandelinia, and that glandelinia had done all the punishing that could be imagined.

Out of all the Galverinian cities, and towns not a one towered toward the sky ruinless. There was not a single farm, in the whole country, and wide areas, areas of forests, probably tens of thousands of miles, of the forests, were in desolation wiped out by the most ravaging forest fires, that could ever happen and which the fiercest rainstorms failed to subside, and not only that, the greatest number of children in Galverinia no matter what nationality had been slaughtered, by the glandelinians in a manner that would appall God himself, and to boot, all the Galverinian seaports had been blocked up so that no provisions could reach the starving inhabitants by Abbeinnia, and still more serious glandelinia had caused a complication of maladies to break out which ran wild like a heart of the country destroying all those who had not fallen under the sword of the hordes of Gods worse enemies ever living.

Some of the very christian nations predicted thus:

"It is true that all the shocking horrors witnessed by tourists and correspondents who posed as glandelinians, is terrible, far surpassing probably the tortures of the damned, but nevertheless I for one the president of Blomlinia, do say that Galverinia well deserves it for her carelessness, and it ought to be a lesson to not only her in the future but also to other nations who become careless from overconfidence."

The Protestant king also stated:

"Galverinia has already been reported as the most devastated region in the world. Not a million typhoons like the two which swept and tore the heart of the Abbeinnian nation to shreds, can outdo all that the glandelinians committed in Galverinia, and Angelinian combined. But it is through the fault of Galverinia. She threw at the outbreak of the war more armies into the fields, than needed, when most of those armies, or probably a half of them ought to have been garrisoned in the two long lines of McWhirther fortifications, Stephen, and Phillip. For my part it is a good lesson for Galverinia, and ought to teach her not to distrust Angelinia again, and heed not her warning or the warnings of Abbeinnia too."

Christians had recaptured after not a minute's fighting all the ground they had lost

The Abbeinnian king made this report re port!!!

"I have a record of the terrible conflict which had raged through out Galverinia for the space of over three years and ten months. My nation has been in many wars, even with glandelinia also, and also had a severe conflict with Abbeinnia herself during the early christian times. We have seen frightful havoc committed to our own property, or we have seen the fearful havoc we have committed ourselves, but none as bad as reported done by the glandelinians in Galverinia, and northern Angelinia. It does show that through Galverinian carelessness, that Abbeinnia has herself was unable to altogether bar to batter her way through the fortifications of McWhirther, and Aronburg.

In the great war of 1841 when the Abbeinnian torrent poured through Galverinia and within a few months crushed glandelinia out of that stricken child slave torn country, she had started immediately to fortify the great city of Catherine. Noted as it was called in those days. As general Francis Vivian wrote a wise Abbeinnian armies had been the first of the armies of Abbeinnia to win the first battle of the Glandee-Abbeinnian war of eighteen forty one, the city name was changed, and called Vivian Wiskey in his honor. It took whole half a century for the Abbeinnians to build the fortifications, and so strong had they been made that rival nations were afraid to approach the waters of Wiskey Bay.

So it can be imagined how it was that Abbeinnia herself really failed to capture these fortifications, which only philliamsburger Zimmerman, the "Terrible Aronburg" or the "Terrible Wrath of God" as he was called, took himself after smashing the glandelinian armies in the stricken, of Francis Atlanta, Jennie Turner, Gloria, and Virginia Run, besides at Mildred Greenburg, and Logan Zoe Pine Run, and so Abbeinnia felt sheepish indeed over the news. It was the first time in her history that Abbeinnia had met any failures, and crushing failures indeed. It is not the reason that Abbeinnia could not do things. But in some case she knew she could not. The men in Abbeinnia are good at every kind of building work, and her fortifications at her western southern, and northern shores, are so strong, that if Satan and all his host of demons were to at arm and rage their assaults they could never prevail against them, may they could rage and storm their assaults for hundreds of years, and be driven back bitterly defeated. It was reported in early history that in eighteen thirteen that a million demons did make an assault upon the fortification of McWhirther, and raged the attack for fourteen months without any days intermission or night either, and finally had to give it up as it was of no use. Abbeinnians who defended these fortifications did not need to use Holy Water or present the sign of the cross. Guns cannons and fire from liquid oil did the work.

Thus it can easily be seen why Abbeinnia could not carry the McWhirther fortifications. In some battles the Abbeinnians had assaulted their own fortifications early before the war, and failed to take them from the defenders despite the fact that blank cartridges were even used in the same fights. So when all the fleets of the christian allies again and again stormed and raged against the McWhirther fortifications, without success, and only meeting disaster upon disaster, and when finally the fiercest bombardment occurred and ended so fearfully with such tremendous loss in lives and ships, Abbeinnia realized that for facts she had made fortifications build out of her own hands so powerful that it was even impossible for her, herself to take them. Now Zimmerman accomplished it is a most astounding mystery. It was still more harder to capture these fortifications by land. The main first attempt was made by general Hanson in the frightful battle of Evangeline Grania when his troops by the covering fire of eight hundred thousand cannon battered a hell storm of shells and explosives upon the fortifications of Jennie Vivian, and Marcusian, and also the fortifications of Jennie Turner. It was reported that the roar of so many great guns, when the forts answered their own storm, was sleep deafening when heard at the distance of a hundred score of miles, and so shook the city of Jennie Wiskey to the ground, and raised the cities of Angelina, Jennifer, and Paul as a fender. This was the first fierce attempt to take the McWhirther fortifications by land, and it was made by "annon vivian" himself on that bloody christia Christmas day when oceans of blood seemed to be spilled, when the whole battle in its thousands of titanic assaults was a screaming horror.

3558* There is no doubt that the fortifications of McWhirther could have been captured, had it not been so that Hanson's army was not a crushing defeat upon the time of the bloody assaults against Fort Cedarline on the Turner hills. It is true that the christian army of Hanson's army captured the fortifications of Marousian, but he was finally driven out when all the other fortifications of McWhirther were manned upon his forces and this is the reason for one part where the great and one of the first bloodiest battles of the war was lost.

If it had not been for the successes of general Whillmshurger Zimmermann the war would have turned out as a Glandelinian victory, and then the whole world would have been in danger of a continual strife with this wickedest of all nations.... Calverina has been frightfully devastated by the foe but it is her own fault for not guarding the fortifications, which caused the Glandelinians to capture them after seven hundred tremendous battles which were not named, or whose names were withheld..... So there is no one to blame for the series of most frightful disasters brought on by the war but Calverina herself....

Hanson himself had made statements about the Calverinian situation himself. He had known from the start that if the Calverinians had not been on their guard a very terrible disaster would happen to her. He knew from the horrors going on during the child slave rebellion, and also during the Calverinian rebellion that Glandelinia was wicked as she was a nation not to be trifled with, and Calverina would not take heed. Even the bloody child slave rebellion was a good warning. The child slaves were really being worsted, which was the cause of the Calverinians rising up in rebellion with the intent of reholding the child slave rebellion. Angelina and Abbie-anna had warned the Calverinians not to join in the insurrection, declaring that it was dangerous.

Glandelinia had recently before the child slave rebellion had reached its worse had trouble with Proteus tentia, and so had not been in any mood to be trifled with. The Calverinian rebellion was also blamed for the massacre of christ christian children at Crowley. And also at Jennie-Wren-Town. The Calverinian rebellion then was at its worse, and it is no doubt that Glandelinia fearing that the insurrection would spread so far that nothing could stop it sent troops under general Hennie Shoeman to stop it. Hennie Shoeman had been it is true opposed of being sent through Angelina to Calverina. For he knew that at that time the situation of both nations was serious, and already hanging over the precipice that would hurl them down into the maelstrom of bloody war. To pass through with his army he knew would be at this critical time considered as an act of hostile invasion on the part of Angelina. So while he halted his army south of the Angelinian boundary line he left his command in the care of general Francis McWhirther, and Allister while he went to consult the king on which course he should take. General McWhirther was in favor of pushing on and not waiting for the return of general Shoeman and so he started across the boundary line, and entered Crowley. At the first entrance his army was treated with as much respect as devils would be treated on entering a christian church, and though at first the Glandelinians were looked on with hostile and repugnant faces from the inhabitants nothing serious occurred on until a Sunday following.

Then as the soldiers of naughty Glandelinia were passing through the streets of Crowley and also Jennie-Wren-Town, from every house, every window door, and alley, and house top a withering fire was poured upon the unsuspecting soldiers with such terrific slaughter that the Glandelinians had to retreat in panic. This did not for a time seemed to be resented by the Glandelinians, though some friends of the Crowley Courts advised them to withdraw the people from the two cities, as terrible consequences would come of the sniping of the soldiers. Three days later after an unusual quiet, mobs of yelling gray-coated demons surged through the two great cities, burning and pillaging, tearing children from limbs to limb, disgracing women and men and even slaughtering the most unmercifully until the two cities and the regions about resembled the slaughter houses of hell.

Thus this great massacre that occurred precipitated the two nations into war without any explanations, or demands to retrieve the massacre that was committed by the foe during that time. When Hennie Shoeman returned from the council with the king he was shocked by the news of the havoc committed by his army, but it was too late to withdraw them from Angelina as two big Angelinian and Abyssinilian armies were pressing down on his army like a raving pack of bulldogs bent on revenge for the massacre already committed.

The war had progressed with its terrifying fury as already predicted, and during those years and years, Calverina and Glandelinia met a visitation that was well known, and described as long in detail as could possibly be done. After breaking up the first christian invasion it was Glandelinia who really declared war, even acknowledged her declaration of war against Abbie-anna, saying Abbie-anna to come on general Lugatorian seized the big cities of Julio Callio, Norma, and Vivian wickey, and so all the efforts of Abbie-anna to come to Angelina and had seemed nil, until general Whillmshurger Zimmermann had finally forced the surrender of these three fiery war hells, and captured the entire Glandelinian naval bases formed in Calverina, besides taking possession of the Hlongiglowan islands, and smashing the enemy armies to pieces at Gloria even before general Hanson, and Vivian came up to the rescue with their armies.

Now general Whillmshurger, Zimmermann managed to hold his ground during the battle of Aronburgs Run while all the other christian armies, were being driven into confusion at the headlong onslaughts of the enemy, could never be under understood, but he did, and saved the day until general general Vivian, and his brother with their armies, came up, and after hard fight but, first drove the enemy from the Gordon and Carnation ridges, and then taking possession of the Vivian hills met every last onslaught the enemy had made until the foe finally gave it up and retreated in the greatest confusion ever seen occurring after any battle in that beautiful war.....

It can be believed that great general Whillmshurger Zimmermann would be given the credit of bringing the war to a speedy close. It had been dreaded by many of the other christian nations that the war, would last at least eight years, or probably more, and it was also feared that the results would be so terrible that they could never be listed. It is true as reported before like at even the battle of Jennie Turner a complications of disasters hit the christian armies hard, but nevertheless the battle was a christian victory, and prevented the enemy from having a full sway in their invasion of western Angelina during the bloody Angelina Anathia campaign then raging. It also was a proof that the very general Zimmermann if given time could do what no nation believed could be done, and that is take the fortifications of McWhirther, and also Julio Callio and Norma Catherine.

When general Whillmshurger Zimmermann first took command of the Angelinian armies, it had not been expected that he would turn out such a great soldier as he had showed himself. When he met his first failure at the battle of Crowley Run, it was believed by the Angelinian government, that he could not accomplish anything that would insure the safety of the Calverinian nation, and he would have been withdrawn from command if it had not been proved that the cause of the battle being lost was of the great general being so seriously wounded that he was unconscious for hours, and was unable to remove command, even when recovering. The fall and wounding, of or the death of the greatest commanders ever living could demoralize the best armies, on the battle fields, and this made the government reluctant in their intentions, and he was to retain his command.

Zimmermann throughout his service fought few battles, in the war but nevertheless, he staged the fiercest conflict few battles, in the war but this was spent in raiding around the enemy rear, in harassing retreating enemy armies, and the like. Such is mentioned of Zimmermann's greatest victory during the battle of Ambrose Creek, where he fought his first fiercest battle of the war. Starting with their devil yell the enemy had assaulted the christian lines without the slightest warning. So many wild and mad had fled before the oncoming Glandelinians that they had driven the christians in the line of enemy attack into confusion, and so for the first part of the battle general Francis Schmidt's Glandelinians had had everything their own way. They had been in possession of all of the christian front line trenches, and though general Hanson's line of troops swept over the region afterwards known as "Hans and" from the terrific slaughter on both sides, the enemy could not be checked, and after driving the christians back made three hundred onslaughts upon the remaining line without cessation, until throwing forward their heaviest waves with the greatest alacrity, they soon had drove the whole christian line under general Hanson from its entire position, and it seemed as if the battle was as good as won, for Hanson's army was so badly mangled that it could not stand its ground any longer and the worse of it all was that the main christian commander next to Hanson was killed, and Hanson severely wounded. Officer generals fell by scores but their names had been withheld.

Christians had captured himself came back into christian possession and so the most numerous fighting all the ground they had lost

One of the most popular thing things that poor soldiers ever experienced was during this section of the war when six americans had went to spy on the enemy and who had been accompanied by Violet and her sisters. Their expedition had been very successful though that of course did not enter the enemys lines but learned their intentions by means of friends who had managed to give them a strong pull. The weather that day was somewhat cold and miserable and all morning it had been quite dark and the sky had been overcast with clouds of a peculiar white color.

quite dark and the sky was overcast. The thick woods they had left tracks in the old snow and these on their return trip toward the christiania lines they finally followed for a time. Violet and her sisters being somewhat in the lead knowing the way better than the rest did, put about an hour after they had started back, they noticed a small flakes of snow began to fall. first it was like a flurry, stopping and coming again at times then became more general but snowing still gently and though violet and her sisters warned the americans not to be rash as a blizzard was beginning the americans did not heed them and decided to halt for a while and take a rest. who snow which fell for a whole hour finally gave violet and her sisters now almost the impression that it was only a snow flurry but the storm had soon developed into a swirling raging blizzard of greatest fury and a highcrawling gale of wind started to blow intermittently. the tracks soon became obscure, and it was with great difficulty that they ever could make them out. the wind threatening to rise to the strength of a real hurricane hurled the stinging atoms of flame into their eyes so that at times the americans unused to such storms of cold fire felt themselves completely blinded. nevertheless at first the Governingmen here could scarcely believe what was happening, nevertheless at first they were not alarmed thinking that the americans were nervous. however when they saw how easily they thought they could come have a little fun out of the "ivian girls and have them taken care of by the americans could do many things too. Even when the snow falling new them thickly enveloped them all like a blanket and made it impossible to see. In the confusion and distraction they remarked the experience was in the light of a frolic.

To protect themselves as much as possible from the bitter cold hurricane and because they became separated from each other continually, they began to walk lock-step fashion. First some of the Americans would take the lead then the rest, each pacing behind the other in a hand-to-hand line. At first they faced behind their comrades but then they would reverse the order and they would take the few moments rest to new they must have trudged and dragged themselves through the ever deepening blanket of snow for about an hour when suddenly Violet and her sisters were leading some of the Americans brought them to a halt with a tug at their shoulders. They had just plunged and slid to the bottom of a ravine or in the woods, and the formation of the woods made it possible to take either of the two courses in skirting a line of high trees which they could not have hoped to miss and which they remembered they had not approached toward directly. Violet and her sisters had just turned to the east when the Americans brought them to the sudden halt.

to the students. "What are the wrong way little girls?" One of them asked rather nervously. "Are you sure?" Asked Violet. "I am quite possible we came from this direction." Violet and her sisters were still quite positive that they were right, but this time there were any landmarks in the ways of rocks, shrubbery and trees or such they were either covered by the snow or they were unable to see them through the mark of the driving snow. Violet and her sisters at last argued the americans to their way to thinking and they continued on the way they had all started. This was enough for a time but they found themselves wondering at a very long point whether they were right or not. And the more the little girls thought of it the more confused they became. When at last became the turn of one of the americans once more they seemed very downcast.

"It's no use," one of them said. "You little girls may have come right, but I cannot be too sure of myself for a single step. I have not the least idea where we are."

When they thought it over Violet and her sisters had not much idea as to their location themselves, and meanwhile the cold was biting into the Americans with cruel teeth and Violet and her sisters being too used to cold weather and being able to stand it even without clothing on did not hardly so feel it but did not like the idea of being lost in a raging blizzard and run the chances of being captured by

The gladiolus leader with spine broken, sprawled writhing on the snow. Into the very midst of the gray coated mass of gladiolus men forcing them back from the others in some confusion, he leaped now roaring with rage, his great shoulders heaving and the light of battle in his eyes. High into the air lashed the clubbed pike, whirling and smashing faster than ever any armoured knight death death blow, with battle ax or mace. (Just now the great a. . . .)

Indolines who may be prowling about in spite of the storm. Violet and her sisters however were becoming very hungry and so were the Americans,, and the Americans thought that a bite to one eat night was a good idea. They were almost frightened at the numbness of their fingers when they tried to pull open the strap which bound their knapsacks. Some of the Americans tried it but their fingers had no strength. Together they tugged and pulled at them but it was of no use. Finally some of the other Americans took them in their teeth while the others held the snakes between their stiffened fingers or fists, and they managed to start the buckle when it was strong enough to insert their aching fingers in the loop of the strap and tug it open. While they at the open buckle they shook their fingers violently and shook out their hands from their wet wrists.

The meal was indeed very sparse for the Angolians with the little girls did not care to be left without anything to eat, they were all throughoutly frightened, though even then they did not think that even then they realized fully the seriousness of the situation. All the while it was getting much darker and they did not know whether night was near or whether the clouds were piling up thicker and thicker over the sun. At last with even last warning than usual the worse came, the darkness of the storm clouds added to their difficulties and what with the natural gloom and the blinding swirling swirl of snow go growing so thick as to obscure objects fifty feet they could actually speaking scarce see a hand before their faces. Fortunately for the Americans Violet and her sisters themselves were not lost and within two hours of more traveling they at last brought the Americans safely within the Christian lines and never again did the Americans think that the Vivian girls could be so easily fooled as supposed. . . . . .

That cold snowy night they spent silently within the two christian lines entrenched before Fortuin and one of the nine Americans with skins in hands sat on the edge of his bed in his winter tent long into the night listening to the hiss of the snow on the roof of the tent and the scream and howl of the fierce wind. Suddenly he started, then a stiffened, gave a shudder from the farthest eastern entry line crawled, then a long quivering cry floated down toward the christian lines, vibrating and rolling fiercely, and another cry came to be echoed by the distant hills and taken up at long intervals in the distance. Slowly died away, very weird and unnamable, worse than the howl and scream of beasts in flight, more terrible than the very howl of the terrible volving winds from the full earth, and then burst forth afresh, and the marion hearing became alert, his eyes and his face fiercely with the light of battle, and through his brain came the instant army desire to go out and to battle. Carefully he cut a large piece of leather from a broad army strap he had in the tent with him and fitted it about his neck so a light collar to keep the tyvek snow from going down his back tied around with even heavy purple lace from his army boot. The strange yelling cry finally ceased and the marion in his tent paced restlessly, peering out of the tent opening occasionally. On his forehead great beads of perspiration of excitement beaded forth and rolled down, then he trembled violently and murmured, when in the distance over in the direction of the E vancouver Grand ridge or Heights the strange cry whatever it was sounded again, and he writhed as he paced. He then stumbled against something at the foot of the army cot and it crashed to the floor. As he bent to pick it up his hand touched the familiar trigger of his own long rifle and he stopped. A very cruel light came into his eyes, transforming him completely. He was a gladiatorial killer, the blood lust became strong in his brain, his trembling of excitement ceased. Laying the long Angelina rifle close as possible, he knelt on his army bolt put on his undecorated coat, and arming himself with his short nature put on his army cap and left the tent.

That same morning Violet and her sisters had also left the christian home with the purpose of going on some scouting tour and so if the enemy were really suspicious of any movements their uncle or father may make shortly after midday the scene began to fall heavily again and the sky became once again more darkened than it had the day before. Violet hurriedly shook her head wondering at the early grip of winter and saying an inward prayer to God and His blessed Holy Mother, while some of the girls with Violet and her sisters cursed the weather and allowed them to permit Violet and her sisters to go through this ordeal in a blizzard storm of that last week of November.

One of the most peculiar things that poor soldiers ever experienced was during this section of the war when six Americans had went to spy on the enemy and who had been accompanied by Violet and her sisters. Their expedition had been very successful though that of course did not enter the enemy lines but learned their intentions by means of friends who had managed to give them a strong pull.

On the other side of the same point or location of ground the American soldier climbed, driven on by the mad fury in his brain, powerful and dangerous indeed being more like a primeval person reborn. All the potency of a thousand generations of hardy savagery were awakened in perversion of his mind. Spurred on by the strong unshakably rolling staircase of the distant glandelinian yell he swiftly followed the sound. Little and most mighty graces personified, he breasted the big white mounting drifts of hard hilly snow, unmindful of the blinding swirling clouds of snow and the intense cold and hurricane of wind threatening to blow a tree down at any minute. With the advent of the day the strange cry of the distant foe came less frequently and finally died away altogether. And as the sound finally lessened and then ceased altogether the fury in the American's brain subsided, and left him wondering at the cause that lured him into the thickets far away from the main Christian lines. Gently he laughed, an impatient, half frightened laugh. "Hea out of the slowly gathering dusk of the crushing storm came again and again the terrible quivering deep throated cry of some glandelinian profligate, and it seemed then that countless glandelinians answered it and made the whole region echo with the yelling. Instantly the eyebrows of the American contracted, drops of sweat or perspiration came again to his forehead and from there, his hands clutched, and the fury gripped him again. A low throaty gasp came immediately from him, and starting in the direction of the sound, he shouldered aside the brush. A number of American soldiers coming onward with Violet and her sisters heard the strange Glandelinian cry and whipped up their slowly traveling horses, the noise of the distant unsavory yell striking fear into the hearts of their soldier companions with the hoarse words:

"Providing Glandelinians sending looking for chances to make a raid."

And making and frightened and two of the Indian girls were uncovered and bowed into a deep snow drift. The American soldiers wisely sought an open space on the side of some high slope where the trees formed a wide circle, ominous and forbidding, some distance away on all sides. Here the thirteen Angelinians and the seven little girls armed with rifles and pistols ready, when their rifles and pistols roared in a thunderous volley as gray forms appeared at the edge of a thicket, and a shower of pin answered followed by a roar of glandelinian musketry as the Glandelinians answered the fire. The American coming steadily across the bottom of the foot of the slope at this time heard the crashing din of twenty rifles and pistols and the sharp cries of Glandelinians as they spread out in the circle of death and answering with their own rifle fire. From the depths their dully business wicked eyes appeared now and then as they emitted the leaping rush of the great leader to close in on the fugitives. Then knowing that some brave Angelinians were in danger and forgetting himself the American broke into a swift run. Reaching the edge of the clearing just as a number of the Glandelinians charged on the trio in the center with the remainder of the horde of Glandelinians spreading out in its own circle to cut off escape from all sides he saw Violet and her sisters even before the rifles of the men spoke. He fired twice himself and so then for some reason the trigger mechanism jammed with the powder of his loading, put these two shots in the rear served indeed to disconcert the first real attack, and gave the men in the center and also the little girls who fired also a chance to fire or more rapidly. A moment the American tore at the breach of his rifle. When he shrieked wildly with greater fury, his right hand brandished the rifle as a club, while the other swung his short sabre. When he advanced a most formidable figure, with head lowered, emitting hoarse cries to his comrades and the little girls. Even as the Glandelinians again closed in their yelling charge he was in their midst. In their terror, praying a hysterically, Violet and her sisters had seen him coming, and hope sprung anew.

When the American the Colonel of the attacking Glandelinians sprang with the purpose of checking the threat of the American with his sabre but fortunately the latter hand put there as the result of some unaccountable working of the mind blunted and sent the sabre flying that had been driven by the full swing of the rebels arm. The hand jerked backwards under the impact, but the short sabre wielded with all the strength of the sinewy arm came down in a crushing blow as the long gray uniformed man flashed by in an effort to escape the rage of the American.

The Glandelinian leader with spine broken, sprawled writhing on the snow. Into the very midst of the gray coated mass of Glandelinians forcing them back from the others in some confusion, he leaped rear rising with rage, his great shoulders heaving the mad light of battle in his eyes. High into the air lashed the clubbed rifle, whirling and smashing faster than ever any armed knight death death blow, with battle ax or mace. Silent now his first immense rage forgotten, he snatched himself and breasted himself under the wild assault meeting the rushing Glandelinians right and left in all directions with terrific blows that sent the life fleeing from one after another of the surprised attackers. Ste straight on his one of the strongest and biggest of the wicked Glandelinians leaped, and he met the rebel with a murderous swing of the rifle that era crushed the skull of the wicked Glandelinian and shattered the gun stock of the American leaving only the bloody iron hinged, itself a most deadly weapon, clutched in his hand. At the same time another Glandelinian closed from the side, and the blow from a bay sabre laid bare the raw flesh of his back, but he battled on, while in the rear, the rifles roared until the circle, closing from the other side in redoubt fury bore them down. Arms and shoulders heaved and torn, he stood a most terrible colossus with piled up dead about him and found himself free at last. A sudden made him suddenly turn. One of the Indian girls was down clutching her throat with the fir collar of her dress suppettism while the soldiers standing astride the prostrate huddled form of the Indian girl who were out of ammunition still walked their own rifles as clubs, fighting desperately, but weakly. The sight of the Indian girls drive the American in his fury to the full breach fury of battle, it united to the ultimate degree that inherent instinct which the cry of the Glandelinians had called into being. Heed to the wail in the bitter cold, with blood streaming from the terrible gashes at the base of his neck where the leather guard still served so staunchly he launched into the remainder of the scurrying mass of Glandelinians like an unleashed thunderbolt. Sweeping in his fury, a wild horde of death West of the Glandelinians turned to meet this interloper as one who only meant an addition to their kill. Instead they met a flailing, bone crushing, bent and twisted thing of iron, wielded by some mighty man muscles that drove it with killing force and fury rain making terrible blows as a heavily man-antree his way during the noise of a charge. Heaton down on the forehead one of the Glandelinians finally gave way before him. As the last of them then, the few still able, fled his bloodshot eyes saw a faint movement of the Glandelinian Colonel as he tried to struggle off with the spine broken by the blow of his sabre. As the soldiers came bounding the wounds of the American the mortally wounded Glandelinian Colonel was hastily but carefully taken to the camp and after this any Glandelinians thought twice before ever fighting an American at close quarters. With his clubbed gun, and single handed he had killed twenty three Glandelinians and routed the remaining twenty. The Angelinians and Indian girls themselves had shot down about twelve.

captured himself and took into Christian possession and so the Christians and recaptured after that having all the ground they had lost during the month of October and as far as November 1912. and during the progress of the siege of Vivian Wickey and all her fortresses, and also while the armies under general Hanson a Vivian and his brother Robert Vivian were advancing southward with the purpose of joining the siege one million six hundred and forty five thousand glandelinians all wretched and broken down men, confronted the larger christian armies once more near Carbondaler, and by the end of October after a whole month of serious and unendurable fighting the whole situation of this force of besieged glandelinians was beginning to tell, and for the beleaguered it was the final and everywhere, when all was over. Fearful Red Mars of horror and devastation, and fury of the war storm for these glandelinians had passed over the horizon, and the White Star of peace for them only already shone faintly on the horizon. The White Star of peace for them only already shone faintly on the horizon. The shattered remnants of this section of the immense glandelinian army of Vivian Wickey, pallbearers of the lost cause of Vivian Wickey, had been during the conflicts driven hither and thither from place to place, barefooted and in rags, half starving, without water and provisions and sufficient clothing to keep them warm for the coming winter, and surrounded so long and finally losing out on ammunition and not receiving report from Vivian Wickey as none could reach them, they had finally surrendered, and gave themselves up to end the horrible inferno of a months time. Indeed the whole world was surprised when the news papers throughout the nations put in this news:

"HANS BATTLE NEAR CARBONDALER OVER AT LAST. GLANDELINIAN ARMY SURRENDERS TO BESIEGERS. SECOND GREATEST CHRISTIAN VICTORY."

ABBESENN. NOVEMBER 9TH 1912. (BY THE UNIVERSAL SERVICE)..... The world department of Angelina this morning surprised all the nations of the world by announcing that the surrender of all the glandelinian armies engaged in the battle of Cohen near Carbondaler and their generals who had remained with the besieged submitted by the christians to the glandelinians had been signed. The resignations and surrenders had been signed at 10 A.M. Abbeesenn's time and between the small force of besieged and the Carbondaler besiegers hostilities had ceased at 11 A.M. Abbeesenn Time. (T. by ceased at five o'clock this morning (Angelina) time.

The glandelinian generals had been given twenty four hours in which to surrender their armies, and all reach their new decision, as they feared their period of grace would expire at 11 A.M.

The announcement of the signing of the surrender at the departments of Abbeesenn, and the other christian countries engaged in this terrible war had been indeed very dramatic. Upon the receipt of the good and surprising news of the surrender of the glandelinian armies of over a million men over the Abbeesenn navy wires a messenger aroused the Abbeesenn Prince Prince who was asleep at the time, and the whole of Abbeesenn and her states was soon notified of the news. This gave Hanson an opportunity indeed to draw his main armies still more closer around the main sections of Vivian Wickey. The terms of surrender it was announced was as follows:

"Immediate retirement of remaining glandelinian armies and other military forces from the regions of Carbondaler, disarming and demobilization of all glandelinian armies which had been compelled to surrender. Occupation of by the Abbeesenn and Angelinian forces of such strategic points of the nearest parts of Vivian Wickey as will make possible a tightening of the siege. Delivery of all the glandelinian high sea fleets and a full number of all the glandelinian submarines to the Abbeesenns, and also Galverinian naval forces from the gunboat river near Carbondaler. Occupation of all the main principal glandelinian bases by sea forces of all the victorious Abbeesenn forces, and disarmament and capture of all other glandelinian ships including steamers, frigates, and gunboats in the gorm river, and under supervision of the christian navies which will guard them.

The Abbeesenn generals had also ordered the wicked glandelinian general in charge and their entire party interned, and though the other rebel general and his wife had fled it was reported they had been overtaken, and it is also reported that probably the whole list of glandelinian generals guilty of child slaughter and murder in gorm Catherine throughout July and August accompanied the former rebel general and his wife before he and she was overtaken and captured, though of course all the fugitives had been fully armed and showed resistance to the pursuers.

Christians had captured himself came back into christian possession and as the Christians had recaptured the post abandoned by the glandelinians all the ground they had lost Immense trains of flat and other freight cars with escaping officers, generals and troops of soldiers from Cohen had also been drawn up before the closely guarded glandelinian Imperial trains and the unloading of these cars were done in the shortest order by the Abbeesennian soldiers who had pursued and captured the foe fugitives before they got to the refuge of Vivian Wickey, all these to be taken to the internment camps where also the general and all those taken with him shall be sent....

Mrs Bertha Thomas and her husband the general are reported under arrest. The other local officers of the fallen division of troops have fled and general Ballenina genius of the late Empress Prince was reported dead, believed to be a suicide in order to escape the fury of the pursuing christian soldiery. Prince Goldlocks who had been in Vivian Wickey in time and reviewed the besieged foe army was reported shot in the arm by the Abbeesennians as she fled before the advance of the Tripoligonloans troops. Nearly every village and small town except Jemine Vivian is now flying either the Abbeesennian, Galverinian, Abyssinian, Angelinian and other flags of the Abbeesennian states. The Abbeesennians and the other christians are also in supreme possession of all the glandelinian and Galverinian railroads now running through and from all points of Vivian Wickey and her other score of sections, which they paralyzed by proclaiming a general blockade.

Officers and men who still resisted were shot, or captured and imprisoned. It is also reported that the railroad paralysis is bringing danger of famine to the besieged glandelinians in Vivian Wickey, but it cannot be confirmed as it is reported the rebels in Vivian Wickey have all kinds of communications from Galverine either by land or underground tunnels and receive provisions from there. No provisions from gorm river and the Bay of Vivian Wickey. It seems probable that Vivian Wickey is going to be the most fearful siege of all times....

Indeed the second horror of the great siege of Vivian Wickey was really over at last. In all the nine months of the fearful and bloody siege and war which almost in some sections already wiped out Angelinian and Galverinian armies, there had been fought amazingly to think of it many battles big or small, and the losses of both sides were so heavy in killed and wounded, and the numbers of those disabled for life was so great that if known they were really withheld while already the war had cost the christian nation over a hundred million dollars, especially in pay for the soldiers. The fearful war of course had not been so fearfully severe as yet, but it probably had not slackened in its fury and some battles had ended at once like some sudden and violent tornado that came and passed as fast as it had struck, but not any portion of Glandelinia or even Angelina was so fearfully devastated as the country of Galverina, which could not be accomplished on account of the recent fierce opposition of the foe during the past invasion. Of course their resistance had been shattered here and there again and again, and still again, but nevertheless it did not benefit the christian army, for they were or had been prevented by the fury of opposition from committing all the havoc they had been ordered to. The amount of damaged property in Glandelinia during the invasion was severe enough however, and the lords at Carbondaler still at large had predicted the loss of property as far as nearly nine hundred million dollars.

But it was a very small sum compared to the losses in property on the side of the christians themselves. It is hard to predict which is or is to be the hardest sufferer in losses but it was predicted that Abbeesenn, and Protestantia suffered the greatest loss in ships in the fierce efforts of all the christian nations in helping Angelina and Abbeesenn in trying to batter down the sea parts of the fortifications of Me-Whirther of Vivian Wickey during the month of September and October.

At the start of the war real general ferocity all tourists and others had fled the threatened nations, and yet during the later part of 1912 they had daringly returned to the same ruined regions to see the heights of the havoc the war was doing. It had been at first been the intentions of the Abbeesenn and Angelinian governments and even the Gendri to bar all these persons, but King Gannon who had returned from America by ship and train at the outbreak of the Child Love Rebellion had ordered the government authorities to allow them to come as it was a sight worth while to witness and it would probably impress these people who come to see the ruins to get their own nations to show sympathy for the stricken countries and lend a helping hand as far as it was in their power.

It was decided by general Hanson that the christian armies which had captured Garbondalar and Colan should remain in these two places for several months of till at least of Hanson's arrival with his armies, and then if the foe positions at Laughing Landing and elsewhere were forced these armies would be withdrawn to take part in the general siege of Jivinn Lokwy.

During the time of general Hanson's advance toward Jivinn Lokwy and also during his concentration of troops before the city which brought on the bloody battle of Laughing Landing he had started the third weekly meeting of the Abbleannian and Jivinnian Council which had been just called to order. It was to be really decided at this third meeting of council whether general Joss Joseph Mac- or Mic- Farn would be called upon to lead the army or not for his blunder at the battle of Garbondalar Hills, as well as his generalship or not for his blunder at the battle of who had on entering the army gained his commission of general but a few months before the opening of the battle of Ulverine. Of course many of the generals and even all the troops of soldiers and officers of all other ranks and even violet and her sisters, and their girl and boy friends had found general Mic-Farn to be a pretty nice fellow, righteas and good in many other ways, good natured, and willing to do anything he was asked, and when he had been commissioned a general by the Ulverinian government general Hanson had at once induced him to join his own armies and lead for him. At the battle of Ulverine Hills however general Mic-Farn had his army or division through a mistake he had made had been caught in a trap and annihilated, and this had brought on the reason of the christian armies failing to hold the hills and the battle his being lost.

At first it was believed that general Mic-Farn had made the blunder on purpose because of some under officer had called him a name because he would not allow him to pass his degree, thus keeping the main line of action from counter charging the wildly attacking rebels, where had been a battle dew pits the trap in which he had been caught in in which he had turned out victorious but never never theless the rest of the christian line had mentioned in the story of the battle had been disastrously beaten.

As many of the christian generals were furious over the results of the blunder general Hanson had declared to the government of Abbleannia that they would have to send in written degrees that general Mic-Farn would have to be expelled from command, and so general Hanson had early called this special meeting to vote upon it. Many of the generals in the convention and even Mic-Farn's friends the Jivinn girls themselves and to say seemed to be of the same mind, and so it was determined that as soon as the degree was signed by the authorities of Angelina and Ulverina and sent to Abbleannia, and then returned to Hanson general Mic-Farn would be unanimously expelled and another general placed in his stead.

Shortly after this voting general Mic-Farn was ordered to move his armies back to his own section near Jennie Jivinn, where all the generals claimed it belonged. The next meeting of the generals a little after the battle of Laughing Landing had just been called to order. Hanson had not received the written degree in return as so he had a proposal to make that would be of interest to all his generals as the many bigger armies of christians had now been closing on toward Battery Line river and Jennie Jivinn because of an epidemic of skirmishes and a artillery duels during the meanwhile. He suggested that the generals concentrate their army divisions to all points necessary and ordered general Kindernine to attempt and capture the town of Janda Canada. He knew of a good section of the enemy positions his troops could use if they were captured by abrupt assaults.

All of the christian generals were very enthusiastic over it indeed, and express their desires in many ways. After much discussion lasting for four hours it was voted on unanimously by all those generals and other officers present and preparat ions for the new action of the siege were at once made. After desultory action without a general battle however the positions were secured, and all provisions captured by those assigned to the task, and every thing was ready for the main action that was expected to be made on the next day. It was on the following morning that the Jivinn girls went on their daring spying trip into Jivinn Lokwy and stayed under all reefs for about three weeks, see next chapter. The action of the morning was more general and ranged three days, but it was successful and the enemy began to fall back into the main positions with heavy loss unable to withstand the assaults. It was arranged that general Herdrude Harris would have to follow the next day and assault the foe positions near Jennie Jivinn, but at the outset of the resumption of the struggle his divisions were repulsed and the general killed.

On the time of this five day battle general Hanson arrived at the scene on the morning of the sixth day and not seeing any general to meet him, set off alone to muster his artillery lines for a general bombardment. His artillery, however, were very unfamiliar with that section of the enemy's territory, and so, when on account of foggy days from battle smoke that the Jivinnian fortresses were frowning upon them close by. The artillery men after a day of horrible work, finding themselves out numbered by enemy artillery and threatened with annihilation began to waver, and most of the guns stopped firing and were withdrawn which general Hanson did not know of.

Christian and captured himself and took into christian possession and so the christian had recaptured the most important position and the ground they had lost

On the evening of that day of the artillery storm the generals of the many lines of batteries ordered the gunners to build small configurations so as to declare the foe, and also asked for great forces of infantry to keep away the greatly feared surprise attacks the foe were always apt to make, especially when they would be attracted by so many guns which they would be attempted to try and capture. In the morning general Hanson consulted his generals of the artillery and the request the artillery firing began again. During the while of the artillery duel general Hanson noticed that a portion of the battery was on the opposite side of a small canyon through which the Sunbeam Creek ran, at which he was forced to push a force of infantry if he wished to save the artillery line from being worsted. Fortunately he had engineers who could work out any problem, and these had been consulted by him and they soon laid across a number of trees at many parts and planned them all the way across making bridges of rude fashion. They had succeeded in making bridges but they nevertheless would be difficult to cross especially if the infantry were to be under fire from foe infantry and artillery combined. And this was to be the trouble. The forces of troops however being unafraid started across. Large divisions of troops got across without as much difficulty as had been feared, but they had not dared to look down as they had found on taking one look that many soldiers became dizzy and almost lost their balance.

The last solo columns of troops were almost across, when the foe artillery saw the columns moving across the columns, and so many of the guns were brought to bear on the bridges and the troops. The results was horrible for thousands at one volley were hurled down the deep abyss to their deaths, and scores of thousands more were tangled and torn and killed or wounded by the terrific infantry fire of the foe and the columns had to charge with all fury to take the position in front of them or perish. They succeeded but oh at what an awful cost. In the disaster to the rear column one of the generals fell with the rest falling downward at a sickening rate of speed but he finally landed on something solid, and all before him came he became black. When he awoke it was getting dark, and still the artillery was roaring with redoubled violence, and so he lay still not daring to move for fear he would roll off the ledge upon which he had fallen and join his myriads of comrades below. He was almost blinded by the sheeted lightning like flashes of long lines of active artillery, almost stunned by the roar, and yet could not go to sleep for the same reason. To make matters worse his right foot and leg pained him terribly and he found he was also wounded in the shoulder and side, and his leg and foot was bleeding badly. His wounds were not from falling, but from shell fragments which he received when the foe shelled the columns and bridges.

He finally dozed off however despite the uproar of cannons and later he awoke to find that it was morning. That morning all was quiet in artillery but he could hear a lot of noise which told him a fierce infantry battle was going on some where and the sky was gray from smoke from probably a great fire burning somewhere.

And the ledge upon which he had fallen was about twenty feet wide, and was at the mouth of a small aperture which led upwards. He tried to walk toward the aperture but found his leg and foot pained him so badly and that he was so weak from the wound in his side that it was impossible for him to even arise. He then started to cry for help hoping that someone might hear him, and come to his rescue though it was doubtful if any one would hear him from the distance he was down and from the noise of the fray. Nevertheless fifteen to twenty minutes later after he continued to yell and holler he heard from somewhere an answering shout.

General Mic-Fern not yet discharged as Hanson had not received an answer from the authorities was out scouting with a party of officers and men and had pursued a small force of glandelinian cavalry into the very canyon in which the wounded general was lying on the ledge. General Mic-Fern and his followers had been startled by hearing someone calling for help and the noise of the distant fray.

He at once answered detailing his men and officers to go into many directions so as to find the one, and all setting out in the direction of the cry soon found the wounded christian general, and some of them at once built a large bonfire to wave the now almost frozen wounded christian general. He and some other officers had to start the fire with the Angelinian army fire drill method as neither the wounded general or he, or his followers had any matches with them.

The wounded general was surprised as he had thought that Mic-Fern had been discharged from his command long ago. General Mic-Fern cooked some game he shot, and then knowing it would be almost impossible to carry the wounded general on a horse on account of his condition, so he and his officers built three big bonfires to signal for help, and all of the officers and men fired their pistols in all and rifles in long drawn volleys at intervals.

Three hours later they heard shouts of many soldiers who had been sent out to search for the wounded general who they had missed. General Mic-Fern answered, and a few minutes later the soldiers with some officers came into view around a bend in the distant woods. General Mic-Fern waved to them and the soldiers waved back as a sign that they saw him and his troopers.

When most of the Angelinian soldiers had reached the ledge, they were indeed surprised to see general Mic-Fern, and would have dared to ask him numerous questions, but he ordered them to make haste and take the poor wounded general to the christian lines.

"Where are you going general?" asked one of the officers. "Are you not coming right away to the lines with us, and stay with us for the night as you are all tired out from your excitement?"

"I have not forgotten when I was a general in command of your divisions two months ago," said general Mic-Fern. "And I have no desire to go back just now when I have not finished my scouting. I'll return later when I find out the movements of the rebels..." He and his column of troopers then left them to enter the woods and disappear... "I wonder what the general meant when he said that hat..." Asked one of the Angelinian officers, as they again set out for the main christian lines. "Search as follows was the short reply."

The next day other parties of christian soldiers and officers went out scouting until the approach of noon. They had just returned with valuable information, when they heard a great roar of shouting. Galloping up to a bend in a wide plank road they were surprised to find general Mic-Fern there with six squadrons of officers and men who had just routed a large party of glandelinian cavalry who had also been out on a scouting tour.

"Welcome to the Angelinian causes," cried general Robert Whiter. "Meet the best column of men who ever routed an overwhelming force of Glandelinian cavalry," said general Mic-Fern.

And then general Mic-Fern had to explain everything from the time that he had left the christian lines to go out on another scouting tour that morning, to now when he and his troopers routed the big force of Glandelinians.

"Well a few hours before after I left the christian lines with the intention to go out on another scouting tour I had this experience with the rebels which convinces me to my benefit of giving information that if any one is to pass the test of endurance it is us Angelinians for the rebels are not what we believed them to be. I can bet any man money that general Hanson will never capture a rebel. It is too strongly held and I am proud to say that we Angelinians are doing our best to put the rebel foe under submission." For a few minutes after general Mic-Fern had finished there was silence. Finally some one cried: "Three cheers for general Mic-Fern and his cavalry." The cheers were given with such fervor.

Later when he was arranged before general Hanson, the general said sadly: "General Mic-Fern will you shake hands with a fellow that has done you as much wrong as I have."

"Why sure," said general Mic-Fern as he accepted the proffered hand.

It was decided at another meeting of the generals and other officers during a lull in military activities that they would spend their time of war work together more closely and get down to serious business. It was hardly necessary to tell my dear readers of the time when the officers held their convention, and when general Mic-Fern came to depart for his own commands he was anything but happy. He Angelinian general, in Fern promised heartily not to commit any useless and care less blunders and general Hanson said:

"This time we and the other generals and even Violet and her sisters and their little girl and boy friends will try to treat you better than the last time you were with us but be careful not to commit any blunders for I know the authorities of Abbaanma and Calverini will not tolerate it and I would have to discharge you and it was against my will the first time at that."

"Ah forget it," General Mic-Fern flung back as he rode away. "It was my fault and they were right."

There are many occurrences within the main christian lines of any army which proves on many occasions that strangers that usually act quiet and never give their history are always suspected as spies or so on until it is fully proved that they are no such thing. This happened as I'm to describe during the time of persons advance toward Eva Granda or, Ighburg, a ding Landing but in general gansons army.

Jannete Macchettere was an Angelinian who had been born in Pandore Calverinia, raised in the state of Angelinia and when he entered the war or the army during the war he intended to stay until he died or the war was fought through to a winning finish.

christian had recovered himself came back into christian possession and so the most numerous fighting all the ground they had lost was fighting against a wicked rebellion he would be doing an act of treason not against his own beloved country only but betraying Christ as well, and in a moment by resisting his temptation he got the best of himself and decided to pretend to give in, and by some trick capture the bunch of spies and then raise the air alarm. He felt sure if he succeeded in capturing these six spies single handed it would lessen general Hachetters' suspicions of him and gain him more in his own favor and probably win his friendship and he really wished, and so he planned to do whatever he could to capture the spies.

"I'll tell you boys what I'll do," Dugger said. "I'll join you and betray the rear of the christian line without taking this money," and walked over to general Hachetters' tent to return the bag. Dornthonia arose and held out his hand for the bag. But Hachetters did not put the bag in the outstretched hand. Instead he threw it with all his might into the face of the unsuspecting Dornthonia. So great was the force of the impact that Dornthonia was stunned for the moment. He staggered backwards, and before any of the others could do anything being to be hindered by the suddenness of it all Dugger sprang to his rifle which he had laid down by the fire, and at the same time tearing the two pistols from one of the other men he covered the men with one pistol and a rifle so that when they had recovered from the surprise of the attack, they found themselves the prisoners of the young guard. Dugger looked for a rope in vain to tie up the men with, and so was starting to cry out:

"General of the Guard NO. One when the man who called himself Dornthonia suddenly spoke up:

"Hold on Hachetters we are not as bad spies or outlaws as that, at least were not at all," and he pulled off his bushy white whiskers revealing himself to be general Oringrib. He astonished Hachetters turned toward Dornthonia but that very man had disappeared and where he had been sitting general Hachetters was.

"Why, - why I don't quite understand all this," Exclaimed Hachetters Dugger taking wholly by surprise indeed.

"It was all a trick to see if you were really an honest lad, and not a spy or a gladiolusian outlaw, and I think general Hachetters has been convinced that you are," Hachetters answered.

"I sure have been convinced," Replied general Hachetters as he came forward and shook hands with Dugger. "and I want you to forgive me for the ill feeling that I have had against you."

"Why sure," Said Hachetters. "Forget all about that."

"And I'll remove all the suspicions that is on you," Said the general and he did.

THE FRIGHTFUL BATTLE OF VINCENTI M. VINCENTIANNA RIN.

Since the encounter at Lieghburg landing one of the most spirited fights ever recorded since Hachetters' arrival near Lillian Wickley was the battle of Alexander Hachetters on the Vincentianna Rina a large stream running into the Norma river. Hachetters after his slight failure at Lieghburg Landing changed his movements after his short distanced retreat and had concentrated here with the purpose of moving his main army upon this town but was on the month of December fiercely opposed by a large gladiolusian army which was believed to be probably that of Purgatorians sent out to help Hachetters who had however remained the time being near Lieghburg Landing. The battle was as heavily contested as any game in schools and balls parks and was nothing at all to say but a matter of endurance and bravery, and main strength of both sides.

The enemy had on the morning made a headlong attack and while the conflict was raging all along the line many generals along the christian front exposing themselves to the fierce firing of the rebels had cried out stoutly: "Watch that movement of the enemy," stop those yelling devils in gray! Don't let those gladiolusians get past that point, look the foe are crossing those works stop them in the name of Heaven and so on. "All these orders was being shouted to the men who struggled like a tug of war to hold back the rebels. Very general in this contest was even trying to build up a championship division of their own and so each division was trying to outlive the other in fighting and so the battle was indeed bloody and the enemy was surprised indeed by the terrific resistance they met. The rebels had realized that the end of the year was only a short way off, and that the main armies of christians under the "Terrible Wrath of God" was only a few miles from Lillian Wickley, while general Hachetters had all he could do to hold his place at Lieghburg a landing and so these under Purgatorians were determined to defeat general Hachetters at any cost, and they paid the cost indeed in cold blooded murder of themselves in facing the christian fire hour after hour and day after day.

General Mc-Doodle Walliser added the guise of the christian army for his girls girlish manners for and for liking little girls better than boys had put in his own division of Abissinians to keep back the rebels, and had tried every means to bring the foe down to a defeat and the firing along his line was murderous.

He showed a fine ability as he once during the action drove his division forward to a fierce counter charge, and captured a coveted position the enemy abandoned at the headlong rush of his troops. The christian general was even sure he could atone for his girl-like ways by showing his skill at command and of managing his divisions during action in the field. Before arriving to the scene of action he had organized a strong division of Abissinians, and every spare moment he had before ordered into action he had his troops practicing at target and other drills to get them in first class condition. His military training those few days before was the chief factor in his getting his command in trim.

Seven great onslaughts had been made and repulsed by the christians and foe combined. The enemy however had won six out of seven of the assaults, while a division of christian troops under general Henry-Fairview had won seven assaults of their own and captured many foe prisoners and gladiolusian cannons provisions and battleflags but did not capture the foe positions. General Purgatorians aid Moore's leader pushed his gladiolusian attacks to their utmost, for it would be a terrible disaster to him should the christians win on him and defeat his his superiors purposes.

Very division during the morning assaults had been on the very edge of victory for the last two hours of the morning battle, they having made great onslaughts and inflicted great losses upon the christians but all the rebel generals urged them to do better. In three hours already the gladiolusians had pushed on successfully as far as general Hachetters' positions and artillery and here met resistance that was amazing. The gladiolusians charged forward brilliantly in the face of musketry and grape and canister against a line of fire six miles long as did other divisions attacking the respective positions of the nationals.

But for that time they met bloody repulses and the christians were now pressing forward themselves and recovering lost ground all over. The hour however was coming at last for the final tussle of the war and the new christian divisions and reinforcements under general Hachetters sent by Hachetters to the scene of battle rushed into their positions confident of a victory. They arrived at general Hachetters' positions at Two O'clock where the firing was so fierce that hell seemed to have broken loose and the smoke made the appearance as if there was a forest fire raging in that location. At three thirty it was proposed that a fierce concentration would start against the assaulting rebels. All of the generals were dashing back and forth excitedly encouraging their men, and with thousands of bugle blasts and other horns blew as the violence of the battle was increasing. The new columns faced each other impatiently waiting for the order to go into the work and assault the attacking enemy. Finally the signal bugles were blown, and like a tossing wave the columns rushed into the thickest of the fray. Now the brave Anglinians were at it for real. Less than a minute had passed, when general Sherman of the christian side fell wounded, but with loud cheers of his troops reinforced was pressing on forcing the enemy to slowly recede. A few minutes later another step was gained by Sherman's troops and his aide, and all the officers seeing the success approaching encouraged their men and under officers to keep up the good work, while the wicked gladiolusian generals and other leaders pleaded to their men to stand firm, and even tried all means to stop the retreat but in vain now. General Wally of the christian side pressing on tried to push his troops forward faster but the attack for the time rolled on slowly progress progressing. The firing was more wilder and a cheer died in the throats of the christian troops. From then till there there was only two minutes to press on successfully, and the foe was already driven over to the middle of the fields and meadows. Bugles still blared in tumultuous cannons roared in explosive volleys, shells boomed boomed and banged in a wild uproar and the noise of rifles was dreadful. A whole long line of foe trenches was already won and carried by the Anglinians who cheered like mad now, and general Hachetters called for other divisions to follow on to victory. As they finished cheering, general Wally was wounded but the christian troops kept right on through that smoky roaring screaming inferno. The foe main line of artillery now sent shot shell and grape and canister right through the surging christian troops troops dealing wide spread havoc, but two more works were soon carried by the christian troops who could not be stopped. This tied the score of the battle at three to three, and the first half of it was now over and it was noon. Bugles blared and men cheered as the foe retreated to the cover of the other works along the banks of the stream the foe having been driven across with the most dreadful loss.

During the last the christian officers and generals held a small council and it was decided to press the attack to a finish so general Hachetters could advance on to the Heights of Evangelina grandia. The bugles were blaring still constantly, and the renewal of the battle started and the noise of scores of hundreds of thousands of Anglinians cheering wildly like rovers of ball games and the noise of firing and cheering was deafening and heard above the roar of rifles and cannon.

and captured himself came back into christian possession and so the christians had recaptured the post unharmed and all the ground they had lost

The Angelinians now reinforced by Hanson fought and attacked the enemy harder than ever, but the opposing rebel lines now were holding their own and the firing of the foe was becoming too much to endure. Five minutes of furious churning passed with a bloody repulse on the christian side. Then general Hanson took general Sherman's division of Abyssinians and made a violent onslaught, and kept it up until he captured a small section of the foe position as if to say scored two points, putting his troops of attackers for a time in the lead, but foe troops were concentrated heavily against him with machine gun fire and counter attacks and he was compelled to give up what he had gained and recoil, a second repulse for the christian side. The Angelinian officers slapped their men in the backs, and tried every way to prevent the retreat but of no avail, and the rebels pressing on and cheering wildly in their joy of repulsing the christian attack a second time opened a withering fire shooting down christian soldiers and even officers like flies tossed to death by wind. This part of the wild battle seemed to be nearing its end, when general Wallace himself put in his columns and after rallying the disordered division made a third assault. The opposing sides fought harder than ever, the battle now becoming very sanguinary and raged incessantly for four or five hours without a result and again the assault of the christian troops was repulsed with general Wallace wounded in the thigh and hand.

Despite despite being wounded general Wallace decided to try again to capture this seemingly impregnable position of the rebels, which he felt sure would most likely be the winning point of the battle. He carefully measured the distance between the opposing sides of the disloyal and loyal Angelinians, and then rushed his troops forward once more. The assaulting columns reinforced by other generals fairly sailed onward like a roaring storm, and again for good the christian troops attacking with redoubled violence forged ahead despite their lines being torn to pieces, there was a long cloud of smoke and a few minutes later they were in possession of the works and the enemy was fleeing. The noise of the contest this time had been terrific but now it being won a second time, the men stamped their feet in an uproar of joy, yelled, screamed, cried, shouted, and threw their hats and everything they had coats and all into the air. A shock hands with each other and shared all the excitement that prevails among troops over winning a victory. As they were cheering and as many of the soldiers were still pursuing the enemy the bugles blared again and the drums drolled and the assault was over. The Angelinians had won the advantage in flying colors a second time the enemy having lost six to five of the Angelinians. General Wallace was cheered again and again, as the victorious troops took possession of the captured trenches and brought up their own cannons to add to those captured. Thirty battle flags had been captured, over two hundred prisoners and large amounts of ammunitions and stores of provisions and thirty frigh freight trains and ten passenger cars and all the railroad yards in the region.

The following day general Hanson confident over the success already won decided to push on and so the christians did not push forward but gained so steadily after that that the foe generals were terrified and begged general Furgatorian to spare heavy reinforcements or otherwise they would be compelled to retreat from Manley's support. There was only an hour before the final action of the morning of the second day was to come which would probably decide the supremacy of the christians in that location of the vivian lucky excitement. General Moore himself kept his divisions advancing and attacking like a tidal wave despite the fact that the foe fought hard and with the stubbornness of desperation, for if any of the christian generals wanted the championship in licking the rebels he was that one. He minutes slowly passed and though the conflict was growing to a perfect storm of fury the success of the advancing christians was steadily improving. The great moment soon succeeded in coming, though it seemed from the ferocity of the conflict that years had passed to the Angelinian fighters who had been suffering the most awful losses.

The remainder of the foe position on the opposite side of the stream was to be assaulted assaulted on the region known as Edwards Court, there fore general Moore really thought his divisions had the advantage on the enemy already. The contest at this point however raged steadily until it was three thirty in the afternoon, and no side won an advantage. The enemy still held the works, and the christians still kept up the assaults and the plains, woods, lanes, and ravines of the battlefield was full of wounded and dying. The foe and christian generals were once again raging their men to fight their best for their respective causes. Some of the christian divisions had already been so badly dripped that they had been withdrawn, and new ones had been put into their places. All the while bugles were blaring, signal bombs roared incessantly in the air, the atmosphere was thick with blinding smoke and the noise was a wilder tumult than a volcanic eruption, thunderstorm, tornado, and earthquake put together. The Angelinians soon again reinforced by general Hanson resumed their onrush toward the foes last line of works, but the rebel lines kept them back with a scathing annihilating fire that mowed down several lines and killed and wounded a score of christian generals and hundreds of under officers. Flag bearers fell by the score amid the dreadful carnage, flags were torn to shreds by the storm of musketry and canister and the scene of battle was horrible to witness. The Angelinians it seemed now were kept at their respective distance and neither side now was confident of victory. It seemed as if the second day's contest was going to end as a draw. General Wallace tried three times to bring his great assaults to the goal, but three times he was wounded seriously and it was in vain. The generals and all officers pleaded most petitionally to their men to do better by but they could not. No rush on was to risk annihilation. He first put portion end with the score of nothing nothing each. During the lull the artillery was brought to bear upon the last line of foe trenches on the opposite side of the art river and an artillery duel started that fairly shook the earth. The Angelinians prevailing even in the artillery game were cheering wildly again and again, and the region was being torn and smashed and ripped up by the terrific shell fire. He reports of the shell explosions was one thousand bangs per minute. As general Hanson seeing the repulse of the assault was musing more troops he ordered general Moore to slacken the cannonading, and try the assault once more, supported in front by rushing bodies of Gonsentinian and Abissarian severely and vigorously.

The bugles then again blared and the generals and other officers again begged their men to win the assault. Now th both sides fought harder than ever, but the christians could not break the foe line at any point, the Angelinian onslaught was again given back, the center of the line of troops was torn and cut to pieces by a wild Angelinian counter onslaught, general Wallace was mortally wounded, and borne from the field, and general Finnhurst who tried to stem the disaster was shot through the head and his divisions dispersed. He foe then rushed forward in general columns to press the advance but after getting about center way to the captured works of the day before the enemy received a fire of artillery and musketry that threatened to annihilate them all if they dared pressed on in such style, and so they recoiled until the main column came to their support. When both sides realizing that the day was ending fought as if they would fall down exhausted, before a minute was up. His furious pace of fighting began to toll on mostly all of the fighters of both sides, but they still fought hard and the smoke of firing grew so thick that trees a hundred feet away could not be seen. With only two hours before night, the christian generals managed to hurl back the foe counter assault and got their own divisions soon surging toward the foe positions in overwhelming numbers. The noise of the battle was redoubled as it became more general and extremely desperate. The other troops supposed to come to the assault was not near yet and so most of the Angelinians took their time in advancing, leaping from tree to tree, from rock and bushes and from snow bank and drift to drift as they advanced. One part of the christian line now surged over the foe works, but was slowly being driven back. The Angelinians had started a tremendous cheer, but it died away when that portion of the line was pressed from the works they had so gallantly captured. Another division at the same section was rushed in to get the works, but the foe again hurled them back. Again the troops tried to take it by assault, in front and rear but this resulted in a double red repulse of bloody character. The enemy resisted like leeches and the remaining generals commanding the assaults realizing the results if there was a general withdrawal now, rushed the immense body of troops to the attack with a fury as they never did before. The columns rushing forward at once under cover of artillery and severely attacks finally swarmed over the works at all points at last and again the foe withdrew in confusion. Again the struggle was over and again the Angelinians had won. The score could have been two points to none. What following evening general Hanson and his other generals were having a meeting over the outcome of the second day of the battle when a message was brought to him. One of the generals read;

"The largest demonstration ever witnessed is being made by general Furgatorian and Manley from the results probably of the fact that christian troops under Hanson's Vivian twice defeated the crack army of the two foe commanders, two points to none. Though this battle won the championship for Angelinia it seems probably the battle will still have a resumption on the following morning."

In the meantime while this tremendous battle had been raging on the second day a bunch of Angelinian spies who probably belonged to the Gensian members for they wore black hoods and regalias were in row boats on the narrow run river being pursued hotly by Gensianians also in row boats and by some in Gas's Gaselle launches and gunboats.

"Full, one one-two-three-four. By Steady number four. Full harder five. The rebels are gaining and preparing to fire. One two - three - four."

The twelve oared boat the pride of the Gensian spies who were pursued shot through the swampy calm waters of the mighty river. Its crew as said before dressed in black regl regalias and hoods were strong sturdy men, Thompsonian pussells had of only sixteen years of age being their leader, though he was tall for his age, with his face and even arms of a nut-brown color from his long work in boating and spying trips and always being in the sun and through all kinds of weather whether stormy, hot cold, or snowy.

"What's doing it fine boys?" he cried as he saw they were slowly outdistancing the pursuing rebels in rowboats. "Keep it up and we will succeed in beating the glandelinians in another half hour. We do not need to be afraid of those on the Gasoline Launches and of the gun boats. We can sink them if they gain with our swivel gun which we have on board. Don't you want to blow those rascally rebels out of the water?" He asked.

"Sure," his friends and men members answered in unison.

"Longwood fortress which was in the next bend of the great river was the main danger of the fugitives but fortunately the weather was quite foggy probably the smoke of the distant battles sweeping across the river. These same spies had rowed past these glandelinian fortresses for several months without being discovered or fired upon, but this time it did seem that there was danger of their being fired on as glandelinians on shore had signalled to those who were in the fortress.

Yet the fugitives determined to run past the fortress or die. After rowing for some hours, they came within sight of the frowning fortress which looked like a long penitentiary of a mile long and as high as three hundred feet and armed and teeming with big cannons. The fortress was of a concrete color and probably of the same material. Russeller called the crew of the boat and said:

"Follows we must run past that fortress at any cost or we will be captured. Rather be shot on the river than be hanged or shot as spies. We must get to the Christian lines with out information at any cost. And the only way to do it is to row like mad and those who are not rowing and preparing to fire at the pursuers should get in on us keep your heads low as possible so you won't get hit. We must row like mad, and continue to row like mad till we pass the fortress. Are all you boys with me?"

"You bet!" They cried.

"Good. Now there is one thing more I have to tell you. Keep strictly to the same speed, do not slacken or increase unless I command."

The next few hours were busy ones for the crew of the boat pursued by the glandelinians in rowboats, gunboats and the Gasoline Launches. Each member of the Geminian in the boats obeyed the rules laid down to them. One of the fast speeding launches gained on them in no time but were sunk by the sturdy fire of the swivel guns and the occupants were soon swimming madly in the water and going fast for the shore. The gun boats were also gaining but received a disastrous fire which wrecked the cabins and set them on fire. One of them blew up. It was indeed an exciting pursuit.

Already the pursuit had continued for five hours. Russeller had much confidence in his men, and he knew that if they rowed as well in the intended race past the dangerous fortress he would have no cause to fear and all of them would come out unscathed. But would they? He knew well what would happen if the guns of the fortress got the range. He began to believe it would be safer to make the desperate run during dark, but where could he hide from his other pursuers.

There was a small cover near by and into this he intended to go but he soon found this impossible for glandelinians were seen everywhere on shore firing at them and shouting and yelling. The glandelinians on both sides of the banks appeared to be there in all their array. The course of the pursuit had already been down the river through the city itself directly north west toward this cover ten miles up the Norma river.

However fortunately it was not when they really reached the location of the mighty fortress and so they prepared for the desperate race.

"For the honour of Angelina and our Blessed Mother," Russeller said in a low voice. "We must get past!"

"Quick!" he went a rifle from some where and a bullet clipped off a lock of hair from his head. The pursuers were still so close after them. The two boats loaded with the Geminian Members kept together for about a mile, then the other one at the order of Russeller crept ahead and started firing at the pursuers. The pursuit had continued for another half mile, and Russeller allowing the first boat to keep the lead ordered his crew not to row too fast as he wished them to keep their strength and breath for the final sprint. At one mile the boats were sixth lengths ahead when the looming fortress came into sight with the glaring searchlights flaring from it across the river and glaring down on the water. The glandelinians on shore were yelling themselves hoarse. Russeller smiled.

"One-two-three-four—One two—three—four," he cried moving himself forward and backward to the count. He increased the speed a trifle and then guns began booming and roaring from the fortress and flashes as of lightning stabbed the sky and air and geyers of water shot up around and near the boats but no damage was done as the foe did not get the proper range most of the shells landing beyond the river and exploding among some of the glandelinians themselves killing and wounding scores. There was confusion everywhere and the Angelinians had to laugh despite their perils.

By this time the leading boat of fugitives was reaching a rocky cove. The two boats had made the turn beautifully despite having been under fire from the fortress and as to say was starting on to the home stretch when the guns of the fortress again roared with redoubled violence as a greater number thundered and again there was a tumult of thunderous reports in the air and close about the boats and the fugitives were fairly dazed by the flashes. One of the boats was hit by a shell fragment and sprang a leak but those not coupled with oars started bailing. Six of the members were wounded and an oarsman was killed. At the boats made the turn, the other boat was five lengths ahead of the second and was fast filling despite the efforts of the balmers. The wounded men were groaning, and feared that yet the rebels would hit the mark. Russeller however smiled defiantly. He increased the speed a little more and edged further out in the river to make the race range still longer. The other boat had also increased the speed. Russeller increased his speed again, and soon came alongside of the leaking boat. The occupants brightened, and Russeller smiled for they had only half the distance to go and they would be past the fortress and be to safety. Could the leaking boat make it before it filled up, but now something which he did not count upon changed his smile to a groan. Both boats were a mile from the finish and were starting to sprint when the guns of the fortresses roared anew, and one of the boats was struck with every one on board mangled by the explosions and every one sank. A shot also struck the other boat and the leader horrified heard a man snap, and Colonel Cromwell dropped his oar, and sank to the bottom of the boat. Like a flash Russeller realized the trouble. Colonel Cromwell was wounded.

He quickly made Cromwell, groaning with pain, change seats with him, and he cried:

"Follow me as usual men. We must make it or share the fate of the others. Our only chance. We only got a hundred feet to go." And as he rowed desperately he counted while the others prayed. The occupants of the boat were not rowing were so spellbound with horror at the tragedy to the other boat that they forgot to pray. But the goal was but only half a mile away, the boat was coming a considerably way from the fortress now, but the glandelinian boats were still in pursuit and they were only four lengths ahead of those of the rebels. Rebel pursuers were starting to fire themselves.

"One-two-three-four, one—two—three—four."

This time Russeller counted for the utmost speed he could get out of his crew. The boat fairly flew forward, and at fifty yards from the goal it ranged along the Christian portion of the shore. One rebel boat finally gained the race drew up alongside of the other but was sunk by a grenade thrown by a Geminian and the rebels were swimming for the other shore while the other boats receiving fire from cannons on shore began to retreat in confusion. The other rebels held their breath for a few moments and then defiant of the Nationals on shore raced onward with the purpose of capturing the pursued and with a great bound a number of pursuers were either along side or ahead of the pursued or ahead, but speedily were sunk by cannon fire on shore and the river was full of struggling men. The pursued of the surviving boat came off the victor by half a length and Christian boats came out upon the water and the pursued one was speedily drawn to the shore and those of the wounded taken out and carried to the lines.

The Angelinians rushed for the hero of them a li and bore him to the Christian lines in triumph. Russeller could smile again, though out of twenty men he lost twelve killed, and six wounded. Heroes in this story do not escape so easily as those read of in novels and other stories. I'm sorry for them of course but I got to show the real ferocity of the Glandelinians when they pursue spies. The rebels would go through perdition to get the spies and heroes if they felt sure it would bring them quite success.

Another Angelinian soldier but only a single one this time also on the same day but elsewhere had a harrowing experience which he narrowly escaped death. It was during the afternoon of that cold December day. Nature despite the raging battle in the distance, and despite the horrors of the extensive siege of Jivian Wicky was now assuming the white drab of a severe Galverinian winter. Robust towering oaks were leafless. And thick clusters of leafless bushes mixed their gloomy appearances with the myriad trunks of trees and higher shrubbery, and the deep snowy carpet on the ground. Despite the roar of distant battle, the cold winter air, and the deep snow on the ground Pussie squirrels boldly and nimbly ran up and down the trees and the ever present sparrows and other winter birds made merry amidst the multitudinous branches and did not seem to fear the noise in the far distance of so much firing as if millions of hunters were closing and announcing their approach by roars of guns and yelling.

A once sunning brooklet but now frozen half hidden beneath overhanging vines and undergrowth which possibly could conceal any amount of lurking enemies had during the summer peacefully rippled down its shallow channel through the once tranquil forest scene now loud in tumult of distant battle. A dim but now snow covered path bordered here and there by bushes and trees of different height and thorny growth wound through the glades. Old Sol in the winter sky smiled coldly from his mighty seat in the heavens.

...the captured himself came back into Christian possession and so the Christians had recaptured the boat... all the ground they had lost

On this particular afternoon while the battle was raging at the far distance but within the sight of a single Angelinian soldier he a man of about twenty seven years old and whose name was Antonio Harlander entered the glades belonging to the Sunbeam Creek banks by the footh path trudging towards the direction of the battle to see if it possible. He did not belong to general Hanson's command and so had not been obliged to join in the conflict unless he wished to do so.

His neat and his neat and pleasing appearance indicated in some ways that he was no ordinary soldier.

His frank intellectual features evinced his love for truthfulness, and his deep blue eyes indicated keen penetrative insight and ready readiness of wit.

"What a grand place a place," exclaimed Harlander, "and yet it looks as if it was soon going to be torn up by some bloody battle of this darn war, for many armies of christian troops are only a short distance from here."

He paused a moment in his soliloquy.

"I wonder," he resumed slowly, if Hanson's darn lunatic army of rebels, people are for ever talking about really is concentrate around here to oppose general Hanson's advance on Vivian's way. Some soldiers and even generals say that it is the intention of general Hanson to concentrate his armies at these places as soon as possible so as to turn general Hanson's Vivian out of his strong position, and it is also said that his generals and all his Angelinian soldiers are so ferocious with war lust that his rebel army is really dangerous and that Hanson or his other generals must look out before they cope with him in general. Oh well why should I worry. Angelinian army or no, Angelinian army is going to rest here and enjoy the sights before I can continue on my way, the battle is too far away anyway. And I'm all tired out by rambling about over all of this darn torn war torn country of California."

Thus soliloquizing, Harlander, threw himself on the floor of some abandoned cabin which he had reached and covering himself thickly with blankets he found there he prepared to take a sleep. From the open door which he forgot to close gentle cold winds played with his curly chestnut hair as he lay reclined in luxurious ease on the floor. Squirrels who chattered outside and ridiculed the intruder of the forest of Sunbeam Creek. Birds twittered and blithely hopped from limb to limb. The waters of the Sunbeam Creek not yet frozen over on account of its depth and currents rippled and splashed over the white pebbles with sweet cadences. The boy inside the cabin listened to all the natural sounds, of the Angelinian winter season with wondrous delight. Fatigued by his tramp through the Angelinian wooded country near Vivian's way, and lulled by the sweet sweet music of nature, Harlander fell into a slumber. As the soldier's sleep the sun gradually sank through the winter sky toward the western horizon, and the various forms of nature continued to speak in their simple and mysterious language and the sound of distant conflict had died away.

Then Harlander awoke from his deep slumber.

"What!" he said to himself. "Have I been asleep? I guess I was so tired that I could not help taking a little nap. Oh well it cannot be very late, but I had better be moving along anyway or my comrades might miss me and come in search of me. If I was found by the enemy I would have a fine time indeed."

He yawned and stretched and started to get up. He was surprised to find that he could not budge, not even an inch. He opened his eyes expecting to see the starlight sky overhead, but instead of that he made out nothing but vague gloom. Once more he tried to rise, but this attempt was as futile indeed as the first one had been if you please to say so. Harlander was now startled and somewhat alarmed, but not discouraged, or disheartened. After his eyes had become accustomed to the gloom he finally glanced around. He appeared to be securely bound hand and foot on a rude couch in one corner of a large tent. In this tent there was only one visible entrance, an opening wide enough to admit the passage of one man only. The floor of the tent was of bare hard packed earth and stray straw. The furniture was very scant, consisting of only two couches or army beds, a rude rustic table of round formation, and two rustic chairs. In the center of the tent was a round stove with a straight stove pipe toward the top of the tabernacle. The object which mostly attracted Harlander as he viewed his dismal surroundings, was a large crucifix of gilt silver, which lay on the floor opposite the stove and which appeared to have been abused and trampled on by someone.

When his eyes rested on the silver crucifix dully glowing against the dark background of the stern gray wall of the tent, Harlander started, and a shiver ran down his spine. A sweat exuded from his brow and his veins swelled as he frantically tugged at his bonds. Why was this trampled and abused crucifix used such surroundings. He could it be that lived in such a God forsaken tent, and yet would dare to insult the image of our Blessed Lord? These were Harlander's wild thoughts as he struggled desperately to liberate himself. Exhausted soon by his exertions he finally sank back on the couch, with a stupor clouding his brain. The soldier had thus lain quiet for several minutes, and was endeavoring to regain his scattered senses, when he was suddenly startled by the sound of two men entering the tent.

Harlander hurriedly turned his very languid eyes toward the entrance of the big tent to ascertain who the intruders were. At the sight which met his eyes, the soldiers for a feverish face blanched to a deathly pallor, and he could not prevent himself from sinking and trembling with fear on the couch. Standing just within the tent but close to the entrance was a tall Angelinian officer. His terrible visage made so by his wickedness was such that no one could ever look on and easily forget. Deep furrows and awful scars the results of lacerating wounds obtained in some battle had been through probably, criss-crossed it in mighty profusion. Two bloodshot eyes glared at him with seemingly insane hatred and ferocity from their cavernous sockets. The strained muscles of this strained, haggard and scarred visage were immediately chiseled into a diabolical grin. A few gray locks of hair fell from beneath his black rounded gaiter like hat, and his uniform coat of dark gray color fell from his neck in two long folds almost to the ground. He wore black leathern boots. The soldier with this hideous officer was probably his orderly.

Harlander could not help from shrinking back as the officer advanced a few steps with the diabolical grin on his face growing more and more threatening, and with his fierce eyes glowing more and more fiercely. The officer advanced still further growing more terrible with each step. Suddenly when he was very near the couch, he raised his long sabre and shook it in the soldier's face. He cackled shrilly like some insane man and assumed a devilish fierceness. He even opened his enormous mouth, disclosing therein many white teeth. Harlander's heart sank and he almost lost all hope. For what mercy could he possibly expect of his Angelinian demon. Suddenly the wicked Angelinian colonel began to speak in a broken and disjointed language interspersed with shrill cacklings and outbursts of very cruel and evil exultations, to asphering and many imprecations.

"Ha, ha," he shrieked wildly and jumping up and down and shaking the brandished sabre in the face of his captured Angelinian prisoner. "Ha, ha, you thought you could have got away from me and the other Angelinian soldiers eh? Didn't you? Yes you did. But you didn't you dirty christian dog. But you did not succeed in doing so. No, no. I and my companion followed you, and your bloody tracks all over the way you traveled to this log cabin. You are held as a spy. I almost caught you in the city of California, but with the help of your wicked christian doghounded scoundrels you got away you dirty christian scoundrel. On and your armies of comrades who are trying to forcibly set free all our child slaves with whom we have rights to keep and enslave. I vowed that if I ever caught you I would torture you till you confessed the bloody crimes you did against the Angelinian nation and against me and all my comrades. I would even pull your hair out by the roots and even pull your finger nails out, and brand your tender flesh with red hot irons until you told me all I demanded of you. You would not like that would you? You would have to endure the penalty for your vile sins against Satan and Angelinia and her king and armies of soldiers. At the command of general Hanson I have toiled hard to find that black christian heart of yours, and banish it from the earth. And now after months of following you I have succeeded in getting you. Would to goodness you had been the dare devils called the Vivian 'Arts' though. I would rather have them for they are the greatest spies the devil dirt y dirty christian ever had within their ranks."

The eyes of the Angelinian officer's eyes glared fiercely almost insanely. "Yes at last you dirty christian dog." He again growled. "The devil and his followers have rewarded me at last. Now I have found you can't get away any more. Now. Now I can wreak my vengeance."

Continuing his wild and wicked abuse the Angelinian officer started the Angelinian soldier by suddenly redrawing his long sabre and shaking it violently above his head. He pirouetted wildly around the tent in the inside several times, muttering, and shrieking curses and exhortations, then stopped short and stared with his wicked eyes at the Angelinian soldier. He then raised the sabre higher into the air and slowly advanced never for an instant averting the serpentine charm of his eyes from the shrinking shrinking gaze of the terrified soldier. Harlander's hopes forsook him. He ceased to struggle with his bonds, for it was useless and fell back on the couch. In his heart he muttered a silent prayer and resigned himself to the fate for which he had been singled out by the ferocious Angelinian officer. For he was only human at that and should be brave like the soldier he was. The Angelinian officer enraged by sorrow and other wrongs he may have suffered before the rebellion was now going to wreak vengeance on him as he lay there, helpless and innocent. As the painter's pounce with its powerful claws upon its helpless victim, so the infuriated Angelinian officer, rent the tent with a piercing curse and blasphemy bounded forward into the air, and brought the heavy and sharp sabre down with seemingly supernatural force toward the head of the helpless Angelinian soldier.

When a shot from somewhere stopped him.

Harlander prepared himself came back into christian prison and so the christians had recaptured him. Not a moment after all the ground they had lost

At the sound of the unseen rifle the Angelinian soldier saw the glandelinian colonel stagger for a few moments, drop his sabre and then sink to the floor and lay at still while his orderly looked amazed and with consternation. He at once darted toward the entrance of the tent, when there was a loud tumult of yells and he saw that the encampment of this regiment of glandelinians was in the hands of the christians.

The orderly was taken prisoner and the Angelinian liberated. Garlander was almost overcome by the narrowness of his escape. A cold sweat still stood out on his brow. "There, I'm mighty glad that the christian troops came when they did," he exclaimed as he left the tent and went along with a party of the Angelinians. The rising sun in the god golden northwest diffused the beautiful snow whitened forest glade in low light. Still nature seemed to burst forth in splendid glory at the onset of a perfect day in early winter despite the battle that had raged so violently in the distance. The Angelinian soldier lingered for several minutes in silent awe, and then slowly stride from the glade and followed the Angelinian soldiers who escorted him to the lines and placed him under the care of a medical officer.

In the meantime during the time while general Williamson, commander of the army of Abolitionists was advancing toward the location of Jennie Vivian, near the little stream called Gunbeam Creek, an Angelinian officer was sent immediately to take charge of a newly established army telegraph and signal station near a branch line of the California Northwestern Lines called the McMillan and Pandora railroad, which ran through the Sunbeam Creek section of California.

Though close to Vivian, it was a dreary and most lonely spot and from it the main christian army of general Hanson Vivian was twenty five miles away. Before the poor Angelinian officer had been there a week, he was ready to quit and go home, for not only was it lonely, but it was full of danger. He even passed through tremendous miracles for a over a hundred times he had been fired at by glandelinian snipers, twice a foe shrapnell had wrecked some portion of his station, and many glandelinian cavalry regiments had rode pass and he had to keep himself in hiding for fear of capture. The fact the foe of cavalry did not destroy the station was because they thought it was one of their own and would not molest it, but feeling himself in so much peril and believing he had more excitement than he really cared for for every day he was under fire of snipers and shrapnell, he expressed his wishes most ardently to the main christian superintendent general Hanson Vivian, who had placed him there to allow him to go back to some safe spot, but the brave and great christian general himself came down to see him a few days after he received the message, and after a long talk prevailed upon the Angelinian officer to please remain unless necessity compelled him to be removed.

"Stay here until spring please for the sake of Our Lord, and his blessed mother and our country," he said as he left the Angelinian officer, "and I will give you a change then that will please you mightily."

The young officer who happened to be an American of german birth or descent I mean was only eighteen years old then. Before ever entering the army of Angelinia, after coming to California from across the most dangerous seas he had always lived in town, and he had always enjoyed plenty of company. The desolation of his lot, up there in the wilderness of Vivian, wicker regions swarming with rebel snipers, and cavalry and hornets nests of dangerous glandelinian machine guns nearly drove the young officer frantic with fear and excitement. He was wanted some one to talk to under any conditions, his nature demanded upon human companionship. But he saw very few faces that were any good to him. He saw of course all the faces of glandelinians who were passing through and from every day, twice each day a glandelinian train, running back into the distant Evangelina Grania heights mountains would sometimes stop for some time at the station, and he would have even then had a chance of a few moments talk with the train crew had they not been all glandelinians, occasionally some engineers would bring in a few car loads of material for pontoon bridge work, every now and then, but never would an Angelinian passenger pass in his way—a christian prospector from the distant hills, or an Angelinian soldier or workman from over the divide, but the greater portion of his time—I would say about twenty out of the twenty four hours of each day he generally spent alone. To show himself to the glandelinians would mean his death or capture.

The station itself bore a beautiful name, the name of the small town near the sunbeam river, but beside the empty box car in which he mostly hid himself or inside the little house of the signal station, there were no other buildings there, no one else lived there. There had been once signs of houses in this location but now as the snow presented itself big fires had probably wiped out everything that not only was wrecked here but also grew. General Hanson Vivian and other christian generals had promised him that he would see a "kok boom" in the approach of spring when it would be evident that the Vivian wicker city would be in the possession of the christian armies, when work would be started in repairing the railroad lines, and that the big town would be presented once more to the Angelinian governments. All shipments to and from towns and cities would again travel by the route of the McMillan and Pandora Railroad after the rebellion was overthrown in that location and the Angelinian rebels swept out of the region. At that time everything was transported by the rebels by either their own trains or by army and covered baggage wagons, over the mountain and river roads running from a point thirty five miles down the river railroad. The trail leading from the signal station back toward the distant christian encampments blown to jagged ploughed ground by rebel shell fire in the battle of Jagburg and was not fit now for wagon or cart use, and was not even hard enough to travel by soldiers or even any other men on foot or horseback. The Angelinian officer at the signal station was connected with the general's headquarters at his lines by a secret telephone line running up along this unused trail, and every day when he saw any thing unusual going on in the enemy lines at the far distant he had some conversation with the Angelinian generals way up near McMillan.

All of the main christian generals appreciated and understood the loneliness of the Angelinian officer who was at the signal station, and were always ready and glad to help to cheer him up in any ways possible. Even twice each day a parcel of important and valuable papers and other documents and even sometimes bags of army money and plans and many letters would pass through the hands of the lone Angelinian officer on its way toward the main christian armies. Sometimes he received other valuables belonging to some general sent to the main army it generally being sent to the lone Angelinian officer from the town of St Helena by express army wagons, and the officer would deliver all that came to him to two christian officers who would ride down for them accompanied by a strong body of cavalry and sometimes infantry. These two officers would usually arrange to reach the signal station on time to be there the wagon would arrive, so that the most important articles, were never in the possession of the brave Angelinian officer for any great length of time. And he was glad of that for he always feared enemy soldiers would sometime stop at the signal station and finding him take all he had and even make him prisoner or because he had valuable papers about him arrest and shoot him as a spy.

One day after he had been by the signal station for about a week these same two officers came down for valuables, accompanied by an unusually strong body of cavalry, arriving there a few minutes before the time for the express wagon arrival, but when the express wagon came in the express messenger and even the driver and the soldiers with them informed the three Angelinian officers that no valuables had come that day before to many scouting parties of the rebels were roaming about, and that things looked pretty dangerous all over. A little while afterwards came a telegram from some place not mentioned or known that there had been a little delay in getting some plans for the governor general Hanson Vivian on account of a battle raging somewhere near Jagburg, and that it would not go forward until until the next day. The two officers followed by their escort at once set out on their return to the christian lines, saying they would come down the next morning if possible.....

Late that afternoon the noise of a battle could be heard by the Angelinian and to make matters worse for him one of those well dreaded Californian blizzards started to set in. It was a wet heavy snow, and it piled up with astonishing rapidity but despite the wind blowing at a terrific velocity failed to pile into deep drifts on account of the wetness of the snow, but laid level. All night and all the next day it fell so heavily no one could see for a hundred feet, and when the lone Angelinian had arose the next morning and saw the blizzard was still raging, he also discovered that he was without wire communications with the rest of the world, both telephone and telegraph wires being down, not broken by the heavy snow as supposed but cut down by enemy soldiers during the night. The lone Angelinian also discovered that the signal station had received a complete overhauling and there was evidence that foe soldiers would return and make another search.

Suddenly he picked up a note and read:

"Colonel Saundertonia;

Please make a complete search of signal station No. Ten, near Jennie Vivian. It is supposed to be belonging to the glandelinian authorities but it is mentioned an Angelinian spy is using it for communication with said christian lines under general Hanson Vivian. Cut down all wires so he cannot communicate with christian lines. Resume search following morning if you cannot find him to day.

General McMillan, Hester Stanks."

He realized the colonel no doubt had forgotten the note and left it folded up on the table inside the signal station. Now he saw that he had to be careful for the place was under suspicion.....

And worse of all still the express wagon was three or four hours late,--it had had a hard time getting up through the cuts of the hills on account of enemy spies and prowlers and cavalry squadrons and on account of the deep snow. A bag of important letters for the Angelinian, Galverinian, and Abbeismannian governments and from generals and high commissioners and even from his brother and also plans maps of the country and captured letters from the enemy was on board of that wagon, and it was handed over to the Angelinian officer at the signal station by the army express messenger who laughingly warned him that he must be continually on the lookout not for the gladelinians on cavalry squadrons and searchers only but to watch out for rebel spies also. The Angelinian officer could not telephone or telegraph to the main christian lines or to any of the christian general and generals and tell them there that he had the important bag of articles in his possession, and indeed it so would have done no good if he could have, for no one could get down over the trail that day for every road, trail and ravine and gorges were watched by hundreds of rebel sentries and explored by foe soldiers also. He thought of being alone there with that bag of letters and other important articles disquieted the Angelinian officer somewhat, for he knew that he would be responsible for very important letters, plans and papers, and over five hundred thousand dollars also which were in the big sack.

But then he suddenly thought to himself that if none of the Angelinians could come down from the distant christian lines to take the bag back to the encampments on account of the raging blizzard and violent winds, the gladelinians could reach there either to rob him of his precious bag. As the storm grew worse toward the late afternoon and the snow fell more rapidly than ever and it began to grow very cold and ice began to form on the small windows of the signal station. The Angelinian officer was therefore forced to build up a small, huge fire of pine knots and other wood in his stove and he sat down to look over some of the important papers to pass the time. It was about ten o'clock in the night, and the Angelinian officer was falling into a dose when the sound of footsteps steps just outside his window in the deep snow outside made him start up. They passed around the old car, and in a moment the door knob rattled.

"Let us in please will you?" A voice called. "Let us in. We are half frozen and lost on account of the snowstorm...." The Angelinian officer thinking it may be the Angelinian generals come for the bag and followed by their escorts as usual, opened the door and was surprised to see only two tall men to step in. He had never seen any of them before but they wore the uniform of Galverinian soldiers and one of them had a little girl with them very pretty indeed in looks but nevertheless there was something about the men which the Angelinian officer did not like. And there was something about the child which he thought seemed peculiar and which he did not like either. The men ran to the stove after pushing the child to a bench, and began warming their numb hands. The Angelinian officer stuffed in more wood, bade them to make themselves as comfortable as possible, and inquired if he should prepare anything to eat for them. They however declined his offer for food saying they were not hungry. They declared they were fugitives.

"This little girl is a child slave who we stole from the gladelinians," said one of the men. We came here to get warm. We had been pursued and after outdistancing the rebels who failed to see us on account of the shroud of snow we seeing the light in your window came in. We wish to smoke a pipe for a few minutes, attend to the business we came on, and get back to the christian lines."

They were Galverinian soldiers they told him fleeing toward the christian lines which was a few miles back. They were going to bring the child back there for safety, and were expecting some comrades who had followed them. And they said they decided to remain at the station until they arrived or until the morning when they expected the snowstorm and hurricane would subside. Then one of them pulled a paper from his pocket, said it was a plan he had also captured from the enemy, and asked the Angelinian officer to look at it. He took the paper which was very large and thick, laid it on the table by his lamp and was stooping down to read what was written on it, and look over the map which was drawn on some other parts of it, when suddenly a black hood was thrown over his head, and he was seized by someone and held as if a vise. At another moment the Angelinian officer felt himself being bound hand and foot. Still simultaneously came a shriek of fright from the little girl and a curse from the two men and then for a moment all was silence. When the black sack was pulled from the head of the Angelinian officer and looking round he was surprised to see the room full of gladelinians and the two men also bound and the little girl lying as if dead.

"Now young man," said the gladelinian who had seized him, you know what we want don't you. Where is that bag full of money and valuables that you have in your possession and which were to go up to the dirty christian lines to day. We looked for you last night, and could not find you. Yet we found you to night and with two dirty Galverinians who you sheltered after they run off with a child slave."

The Angelinian officer knew how dangerous gladelinians were if opposed and aroused, but nevertheless he was resolved to say not a word to the gladelinians. He therefore closed his lip and remained quiet.

"Well if you won't tell us I'll suppose we will have to find it, and I don't think we will have much trouble at that unless you have hid it carefully," said the leader of the intruders. "But if we cannot find it we will do something that will make you surely yield. We know what you hate worse than anything. That is torture of children. If we fail to find what we are looking for we will torture the recaptured child slaves right before the eyes of the three of you dirty christian dogs...."

The gladelinian private then began searching all around the small room of the signal station, and in a few minutes one of them gave a cry. He had uncovered the bag of the precious papers and other important articles. The Angelinian officer not thinking any rebels would come near the station on account of the storm had thrown it into a corner, and covered it with a lot of cotton waste. He had also found another bag of the same size.

"Two bags!" shouted the rebel who had found it. "A full one and an empty one...." For a moment the Angelinian was puzzled at his words, then he recalled that the two generals from the christian lines when they had come down the day before the blizzard they had brought it with them the bag in which the plans and papers of the previous week had been shipped. This bag the Angelinian officer remembered he was to send back to the Angelinian armies at Holmdel. Both of the bags were looked, the keys being in general Hanson's possession at Lehighburg, ending....

"Here this is the key to the bag!" One of them now demanded. The Angelinian officer said nothing, one of the rebels searched his clothes, and the small desk, and also the clothing of the other two men and also searched the child who had now regained consciousness, but not finding the key, they took a hammer and smashed the clasplock. The large grip then fell open, and two of the men began fingering the important papers, and counted the gold and silver coins.

"Everything is all here just as I told you it would be Joseph Saunders," laughed one of the gladelinian officers. "Well a cavalry force will be along in about half an hour. We will wait here until they come. No use going out into the cold and stormy weather until we have to."

The gladelinian soldiers then sat down by the fire in the stove, and some of them lighted cigarettes and started smoking. The Angelinian officer lay at their feet, his mind busy trying to involve some scene by which he could save the treasured documents and papers that had been put to his charge, but he could not see any way out of the difficulties which beset him. And the two Galverinians were just as securely bound as he, according to their conversation the cavalry force they expected was supposed to be due at ten forty five. The gladelinian column of cavalry were to stop at the signal station, the ten rebels in the signal station would join them and take their recaptured child slaves and probably himself and the two Galverinians with them. There would be no opportunity for the Angelinian or the two Galverinians to communicate with each other as they had been gagged.

The little girl felt like screaming but she dared not for she was afraid she would be strangled a second time and maybe to death. The gladelinians were to join the cavalry force down near a water tank that stood about a mile down the tracks of the Erie and Lehigh railroad lines. The gladelinians according to their conversation were going to take the two Galverinians and the bag and the little girl with them but were going to leave the Angelinian officer at the station tied hand and foot, because they declared if they took him with the Angelinians who would come down from the lines to secure the bag would find him gone and would immediately persecute us so swiftly that they would be captured and the bag taken from them and the child also. They knew the character of Angelinian pursuers. They were like wolves pursuing after lost sheep. The Angelinian realizing that he would be left tied hand and foot and under guard ever if he could free himself and attack and kill the guard after they were gone realized that the wires were down and he would not be able to send any warning to the christian forces on ahead. His outlook looked completely hopeless but nevertheless he did not lose hope in God and the blessed mother and he prayed for before.

A little while before the cavalry force was due to arrive, the Angelinian rebels made ready to depart. Despite being the ferocious, immemorially they acted we will toward the Angelinian officer and the two Galverinians, considering their drawn dagger and the kind of work they were engaged in. Finally determining at last to leave the four prisoners in the building until the approach of morning until the cavalry came they decided to go out and see if the cavalry were anywhere in sight and to place three guards while they were gone. So they pulled the coats which the three men were lying on to the center of the room, the child also placed the four upon them with blankets about them, filled the stove with wood, and then set the dampers.

 "You will be here alright for a while until the cavalry comes to take us away to the fortresses," the Angelinian rebels said. "The fire will stop until we return from our outlook and for that short time you won't suffer from the cold. And if we change our minds and don't come back your Christian dog comrades will find you tied up in the morning. You can just tell them that you tied yourselves up on a bet that you can get loose. Be long. We are off. If for some reason we don't return to take you along with us give our respect to the National of Abilominia when they come down for the bags."

Then leaving three guards they went out, taking the bag and the little child with them. The child cried and screamed and struggled but she was forced along. The Angelinian and the Galverinians listened to their tramping in the snow, and then could hear them laughing and talking as they mounted horses and rode slowly away. The rebels seemed to be in high good humor. As soon as they had passed out of hearing the Angelinian and the two Galverinians began to desperately pull and twist at the thongs that bound them, hoping that they might loosen them. At they took care that the guards did not see what they were doing, but they could do nothing. The guards were well trimmed by the ropes. There seemed nothing for the three "Christian dogs" to do but to accept the inevitable--they could do nothing toward saving the precious papers or rescue the poor child. They now began to expect the expected Angelinian cavalry on account of the raging snowstorm would be late. For the snow was three feet deep in the level in many places and horses could not hardly travel in that snow and so the three prisoners watched the clock and the guard until the time of the arrival of the cavalry, and still did not hear anything that would be that they had arrived. Another half hour went by, and still the cavalry force did not come, and two of the guards went off to see if the others were coming back. The Angelinian almost wished the cavalry force would come--he wished it would hurry--he wanted his suspense over with. The stove finally began to get very hot, its sides glowed dull for a little while, then turned to a cherry red. The three began to fear the floor beneath and around it would catch fire. So intense was the heat the stove was radiating. Then a great thought came to the Angelinian officer. He rolled off his couch when the guard was not looking, managed to drag himself over to the stove without being seen, and raised his bound hands to the red hot rim that encircled its drum. In a flash the thongs were burned through and his hands were free. It took him but a second to undo the ropes about his ankles just at the moment when the lone guard saw him free. He at once made a rush with leveled musket but the Angelinian grabbing the muzzle of the gun shoved it butt with telling force against the guard's stomach and knocked him down sprawling, with the gun in his own possession. The guard getting up attempted to draw his pistol but the Angelinian dashing at him wrested from his hand and flung it through the window glass. Maddened by being treated thus the guard roaring rushed at the Angelinian who swung his musket in the air and aimed a blow but the gun flew out of his hand and went sailing like an arrow through another window taking pane and glass with it.

The guard closed with the Angelinian for several minutes but the Angelinian was the stronger and managing to draw his own pistol just as the guard was about to use his army dagger he shot the Angelinian dead. Then quickly dragging him outside into the deep snow and covering him and quickly untied or cut the cords around the Galverinians hands and feet, and then without any definite purpose in mind they ran to the door stopped outside, and encountered the other two guards just returning. Here was a tussle like two prize fighters contesting each other for a few moments and the guards were overpowered and gagged and dragged into the snow drift close by. Then again the three Christians went out side and looked over toward the distant water tank. The storm had suddenly passed it being now a clear moon light night but zero cold and with everything covered with snow it was nearly as bright as day. The Galverinians and the Angelinian could see the big tank clearly, and they also could make out a number of black figures and dismounted men and horses on the tracks near it. The Galverinians and the Angelinian crept into the shadow of the building and stood there trembling with excitement, trying to think of something they should do. The gunbeam creek ran past the station it was probably a little stream from back of the distant hills and here the stream was about a hundred feet wide. A fringe of low bushes now half covered with snow had grown up along its sides. The thought came to the Angelinian that he and his two companions could approach the tank unseen if they would follow along this fringe of bushes. They slowly dragged themselves through the deep snow behind them, and slowly began making their way down toward the tank. They did not stop to ask themselves what they were going to do there, they only knew they wanted to get near the bag and the little prisoner now in possession of the enemy.

The three Christians therefore followed down the tiny frozen stream until they came to the tank, and there they crept up behind the big supporting pillars the Angelinian feeling to see if the captured pistol was still loaded. He could hear the voices of the Galverinians and could see some of the men walking up and down the railroad tracks, while others were standing still and with them was the child weeping bitterly.

 The Galverinians were so complaining because the cavalry force was so late in coming. They were getting cold, but though they wished to go back to the station immediately they did not wish to just the same as they believed the cavalry would be along at any minute. When the cavalry arrived they would go back bringing out the prisoners and rode toward the Galverinian encampments. Then they began speaking about general J. A. Allister Stanek to which they intended to take the bag of papers and of the child who they were going to turn over to general Purgatorians child gave. The Angelinian and the Galverinians learned the rebels would ride with the Galverinian cavalry until they came to the sound bend of the Sunbeam Creek where there was a steep grade on the road about two miles west, and from there ride off toward the rebel lines. They would then remain within the rebel lines a week or fourteen days until the excitement about the robbery of the place had died down. The Angelinian bidding the Galverinians to remain hidden where they were crept closer and closer until he stood no more than fifteen paces from the rebels. Suddenly his heart almost stopped beating for there on the other side of the post, bob behind which he stood hidden sat the bag with its provisions and by it the little girl shivering with the cold and crying. He could have reached out his hand and taken hold of it. But he did not move to do that very thing but drew back, what would be the use. He would gain nothing. To attack the rebels would be committing suicide. To seize the bag and child would only cause permit. In a moment the cavalry force might appear, the rebels would step over to get the bag and the little girl, and if would find them both gone. What then. Let a hue and cry and cause the cavalry to scout the whole country. They knew the Angelinian and the two Galverinians were the only persons in the vicinity that night. They and the whole cavalry force would set out and look for him the two Galverinians with the child and in the deep snow, with a clear moon shining, they would quickly run the fugitives down. Now he racked his brain in the next few minutes as he stood there with that precious bag and the still more precious child within arms reach. He did not dare attract the child attention for she would then make a break to go to him and if one of the rebels saw her move off a shot would kill her for they would ever fire at a child. And then a plan of action "Thank God" flashed through his mind. If if God would just cause the rebel cavalry to delay its coming a little longer he told the Galverinians of his plan and then the three again crept down to the shadow of the bushes and hid unseen back to the station. Where while the two Galverinians formed a duplicate of child from a large doll they had found in the house or signal station the Angelinian hauled out the empty vase or valise.

It was locked but with a blow of the hammer the Angelinian smashed its lock. Then he began to throw into it mats, bolts, and all other kinds of heavy metal junk that was lying about the room. When he had a weight that he judged equal to that of the other bag, and while the two others were done with their work, he stuffed a bundle of waste upon top of the junk, took the grip, and started back to the tank. Very moment they had expected to hear the cry of voices from the arriving cavalry but the rebels did not come. They reached the tank again, crept up behind its huge timbers, and made their way to the one behind which he had left the other bag and the little girl. They were both still there, and all of the rebels were now walking up and down the tracks a few paces away. After cautiously arousing the child and getting her to come slowly to him he put the dummy in her place in the same sitting posture, and also took the other bag and in its place set the bag of metal junk. With the two recovered treasures in their possession once more the three slipped down to the bushes. They had barely gained the shelter of the signal station when the shriek of a shell struck through the still night air, and in a second more there was a lightning flash overhead and a terrific bang and confusion reigned among the rebels. They were spotted by searchlights from the lines of Christian soldiers and fired upon. At that moment also

 At that moment the foe cavalry arrived and the rebel leader of the other said, "At the bag and the prisoner Joseph. Here they come at last!" The long column of rebel cavalry came slowly down and stopped at the water tank. For several minutes there was the sound of many voices, confusion and curses, then a rattle of rifles as the rebel column crept around, there was a tramping of horses, and the foe started back again in the direction of the station. As they rode past the spy spot the three lay with the bag and the rescued child they caught the glimpse of many black figures coming from another direction. The cavalry seeing them also changed their course and were soon out of sight. They had intended to stop at the station but at the sight of so many approaching Angelinians suddenly changed their minds. The Angelinian and the two Galverinians then walked back toward the station dropping the bag into a deep snowdrift on the way for safety and sat down before the fire, after giving the child all the comfort possible it well pleased with the outcome of the evening's adventure.

 The three Christians had therefore followed down the tiny frozen stream until they came to the tank, and there they crept up behind the big supporting pillars the Angelinian feeling to see if the captured pistol was still loaded. He could hear the voices of the Galverinians and could see some of the men walking up and down the railroad tracks, while others were standing still and with them was the child weeping bitterly.

The three had no fear whatever that the rebels might return. They would not in their haste to get to the rebel lines examine the contents of the bag or the doll before they got to the lines with the cavalry column, probably not at all until they brought them both before their general, and the distance was too great to allow their coming back even if they should wish to. A slight warm chinook came pouring down the valley late that night, and the snow was still slushy and packy when the four awoke the following morning. The two generals and their escorts came down the following morning very early and relieved the Angolinian of the bag. They listened to his and the stories of the two Galverinians of outwitting the rebels with shouts of laughter. They would give their very lives they said to have been permitted to see the faces of the rebels and even the chief general Mic-Allister Stanek, and Purgatorian when they opened up the bag of old iron and presented the doll.

The child was as soon as possible sent to Abyssinika with the two Galverinians one of who adopted her, and whom superintendant general Hanson heard of the Angolinian officers adventure. He wrote him a letter of thanks, promised him a commission of colonel and told him he would not have to wait another day before getting change of location as the station was not in need any more as the armies being defeated at Lashburg Landing were going to withdraw to other locations. Soon the lieutenant went on his new commission as a colonel.

After general Pistro, possinanna one of the Glandelinian generals died of a lingering form of disease after receiving mortal wounds at the battle of Lashburg Landing to which wounded soldiers are usually subjected is while a while a prisoner within the Christian lines, some other Glandelinian prisoners mostly no doubt the fierce and sanguinary Mic-pollestinians, decided to take a chance in securing the liberty of many of their prisoners also prisoners within the Christian lines, and if successful to look up the "Derlings of the Nation" called the Vivian, Iris, or Violet and her sisters and murder them as they were considered a menace to the rebellion.

General Pistro of the rebel troops when captured while wounded had been usual for a Mic-pollestinian general. All Mic-pollestinians are always surly and cruel and wild in nature when prisoners and appear so sullen and threatening that it is necessary to have an enormous number of guards to watch them at the edge of the internment camps, but this Glandelinian general who was a Mic-pollestinian was usually mild, despite his weakness from wounds and illness and many children were not afraid of him. He died like a good soldier asking pardon from all those he believed he may have offended and even kissing some little girl and boy children who had been once persecuted by him and hugging them and showing all the resentment he could for his former ways dying indeed a repentant. The other Mic-pollestinian prisoners those who were not wounded but just captured were placed or had been placed in the same internment camp because no other internment camps had room for these sorts of Angolinian rebels but these were otherwise entirely different creatures than the general and looked as if they would kill the world if they had the power to do so.

"These rebel prisoners known as the Mic-pollestinians will have to learn their places a fast enough," said one of the Angolinian officers of the guard when on inspection, striving to reassure his sentries who complained about the sullen ways of the rebels one who had recently insolently snatched a cigarette from the mouth of a guard off duty and smoked it himself and dared the soldier to come and get it despite being armed. The officer however advised them to watch each prisoner closely as they did look vicious and independent. It was once reported that one of the Vivian, Iris Jennie Vivian probably had been passing one of these internment camps innocently looking around and humming the song called "Onward Christian Soldiers" when one of the prisoners cursed her and another struck her down as she happened to pass too close and then killed three soldiers and wounded six with his fist before he was overpowered and killed himself. This showed the dangerous nature of prisoners of these kind. All orders the rebels frightfully refused to obey, growing growing at the guards and Christian officers, and forcing their comrades to follow their example declaring they would not do anything asked and would not repent their ways as long as they were prisoners. The rebel prisoners of these kind had been given up given up as incorrigible by many guards and officers, but the guards knew nothing of the history of the Mic-pollestinians except what they probably suspected from their sullen pouting ways and their nature.

"You fellows have to be careful. One officer of the guard told his sentry when he reported that a prisoner boldly tore from his pocket a package of cigarettes as he passed by. Guard or no guard they will rob you just the same when too close to them."

The guard did learn hereafter to be more careful, from the vigor and harshness of the foe nature, even if prisoners realized the Mic-pollestinian prisoners did not appear to be afraid of no guard but they did not try to make any escapes as the gates and wire fences of the internment camps were usually charged with electric currents and it would be fatal to grasp the fences and gates. The natural moreness of the disposition of the Mic-pollestinians only became more pronounced and they seemed to have developed a settled animosity toward the whole world in general. Meanwhile during the dull inactivity, and during the time violet and her sisters had went into Vivian Wiskey to spy on the foe and watch the child slave rebels at work and do what they could for these many more prisoners of the same sort had been brought in so that at the end of week one internment camp had about fifteen thousand prisoners all rebels who did nothing but sulk, pout and frow and scowl at every one who passed and looked so vicious that even the guards were somewhat afraid of them. Filled with misgivings about Mic-pollestinian a Mic-pollestinian prisoners general Joseph Mic-antler set out in the work of having a specimen u number of some mounted guards to watch such prisoners, for he felt that if these kind of rebels ever made a break for freedom and secured arms they would reap a harvest of lives and property that no typhoon could boast of.

All went reasonably well for ten days, and then during the transferring of Zimmermanian and Gaurian prisoners to a new well guarded internment camp and while Zimmerman officers were being exchanged for the return of Christian prisoners and officers a Mic-pollestinian prisoner sullen and sulk was being transferred to a prison tent on examination of spying or something like that when a little girl in the company streets running about playing with a hoop hit hoop accidentally bumped into the fierce Glandelinian, and the infuriated prisoner enraged from the pain as she had collided head on into his stomach with a frightful curse and blasphemous language lunged at the little girl. Several hundred soldiers had gathered at this point to watch the transferring of rebel prisoners and these seeing the furious rebel lunging at the child rushed forward in scattered groups but before they could reach the scene, with one blow of his huge fist the strong rebel literally scooped the poor little girl off the ground, and grasping her by the throat in a stranglehold until she was choked to senselessness threw her with great force into the group of soldiers many of which the child knocked down. The soldiers then coming up in the foremost part were bowled over like ten pins by the rebel who struck right and left, one suffering a scratched face and a broken jaw, and then the rebel thinking of making his escape bolted across the company street and street, and down outside the camp near the sentry line, finally taking refuge and hiding under the wide porch of general Hanson's headquarters near Jennie Vivian. The instant the trouble with the escaped prisoner started, many onlookers looking on and children terrified by what had happened and fearing that the Glandelinian prisoner who had escaped would go for them next ran for the nearest tents. The prisoner who had expected to remain free did not get so far as the under portion of the veranda of general Hanson's headquarters, and the company streets were swarming with soldiers looking for him, and finally Jack Evans himself seeing him pounced upon him and brought him back to where he had been when the trouble started.

"Now" said general Jack Evans. "You come along and get that wild animal nature out of you. Do you think you are going to turn into some wild ugly animal or beast while in our hands. We'll make a fabled dragon out of you yet."

The recaptured rebel said not a word as he was jerked into the company street into a yard to the rear of a large of a large tent, and ordered to bring forth of his papers of which he was accused of concealing. The roofs of barracks and other army buildings were now covered with small boys and girls, while all the soldiers themselves stood in a wide semicircle at a very respectable distance.

The Glandelinian rebel now was plainly nervous over his wild conduct, if not as afraid, but he when backed into an angle of a stone wall of general Hanson's headquarters looked dangerous, but finally he was lead toward the rear by means of a rope tied around him for security growling sullenly, and looking with red eyes toward the crowd on roofs of barracks, and the soldiers who looked sullenly at him in return.

"Now you come along and join your own sullen sulky comrades." Said Jack Evans his pistol in one hand and his sabre in the other, for he was resolved to shoot or sabre the desperate Mic-pollestinian rebel if he again made any attempt to break away. The rebel silently and silently obeyed, not considering the time ripe for an argument with this early Angolinian officer strong enough to kill a bull with his fists only, and earnestly wishing to get by himself so that he could plan some defensive campaign. The crowd of soldiers and little refugees children followed a half mile behind as the Christian officer or general led the way to and into the army house in one corner of which was a steel cage, where offenders like him were confined until they could be tried in the army justice court or transferred to the original jail for he was to be tried for his murder of the little girl.

"In there you go you damn rebel," said Evans with a scowl. "You and your beastly nature together."

On hearing this the glandolinian prisoner promptly set up a loud outcry. "No no," He roared waving his hands threateningly and looked to kingstone ferocious. "I'll kill any one who puts me behind a steel ga cage." He went in nevertheless for Evans shoved him in with force and slammed him to the floor with the push.

"He certainly is a nice kind of a glandolinian to be brought without strong guard into the company streets if he is that ugly," said Evans to one of the officers who had been in charge of the prisoner. "You ought to be sent to the guard house for leading such a prisoner without strong guard around little children. He already has killed a little girl either by the choking he gave her, he by the manner he flung her into the crowd. You put the other prisoners in the internment camp and then come along with me. I wish to have a few words with you."

The soldier obeyed but protested that the prisoner might be assaulted by a mob of soldiers and killed.

"Good riddance," said Evans. "I even wish wolves would brin in and eat him up. He slammed the steel door shut on the glandolinian prisoner who looked at him with the eyes of a tiger, not deeming the use of a key necessary however as the door looks itself on the inside, and then led the guard to his headquarters, and told him to wait in the reception room until general Hanson would appear. He was to give an account of himself for the prisoner not being strongly guarded. Over while waiting for Hanson's appearance he was given his supper there, for the christian general was busy holding a council with his generals and could not attend to his case until several hours. The prisoner was also fed on bread and coffee, and finally the soldiers dispersed since the disturbance was over, though without hindrance a excited small boy and a girl who were crying kept raising themselves by the bars, and peering through the windows of the prison house until at the approach of night the interior became so dark that absolutely nothing could be seen.

Millen Davyson an Angelinian officer was ignorant of what had happened in his own location of the christian encampments that afternoon, for he had been at Mary Ann town attending a military conference, he being a colonel of the medical staff. After galloping toward the lines for three hours he soon reached his post and stopping at one of the signal army towers to inspect, he ordered a group of boys and 1 boys that were looking at something curious asked them to go to their respective places and not be too far from the protesting portion of the christian lines as they were. By the time he reached his own section, not another person was in sight anywhere except company guards and the sentries guarding the barracks and other army buildings. He swung around the corner of one of the company streets after being halted by a guard and allowed to pass as he was recognized, and then walking rapidly he passed the handsome structure used by general Hanson, where his headquarters which stood on the opposite side of one of the company streets. The 1 electric lights in the company street were not placed very close together on account of the fog, and there were frequent dark places along the wall shaded away thoroughfares of the company streets, but general Hanson's headquarters was doubly illuminated, having an arch light under the ornamental second story porch, and three others over the roadways just to the north of the building.

Davyson was just opposite this second light, when he heard a sharp tinkling, and then a clear clatter of something falling, and turning about saw a shower of glass fall to the ground. Looking intently he then noticed that the lower sash of one of the side windows with glass shattered out had been partly raised, and the iron bars that guarded it pulled or taken out by someone. One suspicious person, he at once suspected was inside general Hanson's Headquarters, tampering with the wireless apparatus, or looking for plans or plots, for the building contained little or nothing to tempt an ordinary thief.

Davyson used to be an assistant orderly for general Hanson before he received his commission for his bravery, and still had the same key to any door of the building, the big door opening only from the inside, but was his key in a pocket of the uniform he was wearing. He plunged one hand after the other into the side pockets of his army trousers, and after fumbling for a moment with his finger tips, dragged on a key ring, and quickly found the bit of brass for which he was searching. Then he hesitated wondering if he had best secure help before making an investigation all alone, but being unaturally courageous, soon rejected the more prudent plan.

In a half minute he had crossed the company street, unlocked the front door where he found no guard which looked to him suspicious, and left it ajar. He went into the building was dark, but at the right hand was a switch which he threw over, when instantly the whole lower floor was brilliantly lighted. Davyson stepped briskly across the little front room and thrust back the door leading to the main front hall where general Hanson's room was, and where army apparatus of all kinds was stored, and a cage located for the use of keeping articles which were too precious to be trusted without being under lock and key.

He returned himself came back into christian house and so the christians had recaptured the most valuable fighting all the ground they had lost

"What are you doing here?" He shouted loudly 1 loudly for the legs of a man were visible as the intruder wriggled through between the remaining bars outside the partially open window. There was no response and Davyson made a dash for the legs only to see the feet disappear almost from under his extended hands. He thrust his head outside to see what had become of the man when a hoarse angry growl behind him caused him to jerk back in amazement and alarm. Almost upon him with drawn dagger of great length was a big fiendish looking soldier in brownish gray uniform with open mouth and glaring eyes, and a leather hat half across his head in rakish fashion while just beyond was a small girl and boy tied to two chairs naked and bound and gagged. No doubt two glandolinian assassins had entered the christian lines undetected and were about to kill the little girl and boy when the Angelinian officer came in.

Now the headquarters of general Hanson had become almost transformed so mysteriously into a slaughter pen Davyson could not imagine, but finding his weapon had dropped in his excitement of looking for his key, and having no dagger about his person, and knowing he was no trainer of such brutes which glared at him now, he had no intention for the moment with interfering with the human beast. For the moment too much surprised and alarmed for conscious thought or plan, he leaped to one side and climbed swiftly up to the top of a high cubbard. The glandolinian who ever he was was plainly in a savage mood, for he pursued the Angelinian with surprising agility, clambered up relentlessly over the ends of some ladders straight toward where he was perched with the dagger held between his teeth. There were axes and sabres in leather loops on the lower section of the left wall, but these were far below the reach of Davyson, and when his pursuer was almost upon him, he sprang across to the top of a supply wagon standing in the middle of the huge room.

The two small children terrified looked fearfully at the scene, while the rascally glandolinian growling and cursing louder than before, scrambled down from the cubbard, and stare started to mount the wagon. Davyson was being rapidly driven into a corner by the glandolinian soldier and he realized that he surely would be caught, and mangled or murdered if he kept on, for only a small wasteland remained between him and the back end of the building. Across in the opposite corner was the steel cage, and he saw that the door was open. Once inside he felt sure he could be safe from the rebel soldier, but the thought of being imprisoned for the remainder of the night was galling, and besides the other glandolinian child assassin might come back. Beyond the entry lay the outer door and free freedom to summon help, and his was posing his body to leap and rush for it when he heard a slam and a jar. These sounds were readily interpreted; a wire draught coming from the open window had blown the door shut, and it closed with a spring lock.

The big hairy glandolinian ruffian was within a yard of him as he dodged and sprang over a wheel to the wooden floor. He turned toward the peculiar cage as his only sure refuge, but in the second or two in which he had hesitated, the rebel had placed himself between him and the corner, and now flourishing his weapon threateningly uttered an imprecation and demanded of the Angelinian officer to give up and nothing would happen to him. Davyson almost hopped in made a dash around and between the end of the wagon and the side wall. He had in mind the raised window and the opening between the bars. It would indeed be to him a most tight squeeze for he was a good sized man, much bigger than the rebel, but he probably could get out that way quick quicker than if he stopped to unlock one of the doors, though he shuddered to think of the assailant's dagger closing in on his back or neck. At that instant he heard a tremendous chorus of whines and screams and growls and curses behind him and then silence. The little children had somehow gotten ride of the rope around their arms and had removed the gags and started to yell to arouse the Angelinians, and were being strangled for their seemingly imprudence. This gave a seconds reprieve, and just then in looking for a weapon himself to kill the brute before he killed the children he brushed against a dangling rope and instinctively clutched it. The rebel seeing his motion and knowing it was a rope to pull a bell to arouse an alarm in case of spies within the locality let go of the children he was choking, just as the Angelinian was jerking the rope up and down furiously. The clapper struck the resonant metal and sent the clamour out of over the entire christian encampment ding-ding-ding-ding-ding-ding.

But the glandolinian had his hands on the throats of the children only a short time. With mouths bleeding and gasping the child were let go and the glandolinian glaring at the man ringing the bell again made a rush for him. Davyson saw him coming and slowing with him fought for a few minutes until he was disarmed by the rebel, then putting a foot on the window sill, the Angelinian leaped as high as he could, and started head over head up the rope toward the ceiling. "ding, ding" went the bell, when the clapper would be held hard for a moment, only to repeat the summons, followed by another brief interval of silence. After the most strenuous exertions of which he had any recollection, Davyson found himself panting and exhausted, but temporarily safe. He was against the ceiling, which his hands also touched while one hand rested on top of the tall window frame, helping to support his weight. The bell was again silent, for he could not jerk the rope while he rested, and he wondered if the momentary alarm had aroused anyone outside or in the building. In it was, he felt sure it must have puzzled to the hearer, for surely no such erratic alarm had ever been sounded before. He was indeed very thankful that the windows were so tall, for though the glandelinian tried to climb one of the windows to reach him, he could not quite reach the top. Not four feet away however was the wagon, and after a minute or two the glandelinian began to clamber upon it. Perhaps he would fail to reach across, but pay was gamely alarmed, swinging his other foot over to the window casing, he resumed his jerks up and down on the rope. "ding--ding--ding--ding--sing--sing--sing--sing--sing--sing" went the bell. Great drops of sweat gathered on Davysons forehead and ran down into his eyes, due both to the tremendous exertions he was making, and the fright caused by the proximity of the glandelinian. For now the desperate glandelinian was on top of the wagon seat, and of ing out toward him with one of the sabres he had drawn from the wall in one hand and a gun in the other preparatory to fire. Davyson was about and kicked furiously at the hand that held the gun knocking it from him and just then came the sound of shouts outside, and a rattle at the door, which was unlocked and flung open.

As two or three half dressed soldiers burst in from the entry, the glandelinian wheeled with a curse and faced them with flourished sabre. Davyson had been waiting for just such diversion, and the instant it came, he slide to the floor quickly liberated the two children, and ran to join his friends dragging the children with him. The vestibule was quickly filled with soldiers armed to the teeth, and the hall and room was filled and the glandelinian made a prisoner in no time.

"Where's general Hanson?" cried somebody got general Evans. "How got rifles and bayonets?" were the exclamations to the crowds of soldiers. General Evans quickly arrived, and very soon discovered that the cell in the guardhouse was empty. The glandelinian desperado who had killed the child in the company street had escaped and had been doing his very best to help the other rebel murder the boy and girl, when Davyson interposed. No he had taken to flight without accomplishing his wicked purpose, which perhaps was a good thing for him, as by this time the soldiers were not in a pleasant mood. Davyson was sent to round him up if possible, and a decision was reached to shoot the glandelinian for attempting to cut up the two children to death, when the rebels courage began to fall and he begged to be spared. He was immediately taken out of the house under guard, and he was securely placed in one of the tightest tightest internment camps to head trail by guardhouse for his attempted deep within general Hansons very headquarters.

Hanson had been absent while on duty at the time and had just arrived two hours after the place had been raided by the soldiers and the glandelinian assassin captured.

The whole encampment awoke the next morning to find that it had another child assassin for a prisoner. The other glandelinian had vanished and no trace of him could be found as yet by the cavalry who were scouring the region for him, but the other prisoner had remained, a source of trouble for the guards.

Finally he was court martialled and sentenced to be placed before the firing squad. Occasionally since then many suspicious persons strolled toward the outskirts of the christian lines but he never gets in or causes. "Move on and be quick about it." Is the order from the moment they strike the entrance or limits of the christian lines, and it is given by the guards in a tone that admits no debate.

After the last day of the bloody battle of Lehighburg, landing when the winter sun had set and the twilight shadows were settling over the snow and body covered plains, an Angelinian officer who had been on his way all the evening soon came in sight of the yellow lined stream known as Gunbeas Creek, which marked the boundary of the main christian lines under general Hanson. He was also a part of that of general consentinian Aronburg and also, mention if you please to mention. He had set out from the rear of general Hansons christian lines the morning before a little before sunrise and now at the end of nearly two days journey through a wilderness, and escaping from the horrors of one forest fire which advanced with the speed of a racehorse, he was now nearing the region of his enemies the rebels of Angelinia.

He thought indeed thrilled the young Angelinian officer, for it was indeed his first journey into the region of the foe lines, and he knew that his reputation as a warrior of Christ and his Blessed Mother depended upon his success. He had during the last evening of the eve of the battle of Lehighburg landing betted any of his comrades, that dangerous as it was he could succeed alone, and without compass to reach the foe lines, at besieged, ivian y picket and rescue any number of little child slaves he wished. He Angelinian soldiers around him. It first had been so scornful as it was a more dangerous undertaking than any one ever thought, but liking the young officers manners and his bravery they decided to accept his bet, and if he failed to accomplish the purpose he was to owe them all a ten dollar piece. If he won they all were to give him the same price.

He had known just where the many child slave troop was held and the brave Angelinian officer had determined to rescue them single handed, not only to win the bet but also to free the children who he felt so sorry for, and also he liked to be able to boast that he had succeeded. And knowing the nature of child slaves he being without children had longed more than ever to have some of them in his arms and embrace. It indeed was a daring undertaking for a lad of fifteen winters, but he had talked and conversed with Father Dearburner, the Angelinian Catholic chaplain and had made many promises and other prayers to the Great Sacred Heart of Jesus and his Blessed Mother, and dangerous as it was and foolish as it seemed, and also rash to the extreme he felt sure nevertheless of his ability to accomplish the exploit. Exploit a young officer whose name was James Gurneller made his camp beside the beautiful little stream, and as night finally closed down upon the snow covered plains he started a tiny fire, and broiled sufficient chicken enough to last him through the remainder of his journey. When he wrapped himself in his blankets and sat beside the half frozen water. A trout was plashed within a few feet of him, a sparrow sang its night a chirping in the branches of a tall tree above him, and sometimes far to the west he heard the signal boom and other bawling signals of the foe lines, and generally the serenade of some time timber wolf. A moment later his pony snorted in fright, and the young officer arose to his feet, and drew his revolver. When he reached the horse, he saw a form of a man slinking away into the snow windows. Not wishing to fire as the pistol would make too much noise he picked up a large stone and hurled it after the retreating form, and then not being able to get him, returned to his fire.

At sunrise the young Angelinian officer crossed the stream, and rode away away toward the west.

He saw far from the distant suggestion of composition of the "Mollie" taken fortifications large cities of gray tents, and many moving bands of glandelinian cavalry, and garrison and other dragon dragon squadrons, but as he was far off from them, and not seen, and as he was anxious to reach the foe lines he made to attempt to go in hiding now. He however traveled with the greatest caution, and was also in the disguise of an Angelinian officer for he realized that at any moment he might encounter a party of rebel cavalry. The day was far spent when the young Angelinian officer crawled to the crest of a ridge to reconnoiter, and discovered an immense cloud of dust far to the south of him. He watched it with considerably anxious anxiety, and in a few minutes he saw what appeared exactly to be a tremendous sea of rebel horsemen galloping across a large plain and over two meadows their horses making a great continuous galloping noise that was heard from there. They were riding toward the west toward ivian picket or one of the other fortresses, and the young Angelinian officer believed from their appearance in their uniform and hats they were the

"Mollie" soldiers and garrisonians together. He watched them for nearly an hour before they passed out of sight over a high rise of ground, and then he counted his own pony and continued on his way. He rode until dark, and camped again for the night on the open plain near the little stream. Early the following day, the young Angelinian officer discovered smoke of great volumes rising above a long line of pine and tall evergreen trees some distance to the southwest. He believed the trees marked the course of the little stream, and he felt sure the smoke rose from some section of the glandelinian encampments. His heart bounded at the thought. Having actually come within sight of his goal, he became greatly excited. However he soon stifled his emotions, for he knew that to be a successful in his daring exploit he must remain calm. He estimated the hostile encampments to be at least a days journey away, and for a moment his confidence weakened as he realized indeed the extreme peril to which he must expose himself to reach and get into the foe lines to accomplish his rescue of the children. He knew the number of guards, very road and bridge toward the foe lines would be guarded, every company street had had guards, and even the child slave pens were more strongly guarded. When he thought of the plight of the many child slaves may be in and it gave him new courage. He realized however it would be foolhardy to attempt to get into the foe lines before dark with so many sentries about and so many foe cavalry roaming about like herds of hungry wolves, and he looked about for a safe hiding place. He knew also he must avoid the foe searchlights the following night for if one of them detected him he would not know what happened if any cannons got his range. Several hundred feet away he saw a narrow ravine, and when he reached it he found out it was a portion of the water course for the Gunbeas Creek for in the bottom was a clear stream of sprouting water not as yet frozen as its current was too swift.

It stretched away toward the southeast, and the young Angelinian officer believed that that by following it he could approach a part of the immense rebel encampments with little likely hood of being discovered. But he had to look out for foe cavalry also. The young Angelinian officer followed the bed of the beautiful little stream until it turned abruptly toward the west running toward the direction of the horseman's river, and then he picked his pony and crawled forward to the top of the ravine to again reconnoiter. He had covered half the distance to the foe lines, but he saw the immense clouds of smoke was not from there, and were further off than he had looked. The smoke rose from somewhere in Julian Gallo and hung over the city in thick wreaths. There was a big fire burning in the city no doubt for the smoke appeared as if a whole block were burning. One more of the besieging guns work no doubt.

seeing the nearness of the rebel encampments however he trembled with excitement, as he saw the immense city of tents and barracks, and then the immense flaming fortresses far to the rear. The sun was far down now near the western horizon; snow clouds were appearing from the northwest, and he determined to wait until dark and then move. As soon as night had once more settled upon the mountains the young Angelinian officer though a little troubled by the numerous enemy flash lights scotching the sky, and surprised at the excessive red glow over Julia Gallo led his pony from the ravine, and rode cautiously toward the main bed of the Auburn river. He made a detour toward the southwest, for he had seen a sea of horses grazing near one section of the glandelinian encampments and he wished to avoid them. He feared they would exchange signals with his own men, and thus arouse the suspicion of the rebels who would begin a search and make it impossible for him to even get near the lines. When the young officer finally reached the fringe of the many trees which bordered the water of the little stream, he dismounted and tied his pony. Then he muzzled it with a piece of heavy cloth, and set out for the city of glandelinian tents and barracks. The young officer made his way through the timber as cautiously as a wolf for the woods at a certain portion seemed to be teeming with glandelinian guards. When he had gone for some distance he stopped to listen. The night was hush was broken however by some outcry of a glandelinian signal man, but not being suspicious that he was seen he cautiously continued his advance, a few moving forward as cautiously as some blackfoot Indians. When a hundred feet further on, he heard something moving through the bushes directly ahead of him and became most suspicious. His heart pounded against his ribs, and his hands trembled violently as he silently drew his sword and sought shelter behind the nearest tree. The unseen prowler was advancing directly toward him, and the young Angelinian officer wondered if he had been discovered by one of the rebel sentinels in the outer outskirts of the forest. He peered cautiously around the tree trunk, but the darkness was still impenetrable. Then as the sounds drew nearer he looked again and saw a small human figure moving toward him from the bushes. He next instant had the object by the throat whatever it was so tight that it could not let out no outcry and pulled it violently toward him. At the same moment he heard the low long and dismal wail of a glandelinian coyote, a short ways out on the plain, and also signal reports of the rebel lines going on and continuing for several minutes without abatement and the searchlights began to flash with greater fury.

After having pulled the unknown creature toward him and letting go had placed one hand across the mouth he took out his own little flash light and flashed it a moment at his prisoner. It was a ragged terrified little girl. She looked at him with unspeakable terror, but instantly seeing it was no rebel he changed.

Terrified as she was he had however no difficulty whatever by preface to show her he was no enemy but an Angelinian in disguise, and then she having confidence in him he told her how to get past the guards, and promising she would remain in hiding where she was he said:

"I'll go on ahead then but to know where you are in case I return I'll leave with you my flash light. If I happen to fail to come back this way make your way to the Christian lines by following the banks of this stream. Go north not south or you'll run into the rebel lines."

She promised to follow out his instructions and after an embrace from him he went off again toward the foe lines. He knew right then the little girl was a child slave who had made her own escape. Soon afterwards after passing about three hundred guards, he saw the glow of many glandelinian camp fires, and he sank to his hands and knees and crept forward until he was within sight of the nearest trees when he concealed himself in the bushes to watch. As he saw many figures moving about the camp fires, he heard a sound behind him and was surprised to see the little girl had followed him.

"I came back," she stated timidly, "to ask you what you wish to do within the camps of the glandelinians. Are you going to spy?"

"No," he answered and he cautiously told his mission. Now dear reader if it was not for the child as advice he would have failed to accomplish his mission for it would have been impossible to enter the foe lines. With the aid of the little girl he had no difficulty in identifying the glandelinian warriors as they strutted to and fro in their uniforms with shouldered arms. He saw also a number of blood hounds slinking at the edge of the encampments, and his heart filled with misgivings at the sight of them. The Angelinian officer knew that if they once caught his scent or the scent of the little girl they would instantly alarm the enemy, and the woods would soon be an inferno of rifle shots for him as he ran for safety. Through what the little girl whispered to him as he helped her in his embrace for all the time he realized the difficulty of entering the foe camps without arousing them. And also through what the child told him he realized it would be useless however to enter the camp until he had located the child's slave internment camp.

The child told him that there were 10,000 children boys and girls confined at the camp and were worked like horses. A sudden grip of a fear came over him.

Perhaps the ten thousand children may have been massacred by the glandelinians. This horrible thing usually happens when the rebels fear that the children would be rescued by Angelinians or agents or spies, or during some desperate attacks. The child's eyes indeed flashed threateningly at the thought. If the ten thousand little children had been massacred, he knew his bet was not won and so he was prepared to forfeit his own life to avenge the little children. Having made his bold decision he offered telling the child to keep out of sight of the rebels and after giving her one tight embrace and asking her to pray for his success crept stealthily through the undergrowth in the hope of reaching a spot in which he could see the portion of the encampment where the child had pointed out, where the child slaves were held. When he finally gained a position which commanded a view of the enemy encampments and the city and even the fortresses nearest to him, his heart filled with joy for he saw the shacks where the child slaves were kept and many children still were working though it was still dark. Except for their almost complete nakedness or ragged clothing one might have supposed them to be members of rebel child scouts for there was nothing except the work they were doing and the guards over them to suggest they were child slave prisoners.

They would have appeared apparently as free as the foe soldiers themselves with whom they were if it had not been for the work they were doing and the guards and overseers among them. They were helping in the erection of high sentinels and breastworks and the placing of cannons. The young Angelinian officer looked at the numerous child slaves with amazement. For one moment a sickening doubt entered his mind. Had the child slave really renounced renounced the Christian soldiers and nation and pledged a allegiance to this hated rebel troop? He knew that this choice was sometimes offered to any number of child slaves, and he wondered if the child slaves had accepted the terms to save their lives. The young officer weakened at the thought and almost felt not going to their aid. However his confidence in the child slaves however was too strong to be shaken by such unjust suspicion, and the young lad felt thoroughly ashamed for having permitted it to enter his heart. But ever was the reason for the apparent loyalty and restraint of the Rebels to the child slaves, the young Angelinian officer was convinced that it had not been earned by their sacrificing their God and his blessed Mother by betrayal through cowardice.

It was not long however before the young Angelinian officer learned the true significance of the most unusual procedure. He saw twelve glandelinian officers emerge from a large labour or circus like tent near the center of one of the encampments, and walk slowly toward a group of other rebel officers about a table near a camp fire. They were led by a tall broad shouldered man, who wore a wonderful hat almost in the fashion of the Mexicans, and a spid splined uniform fit to kill a king of a blue gray color. The young Angelinian officer knew at once from his dress and manner that he was a glandelinian general. Behind him came a short older man who wore a hat similar to the generals, and a uniform of a colonel, in his hand he carried a walking cane. The young officer believed he was a courier or an orderly.

The other warrior officers all wore black round hats of sailor fashion but larger and carried coupes sticks, and the Angelinian officer felt sure they were also head officers of the division glandelinian of that encampment. He believed they had been sitting in the headquarters tent in council, and as they formed in line before the main leader, the lad realized that it was to be an inspection of the child slaves for they also were being lined up by hundred per rank. He feared the fate of the child slaves were in their hands, and then too he began to dread it was an examination to find out which of the children had become sick from overwork or something of the sort, or defective from accident for all those who did were massacred as no accounts.

A terrible fate indeed for the poor child slaves. At a word from the chief commander the other rebel officers rose to their feet, for some moments the two lines of officers and generals looked at each other spoke few words and then faced the line of children. The rebel generals appeared indeed to be superb specimens of fine manhood, and the young Angelinian officer gazed upon them with interest. Then the rebel general began to talk. It was impossible for the young Angelinian officer to hear what he said, but he gained some idea by watching his gestures and gestures.

He saw him sweep his hands about the circle of general officers and point toward the barracks and other buildings holding the child slaves, and the young Angelinian officer believed he was intending to remove the child slaves to some other portion of the camp or at least put them inside of a wooden shack where all hopes of rescue would be gone. The lad fixed his eyes on the chief general of the Angelinian rebels and sought to read the emotions which were battling in his own heart. The rebel veteran warrior general had been too well trained however to display his thought thoughts on his face.

He required himself came back into circulation possession and so the Christians had reappeared. Not a moment later all the ground they had lost

He showed no more interest than any of the fierce and stolid "landelinian general officers who stood watching him. His splendid self control filled the young Angolinian officer almost with pride for though an enemy he could not help but have admiration for the landelinian general. When the main landelinian general finally ceased speaking, the Angolinian soldier felt his heart beating wildly, for he realized that the situation of the ten thousand child slaves depended upon his reply. For a moment or two the rebel chief was silent, while he glanced scornfully at the child slaves lined up before him and then defiantly toward the direction of the besieging christian lines. Then he made his reply. At his words the warriors about the table near the camp fire sprang to their feet and stood in double rank with shouldered muskets. The Angolinian officer fearing now something was really going to happen to the child slaves, drew his pistol and cocked it, preparing to send a number of shots toward the direction of the Angolinian rebel lines. The latter however he realized were beyond pistol shot range, and as he watched the generals, he heard the chief leader speak in a tone of authority, and the rebel soldiers moved forward in defiance glaring fiercely at the child slaves. Then the chief general called three of his under general officers, and they disappeared into a nearby tent.

A moment later they came emerged with rawhide thongs, stepping up to some of the child slaves, they bound their hands behind them, and led them into the tents. Then the landelinian general again called all his officers into council and the young Angolinian officer dared not think of the penalty they would impose upon the child slaves. His one hope was that the Angolinian rebels might from some cause or other delay the execution of it until the following day. Otherwise the Angolinian officer knew he would be powerless to save them, and not only would he lose the bet with his Angolinian comrades but he would be unsuccessful in saving a large number of children and win fame for himself. He watched therefore in breathless suspense, while the landelinian general addressed his officers. The young Angolinian would have given much to know what he said then, but nevertheless he felt sure he was seeing the fate of the ten thousand little children held as slaves within the rebel lines right in sight of the besieging christian encampments. While one of the other general officers also started speaking and when he finished one of the other generals worked himself into a great frenzy of rage, and all the officers and even thousands of the privates great grunted his remarks of with approval. When he finally exhausted himself in his exciting harangue, a number of the landelinian generals arose to their feet and started toward the tent in which the two children were confined. The chief general called them back however, and a great hope entered the heart of the young Angolinian officer. He believed they at least intended to wait until the following day before the child slaves would be transferred to the city of Julio Gallo. When the landelinian generals finally ended their council the night was more than half gone, and the sky was rapidly being clouded over and soon it began to snow as heavily as snow could ever fall in the vorse of mountain blizzards. The young Angolinian officer trembled with eagerness, as the last officer and soldier entered his tent, and the great landelinian encampment became quiet. He watched the fire smoulder to embers, and finally go out as the snow wetted it, and as the city of tents was soon blotted out in darkness he turned his face to heaven and thanked god and his blessed mother. Still he waited, fearful of the dogs, and landelinian sentries. He heard them snarl at the edge of the camp which he could not hardly see now on account of the snow shower. The snow was falling in the biggest flake flakes he had ever seen. The Angolinian had known it would be fatal to move toward the encampments until the dogs had gone to sleep. When they became quiet, the lad realized that his opportunity was at hand. After seeing to it that the child would be comfortable, and not be exposed too much to the sudden snow storm he rose to his feet, and advanced cautiously outside toward the hostile encampments. When he reached the outside section of tents and barracks he stopped to listen. Hearing nothing to rouse his fears, and seeing nothing of the sentries who he felt sure could not see him also on account of the thickness of the falling snow, he drew his long army dagger and pistol, and continued boldly into the encampments. He moved as noiselessly as a fox, and after an hour of crawling he reached the section in which the child slaves were confined, and then sank to his hands and knees, and of crawled forward with his body close to the ground. He approached one of the guarded places from the rear, for he believed if the sentries had been placed to guard the buildings they would likely be stationed at all the entrances only.

The Angolinian officer then lingered some moments on the outside of the building, and then as all was still he managed to pry open a window, and thrust his head and shoulders through the lower opening. He saw many small figures lying on the floor without beds apparently asleep, and his heart beat wildly with excitement. Cautiously an inch at a time he finally managed to crawl into the building. A guard at the moment inside the building happened to see him, and the young Angolinian officer crouched with knife in hand ready to defend himself.

An instant later he saw the child slaves arouse themselves and look at him as he crawled to the middle of the floor.

From his queer and peculiar actions something told the child slaves that he was no

he showed no more interest than any of the fierce and stolid "landelinian general officers who were watching him.

From his queer and peculiar actions something told the child slaves that he was no enemy, and they were all around him eagerly and unafraid in a moment hopeful however that he was a deliverer.

"We must be cautious," whispered the Angelinian. "here are guards all around the building. I have come to try and bring all of you ten thousand children out of the enemy lines if possible and if you in this building can lend me a helping hand we can all make the break. I can cover your retreat with my pistol and besides there is a blinding snowstorm raging outside and the snow is falling so fast that nothing can be seen at all now. So the snow will make it impossible for the rebel guards to see you as you children make the break for the rear of the lines." and then he cautiously gave the eldest of them instructions what to do. so numbers of them managed to enter the other building and the many children there aroused and hopeful determined to try their break for freedom being confident as they realized they were to be led by a spy who had entered the foe lines. The eldest of them decided to take the youngest children into their care and lead them through. For so many children as there were it would have been impossible on any other time. But the snow storm outside had grown in fury coming down so thick that nothing could be seen except without lying for even fifteen feet in big flakes as large as ostrich feathers mixed with heavy hail and sleet and this gave them poor children the opportunity they wanted. Most of the children had slipped out of windows and through cellar ways, taking with them what they could and soon the Angelinian officer was in command of a troop of ten thousand little ragged half naked children. Fortunately being so long even from almost infancy exposed to such roughness the children did not feel the cold at all, and it had no effect upon them, but it did seem difficult to walk through the snow and especially if it grew any deeper. The Angelinian officer had in the meantime when went to the tent where the other children had been confined and bound and he cut the thongs which bound their hands and feet and telling them his mission he motioned them to crawl carefully from the tent. At that instant the guard near the tent saw the motion of the soldier and he approached the Angelinian officer. When he was within a ten foot distance the Angelinian officer sprang to his feet and hurled himself upon the astonished rebel.

He had him by the throat in a moment and in the struggle he choked the rebel to hard that he could not cry out, and then the Angelinian officer bound him, ah hand and foot, and tied a rag in his mouth. A moment the three crawled from the tent, and meeting the column of children he gave them all instructions what to do and so all were back to the plain having made their way to there safely, not being seen on account of the thickness of the snow. They tramped through the deep snow all the rest of the night and toward morning when the storm began to abate they suddenly came upon a column of Angelinian cavalry, and so the remnant remainder of the time the Angelinian officer and his number of friends and refugee refugees whom he had rescued had little difficulty in getting to the christian lines. They had gotten away in triumph and the rebels discovering the children gone were furious.

"It's good you are such a brave warrior," said the Angelinian officer in charge as he brought them all to the barracks within the lines. "General Hanson 'Avian shall hear of this thing. why a single man rescuing by a clever move ten thousand children. why it would seem impossible. Yet the children and even the first woman you befriended in the woods are witnesses."

"I did it for two reasons," said the Angelinian officer.

"You did?"

"Yes sir."

"What are the reasons?"

"I made a bet with my friends that I would dare enter the foe lines and rescue a few children. The second reason was that I had a desire to do so from a longing to set them free."

"How many did you say you were going to rescue in your bet?"

"About as many as there were in the rebel lines."

"Well you won your bet tremendously!" said the general. "and you can thank god that you did for it was a most dangerous undertaking."

The soldier got more than a reward for winning his bet. He received not only the money he won but also an ever a good kiss from nearly every one of the children. In token of his love he held him in his embrace a long time for he loved child slaves more than any one else. Another good account written of the great bravery of Angelinian soldiers.

christians had recaptured the captives and so the captives were all the ground they had lost

George Pauler, a German an Abissinian soldier, from the country of beautiful tropical contending, had been agreeably surprised in the town of Pierre (Gervardin).
a short distance, a miles away from the bn being the river line at the Gervardin valley. The general command of the Abissinian division No. One had sent him out with another man called Pierre Henry as his helper to make a small expedition down the river and learn the intentions regarding general Hanson's operations toward Entabara and to make a tour of the distant enemy positions, a survey of the extensive fortifications of Lucille, Fickson and Gedermehe, he had objected on the ground that he was not conscious of the country of the enemy and of the fact that portion of Gervardin would make his attempts to do so doubly hard and dangerous. But the very little Abissinian-Gervardin had been always a constant surprise to him for the few days out, his memory was indeed very excellent beyond measure to boot for he had never been needed to be told a thing more than once. At meal time Pierre services to his Abissinian companion had been perhaps most appreciated, the exhilarating of the winter region and of the Gervardin woods in that early winter time had furnished the Abissinian soldier Paul with a prodigious appetite and he admitted himself that he would so surely have fared poorly enough without the cooking done by the Gervardin-Gervardin.

Without the cooking done by the Udvigsmann, Angelmann, Williams, Jackson and Gesserdine we had to follow in a general direction the course of the mighty Norman run, now swollen by the snow and the December thaw. The river intersected the line at regular intervals and it had been impossible to carry the camp stuff by boat or canoe since the end of the days work of carefully spring and scouting never found them very far from the stream. Several lines already that they had been discovered by Rebel soldiers and they had to make a dash for the mountains and the snow escape.

They had thought that in coming back to the Christian lines if they ever do return after their mission it would be easier to run down stream with the current.

Paul was new at the paddle, but very enthusiastic, and eager to learn the trick of it himself. He suspected, however, that his Angelinian comrades might find him none too apt a pupil, and in crossing the stream at certain parts or in being pursued by foe boats in the river he had never in entire animated Paul with the stern paddle.

to Paula suggestion they that they change ends for a while, and Paul had taken the hint, though a little resentfully. Despite several times of exhortation with few persuaders they had not yet needed to use any of their weapons. And in some ways Pierre was an unsatisfactory companion. Keatonia admitted, though rather guiltily that the very tactfulness of the little Angelinian-galvardenian got on his nerves, especially in the silent hour of the great night when the woods were so dark and the moon so full and the fire and the soldiers, was not a thing for which Keatonia could ever well find fault with his companion however, so he made when the chieftain could very easily have killed with his bow about noon on the 11th. Anne Jane was the object of his spleenfulness. Jane, the dog, a husky haired girl, a few years younger than the large, dark-skinned, red-haired man, had bravely insisted on this, and she kept him from reaching himself at the Athabaskan encampments and not go on the dangerous expedition down the river of porcupine. There was easily enough room for him in the boats below, and as Pierre pointed out, he really helped steady the craft when going for '11 speed while pursued by the enemy. Jane was sensible to the fact that he was indeed persona non grata with the head of the expedition; but like his master, he perceived a dignified alliance in the matter.

frankly admitted," but he's got lots o' sense." And that was all he had to offer by way of apology for his dumb companion.

may or apology for RAB dumb companion. The heavy island falls close to the region of Macille, Jackson portification fortification. The my across the south side of the great river, which for two miles back formed the actual boundary line of the fortresses of R Jackson and Gerdernine, and were crossing in the canoe or boat to resume the survey of the great fortresses at the point designated on the chart. The swiftness of the stream above the small falls made busy work of paddling and also they were careful not to be spotted by the foe in the fortresses or they would be blown to kingdom come by the gun fire from ashore. The current however bore them down stream somewhat, despite their efforts. Three quarters of the my across was down stream, with a narrow pass separating it from the north bank of the river. It was my opinion that if there was a way, it would perhaps be a wiser plan to make around the island in darkness of night and carry the boat over to the north passage. The island they knew had a large fortress on it also.

In the middle of the wide stream known as the Norma Ru gun River the Angelstein soldier pierree had decided on this course, and had headed the canoe diagonally down the current. As they had went a short distance they were surprised and horrified to see three Mandelmin gunboats pursuing them at top speed. Ahead of them a little to the right was a wider section of the stream. As the canoe swung close to the shore of the Island Paul reached out with his paddle to shove the bow off as at first he did not wish to land at the island. When some from the pursuing gunboats the reports of guns and pierree shouts of warning came too late. The bow was cleaved for several feet by a solid solid shot, and the stern of the canoe swinging in toward the lodge, was hit by another shell which glanced off and despite pierree frantic and desperate efforts, the little craft was captured the next instant by another solid shot. A poor swimmer even under the most favorable circumstances, Paul came gasping to the surface, and after a few desperate strokes managed to grasp the bottom of the overturn canoe but it sank. Upstream pierree was attempting for the moment to maintain a foothold on a ledge of rock which showed barely above the surface of the stream, but the currents was too swift for him.

He was swift off the next instant, with the dog abreast of him, and endeavoring as though awfully frightened to clutch his shoulder. The gun boats were coming fast and the two Americans decided to rather drown or be shot than allow themselves to be plucked up by the scruff of the neck. Pierre started desperately toward the shoote shore of the river of Norman. The dogs heavy paws reached out for him again and again, and shots were striking the water. I all about the man and his struggling dogs-- either to avoid them, or because he could not help himself. Pierre went under several times. Finally with a desperate yell of impatience he turned over on his back, and raising one foot to the surface kicked the dog in the chest, pushing furiously to drive him off. The dog was forced a little to one side and Pierre seizing the opportunity, swam with all his might for the shore. Again bullets whistled about him and the dog and the enemy of the leading gunboat was aiming a swift swirl gun to open for fire. In disgust and impatient at the dogs action Paul reached for his revolver and took deliberate aim at the animals big snout.

"No, no," shouted Pierre excitedly as he sized up the approaching gunboats and knew their distance by this time. "Don't shoot the poor sog dog, wire at the pursuers if you cannot they will get us. Ha V!

He at that moment saw the gunner preparing to fire the gathling gun and mittering mattering. "The worthless brute of a landolina found he fired his pistol at the rebel and saw him stagger from the gun and pitch headlong to the deck where was a yell from the crew of the boats at that and a volley of rifles were crashing but the bullets though they rained all about the three swimmers did not hit any one.

"That worthless damn dog is interfering without any sense," growled one of the Glendelinian officers in charge of the landing gunboat. "Aim properly and get the dog first. Do you want him to allow our fugitives to escape as the damn apes!" In a moment the dog had again overtaken Pierre and again Pierre's head was forced beneath the surface just as a number of rifle shots rang out. With a feeling of horror Paul watched the struggle that ensued between the raging swimmers and the rebel gunboat. As he dug was doing that to his master purposely not for any reason known to prevent the rebel bullets hitting him for Paul saw that every time the enemy killed a swimmer the dog ducked his master under the water. He himself was powerless to render assistance, for the dog was often so close and moved by the way possible and kept himself under water as often as he could. He was so close that Paul saw he had all he could to maintain his hold on the rocks in the rushing water, the river current, finally with a great gulp for air Pierre came again to the surface, within a few feet of the ledge. As he grasped the end opposite Paul, the dogs paw suddenly reached out once more for his shoulders and the animal attempted frantically to pull himself out of the water. In the struggle that followed when several of the rebel soldiers dived overboard to capture them, the fighters were forced beneath the surface. Paul being the victor and having strangled strangled his assailant to death under water came up clogging, with Pierre's hands still clutching the shoulder of his own assailant, and after dislodging of his enemy he had got a fresh grip on the rocky ledge but in a position so that the fire of the rebel gunboat was directed upon him.

the fire of the rebel gunboats would not hit them as the rocks protected them. He heard several speaking soothingly to the dog who was evidently recovering from his surprise and fright, and he began to hang a quarter of a mile up the river beside the sheltering side of the rocks. Mentally the current was carrying the boat on to a more terrible place than the steam engines could make them go. A quarter of a mile below them was the bend in the river where a portion of the Micajollistindian fortresses could be seen, the prospect of all three being captured by the desperate rebel warriors was imminent. The shore of Beaver Island was but a hundred yards away, but the chances of reaching it when exposed to the fire from the rebel gunboats, looked very slim. The Micajollis saw the current of the river was rising too swift, that they would be killed at its mercy if they dared to swim across. They cursed the rebels who had brought them to this plight.

Christians had recaptured after that horrible fighting all the ground they had lost.

In the full relaying sweep of the current, the boats had rushed down stream and were now pounding the ledge of rocks with gun fire, first on every side around with howls to give in broadside of snarl, now stern first and again side on, and all their efforts to prevent the rebel gunboats from getting nearer to them was futile, more than once, but for Pierre Paul wounded in the arm would have lost his hold of the rocks as the end that he was clutching too was sometimes submerged by waves lashed by the movement of the gunboats that were only twenty feet away now. And now downstream there came up to them the roar of many cannons. The two young christian soldiers looked at each other without a word. The poor dog, too with his animal instinct also sensed the peril of the situation, whimpering plaintively. A little ahead of them and on their right, they saw to their joy that a point or a larger section of the ledge they were clinging to jutted out into the stream from the mainland shore toward the christian side.

"There's an eddy upstream a little below the point," said Pierre. "And the rocky ledge is so high we could work out our way and not be exposed to the rebel fire if we can keep our heads under frequently enough."

"Will if you can make it," returned Paul between a chattering teeth go. "Go ahead." The dog Jane began struggling, whimpering pitifully, and trying evidently to get away from the rocky ledge, but Pierre held both big paws tightly and powerfully tight grips.

"Can't do it," admitted Pierre, and then after a moment's pause "Due Jane she can..."

He reached in his pocket, and brought out his coil of army steel tape. In an instant he had slipped the end of it under the poor dog's collar and had made it fast. Paul looked on in numb indifference. He suffered miserably from the cold of the ice filled river. Jane had evidently had more than enough of such cold water. The point seemingly offered him a chance to escape. Freed from Pierre's grip of his paws he started across the ice roaring current with a powerful shove from Pierre to help him on. The thin metal ribbon whirled out of its case as the dog rapidly neared her point of the rock. The landmen aboard the boats seeing this at once opened a fusillade but the swift motion of their boats made their aim very poor and not a shot hit. Clinking and splashing deeper to force their own way across the current and seeking protection of the long line of tall rocks from the rebel fire the two were borne on at an increasing pace, irresistibly toward the shore of the river. A very moment a solid shot began to splash about them in the water and bullets also and one of the lads was hit but he struggled on. "Look look," bawled Pierre who was the one hit in the shoulder. "Jane has made it. Good doggie!"

Paul had already devised Pierre's plan of escape, but looked on with faint hope of its success. At the dog's shaggy head and broad chest emerged from the water unharmed by the fire of rifles and artillery from the boats, Pierre shook the tape line, and gradually it grew taut. The dog slipped backwards a little in the water. Pierre's lat out still more of the line, and then held it again. The enemy kept firing not daring to approach nearer for fearing of running aground on the rocks. The rocks were the shelter of indeed of the two christian spies. Jane now was nearly clear of the water. Feeling once more for the tug at his collar, he braced himself against it, whither whether or not he fully sensed the situation, it was evident he had no idea of being dragged back into the current if he could prevent it.

Foot by foot the two christian lads were swimming their way toward the island under heavy fire from the gunboats, and artillery now on shore, but for the moment the strain on the tape was a little too much for the dog.

Struggling fiercely he was again pulled into the water, and again Pierre was obliged to let the line run a few feet more. Paul cast once quick glance back of him toward the distant fortresses and saw artillery manned upon the rocky ledge.

"It's no use," he decided presently. "Let go of those damn old stones Pierre and you and I can make it."

A grunt from Pierre was his only answer. Things happened quickly during the next few minutes. Cannons thundered on shore in perfect salvoes, shells roared in loud explosions above them in the air rattling the rocks with bullets and fragments, great geyser of water shot up about them as solid shot and shell landed in the river, and bullets from the attacking gunboats became thicker than ever. Despite the din Paul heard the click as the tape line ran out to the end and the next moment another shell exploded with great force in the water, making a gigantic geyser which in dropping made a sweeping wave, and Paul was dragged under by the fierce downward swirl of water produced by the shock of the bursting shell in the river, and the water closed over his head. A portion of the rocky ledge was blown completely to pieces and a gap was in the line of rocks now. Even in his despairing struggle to reach the surface, he was conscious of a fierce clutch at the neck of his sweater. He was conscious too of the rushing of the current, and realized vaguely that the big dog still held his ground and was working at the roaring cannons on the opposite shore. The thought aroused him to use all his strength toward saving himself, and with arms and legs he beat wildly against the steady and unrelenting pull of the rushing current. In a moment he had reached the surface again, with Pierre who had been drawn under by the wave also, unyieldingly grip at his neck, with a gulp of relief he expelled the air from his seemingly bursting lungs, and got a fresh breath.

"Easy now," Pierre was saying. "We are in the eddy." As his dazed senses cleared, Paul realized they were being borne gently across the stream, close to the christian side of the shore along the jutting point of the rock. On shore were lines or swarms of purple and red coats. A dozen strokes brought them safely ashore, though nearly as unaided, both of them not to say the poor dog also, from the numbing cold and their exertions. Jane rushed down the shore to greet them.

"The rebel pursuers have given up their chase," grinned Pierre indicating the retreating rebel gunboats with his finger. Jane he could not see could never have held us if it was not for the help of the rescuers on shore!"

"I was dead wrong all along about the dog," confessed Paul. And Pierre grinned delightfully at the young christian officer's shock. "They had failed utterly in their expedition but it did not matter. It was sure they knew if they could report without lying that the Gorn River was impossible to be explored by simple rowboats and by canoe men. If it was to be explored it must be done by battleships and gunboats."

But so desperate on account of his failure Paul decided to make the trip once more, with Pierre but to have some other lads with him. So in the morning leaving behind on boats the boys had a good opportunity to examine them and the crew. It was an old story to one of them called Bob, yet he took a delight in pointing out to one of his comrades all things like the foe positions and the fortifications especially to a lad called Everett True. The enemy soldiers were strong in numbers and Bob said:

"The rebels are desperate now with the tightening of the siege, with the arrival of general Hanson's armies, his brothers and Zimmerman's, and with the coming on of the galverindian winter. Next years all these rivers approaching the Gorn will be filled with war crafts of all kinds. And for the next month general Hanson's plans to swarm pontoon bridges across the rivers. Trees by thousands even will have to be cut down and peeled and logged to be used in the construction of the pontoon bridges you know, but we ourselves do not need to go in very strong for it as yet unless we are commanded to do so. The outfit they had consisted of an eighteen foot boat, weighing about three tons, and four big calfskin kumpanaks. The latter were capable of holding some three tons each, while Stanley and Bob and Everett True carried seventy five pounds each each. The boat was to be used only when we were required to carry about fifty pounds each. The boat was to be used only when possible for the expedition was going to be made this time with the greatest care, and as the frequency of the rivers rising permitted no navigation for its full length the packs were only to be carried when rebel gunboats, crafts, and music from fortresses, and other obstructions necessitated leaving the water, or when from more caution inland trips would be made if you please."

The supplies Everett Everett True noticed, were limited to salt pork, potatoes, bacon, flour and other materials, salt and coffee and a generous supply of tobacco and ammunition. They had a number of grenades aboard also so they could sink rebel gunboats and other small craft should they persevere when discovering them.

Christian had captured himself came back into christian possession and so the christian had recaptured the fortresses and the ground they had lost

"Our bill of fare for this darn trip will get a bit monotonous," whispered Everett True as he took his place in the middle of the big rowboat. "You will find that it tastes mighty good, and when we add a trout or partridge you will say it is the best you have ever ate." "Declared gob," Truest Abner to keep supplies. If we run short we will supply ourselves from the enemy."

"Where will we camp tonight?" Inquired Everett True, hungry for information, and beginning to feel that he was really a veteran scout. "Here would you advise?" Drawled Abner, who overheard the inquiry.

"Not to be caught," Everett True took his time in surveying the rugged snow covered landscape. The black growth of trees of different description close together, mingled with cedar, pine, and hemlocks, and tamarac trees in the lowlands, extending up to the spruce and fir and evergreen was interspersed at intervals by hard wood ridges. Near the banks of the stream patches of ghostly birch grew tall and slim. Unknown to him this was one of the nearest trench and encampment positions of the lines of Angelinian rebels under general Manley himself.

"Well he finally decided, 'I'd go up between those two hills to the right, and camp on some high dry spot where we would not encounter so much deep snow.'"

Charlie made a peculiar sound in his throat, and dug viciously with his paddle, while Abner in a voice trembling with impatience and surprise, asked "Why would you?"

"For two things," replied Everett True now confident he was answering correctly. "I would camp where I could get a fine view of all the enemy positions to the west, and northwest, of the fortresses also, and where I would not get cold from sleeping near the rushing water of this river."

"By Jingo if we were nearer the christian lines I'd go back and jump on one of the officers and tell him to keep you chained to a tree for fear you would commit suicide," exploded Abner.

"Woodie," endorsed Pierre.

"Why what have I said now that is wrong?" cried Everett True.

"What are we out here for to scout on the enemy or give ourselves up to them?" Replied Paul sullenly himself resting on his oar. "Are we here for view, views or for scouting? Why do we go down the stream so cautiously... because the enemy forces are tearing the banks of the river. Those hills you mention are enemy possession and on their summits are great lines of rebel artillery. I'm surprised at you. We go in among the enemy for sleeping quarters and we shot down like dogs or be made prisoners. It don't seem as if you lived long enough to see show so much ignorance. I and my comrade Pierre had enough experience with the foe yesterday and to day we wish to keep clear of them if possible."

"Good talk," muttered Charlie.

"Will camp on the stream until our mission or expedition is over, cause the enemy are swarming their position on both sides of the river at this location," added Abner. "Try and remember that. It ain't no good to try and find positions of the foe and then surrender ourselves in it."

"Then I'd camp under those birches on the bank to the right and have a guard ready to warn us the first thing so we can slip down to the river again."

Everett True sought to mollify. Charlie's goodhead was as in heat as angry tattoo. "Keep it up and you will go overboard," muttered Pierre under his breath.

"Is it possible?" murmured Abner, appealing to the back of Charlie's head. "To think of I Abner Whillie taking a young you for out in the river board on both sides with woods in possession of rebels, and a youker who even don't know that no one wearing the christian uniform can dare camp on those grounds. Why in the name of common sense do you suppose those rebel troops have their positions there for?" He continued now raising his voice. "And then before Everett True could attempt to reply he ran on. 'It's because we would be suspected as spies, and because no one can approach their shores without being fired on by rebel artillery. You can send a whole division of troops into those woods younder, but you can't drive them on if they are half moved down. The enemy positions are too strong.'"

"I see," muttered Everett True hanging his head.

"Don't see," corrected Charlie, shaking his head sorrowfully.

"You are right, Charlie he don't see nothing," cried Abner to whom the young Angelinian soldiers lack of knowledge seemed incredible.

"He saw himself in a glass," Weekly reminded Abner.

Abner half opened his mouth then swallowed as swallowed convulsively.

"I beg your pardon young man. There's a first time to everything. Maybe you will learn a few things after a while..."

"Why don't you tell him that a body of Angelinians and Abyssinians together won't go through those woods to scout, any more than a chicken will go and jump in fire," indignantly demanded Abner. "You are the worse man to pick on a fellow that I ever see..."

"I'll tan your purple jacket some day when it rains," mildly promised Abner lighting his cigar. "Then kindly," what Abner says is correct of course, only I supposed every one of us Angelinian soldiers know it. Very little handfuls of christian soldiers will try any such stunt I'll tell you, and its only committing suicide when any one attempts to do so."

"I don't see what you mean," interposed stern Stanley himself.

"I mean no number of troops without the support of artillery can save a successful assault upon those rebel positions which we are cautiously passing."

The assault upon those positions means a great loss of troops and for once through our argument with Everett we have nevertheless discovered something. We know how the foe positions lay. "Patiently explained Abner.

"All boys learn when they are old men," grunted Pierre.

Thus far the six scouts had been rowing swiftly but noiselessly through the darkness of night through dead quiet water watching carefully the flashing back and forth of the numerous rebel searchlights, but now the guides keen ears caught the sound of rushing water although it was sometime before the lands on the expeditions came to an obstruction. It was Everett True's first experience in making a "garry round obstructions, and he dimly realized that life of every one in a wooded region might under certain conditions during a expedition through enemy territory have its physical drawbacks. At this portion of the river they could go no further. There were floating barges fifteen hundred feet long covered with cotton bales, and really with an oil, there were swarms of gunboats and steamers, and the river teemed with floating mines, and worse of all heavy chains stretched across the river in a perfect network of snags and the river here was impassable.

Not only the trucks and rifles had to be toted for a considerable distance in land under cover of trees and bushes but by foot cautiously through the fringe of every territory, but the boat also had to be carried as they could secure no other. After a considerable distance they managed to pass this first dangerous obstruction of the river, and above it having not been discovered by enemy sentries, they were again on the river, and rowed up the swift water. Then came more "Garriss" around island fortresses, around more chain obstructions and the like, around the big foe encampments teeming with campfires, and around many trees that had fallen or been cut down and thrown into the stream a maze of floating logs. This proved the enemy strove by these obstructions to bar the advance of christian fleets which any attack, like Whilthor by river and sea.

It was when about to enter the larger portion of the great obstructed river that the lad Everett True received his second lesson in scout life. The canoe was floating idly by near a broad expanse of woods where by the help of searchlights the man foe positions could be seen near an extensive bog, when there sounded a cry that was suggestive of the oak cackling of a number of hens at once. In the domestic environment of the farmyard, Everett True would never have paid any heed at all, but out here, with the region scoured and occupied by enemies, with no sign of friends anywhere but rebel positions and horrid looking fortresses and glaring searchlights, and campfires and looming cities of tents in the distance and only the outcrops of sentries every now and then to break the monotony of the woods and water, the noise caused him to start nervously.

The others in the boat lifted their heads quickly on having heard it. "The being unusually grave of face. Everett True with Abner's searooms fresh in mind, did not venture to seek any information just then. He thought the rowers quickened their strokes, and from this finally decided that this must be a strange danger signal in the harsh note. From the tail of his eye he observed that Abner was gazing apprehensively toward the bog, and he wished that he might be given anchor and be allowed to aid in some degree in making from shore. He also wished that those who were rowing would turn out into the open water, and not hold a parallel course, but he said nothing. If danger confronted them, he would prove he could meet it in a manly fashion. Then the oars were held motionless and the men seemed to be listening intently. The strain was beginning to tell on Everett True who was a stout strong fellow, when the cackle seemed to explode right at his side, and with a half smothered cry he almost started to his feet with rifle in hand gazing at the water.

"Sit down, gunt. It won't do no good to shoot," thundered Abner, as the boat tilted to a dangerous angle. "No you want to give us all a lesson in swimming when foe encampments are on both sides of us. That is the matter with you anyway."

"What was it?" whispered Everett True, staring at the water and discovering nothing.

"Maybe it was a ghost," said Charlie.

"Keep still," commanded Abner as the sound again seemed to rise from the side of the canoe, and Everett True was about to capsize the craft from sheer terror and excitement. "O hear something and not see it was beyond comprehension. He feared not the enemy but an unseen enemy who would let out such a peculiar cry was too much."

"It's only a porcu-pine or something like it," growled Abner-ton. "It walks heavy and probably sounds like the approach of a devil, but it ain't. No go to sleep jolly fish or I'll put you to sleep...."

"Hark was Everette True's reply. "Can't you hear it. Hundreds of men talking in the woods and tramping of feet and the sound of bayonets clinking together." As he paused there suddenly came a muffled note indeed resembling the voices of many men conversing in low tones, and also the sound of tramping feet and the sound of bayonets.

"Those may be only racoons," impatiently informed Abner-ton.

"Please quit Everette please do," begged Bob. "I want to go to sleep."

"Yes get to sleep before you are put to sleep," growled Per Pelree. "And when you hear a sound as of many people scolding under their breath don't rouse me up by jumping on my chest like you did before. For it won't be nothing but a signal from a glandelinian scout somewhere indicating that of a skunk. And if you hear a pumping sound, don't grab for a rifle, for it will be a signal like the noise of a stake driver of hitlers. And if you hear a ooo, its bye sound like the black bear, but there is none around to bother us. Here has been too much shooting around here of late and all animals and birds are afraid to come around. And I guess that is about all you will be afraid of to-night. Now keep shut and let us sleep."

"It's going off and down to the river for a while," said Everette True quietly.

"Why?" gasped Abner-ton sitting up.

"Because I'm afraid," confessed Everette.

"He must be a good desperate coward indeed," remarked Charlie, as before he could be prevented, Everette True disappeared in the darkness.

"I guess it all," growled Abner-ton, "who ever see such a cowardly fellow. I suppose one of us must go and fetch him back before the rebel scouts see him and start a trouble. If they see him they will suspect where we are and we will be taken in short time, and if he is fired upon by the glandelinians he will either go insane, or get lost and not be able to find his way back to us."

"Wait I'll go him bye and bye," said Charlie. "Let the rebels give him a good scare. I don't like cowards and I'm afraid we may have to drop him and send him back to the lines. He may queer us yet...."

In the meantime Everette True cautiously felt his way down a slowly to the edge of the mighty river, and seeing moving figures in the darkness far off here and there he was palpitating in every nerve and hid himself behind every tree he came to. He was however trying to punish himself for intertaining any such sensation as fear, yet the sweat he stood thick on his forehead as he advanced. Abner-ton said the voices were from racoons, his nerves told him it was rebel guards or prowlers talking in stealthy voices, probably talking about him. And what in the world were all those moving figures going back and forth, flashing ever and anon lights of red, green, blue, yellow, orange and all the colors the very artist knows. That looked mighty suspicious and the sky at times was lightened to dazzling brightness by large beams from searchlights. He dropped to the ground as he again heard the cry resembling the great horned owl, but which to terrible cry seemed to sound directly over his head, not nevertheless as he stole his courage, and doggedly advanced, he became conscious of a new note, a note seemingly of sweetness and love. It sounded to him like the night lullaby song of some woodcock, only he could have given credit to six or seven birds for the music. First came something like a beautiful twitter, then one changed to the pure strains of the canary, followed by a slightly nasal, clarinet like "b-z-z-z".

He therefore forgot the distant proplews, the possible-hoo sound like a bear, and the hoot owl similar signal call. The sound as of the barking of a fox passed unnoticed, and the thrilling booming chorus near at hand was unheeded, for now the beautiful night sounds seeming to approach him were flooding with a wonderful melody and the harsher notes were as if they had never been. Out somewhere in the darkness it seemed as if some Old Ben Frabody bird, or white-throated parrrp, warbling with the beautiful Phoebe bird, and it seemed as if waves of music rippled across the lake, and smothered the bog in harmony.

But the sweetest of all was something like the good night song of the hermit thrush. It indeed came in lull as if in the evenings a program place of honour had been reserved for this in comparable songster. Everette's eyes were filled with tears as the end sweep sweet notes seemed to be poured forth. It indeed seemed as if the beautiful singer were telling about other days, when all was pure and true, and a shadow of homesickness fell upon the youth as he sought to interpret the sound. Once or twice he thought he saw figures as of little girls dancing by and it seemed as one of them stopped and looked at him and then disappeared as if in empty air. With bowed head he stumbled along the bank, tripped over a canoe and then picking himself up and with an any particular purpose groped his way back to the leanto wondering how it was that at times the rebel sentries could indicate such lull, and then such beautiful sounds for signals among each other. But it was so indeed the rebels as no birds were in the woods the sound of so much heavy firing having scared them and all animals away.

Charlie the leader was re-arranging the fire, seemingly; in reality about to set forth in quest of the com comwardly wanderer.

"Get your nerve back at last!" asked Charlie very gently.

"I heard the most beautiful songs," cried Everette. "It will ring in my eye ears at nightfall as long as I live, I hope."

"See hear! See planter or dragon or fiend!" gravely inquired the guide.

"No I saw nothing. I was so absorbed with my music and by the figure of little children passing me that I nearly broke my neck in tripping over a boat. When I fell my hand fortunately struck one of the oars and I saved myself."

Noisy Charlie straightened with the little ease and quickness of a pan phanter and picked up his rifle and tied on his cartridge belt and pistols. Abner-ton too and the others awakening, seemed electrified and rose quickly, if awkwardly, and reached for their firearms. To Everette True's surprise, Bob rolled over and seized his weapon.

"What is the matter?" whispered Everette.

"Don't you see? I found a boat with oars. Its some of those glandelinian persuaders all right snooping around to do us dirt. They may have found our hiding place or are looking for it. If it was a friend he would come up to the fire, and take pot luck." Rapidly explained Bob examining his rifle and pistol.

"Why, it was our boat I suppose," muttered Everette True.

Not Bob despite his excitement, found time indeed to smile whimsically. "We brought our boat and paddles up here. If you lugged the oars and I and two others helped Paul carry the boat. Don't you remember?" He reminded.

"All stay here. I'll go and cautiously investigate," harshly commanded Abner.

"Abner-ton has the best head for this sort of thing," murmured Pierre, lying flat and pushing his rifle ahead of him. Everette rubbed his eyes as if in fresh wonder. Noisy Abner-ton had vanished. One moment he was one of the group of Angelinian spies, the next he was gone. And no sound betrayed the course of his going.

Then with staccato sharpness and abruptness, came the report first of one rifle, then a score all at once, followed by several more, single shots.

"By jig they have jumped him I'm afraid," cried Charlie rising to his feet.

"Let us run to the rescue," said Everette, his teeth chattering, even as he was truly willing to advance as he did not fear an open fight with an enemy. Only the horrid sounds had terrified him.

"You six keep quiet and stay here. If they mailed him Abner-ton won't need any help as he will be beyond our help. If they had missed him he will take care of himself."

At that moment came the sound of more single shots and answering fusillades.

"They missed him," murmured Bob. "Some glandelinians discovering him fired at him and he has returned the compliment."

A few minutes after he finished they were surprised to see that Abner stood up with them again, coming as silently as he had gone.

"The swarms of Angelinian rebels searching for us, searched all the time since they drove us from the river in the evening," he quietly informed. "I came to tell you they have destroyed the canoe. I fooled them. They started firing at me but I dogged behind the tree and answered with shots from my rifle and pistols. I confess I dropped a man for ever, shot. Despite it all I routed them to the river. But maybe they may come back again. We got to watch out they don't find us here or otherwise we are trapped."

"Was the rebels alone?" queried Charlie to Abner who had returned.

"Alone. No. Cautiously with them," replied Abner-ton. The river is swarming with rebel gunboats. Leaders bring parties of pursuers here on shore. We thought we had come to rest here alone without pursuit and find out ourselves hounded. But I must have scared them off for they did not expect to be fired on in the dark. They have gone to get help. Had places for little girls to go roaming about. I have three of them, runaway child slaves. And he produced them.

"Finally after comforting them he ordered all to go to sleep again, and he quickly fell asleep while Charlie resumed his guard work. Abner-ton and others were soon all asleep. But Bob and Everette True, remained awake for more than two or three hours, conversing in quivering whispers.

"There's going to be trouble," declared Everette for the twentieth time. "Those rebels are surely searching for us closely."

"Charlie and Abner-ton have not talked so much in years as he has to night," said Bob. "My song son you wanted things exciting. I'm going to say that I'm sorry but you are going to have your wish. This is war you know and war has all the excitement that would satisfy an angel at that."

Abner-ton repaired himself back into christian possession and so the christians had recaptured the most sensitive feelings all the ground they had lost

When Everett True opened his eyes the next morning, he was surprised to behold the Angelinians and Bob up and busy around the fire.

"We let you sleep this morning, but here after you must be stirring at sunup," informed Bob sternly.

"Very well," said S. Everett weakly. "No I'm awake, what shall I do?"

"Wait first before anything else," said Charlie his eyes glittering as he saw as he poked from the coals, two blackened balls, that once were moist clay.

"Thank you but I prefer salted pork, or bacon, and a cup of coffee," replied Everett True, writhing up his nose, as he recalled the guides preparation of the two boids.

"A cup of coffee," mimicked Bob, daintily switching to the coffee pot, and filling a tin dipper. "Wait a moment and I'll get you a fresh bakkin'."

"Stop kidding," said Everett True shortly. "I meant a dipper-----why?"

The exclamation was evoked by Charlie breaking open the two clay balls, and exposing the grouse, skinned and cooked to a turn, with all the feathers adhering to the clay, leaving the flesh as smooth and clean as if it had been carefully plucked. And the odor was indeed very pleasing.

"Fix some salt pork and potatoes for the younger Charlie, while I awaken the three children," ordered Abner. "He don't care for fowl."

"I beg I---I beg your pardon," Abner, and yours Charlie," stuttered Everett True. "But I have changed my mind. I'll have some of the bird if you please or there is liable to be a scrap...."

"You should have said what you meant at the go in," rebuked Abner, eyeing the breakfast very gloomily, as he feared on account of the three children now with them there would not be enough to go around, however when he felt he ate but little at that, and while the others all ate heartily Bob winked luxuriously at Everett True.

"Hurry up it is soon time to go now," said Charlie very sententiously, beginning to pick the ham-packs and everything else. "You know we are within the foe lines and cannot remain here too long for it is not safe...."

"Here are we bound for now if you please to say!" eagerly asked Everett, recalling the excitement of the night before.

"You and Bob will go to a place we have picked out for you. You are to stay there, till me and a Charlie comes to call for you. You are to have your weapons fully loaded however, and have plenty of an untimely union...." said Abner.

"Here is it please!" asked Everett showing no surprise whatever.

"Charlie will show you the trail," replied Abner. "He did a little cruising this morning before you woke up. It's a small deserted shack but still within the rebel lines. Many glandelinians and officers of the rebels have been stopping there, but they are away by this time. We are going to take these children back to the christian lines. Charlie overheard that the rebels are going to bring little children three girls and four boys to the shack with the purpose of murdering like they do and I wish you and Bob to be there so you can interfere and rescue them. You know how to do it Bob."

"But the glandelinians won't come there in too great numbers and find us there, will they?" Ann loudly inquired Everett True.

"No indeed they won't, and if they do it will be only because they are bringing the children, and it will be those who you are to be looking for," cynically reminded Abner. "If it had been those three little girls we have with us instead of ye swooning down by the half frozen river last night, they would have met with excitement enough to bring them to heaven in no time I'm a thinking...."

"I ain't afraid of any glandelinians for one," said Bob stoutly. "But why allow this man to accompany me? I'm afraid indeed he is so cowardly that if a party of rebels would approach us now he would faint."

"Boy foolish!" observed Charlie. "I see he shows a cowardly streak you know what to do."

"Well I guess there will be no danger at that," slowly decided Abner. "Not so much as if you were with us. We will be between you and the rebels, and we are certain you two will accomplish your work successfully, and the rebels won't come in too great a numbers to the shack with children who were too helpless to get away. The rebel leader however knows Charlie would pick up their trails and by this time no doubt the rebels who had been looking for us last night have went back to join their own comrades and not one of us will be bothered if we are careful enough to keep ourselves concealed...."

"Who hired them to do the dastardly trick?" cried Bob his mouth opening in great curiosity.

"Never you mind; leave that for your elders and betters," discouraged Abner.

"No glandelinian rebels ever come here and tries to spoil our way of retreat of their own idea. Some officers put them up to it I'm sure. Of course any of the rebel officers are glad to pay off any wicked scores they believe they owe us so called 'Christian dogs, but they in person would never monkey around even a camp of spies and fugitives less there was a jug of rum or whiskey, and a few hundred thousand dollars in it for pay. I don't give a rap about their trying to find us, I'm only anxious to return these three little girls to the christian encampments before we are hard pressed by too many rebel prople prowlers."

Everett felt but little confidence as the men made ready to leave, but Bob did not display any loss of spirits. "Have he did not have any spirits with him," "see that bunch of red spruce?" a shortly inquired Abner, pointing, as Everett thought, in a very indefinite manner. Bob did not suspend his brilliant but nodded cheerfully.

"When you strike it you will find a bla back blaze to the north. The way is so plain a child could not get lost. Two or three miles will fetch t you to the shack. It must have been put up in the old days, when the Galverinians were cutting through the old growth. Ah this was the days, of peace and happiness...." And Abner sighed, as he contrasted the giants and happy days of his boyhood, when one spruce might scale more than fifteen hundred feet, with the horrible war scenes of to days. Please go away.

"All right," said Bob. "Grab your duffle and a rifle Everett, and we will be moving. So long folks."

Everett truly had expected a different parting indeed, a shaking of hands, a show of regret, and for a moment he felt hurt at the seeming coldness of their leave taking. Charlie even gave them no head whatever, while Abner returning to his task of rolling his blankets merely nodded his head in dismissal. Bob shrewdly diagnosed his companions emotions and smiled whimsically.

"Got strong on sentiment whi?" he grinned. "You will surely get used to that my son if you stay with us Angelinian troops long enough. Once about five months ago when I was only a green recruit, I got mad with Abner up north near probably pondina, and while out on an expedition quit him in the night. I was lost in the enemy's territory for four weeks, and after being captured four times and finally escaping, at last saw his smoke, and got to him. I did not even have a hat then and could not make my two smokes. Then I staggered into the clearing of the forest and he was smoking a cigar. All he said was: 'Guess we need a little more wood Bob.' Never mentioned my running away to this day."

"That sounds very harsh," condemned Everett True. "Then folks part in the city or country, they are civilized enough to shake hands and say goodbyes."

Bob fired up at that for sure. "And I guess one of the city folks or country folks will quit his work or his city life and go up out and hunt out a stranger or tramp through the woods with the barrels of the army, or paddle down the river facing enemy batteries, or paddle down a river if a neighbor is sick shi! As for being harsh, there was never a minute Abner would a put a hand on me. He knew I would not starve for a day or so, and he let me have my sulks out. If your city or country friends were so mighty nice to you why did you quit them and join the army to fight against this bloody rebellion. Why did you not get one of them to find you a job or give you money enough to make you rich so you would not have to work and have good time and all the pleasure and easy life your heart desired?"

Everett True's face drew down pitifully, and his lips trembled, as he struggled to frame some reply. In a second warm hearted Bob had seized his hand and was crying:

"I'm a brute Everett. Just kindly give me a few kicks. But you riled me by knocking the army folks. We are so busy and in such hurry especially when within the very foe territory that we have not any time for sentiment. It does not mean that we don't tell it, but it does not fit with the rough life of the army when in peril. Say say you forgive me, for I'm mighty glad no one got you a job in the city, and kept you from entering the army and coming up here. If you survive you may not regret it."

"It's all right Bob," said Stanley winking his rapidly at eyes rapidly. "It hurt because there is a lots of truth to it. I had to join the army and come up here to get a chance."

"Now here is the spruce, and here's the trail," cried Bob wishing to divert Everetts moody thoughts.

"Trail," blankly repeated Everett True staring about. "I don't even see a thing you would call a path or a roadway."

Bob's fresh laughter rang out loudly causing two gossip gossiping crows on a dead pine to scold furiously. "Why you poor innocent," did you expect to find a road. We cannot use the roads. We would be spotted by the rebels sure enough. There's the trail dead ahead."

"I see nothing, not the sign of a footprint," stubbornly insisted Everett most stubbornly.

"If there was a path you would not need a blaze," explained Bob, still hugely amused. "Now look. See anything on the trees?"

"You mean the trees with the pieces chipped out of the bark?"

"Sure that is just what I mean," "See you can count a hundred of em all in a long line. As we go on we will find more and more and still more. As long as you continue to pass pass blazed trees, you will know you are following the trail." Encouraged Bob....

had captured himself came back into christian possession and so the christian had recaptured the rebel army. Finding all the ground they had lost

"Whoever came this here way, first stopped for some purpose and made those marks!" Inquired Everette True, much interested.

"Not me when coming back." Returned job. "He had been a fugitive and did it so he would not be lost, or to prevent himself from being captured by the glandelinians who were after him so you see what I mean." Returned job.

"I admit my ignorance, why try to fool me all the time this way." Reproached Everette True sternly.

"He, he, you are an awfully good man and comrade Everette True despite your immense plumpness, but you are certainly funny. Now wait I'm not fooling you at all. When the fugitive came in here he wanted to find his way out again didn't he?"

Everette relaxed, relaxed his lips and nodded, a bit coldly.

"As he passed a tree he chipped the side he would see when coming out. Take this tree. Look on the other side. See he made that blaze going in. Now when he got in and decided he would want to come back after again after he eluded his pursuers, to build the shack or hut, or for any other purpose, he followed his trail back, and chipped the trees on the side we now see."

But why did he not chip or blaze both sides at once when going in if you please to mention mention? Asked Everette his brows frowning.

"Because he did not know when he went in if he would when pursued so desperately over come this way again. If he wanted to come back this way again he made his back blaze. That would lead him out. But he would not when pursued spent time blazing both sides till he knew if he was safe enough to go over that same trail again."

"That did he make the trail for a road?"

"Oh no indeed he did not. When you blaze for a road you blaze a tree on each side of where you want the road to go." Answered job.

"Well decided Everette True button my shoe." "I can see how Abnerston and Charlie and the others, have an easy time finding their way back to the christian lines with the three resumed kiddies."

"Everette you don't mean that?" "It's too good to be true." Roared job, now convulsive with laughter and ulth.

"Say Robert Hardeur Thompsona we have been good friends but you annoy me." Exclaimed Everette True. "What have I said that is so confounded and dogmated amusing?"

"I must laugh if you kill me." Gobbed job. "The idea of the group of christian soldiers with the children in trying to get away to the christian lines, stopping to kindly blaze trees to show his rebel pursuers where he is bound for."

"I'll admit it does sound rather silly." Gossiped Everette True. "Yet Abnerston said that the rebels would find his trail."

"My dear boy he meant that Charlie our leader and guide would find a foot print, the mark of the boat against the shore, a broken branch, a stone turned over and the like. He meant that Charlie would see signs of the former presence of the rebels who had been searching for us last night where you and I would see nothing!"

"Then all the trails are not like this, and a road trail?"

"I should say say not." Say one of us men wants to hide something in the big woods, something important has got when pursued by the rebels, or wants to keep secret, a pocket where he is getting or haven't having secured plans and the like, he makes a trail no one else can find. Once when pursued by rebels and having escaped I found a runaway hive full of honey bees, and knew the hollow tree was half filled with honey. I wanted to wait until it got cool in the fall, when the bees would be numb, and not wanting to sting me. So I took some red cedar lichen, and fixed a trailer here and there on a tree. Some of it took root and finally grew, some died, but retained its color, and no one would imagine it meant anything. And I got the honey."

"Job you are indeed a great wonder." Admitted Everette True eyeing his taller companion with a feeling of awe. "I suppose you will soon be studying up something entirely new in trails before very long a horn."

"I have already." Replied job complacently. "I got the idea from a piece of an orange peel peel."

"By could why how could you do it?" Cried Everette True.

"City chip insisting in the army asked me once to accompany him on a ride toward general Johnson's lines. He some some oranges along and as he ate it he threw away the skin. I noticed that a bit of that peeling stuck out into the landscape like a sore thumb. I never saw a color that would beat it yet. If the peeling fell or was side up you could not go anywhere near it without noticing it. Its the only thing that I have ever saw in the color line that seemed to jar nature. So I told Abnerston that if I could have some paraffine chalk, orange color, we could save blinding trees, save the bark as well as the time, and have a trail you could never miss. The paraffine would never wash out, when on ledges and rocks, where you have to depend on small piles of rocks and stones, it would be just the thing to make your trail with. They have it at the encampments, in all colors for marking lumber and trees, but then colored with the rebel scouts around so thick won't do just now. I want an orange for my part."

"I wish I knew what you do."ighed Everette True button my shoe. "You are ahead of me in books of all kinds even."

"Oh no I ain't, and I guess I'll never get so I can talk properly." Lamented job so dolefully, that Everette True himself burst into a laugh.

"Here we are at the great stream in the possession of the enemy called the orna gun flowing in branches or outlets or something like that through the biggest and most strongly fortified city in the whole world, and fortresses by hundreds by jinks so strong as to be able to hold back the whole heaven to say." But do you think of that for a seige like this one now going on my son? And job danced enthusiastically along the banks of the half frozen stream.

"Here the nearest portion of the Lucillis broken fortifications!" Asked Everette True peering about. "Could it be dangerous to go and see it?"

"The first section of these fortresses are quite nearer than we think, and we passed them twice before we got here under cover in the foe lines." Said job.

"And he pointed to a long forbidding object in the form of high stone embankments apparently made of concrete and iron extending partward within sight near the banks of the stream to the southward, the concave side being upstream fairly teeming with bulwarks, towers and long lines of gigantic cannons of all sorts. Now follow me cautiously Everette and we will find their runways, or sluice ways, but we must be careful that no rebels see us spying so near them or we will receive a volley."

Everette True followed him across a pontoon bridge not guarded by rebels but probably abandoned, then walking on what appeared to be a dam, and soon mounting a high hill opposite was soon gazing at many great fortified paths leading up toward the fortresses and could see immense shore batteries extending in whole lines, great stretches of encampments and swarms of Angelinian rebels moving about within the lines. Far off could be seen the walls and the city itself of fortifications known as the Odegrina fortresses.

"Where's six of them in this location or at least six sections of them?" counted job. "See their immense fortified towers two hundred feet broad and eighty feet high above the forts ramparts." And he indicated several neat buildings that appeared to be forts above the fortress itself, measuring from two to three hundred feet in width. "I tell you the rebels wicked as they are are mighty cute and clever fellows to have known how to get the chance to trick the Galvarinian governments so they could get hold of Vivian Wickey. And it appears that the wicked glandelinians know the war game better than we do, even if we can master the largest armies, have the most supplies, and can fight so fiercely."

"But how could they do it?" queried Everette True, studying the immense ramparts and towers and the size of the forts and encampments and river and bay shore batteries almost incredulously.

"They did this because they knew with Vivian Wickey in their possession and the forts also they could maintain the rebellion. They have also builded extra fortresses with the purpose of holding back us christians. I do hate the glandelinians but nevertheless for their cleverness I take my hat off to them just the same."

Declared job.

"I suppose in the recent battles a horrible number of glandelinians have been killed." Said Everette True.

"Hardly." It was for assaulting them ourselves that we received the heaviest losses. Besides these fortresses there are many others, salients and many land positions the enemy have, and we are going to have a hard time to recapture Vivian Wickey even if we do succeed."

"Everette drank this in with avidity, and begged his companion to wait a while on the top of the two thousand foot hill, and see if any more large swarms of rebels would not put in an appearance within the rebel encampments which seemed to stretch as far as eye could see even at that height. It appeared as if the whole world was holding out against human mansion so immense was the rebel positions indeed."

Bob smiled. "We will not see too many rebels just now, but no reason why we should not loaf a little bit anyway way. Almost sure to be something coming here. Only you must keep quiet and motionless as they have attractors which can detect the slightest noise for the distance of a mile and if we do not look out shells will be dropping among us up here."

An hours silence however revealed no new secrets of the distant fortresses, except as a bird tried to catch an orange after a wall where rabbit and failed and laughed hideously at the youths as they jeered him. On the rest of the journey through the gloomy woods, in ing cautiously and leisurely, job pointed out a king bird successfully attacking a hawk, and several winter silver-bird woodpeckers telegraphing to their mates on the surface of dead trees, just before they emerged into a clearing in the forest of trees. Job suddenly seized Everette's wrist, and gently but quickly drew him back behind a wide tree.

"It's something suspicious." He whispered, holding his rifle in readiness.

"It's something big. It's a bear or some animal." Trembled Everette True, as a large number of forms creaked toward them through the underbrush.

"No stress." It must be about twelve hundred rebels approaching us."

Cried job under his breath. "See they have rifles and bayonets and hoods and regalia. They are Gargolians. Good God if they see us good night."

He ventured himself came back into christian possession and so the christians had reconquered the fortresses and the rebels all the ground they had lost

The Gargolians at this point all being on horseback and there being fully two thousand in number at that, turned sharply following through the trees in swarms and soon rode away without seeing the Angelinians behind the tree.

"Those Gandelinians are never as dangerous as the others except when aroused to fury," Announced Everette True.

"Wrong my son, those Gargolians there on horseback with carbines and bayonets might have charged us and slew us right where we are if they had seen us. I can never tell what the Gargolians will do for they are one of the fiercest of the lot. I have been pursued five or six times by them, either on foot or horse horseback, and I would rather have a bear or a tiger even moccasins and wild reindeer after me any time than those. A Gargolian squadron are the only things I am really afraid of at any place and I always take good care they see me not. No--I'll take that back, take for instance those ferocious Mis-pollastinian forces called the Zammer wiggins and Turmeramians, and when they attack they are tough enemies to meet with. They are so desperate and so determinate and also obstinate that they will fight to the last drop of blood in their bodies."

Soon they came within the sight of the old abandoned shack. This shack bore mute evidence of being recently occupied, and Bob's eyes wandered often to the edge of the thick woods, as he realized that these Gargolian squadrons had just left this region, maybe their leader having occupied the place, and he had a score to settle with them. He kept his rifle near at hand, when ever leaving the shack. An old cook stove of Franklin style, heavily rusted and broken in several places, did for a fire place, and Everette added to his small store of woodcraft, when he came to build the fire.

"Want to burn us out?" Asked Bob finally as his friend stooped and placed new fuel on the blaze.

"You said it was all right for me to build a fire in the stove did you not?" Remonstrated Everette True half angrily.....

"I forgot you are a new recruit," Apologized Bob. "But that cedar and hemlock you have there will send sparks of great size flying every which way and set the shack on fire. Get some, beech, maple, or pine. The pine will smoke but it won't spark."

"It does not seem that I can do anything right here," said

Everette True.

"Not the first time," Readily agreed Bob.

"Is there anything Hemlock is good for besides to burn?" sarcastically inquired Everette True, throwing the offending wood aside..

"Sure," gravely returned Bob, refusing to detect any irony. "The bark is used in tanneries. In the old days especially before this great war they chopped down hemlock and after peeling it they would lean it to rot in the woods, pig trees to at that, nowadays during the war when needed to build pontoon bridges or make obstructions they saw them into logs or make strong abutments with them, even use spruce and other kind for the same purpose...."

"Bob," Cried Everette despairingly. "Is there anything about the woods you do not know?"

"What do I mean--I?" Exclaimed Bob in complete and genuine amazement.

"Why my son I know nothing about the woods. I'm simply trying to learn like all the soldiers do if you please to know my dear son."

"Then what chance do I have to master that information you gave me?" Asked Everette True in amazement himself.

"Not a chance in the whole wide world to master it," quickly replied Bob now speaking earnestly. "In the first place you or I are not cut out to become woodsmen. You or I must be born in the woods to know the timber. You or I might handle the office end but I doubt that. You or I are not cut out for this sort of thing. I'm sure you will pick up a lot--lots what I am telling you. Your suggestion to general person several days ago about the number of foe fortresses was a dandy, I'd never have been enough to think of it in a million years if this world ever exists that long. But you or I are not the st. simon pure article as a woods man. We are only soldiers and on a spying expedition and camping like the dare devils as we are within the very foe region and close to their positions. But cheer up there are lots of drawing good salaries, who don't know the game any better than you or I."

The last was meant to soothe Everette, who did not relish this plain speaking.

"Maybe perhaps I made a great mistake volunteering to be one of the spies and coming up here after all," He bitterly remarked. "What's the use of camping in the region of the enemy if we don't know much about trees and the lay of the woods. We are as good as lost in the region of Hades itself. We'll never get out alone together unless Abnerston and his gang returns and maybe they will not find their way here. And...."

"Not a bit," fired Bob clapping his shoulder. "Don't get huffy because I tell you what I believe to be true. You needed to come here and learn something about spying work so you could become a member of the Gemini-like I want you are the type that goes back to town and makes a red record. You needed to come here especially in the army to fill out that scrapbook from yours. Once you have done that you will be able to make your way almost anywhere even without guides."

"Sometimes I'll tell you more about myself," Everette True slowly began, when Bob interrupted him, almost curtly.

"I have not asked you to tell me anything about yourself. Nor am I a bit curious. I took you to be a good hang up fellow--and I know you are that kind of a fellow. Now let's forget all about everything, but something to eat. Get out that open bake sheet, and I'll show you how to make real bread. When we will go to the river and catch some trout, and have a snack."

Bob's idea of a snack was a meal sufficiently hearty to satisfy the fears of Abnerston. That night being a snowy one, after everything had been put into shape, the two remained seated before the fire for more than an hour, loathe to go to sleep. The fresh boughs in the corner used for a bed invited sleep or slumber, but not Abnerston, Charlie and their companions and no rebels had appeared at the shack with any kiddies. Ordinarily Bob would have thought nothing of living alone in the woods for any length of time, but now because he knew he was in the enemy territory he did feel a strong sensation of uneasiness. He almost wished he was in the open, with only a couple of machine guns for protection.

Finally in an effort to cast off the strange spell, he bolatoriously challenged:

"I'll dare you Everette True to go outside."

"It is very dark and stormy outside and the enemy signals are on again," countered Everette True.

"You don't dare to go out and only walk around the shack dark and stormy as it is."

"But what good will it do? There are many rocks and stumps covered by the new snow, and it is so very dark nothing can be seen and we may stumble and fall. And it is not comfortable in here at that."

"I dare you to go," Persisted Bob earnestly. "You don't dare to and I indeed do."

"Now I have not admitted I do not dare to go," Slowly replied Everette True smiling in deep amusement at the persistence. "I simply say I do not want to go as I do not like to go out in the cold and snow unless I have to. You say you dare to go, you are on record as daring to go ahead."

Bob grinned ruefully, but did not hesitate to rise and reach for his rifle.

"If there is nothing to harm you, and you say you are not afraid, why take the gun with you?" Asked Everette.

Bob dropped the rifle and slowly opened the door. It was very black outside and a cloud of snow blew in. As he hesitated there was a sudden flash of lightning or what appeared to be lightning, and a dreadful crash as if a part of artillery exploded, and a mouse taking fright over the detonation scampered across the log overhead, and with a startled exclamation he slammed the door, and leaped back into the room. Everette True gave way to a hearty burst of laughter, it being the first time he had found an opportunity to smile at his own expense.

"With my son," finally Bob quieted raising a hand. "I don't blame you or for laughing. The mouse made a fool of me, and the explosion of the shell overhead scared me it was so unexpected, and I have felt uneasy all evening for fear those dreadful gargolians might return. My darling you was merely an excuse for us to leave here. Now listen I'll hear it again soon. Hark,-----there."

"A regular whistling of the wind."

"A regular whistling, and not the whistle of the wind or the sound of snow on the roof either," muttered Bob reaching for his rifle.

"Something in the woods, a bird signal probably like before," suggested Everette his wrists developing goose flesh.

"It's two men signalling to each other and nothing else," murmured Bob. "They think we are here for the night. They may be the leaders of the Gargolians returning with their squadron. We will make our quick exit through the window."

Bob was half way through the small window when suddenly Everette true caught him by the leg, and soon easily pulled him back, and relieved him of his rifle.

"We remain here," He quietly announced.

"Let me go. I must get out out!" I'll face them Gargolians and the others out in the open, but won't be cooped up in here if you please to know." Cried Bob in a frenzy of fear.

Everette shifted his hold to Bob's shoulder saying:

"Abnerston said we were to stay here at least till he came back. Here we stay Gargolians or no Gargolians...."

"Don't you hear them--you loony!" Whispered Bob his eyes gleaming with fear. "Don't you remember how big a kick of the Gargolians hates us christians? and you boob don't you remember we are spies, and if we are caught so you not not the fate of spies."

"We can hold them off," Answered Everette. "We have plenty of ammunition. If we leave we are cowards."

Abnerston had captured himself and had taken into christian possession and so the christians had recaptured the most valuable of the ground they had lost

"I can't escape from here any how Everett. Let me go please."

"This is our place," slowly replied Everett passing around his companion, so as to block the window. Abner and Charlie said to us to stick to the shack even if we have to go through hell to do so. I can be of little help in the woods, but I have got brains enough to obey orders, and so show the rebels a thing or two if they come here and start something."

"I'm going out of that window," He snarled, violently endeavoring to break clear of the iron like grip of Everett. But Everett's experience in handling heavy weights, and loading trunks, and slabs of stones and also handling all kinds of wet lumber for making pontoon bridges and erection breakwaters and so on for army so crossing had made his hands and arms so many hooks of steel, and with a grin smile he pressed Bob into a corner, and held him powerless.

"Now you listen to me Mr. Thomas Thompson. We are going to obey orders if we die doing it," Forthrightly Everett in a low voice. "You can take the lead at all other times but not just now. For the next few hours until Abner's return I'm the boss myself."

"Let me alone, and get away from me will you please," hoarsely commanded Bob, struggling in vain.

"Yes I'll leave you alone now if you wish," said Everett True stepping back quickly.

"For I know you are mad clear through now, and would not leave here if a dozen demons were about to enter the room. After you have cooled off a bit you will thank me I know."

Bob sat at his jaw and picked up his army rifle his eyes glaring. An Everett had said, he indeed was ugly from top to toe, and no number of pig-tinged lake could frighten him now. He had been suddenly the victim of a spasmodic fear, and now he was all the more ugly and angry to know he had given way to the evil emotion, and had now appeared something of a coward in Everett's eyes. This very realization for several minutes also caused him to feel strong resentment, toward his companion. Everett true on his part, seeing that he had now won his point, quickly subside to his former self, and studied Bob anxiously. He knew Bob's feelings were hurt, and he was only desirous of renewing their old friendship. To accomplish this, he counteracted a feeling he did not feel, and coldly remarked: "I'm waiting to be thanked, I said to morrow. I've changed my mind. You may thank me now."

Bob glowered at him for a moment, and then as a whistle sounded nearer and nearer he sighed in relief, and the old sweet smile suddenly illuminated his face once more.

"Forgive me, Everett. I was mad clear through at you for not letting me go out. But it's all gone now, because we are to have a bully good fight, and I shall have a chance to show you I am no coward. Keep back in the corner. This is my row, and I'll go through with it alone with the gargolians."

"You know that is impossible," calmly replied Everett True, clasping the other hand. "His face was pale, and he believed he indeed was about to face a very desperate situation, but there was no tremor in his hands, no unsteadiness in his voice." "I told you back within the lines that your troubles with the enemy are also my troubles, just as you made my troubles yours. It is our duty to defend one another."

"Well the rebels will have a fine time getting in here," Decided Bob, half grinning. "But a ninny I was in trying to get outside where the rebel leader and his band would have run me down in a few minutes. We are in enemy territory and I ought to know it and—"

"Be quiet, rap, rap," and the door shook.

"I'm going to shoot," cried Bob throwing forward the rifle.

"Wait," I Charlie, "informed a voice."

"A careful you young tyke," bellowed Abner. "You shoot and wound me and I'll skin you alive."

With a hysterical laugh Bob dropped the rifle, and sank to the floor. It was Everett true who unfurnished the bar, and greeted the two Angelinian soldiers.

"What do you think you two are doing," rebuked Abner picking up the rifle and standing it in the corner. "Want to murder us your comrades?"

"One of the boys afraid we are enemies," said Charlie rearranging the fire.

"One of the boys afraid we are enemies," said Charlie, rearranging the fire.

"I'll admit I was quite frightened," generously admitted Everett true.

"He was not doggedly denied Bob. "I myself was scared out of my boots, and wanted to climb through the window and get away. I thought it was general Nicholas gunner and his gang of gargolians for I met them in the woods on our way here though they did not see us. Everett true bent me here against my will. said it was your orders and he would obey. If he was killed."

"Good for him, he braver indeed than I thought," Gried Abner.

"Both good boys indeed both good soldiers. It was good for one boy to get scared," added Charlie, over his shoulder.

"Well I'm sorry Bob could not take our word for it, that we would keep between him and rebel persuaders, and even pick," said Abner."

"the boy was a fool to try to leave the cabin. And yet he was wise to get a good word scarce," said Charlie.

"We did not expect you to night," defended Everett's True just as the others of the boys entered. "We both thought it was the enemy returning for the cabin."

"We followed the trail nearly to the north Bend of the river and felt sure the rebels were headed for the tangled swamps of Orma Run about Wansel Pond. Guess the rebels under general Nick at least will not bother us for a while as long as we keep in hiding." Explained Abner his tongue beginning to loosen as Charlie deftly prepared fresh coffee, and a spider of potatoes and bacon. "When they are gone for good," gladly exclaimed Everett true.

"I looka that way but I cannot be sure about it," said Abner. "If they are gone, you know there could be other searchers looking for us."

"They are not gone," said Charlie. "The rebels may come back to look for us by and by."

"But did you find?" Asked Bob now eager for details.

"Well—," slowly began Abner. "We found the rebel gang of searchers has cut the lots of trees through in the town of Garbondale where we had the battle not long ago. The persuaders seeing they had been outwitted had burned over a stretch of trees expecting to start a forest fire toward us and run us out, but they could not succeed as there are too much snow on the ground and only tree tops here and there burned for a short distance and went out. They could not even cover up the stumps."

"I guess the rebels were trying to cut off our way of escape and prevent us from drifting down to the Christian lines."

"Can you prove it against the rebels under Nick himself?" Asked Bob his eyes flashing.

"Not very well, unless I can locate his rebel troop. It was destroyed only two hours ago. I probably got his troop up gigantic lake way near Ardanok, already already floating with mines, and he took good care to get only foreigners who could not speak our language or tire him. After he had finished he had hustled them across the river. If I could only capture one of them and take him up there it could be proved so close that he would surrender in no time to avoid a massacre."

"How much did he burn?" Asked the practical Bob.

"From a hurried look at the extent of the burned stretch I estimated the conflagration to have burned have burned some two to three thousand tree tops. General Nick is so desperate on account of the siege of Ardanok wicker that he could not afford any spies to escape his lines if he could help it."

"But how could you tell it was he who started the small conflagration, and what did he mean by doing it?" asked Everett True's double barreled question.

"I usually have my pocket maps with me," replied Abner, helping himself generously to potatoes and bacon.

"A two thousand lot of trees is a lot to burn," Completed Bob. "But then its nothing compared to a real forest fire when one one gets started. None of those fires have ever happened yet for fifty years. Everyone is so careful that no woods have been burned."

"Hard work to see forest fires when snow on ground," gravely suggested Charlie, but with a humorous twinkle in his eyes.

"I guess the rebels found the line of fire did not progress far on account of too much snow," sourly replied Abner. "At first sight you would say it was an old burn, but just talk a slow walk around, and there are the charred thousands of tree trunks and tops. Don't doubt he cleared up fully twelve thousand trees to burn against us, figuring we would be routed out of our hiding place by the fire, but too much snow made him unsuccessful and he saw it did not pay to try to make forest fires at this time of the year."

"How do you suppose they first noticed the started blaze?" Bob slyly asked of Everett true.

"By the stumps and the ground blackened by fire of course," answered Everett. "Wrong my son," chuckled Bob. "They first came upon a swarm of trees extending for several acres which shows the appearance of having been fired, and this was what we call covered a burn."

"Everett looked queerly at Abner, who nodded between mouthfuls," and continued. "After the foe burn our trees they usually try to make a general forest fire because spruce and birch are the worse trees to start ablazing."

"But what about the birch and poplar?"

"It is the same case," answered Bob. "That's the reason the enemy make forest fires to rout out spring Nationals if they cannot find them or to run them down any other way."

"What do we do next Abner?" Inquired Everett.

"I have polite when you want to learn our secrets and other concerns," smiled Abner, pushing back his tin plate. "But I have no objections to saying we will arise down the river to the east cant of Mt. Evangelina Grand and go back to the Christian lines. I have found out the information I wanted to know and wish to return as soon as possible and report it before it is too late."

Christians had captured himself came back into Christian possession and so the Christians had captured the ground they had lost

"What what?" asked Everett True.

"He means a jogg, innocent boy," explained Bob.

"A jogg?" repeated Everett with no idea of the word. "What jogg do you mean, a jogg for older?"

"What? You learn anything about?" explained Abner. "A jogg is a watered usually beside a stream. Part of our trip will be up northward, and we will follow the west and east cant, and go down the river. We must reach the Christian lines, so far we have made the expedition without much excitement except of which you met the night before with all the noise you were scared of."

"Let's go to sleep now," advised Charlie rolling himself in his blankets, and dropping off at once. The others followed his example, and this night Everett prepared the breakfast as usual, and then suddenly snaked into the woods.

"After that?" inquired Everett.

"He is going back to the lines first with the news," informed Bob.

"When did Abner tell you?" wondered Everett.

"He did not tell me," snickered Bob. "Don't you see Charlie has his rifle and his blanket?"

"I say he is going to deliver a message to General Johnson, or any of the Christian generals he can find first," supplemented Abner. "I want the general to know about our success, and about some intention of the enemy under General Hanley himself. Hanley intends to concentrate heavily near Evangelina's grand, and frustrate Hanson's purpose to reinforce General Hanson's army and increase the tightness of the Indian's defense. As soon as he receives the information he will send great forces up to General's camp, and spies and engineers to make a careful estimation of the whole region outside of Evangelina's grand, while they are doing that, and working all purposes General Johnson will himself concentrate upon the enemy in overwhelming numbers and force him to fight a general battle."

"Can do we start?" asked Everett. "Time button my shoes." "I will cruise it Evangelina's grand till Charlie returns, then we will push right through to the lines," said Abner. "Both have missed Charlie's foot keenly, 5 Everett more than Bob, because as it was his first experience in the woods with the soldiers' spies. He had learned to depend upon the silent leader, and feel no apprehension from enemies while near him. Abner too missed him, but missed his cooking more than anything else. On the first day after Charlie's departure, Abner was intent on account of the snowstorm retaining its wild fury to remain in camp as he feared no enemies as long as the storm would continue, and he was preparing the packs and studying the maps. This allowed the other boys considerable leisure, and resulted in Everett learning, indeed a most valuable lesson. He had wandered about half a mile from the camp, and had succeeded in seeing a lynx chasing a rabbit through the deep snow, and this excited a conviction that he was rapidly becoming a well good soldier and spy, both discounting opinion to the contrary. Near the base of a towering ledge, carpeted in front with a mass of leafless bushes and trees, he came upon a low dark opening. He might have passed it if not for a strange crying noise as if little children weeping. He smiled as he remembered his first experience with forest and enemy signal sounds and unhesitatingly approached the spot to see what was in the dark opening. It was his surprise and joy to inside the hollow rock two little human beings cuddled up in fear in the dark corner cold and shivering and half naked. His bosom swelled as he pictured the envy of and Abner's pleasure at his noting a hero. He believed he could make a statement he deliberately rescued them from rebels."

"Just what children they were he was undecided. He observed the clothing being in rags, that they were two little girls, and this caused him to suspect they were two hooded homeless little beggar girls lost in the woods on account of the raging blizzard and having taken shelter on account of the storm and the cold. In describing children as child slaves he had not thought of, and yet they looked different, healthy and plump more unusual for child slaves. And yet they were, child slaves, and children who had run away and got lost in the woods with glandelinians scouring the region for them."

"Probably they are beggar children," he murmured to himself. "They are awfully cunning and sweet-looking anyway, and I'll take them where they will be warmer."

After he had encouraged them not to be afraid of him, and after he had proceeded only a few rods in the direction of the camp, however, when he was startled by a snarling roar of rifles behind him and bullets whistled a screaming tumult all around him and followed by a yell and shout and volume of curses. He wheeled behind a tree with drawn pistol, and beheld a large gray column of about two hundred and fifty Immarians making toward him with rifles at the ready, with usus unsuspected swiftness. For a second he was paralyzed for he realized what had happened.

They were the searchers after the children and seeing that with him they had tried to shoot him down. For a few moments more he had dropped one of the children and from behind the tree he belted the rebels by shooting them down continually until he ran out of ammunition and then the next moment for the sake of the two children with him he was running from tree to tree as for dear life, over protrude tree trunks, and rocks with the number of lumbering human brutes behind him growling in fury and gaining a fast. About thirty shots were fired simultaneously but though the bullets whistled close none hit him but he was unworried by never the less he would not give up. He had the children now and he was not going to give up or let them be recaptured now. He dared not look back, for fear of tripping and falling, and only could gauge the distance between him and his pursuers, by the increased volume of cursing and swearing and the ting behind him and the louder reports of the shots fired at him by the rebel pursuers. For did he dare drop his rescued prizes. Even in his frantic haste he told himself it would be cruel to drop the poor shivering little bunches of humanity nestling so close to him for the cruel rebels to destroy. But as he reached the edge of a denser growth, consisting of alders and young birch, he found it necessary to stand behind a tree and drop the two children for a few minutes and throw stones and hard snowballs to confuse the rebels who had gained on him at his very heels. Then with a pang of regret he stooped low and gently picked them up and started on his way again. His throat was parched and burning from the unaccustomed exertion, but he maintained his pace, till he found a small opening, in the snow covered thicket, that promised easier traveling. Plunging into this he was dismayed to come upon the half frozen stream, which to escape the pursuers he saw he must cross. He feared it marked the end for to swim in that cold water seemed impossible at least the children could not stand it. Behind him now each nearer thundered his implacable foes in gray. With a groan of despair he decided to follow along the banks toward the camp, and as he started he slipped, regained his balance, and with the hot breath of his many enemies seemingly about at his very back made a heart-breaking effort to increase his lead. On and on with the swaged yelling drawing nearer he raced, clearing obstacles in a manner that would have won him such applause on a hurdle track. But at last exhausted nature rebelled, and with a low moan of despair he fell over to the ground with the babies under him, his living face downward. Then he believed it was all over for him and the two little girls as the bushes crackled behind him. He turned his head and to his great joy, beheld Abner and near a hundred Angelinians with him.

"Oh Abner! look out," he gasped. "The rebels were chasing me. They are upon us."

"If I had a good chance I'd larrup you so you would remember it to your dying day," cried Abner with voice shocking with anger. "Of all the trying simulators I ever met you are the worse. Why did you want to fire at the enemy for and make them so mad? Get up and hand the children to me and see if you can drag yourself back to the camp. On account of this we will have to leave before tonight and I wished to remain till Charlie came back." Painfully Everett staggered and struggled to his feet casting almost a frightened glance over his shoulder. "The stormy approach of the human cruisers were gone and Abner's stormy reproach sounded very sweet to his ears. He and the little girls were saved."

"Here are the rebels who were chasing me!" He whispered keeping close to Abner's side.

"They have been driven driven back by the Angelinians with me," gruffly replied Abner.

"What were they? Gargolians?"

"They were the worse of the lot. They were gismmarians," exploded Abner.

"Now what did you mean by snooping around too near the foe encampments after you had taken those little girls with you where we ever you had gotten them. Did you not know it a snowstorm does not prevent them from seeing you you poor boob if there ever was one."

"Was I near their camp?" gasped Everett. "I did not see anything. I ran so fast and I thought the rebels would kill them if I dropped them. I thought the enemy camps were far away."

"I might have suspected it," cried Abner. "If there is room to make a full mistake I guess you can be trusted to come along and take advantage of the opportunity."

"I thought you would like to have me save children from the rebels," meekly apologized Everett.

This added but fresh fuel to Abner's wrath, and he added:

"What inarnation did you go so near the enemy lines then for. You was only about a half fifty feet from their tents half hidden in the snow. They saw you sneaking and opened fire. It was a miracle you were not shot."

"I supposed you would like me to rescue children," politely responded Everett's true.

Abner stopped short in his tracks, and wheeling Everett's true about grimly inquired:

"Young an where will you have your body shipped, when some fool monkey shine like yours results in your death?"

"I'm sorry," humbled Everett. "I did not mean any harm. I thought I was doing right in rescuing the poor children and you oppose it. And I was so awfully obliged to you for saving them and me."

He had captured himself came back into Christian possession and so the children had recaptured their father. All the ground they had lost

"You can thank God and His blessed mother and all the Saints in Heaven even and all the stars, that I was on the ridge, and see you start to run after they fired at you. Even then you would have been overtaken and cauled or bayoneted and shot to death and the kids torn to pieces and me too probably if it was not for these hundred Angelinians who saw the occurrence and came up and routed the rebels after a hot skirmish. If it had not been for them the rebels would not have given after the chase and I did not have my gun. And I don't expect the children you did a little girls, you did not understand me. In rescuing the children you did a service to God. At I mean your confounded recklessness to pass to within fifty feet or less of the very enemy encampments where all the gosh darned bloodhounds in any uniforms could see you. It was only by the mercy of God that the rebels did not shoot you and I was dumfounded at that for over two hundred opened fire at once and you did not drop."

"Please take good care of the two little girls." Pleading Everette. "They are not to blame for what I did. And if she is living their mother needs them. But I'm awfully thankful to you for coming to my aid."

"Drop that praise." Partly commanded Abner. "I owed you that for pushing me away from in front of the foe machine gun during the battle of Lightburg landing. Remember this. I will not always have the chance to pull you free of danger. I don't see where you got together so much ignorance. And our Lord says 'Those that seek danger shall find it. And those who seek the sword shall perish by the sword.' So put that into your noodle before it is too late." And he rubbed his brow in perplexity.

"Or do I?" sighed Everette. "Then brightening and his eyes dancing with mischief, as the shaft danced in sight through the mist of snow like some faded away object. But could you take a squadron of soldiers about twenty yards from the enemy lines and scout on them, and get away before they fire?" Abner paused and then scratched his head thoughtfully. "I've been on many a scouting tour hundreds and hundreds of times, and have camped several times like this in enemy country. But I never did go so near the foe lines. But I'll say this surely, that even if I was a stranger in these parts, I would not go to a fool of myself, even if they were orphaned children and hiding. That hole in the rock was only fifty feet from the foe camp and its a damned fool thing you did not look first. It was like leaping from the frying pan into the inferno. I'd just sit tight till I learned some sense. That is what I expected you to do up here. Get become reckless. First you acted like a coward, even afraid of a little noise in the night. And now you become utterly reckless as if you really wished to kill your own self."

As Everette suppressed a smile at Abner's interpretation of the heroism of men, but was satisfied to drop the question. He had seen encampments looking up through the snow shield but had forgotten entirely about rebels and though he saw the red and yellow and blue standards of rebel ensigns he had thought they were Angelinians until his exciting experience commenced. Abner was not it seemed for on hearing what he told him all about it, adding much detail that was indeed very strange to Everette and showing the two frightened little girls to him and having them wrapped in blankets and placed near the stove in the shack and giving them something to eat.

"Don't Charlie be tickled to hear of it when he gets home." Dried Bob snatching his life in his hands to rescue two children—and setting them to day taking his life in his hands to rescue two children—and setting away with a fit."

"Please don't tell him please." begged Everette. "By Abner won't and I don't want him to think any worse of me. Goodness knows my many mistakes have already given him a very poor opinion of me already."

"I'll keep my mouth closed." Forth of Bob. "But you are wrong about Charlie. He admires you for your goodness. He can't be never saw any one before in all his life, or even in the Angelinian army who could take so many mistakes in no other way. You are certainly a great revelation to him."

"Let him be content with what he already knows." Urged Everette. And I don't want him to know I rescued the two little girls either."

Bob nodded good naturedly, and caught up his rifle.

Abner raised his brow in mute inquiry.

"Going to see if any of the rebels are approaching the shack." Informed Bob. Everette glanced at Abner, his eyes pleading. Abner cleared his throat and diverted his eyes as he shortly said:

"Guess I need you around here to attend to these two poor little girls who were out in the cold hiding in a small dark cavern half naked. Let the rebels go. They are leaving in a short time anyway. When I want to shoot any Angelinians I'll do it myself."

"But you promised me I should see any who come near." Reminded Bob, much surprised.

"I know. I know. And you shall see when we go into another battle." Testily replied Abner. "But it seems your friend here has struck up a friendship with those two particular children and wants them well taken care of as he wishes to adopt them as his own if he cannot trace their mother. Has so fond of little girls that he goes over to the enemy and visits them, when he ought to be catching trout for supper."

"If you had seen the plight of the poor little girls." Dried Everette True. "And why do they are the pitiful little humans you ever imagined. Abner promised me he would do as I wished allow me to take charge of them, find the mother who needs them, and if she is dead or cannot be traced to keep them myself. They have done nothing a human mother would not have done. I am the one in fault for I thought the girls belonged to a Christian encampment."

"Of course if you say that way, I'll have to do as you say." Dried Bob. "But I will bet you a million dollars you will never find their mother. All child slaves then mister Everette's true."

"And I'll make it up to you at the double the value of anything I can get." eagerly promised Everette True.

Bob grinned and Abner whined slowly. Everette flushed to his ears and mumbled. "I forgot. It may be sometime before I can square it off."

"That's better." Said Abner. "Never promise anything what you ain't sure you can do. You may die in battle for instance."

As Bob was relenting and wishing to spare his friend, began asking a volley of questions as what would be the next problem.

"We will start this very evening and make the east jog of St. Evangelina. Granda." Said Abner. "Don't know how long we will have to stay there but we got to move from here after this late experience during his focus of his two little girls. Ordinarily I could put three days in to profit my experience of spying; or in making that particular cant, but as things be and a battle night rage soon, I shall put only a day or two, then drop in to see General Hanson on top of Hood mountain where he has his batteries, and then go on north to Angelina lines, where the real war business awaits me. It all depends on how soon Charlie overtakes me."

"Can't he find us?" Incredulously inquired Everette True.

"He can see Abner's dry response. "If we keep going for miles up north of the Ivan iskey where General Underline is placing big lines of batteries, Charlie would follow close enough to cook our second supper or I guess. I wish he was here now to fix the fish."

Indeed a cold winter day deep in the galvian wilderness so near the banished city of Ivan iskey, the blizzard however had passed. Over the whole region the moon was rising indeed like a red pulsating ball, lighting up the vast white silence of the night in a shimmering glow. Not a sound broke the stillness of the desolation through which the same Angelinians trudged lost in the foe region after tramping two days and failing to get out. They had failed even to find the river. It seemed too late for the life of the day, too early for the nocturnal rumblings and voices of any creatures of the night. Like the basin of a great amphitheatre a frozen lake with an outlet toward the gorge, on a river lay revealed in the light of the silvery moon, and a million stars of a clear cold night. It was ten below zero. Beyond it rose the spruce forest, black and forbidding. Along its nearest edges stood huge hushed sails of mighty tamarak, bowed in the smothering clutch of the snow and ice, shut in by the impenetrable gloom.

A huge white owl flitted out of this rib of blackness, then back again, and his first quivering heart came softly, as though the mystic hour of silence, had not yet passed for the nightfolk. The extensive blizzard of the past days had ceased, hardly a breath of air stirred the ice coated twigs of the trees. Yet it was bitter cold, so cold that any man remaining motionless, would have frozen to death within an hour suddenly to the swiftly moving fugitives there was a sudden break in the strange silence, a weird thrilling sound, like a great sigh, but not human to them—a sound to make ones blood run faster, and fingers twitch on rifle stock. It came from the distant gloom of the tamaraks. After it there fell at once a deeper silence than before, and the owl like a noiseless snowflake, drifted out over the frozen lake. After a few moments it came again, more faintly and terror than before. One warped in woodcraft or even any life, would have slunk deeper in the rim of darkness, and listened, and wondered and watched, for in the sound he would have recognized the wild half conquered note of a wounded member of soldiers living divine in the cold and snow, suffering and in agony.

Slowly with all the caution born of the others days experience, the permitted trudged out suddenly into the glow of the full moon. Their magnificent forms loomed in the distance, and one of them had their head turned inquisitively across the lake toward the north. In both was open his nostrils distended, his eyes glaring, and he left behind him a trail of blood. Half of a mile away he caught the edge of a spruce forest and the distant fortresses of Ivan iskey and beginning lines. "Here something told him he would find safety. My Angelinian would have known he was wounded unto death as he dragged himself out into the two foot deep snow on the surface of the lake."

He captured himself came back into Christian possession and as the Angelinians had rechristened the place, naming it after all the ground they had lost

As the swirling snow crossed over the lake, and then|||-----
 And he stopped ----- so suddenly that he almost pitched into the snow. This time from the direction of the rebel pack pursuing, there came the ringing reports of a large number of rifles and then followed the signing of bullets about him whistling a perfect concert and he was struck and wounded in three places. He shot fired from an unseen direction was probably not far from five hundred yards away but distance did not lessen the dreadful force of the blow brought to the wounded Angelinian who was lost with his comrades. They left the black and Everette was not the only one pursued by the rebels since Wagoner and Fierce was also wounded but not as wounded. As of his men, before the beginning of the pursuit he had heard the same sound, and he was brought to him the first wound. With a supreme effort he brought himself to his feet, once more looked toward the north saw the sky pierced by a thousand searchlights, and then turned and buried himself into the black and frozen wilderness

Stillness fell again with the sound of the rifle fusillade. It might indeed have lasted five or ten minutes; when a long artillery roar floated from across the lake followed by seven or eight shots in succession; it ended in the sharp quick noise of some falling over the trail, and in an instant was taken up by others, until the rebel pursuers were once more on the full cry. Almost simultaneously a number of figures one after another disappeared from the edge of the forest, as if they had started running back at the distant woods, and then rushed through the undergrowth to strike their blow at the rear of the pursuing army. The rebels paused and turned around, and there came the report of a dozen muskets fired in rapid succession.

"Are you coming Paul? And Charlie. Hurry before the rebels come too near!"

'A voice answered from the woods.
'Yes: hurry up---run.'''

These hurriedly -- run, the others turned their face once more across the lake and the others tried to comfort the screaming children plunged on. One of them in his right hand carrying a clubbed rifle, another in his left arm a child badly injured, was done up in a blanket and covered with heavy snarl. His face was scratched and bleeding, and his whole appearance showed that he was nearing complete exhaustion. For a few minutes he ran with the rest through the snow, then halted to a staggering walk. His breath came in painful gasps, the rifle slipped from his nerveless fingers and his consciousness of the deadly weakness that was now overruling him, the consciousness of his wound, he did not attempt to regulate it, took any fact but the consciousness of his coming from the woods was another fusillade of shots, and suddenly his knees trembled and he fell, and he sank down into the snow.

From the edge of the spruce forest two young Anglinian soldiers now ran out upon the surface of the lake after stopping for a moment to fire two shots: his breath was coming quickly, but with excitement rather than with fatigue.

behind him less than three hundred yards as away he could hear the rapidly approaching wind and yells and curses of the pursuing Glandelinhans; and for an instant he bent his little form close to the snow and did not stir again. He had received a mortal blow that he must have where the other had fallen tripped, and he was not motionless. He knew he placed his hands there, and he got up, and resting his rifle on top of his head, the other pursued gone on ahead with the two children, and gave a signal and a whistle like that one was carried for a mile.

At that cry the exhausted mortally wounded and lying in the snow struggled desperately to his feet, and with an answering shot which came out faintly to the ears of the Angelinians, tried to resume his flight across the lake but died on the spot before he got three yards and he was abandoned two or three minutes later the rest of the party upon Everett who was almost overcome from his wound and exertions:

"You can make it Everett!" He cried. "The rebel persecutors are coming like hmd. They want to annihilate us if they cannot overtake us.)
He then made an effort to answer, but his energy was hardly more than a gasp before Abner or, Harris could reach out to support him. He had lost his little remaining strength and fallen for a second time into the deep snow.
"I'm afraid I can't do it--- Harris--- please---" he whispered. Little hands shot in four places. "Harris--- please---" he whispered. Little hands shot in four places." "He is dead," Hurley said. "He whispered: 'I'm crushed, I'm crushed.' He dropped his rifle, and knee knelt beside the wounded Angelinian, supporting his head against his other heavy shoulder." "It's only a little further ahead," Hurley said. "He urged, 'I can make it into the black rammer a tamarack forest and a tree to a tree in the dark. We ought to have taken a good chance to make camp, with three out-rides left for the open lake.' "Only three." "Only three."

"That's all, but I ought to make two of them count in this light; I could single out two leaders of the Aztec Angelinian rebels and bring on some confusion that would delay the Fox progress. Here take hold of my shoulder quick!" He doubled himself into a jackknife in front of his half prostrate companion. From behind them came the sudden x-ox of the glandelinians, louder and is clearer than before and the sound of more fire reports.

at least: "He ordered us to hit the open and we'll have the on the late now within two minutes must be quick: give us they use us out here in the open they will now us down we He straightened himself up. "Three minutes, four minutes they were. It was a terr terrible situation approaching and able to shoot them all down where were, and then--"

A terrible picture burned in Garfield's brain, a picture he had carried from scenes witnessed in yorn California. Of children by the thousands torn and mangled before his eyes by these outlaws of the rebel ion, and he considered as he thought what the fate of the other two children with him comrades would be should a volley now all the men down in the open lane. Un can he spend those three minutes should a volley now all the unslain the risk of tal men--he was reached in time, he knew what their fate would be. here flashed into his mind one last resource: He might, perhaps, and find another

This was not the first time that these two Angelinians had risked their lives together, and that was morning at the start of the permit despite all his live actions of that first night. Everett had fought valiantly for the other and the two children killing twenty Angelinians and wounding sixty, and had been the one of the three to be wounded. Even if they died it would be in company, Gluride made up his mind to tint, and slatched the others as in a firmer grip. He might escape the glandolinians, but the refuge of the others was in a firmer grip. He might escape meant only a more painless and by cold. Still while there was life, there was hope, and he hurried on through the deep snow, listening for the oncoming rebels behind, behind him, and with each second feeling more keenly that his own powers of endurance were rapidly reaching an end.

the rebel pursuers had ceased to give tongue, not only the allotted two minutes + 1 soldiers on the lake, was it possible that the rebels had lost the trail when it occurred to the Angelinian that perhaps he had wounded one of the rebels the time he fired at them, and that the others discovering his injury had been delayed by confusion. Heavily he thought of this possibility when he was wistful past but failed to hit him or his companion though a bullet carried away together, but the rest of you can--if you want to."

"here was a silence; then another officer who was a general asked from his position of an old stump:

"You mean the three intemperate men Jeffries and Cal, Wood, and Johnston?"
The general nodded. "I mean just those very men." He replied diffidently. "It is not that they were not neighborly men--I'll bet not one of you general have set foot in any of the tents they met in. The new comers seem to think they are better than any of us are..."
This direct accusation seemed to alarm the other officers--so much that some of them stood up presently and shuffled out for fear that their own horses may be the next victims and they wished to go and see if their horses were safe or not.
The talk veered, too, into less exciting channels and so the young Angelinian officer lost interest. He went back to his own part of the lines and stood watching the concentration of artillery and the erection of high breastworks and so on. He tinkled of strange bells like Christmas bells came to him (maybe they did) through the air of approaching winter, and the boy felt the air of action hunger in his blood. After a moment's consideration, he buckled on his sabre, and mounting his horse made his way expeditiously out of the Christian encampments and down into the tangled valley near Gunboat Creek, it being the Evangelinia grandis mountain front stream.

The water of course was frozen over now, and many of the pools and springs which had been so beautiful were also frozen solid to a great depth incapable of holding old any trout now. The Angelinian officer looking out carefully for dangerous glacelandian snipers and sharpshooters, made his way on horseback with considerable difficulty along the banks of the frozen creek. High waters of the summer before had piled up hills of mud and mountains of brushwood and hood rat foot used by the Christians for breastworks, and in places he had to dismount his horse and climb finally alone laboriously and cautiously up one side of these immense barriers, and down the other, while the stream had filtered through its base, or welled up into a dark deep pool above the obstruction, and dug a way out for itself at one side.

It was dangerous going however for he was in the enemy territory, and the young Angelinian officer realized this but he wanted to see if the enemy intended a new movement to break the Christian siege of Vivian. A long log rubbed smooth by long contact with the sand and gravel, of the creek bottom, rolled under him and all but precipitated him from his perilous position, at the top of a mound when he would catch himself and crawl down, feeling for each foothold, before trusting his weight to it. And then when he had imagined he was just a left the last of the many obstructions behind, he heard a dozen shots, and felt stinging pain in his leg and ankle and found himself sprawled upon the ground, with a sharp stinging pain running through his instep to his knee and pain from his left leg shoulder and arm. He tried to pull himself erect to draw his own pistol, but the effort turned his side sick and faint. For a while he was only partially conscious of his surroundings. He awakened to find the sun sunk below the level of the pines and tamaracks on his left and no glacelandians were in sight. The cold spell of a cold wave was setting in, but it brought with it little consolation --his leg and arm were swollen so, that for his foot his shoe top seemed to be cutting his flesh, and his coat sleeve seemed a about to split, and in spite of himself he cried out when he tried to remove it.

Next moment he forgot all of this, from the underbrush the sound of cracking sticks came suddenly to him. At this time of the year during this part of the siege the enemy were busy with many scouting parties and foraging parties together besides prowlers and spies and cavally scouting parties, and many of those rebels Conifer Conde Confederates of Angelinian frequently came down this section of the valley to secure all booty they could as far toward the Christian lines as possible. Most of these glacelandians apparently were harmless toward wounded Angelinian soldiers, and may run back to their comrades or lines at the sight of one Angelinian probably but some of the glacelandians may be pious-glacelandians or Zimmermannians. The boy turned upon his side, on and again tried to pull himself erect. Then he cried out with relief an Angelinian officer had stepped out of the underbrush and was standing peering about, not ten feet away. He was a tall broad-shouldered man with heavy whiskers and wore the uniform of a Calverinian but the hat of an Angelinian general. He recognized the soldier as Colonel Jeffries, who had taken command of a number of regiments just two weeks before. Suddenly the stranger perceived the wounded Angelinian lieutenant, and came toward him.

"I thought I heard someone call." He commented looking down with kindly interest at the wounded officer. "What's the trouble? Fall and hurt yourself?"
"No." The wounded officer whose name was Kack explained. "I was out scouting and I got shot down by hidden snipers in a bush. I receive the worst wound in my ankle I guess. I don't believe the bullet broke it--I hope not anyhow. My arm and shoulder is also badly hurt I'm afraid and I'm helpless to get out of this ravine."

General Jeffries stopped and took the injured bleeding ankle, into his strong broad hand. For a moment he twisted the bones gently but firmly. The officer winced with the pain but said nothing.....

"Nothing broke broken. I'll take you up to my tent and have the army surgeon bandage it and treat your other wounds, and a few days after I presume you will be all right."

He lifted the wounded Angelinian officer so easily, he that he almost felt indignant; he was not a baby to be carried about in this way. But the severe pain of motion, even even such easy and guarded motion as this, made him shut his eyes, and grit his teeth to keep from crying out. When he next looked out into the world of smoke and batteries and fortresses and Christian positions Colonel Jeffries was carrying him across a neatly fenced yard, toward a large tent of tabour fashion. Near by was a small house of logs which a small porch built of small planks, and as they entered the single room, the Angelinian officer saw that the logs were hewed against the wall. The Colonel laid him on the bed and summoned a surgeon, and the young officer unfastened his shoe. He built a roaring fire of pitch wood, and soon had a kettle of hot water, into which he made the young Angelinian officer lower his foot. At first this was almost unbearable, but gradually the hot water seemed to stop the pain. Afterwards the surgeon bandaged the wounds in his ankle shoulder and arm, and pulled a lumberman's sock over his wounded foot. When he took him up into his arms again, and carried him to his own lines or camp. He placed the lieutenant on general Mansions headquarters door step and turned away.

"Pound on the door or porch when I'm at the gate lad." He commanded briefly. "They will hear you and come out."

Astounded but obedient, the wounded Angelinian officer obeyed. Five minutes later he was seated in general Mansions own great chair, comfortable rocker, and was telling his adventures.

"And this man Colonel Hank Jeffries did all this for you." The great Christian general asked gravely. "Stran o there are many ugly rumors around about him--he is apt to have some explaining to do before long I'm afraid, and some more of these strangers also."

The young lieutenants eyes flashed with sudden excitement.

"I don't believe there is anything in all this gossip and talk of his being the poisoner of our horses and women and children refugees in the protecting encampments and also so many of our soldiers." He explained. "He's--why he is so kind. When a man looks at you when you are hurt like he looked at me, and is gentle I don't believe he would poison innocent women, soldiers and children and horses. I know he or his friends would not do so--Colonel Jeffries never did it."

Surprised but not convinced by this line of arguments the general suggested that bed was a good place for a young lieutenant who had put in such an exciting afternoon.

So by the great Christian general the young Angelinian lieutenant was soon put to bed but did not fall into his usual dreamless sleep. For nearly an hour he lay there in the bedroom of the general's headquarters, tossing about, moving this injured ankle cautiously from side to side, and thinking. He had not served in the Christian army out of these months past if you please without knowing something of the danger which probably threatened not only his rescuer but his friends also and the belief in Jeffries' innocence which had come to him was as absolute as was sudden.
He knew that he and his strange friends were suspected as glacelandian spies within the Christian lines by staying there with the purpose of doing some dirty work by poisoning the army's cavalry horses and men also to make an effort to paralyze the great siege of Vivian which was going on. A deadly he sat up in bed.

"I must help him and his friends." He said aloud. "I've got to find out who the ones are who are doing the mischief."

After that he managed to fall asleep. The Angelinian horses were the chief item of the Angelinian cavalry forces in those stirring times. Horses being principally cayuse and other stock and ponies and so on and also steeds were not of course worth much money, but the cavalry forces needed horses bad, and so even in the Angelinian armies a horse thief was looked upon as a pest beyond the pale of the Angelinian law, and so was dealt with in a way not pleasant to think off when caught. These mysterious persons who were poisoning Angelinian horses by the scores of thousands, and many soldiers and even women and children refugees also so indiscriminately, combined the bad points of the Christian generals and the soldiers also of the cattle rustler and the horse thief. At first it was seen that the work of the suspicious persons who ever they may be was only confined to certain localities, but gradually they seemed to gain confidence and to extend their horrible operations by the whole sale, and once nearly a thousand children died of poisoning and 10,000 threatened with death or very ill and weak, and despite investigations, the witching of every strange person and so on the wholesale poisoning continued unabated, the whispers of suspicion became rumors of accusations, then threats and curses.

Spies by hundreds were set to watch the stranger and other strange soldiers within the Christian lines and public feeling among the whole army especially among the cavalry and those guarding the women and children rapidly mounted toward a pitch where the necessity of proof of even evidence would be forgotten, and violent remedies would be sought.

The Angelinian lieutenant knew this and he had not for one moment relaxed his determination to find out who the real culprits were. Time only strengthened his belief that the Angelinian soldier who had been his rescuer and others were innocent, but he knew that his unsupported opinion would not be considered by the angry men and the generals of Mansions army. He began to hunt the scene of each new deposition, and to look for clues. To a boy or any one trained for the tricks of tracking and woodcraft, it was the most natural thing in the world to think of studying the footprints about the crime scene. He soon had learned to read this record written in the sand and dust, and was able to identify many thousands of the soldiers and even women and children by their tracks. Whoever the culprits may be however, they were playing their part with wonderful skill. At the gathering of generals during a rigid investigation every general was present and all spoke with the old eloquence of apparent conviction and earnestness. To the young lieutenant sitting with the gathering and studying faces as he studied footprints, this was a matter of deepest concern.

He had hoped that some guilty look or an expression of hidden cunning might betray the criminal soldiers to his watchful gaze, but nothing of the kind ever happened.

Instead he read indications of a coming storm, every general in the community came to Mansions headquarters sooner or later, with the single exception of the strange soldiers, and they all agreed that his indifference to the army's calamity was highly significant. Something of unspoken mastery in the strangers had his hitherto protected them—every man who had met them had felt the baffling magnetism of his presence and the presence of his friends, but now the time was fast approaching when when this intangible protection would surely fail. And the young Angelinian lieutenant knew it.

"I've got to do something," he said. "I've got to use my eyes and ears better—the real culprit is right here among us, and I can't see him or them—I've got to—"

And then there came to him the rumor from another camp of Angelinians and one from an Abyssinilian encampment near Gorma Catherine far up toward Mansions right wing which set him to thinking immediately. A scout from the higher positions positions dropped the casual word in the gathering of generals one morning during the time Hanson was beginning his engagement at Lieghurg Landing, and that afternoon the young lieutenant had saddled his own horse, and set out up the valley trail, a blanket and three days provisions tied to his saddle. It had been no difficult matter for him to secure Mansions permission to make the trip, the young lieutenant had never been coddled, and the general believed in the army and frontier training which teaches a boy and all men to look out for themselves, by allowing him to do it. He had been gone for two days facing all perils on the trip by being under fire from rebel batties and chased by rap rebel soldiers and he had thus been gone for two days when the storm he had foreseen loomed blacker and still blacker blacker—and then broke. Soldiers from many points of the inactive section of the Christian lines had gathered in the company streets and fields and conversation had turned as usual but more excitedly upon the mysterious attack upon the live stock and persons. But now no more horses were victims, soldiers, and women and children were the only victims.

"I've been thinking lately, the glandelinians themselves might have something to do with it." One of the assembly said hopelessly. "Of course things look bad for this man Jefferys and his strange friends, the thing started right near his own tent, and it spread from there, he and his friends are the only men we don't know anything about, and he has neither children or horses, looks like he had a grudge against them. But the men we had sent to watch him and his friends don't seem to be able to catch him or the friends of his at the work, and darn it it not only keeps up but has left the horses alone and went to the women and children refugees within our lines with tenfold fury. Now the glandelinians—"

The glandelinians don't like the idea of our millions of cowardly men scouting all around, I mean picky that's a fact general Frank Bishop agreed hopefully. "In spite of himself the young lieutenant's confidence in the stranger had affected him, and this looked like a loop hole. "It might be—"

He was interrupted by the opening of the front door and general gazed on himself strode into the room and he seemed unduly excited.

"What's in the name of Heaven and the Saints has let loose around in this valley and throughout the whole Christian army under my command!" He demanded aggressively. "You men don't have the investigation made more rightly at all." "There are some persons within the lines and no where else doing it dirty work!" I took a thousand two hundred little children toward another section of the lines this morning and they all had complained of illness and even vomited. And now near half of them are dead. Now I want to know—"

He was interrupted by half a dozen generals who had sprung to their feet.

"And we want to know," cried a general who had been among them and who was to Mansions surprise Hanson I mean himself for he also was suffering the same disaster as well as his brothers army. "Where did you cross the valley general Mansions!"

The rest of the mass meeting was a foot. Nothing more was said, but the stranger and his companion strangers found himself strictly guarded by soldiers, and then as the sun crept down toward the ragged purple mountains half covered with snow uniformed and scattered masses of enraged soldier mobs were forming and passing down the company streets with the purpose of lynching the strangers even without the permission of the generals.

Five miles further up the valley, the young Angelinian lieutenant was riding hard as possible, beside him rode a cavalcade of soldiers and two officers who sat on their horses as if they were a part of them. Neither of the eighteen horsemen spoke, but they urged their horses forward, minute after minute, riding as if to deliver a pardon to one condemned to death. The young lieutenants face was tense and seemed with weariness and anxiety. The faces of the others expressed nothing, but their somber eyes glowed like coals. And then as the miles fell behind them one of the officers of the squadron suddenly stood up in his stirrups, and peered ahead, through the haze of the already reached Christian lines. Next moment he dug his heels into his horse's sides, and he and the whole cavalcade dashed forward at breakneck speed. Neither spoke, words were not necessary.

In the opening of the big labour occupied by Jeffreys and his friends the men who had so long been an enigma to the Angelinian forces, stood erect and fearless. Before him and completely surrounding the tent surged the mob, for a wild raving mob it had become by this time beyond the control of the officers who had tried to cool them down. Suddenly Jeffreys had raised his hand and spoke;

"I and my friends are one against a large multitude," he said. "But before you commit this crime, I demand to be told of what I and my friends are accused of!"

A murmur of fierce anger ran through the crowd of soldiers who were brandishing their weapons and looking fierce indeed. When someone among the crowd said suddenly;

"Tell him and his friends before we pay him and they for what they have done."

This was the first direct statement of the general intention, and as if emboldened by it the furious crowd of soldiers making a scene almost like the Reign of terror in the French Revolution, the crowds of soldiers about the labour contracted, and began to close in upon the single man fearless figure in the doorway of the big tent brandishing rifles and bayonets at him and looking like a swarm of Christians suddenly transformed to fiends. Another voice shouted above the tumult;

"You and your friends are not only accused of poisoning the horses of the cavalry but also of doing the same to nearly twenty thousand women and children. We know you and your comrades did it. We traced it to your tent. You are not Angelinians but dirty speaking glandelinian spies and evil criminals in disguise."

Mr Jeffreys raised his head and looked pityingly out over his thousands of accusers.

"Men he said—"I am sorry for you. You are talking of something I and my friends know nothing about, but evidently you are angry, angry, and have lost the power of reason now over some strange disaster that had befallen you. And now you who are Christians and Lovers of the Sacred Heart are trying to harden yourselves to do a cowardly thing!"

But the crowd of soldiers were in no mood to listen. The men nearest the doorway of the big tent made a sudden rush—

The young lieutenant and his squadron were on the last lap. Lying close to the necks of their horses, they urged the fiery steeds along with shouts and heels. They skirted a bush fringed turn in the trail and dashed down into the open company street. They were soon upon the big crowd of angry Angelinian Angelinian soldiers and were pressing forward, heedless of the angry protests of those menaced by the horses' hoofs.

"Stand back and let us pass— and let that man and his friends go. He and his companions are not the ones who poisoned our horses and women and children."

The young officer stood up in his stirrups and shouted as fiercely as those around him had done. Silence greeted his declaration/ silence and then wild anger.

"What do you know about this lieutenant Halsted? Get out of here. This is no place for you," shouted one of the superior officers in the same mob who had stove to break up the riot.

"This is no place for the rest of you either," Lieutenant Halsted repeated hotly and excitedly. "I tell you Mr Jeffreys and his companions no know nothing of this serious affair--any more than the rest of you do. Listen--"

General Hanson rode up at this moment at the scene of the excitement with a squadron of his generals and having heard the young lieutenant words pushed forward from the middle of the company street and approached the lieutenant who was really his son.

"What do you know about this Halsted?" He demanded sternly. "If you are talking without knowing--"

"I'm not," the young lieutenant insisted to his father general Hanson. "General Williamsberger Zimmermann who is concentrating armies upon Jennie Vivian near Gunbeam Creek has captured the real culprits-----, Charlie you tell them." He added to the lieutenant who had come with him and the others. You are from Zimmermann's army and know it all. Why Zimmermann sent you with the report to Hanson. The Ange, Angelinian officer for the moment said nothing but slipped from his horse, and began searching carefully along the trodden ground. And the immense crowd of soldiers realizing that something it did not comprehend was now happening, made way for him. Suddenly the Angelinian officer stopped and plucked what seemed to the mob of soldiers an insignificant bush from its place in a mass of tangled foliage and grasses something which had not soon been seen growing there at the beginning of the siege.

"Here boys-- you see it now. It's a plant called 'Death gamas gonnie gonnie. It grow up sometimes within the christian lines and it is no doubt probable that foe spies and unseen planted the seeds here so it we would grow up with our vegetation upon which the army sorely needs and no one being experienced with these deadly plants plucks them with the entables and so the reason of the destruction among our ranks. This is bad indeed and Zimmermann having discovered it has issued orders for all these plants to be looked for and destroyed so a general policing is going on within our lines. General Zimmermann lost his own horse and over fifty thousand horses but no person was killed there like here. 'U

"Death gamas," Halsted repeated from his position of vantage in the saddle. "I heard the soldiers under Zimmermann were losing their horses by the scores of thousands faster than we were, and I went up to investigate it also and general Zimmermann whose scouts had discovered it told me what it was and here is his proof." And he handed the note to Hanson's this valley seems to be a favorite growingplace for it spies and enemies have been within our lines disguised as women and sowed the seed among our growing vegetables and fruits and even among the grass with the intention of poisoning the whole army to break the siege we are making. The situation has never been so bad as it is now."

So it proved. Mr Jeffreys was freed and his company companions also with many protestations of shame and regret of their mistake but from that day onward he began to get acquainted with all the soldiers who were first his enemies.

Perhaps the lesson in which death gamas had played so important a part was a good one for the entire community, although it might be a fatal one, but for the insight and determination of one young Angelinian lieutenant. The real culprits who had been captured in Zimmermann's army were hanged for it, and the investigation started soon made good riddance of all the deadly plants that had been sowed by the rebel spies. Some desperate move to break the siege it was indeed. No doubt when the Angelinians go to get excited they would go through even hell to break the siege (see battle of Gunbeam Creek r Jennie Vivian. When on a spree the overseers were more cruel to the children in order to gain his favor and prevent his own ferocity upon them, I've said when one of the children would stop to blow their hands to warm them, the laundress Indian overseer in charge of her or him would give them a cruel beat ing and put the child outside in the floor. I told for several hours. This was the cause of many children freezing to death. All day long violent and her sisters had him among the machinery watching proceeding proceedings untill spied by Aremburg who drew them from their hiding places, and dashing their heads together he violently threatened to place them at the machines if he caught them spying again. He noted like a wild man throwing them out rudely and kept up a stream of im swearing and blaspheming, and even scolded and called the children slaves for two hours.

The next day being sober the storm and strife seemed to be early over, though he several times scolded the crew and foolishly rimed the children more carefully. Violet and her sisters and foolishly rimed ished it again being concealed behind a cotton loom. It happened to be that the factory was closed again early that day, and o unknowingly the virian dirle were locked in the hall to stay there all night, with their parents have having the heart combed for them, and the next day violet's heart pant within her, and she heard Armstrong who was drunk again stagger up to the door, shouting, blaspheming and enflaming and swearing because he could not down, reaching to the office door.

door, snatching it from his hand, and heaving it back upon him. He found the keyhole to the office door.

"One of the child slaves sprang forward to open it for him and after she did, he rushed in, and began storming at the overseers for not having things in co operation, and making such a noise that all the children crouched in the corners and among the main machines. One of the overseers tried to quiet him but the enraged man would speak savagely against him striking the man in the face with such force that he went sprawling against a bench and fell over it upsetting it and a pile of wood onto the floor with a crash. Staggering toward the cotton bolls and swearing and singing loudly to himself he discovered the African girls again which made him frenzy stricken. He dragged gathering from the loom and men swearing like a mad man sent her to the floor, and then scattered a large group of children from him and dashed three overseers to the floor with one shove. Just then a small white robed figure came between him and them, and poor little Jennie White and trembling with just anger, stood glaring defiantly at the drunken man, while she gasped in sobbing sobs.

"I don't care what you do to me, but my poor sister. I don't care little Jennie saw, while she gasped in sobb:

"Oh, you mean wicked man to hurt my poor sister. I don't care if you are a gladieloidin, I don't care if you would kill me, but I say to you that you are as much a brute as the rest of them, and I hate you."
She added stamping her little feet, and clenching her little fist.
At this the gladieloidin was furious. He advanced and reached upon her like

As this the gloriole of his furious. "EACHMENT O" He screamed and rushed upon her like a maddened bull striking her a furious blow in the chest, and grabbing an Angelina nearly choked her to death. Then he stormed at them fiercely picked up a mending then furiously to help in the work, but Violet and Jennie picked up a large stick and belabored him over the back and head with it too knocking him down, and breaking some of his teeth. This still more infuriated him and he strove to lay them low by throwing a heavy chair to hit them. Drunk as he was the manager really knew what he was doing but their defiance and resistance, not like usual usual children was terrible to his way of thinking and he was crossed with rage and anger. He was only enraged because he a suspected, and knew that they were spying on him. But he was somewhat cowed because police had produced a fine shining dagger and defied him to come on. But he did not but staggered away, while Violet gathered round sobbing. Gathering to her breast, and when no one was looking sneaked out while Jennie too was sobbing as if her heart would break. It took the while an hour to get home. Her father saw an ugly lump on Violet's head, and that the eyes of her sisters were red with weeping, while great dark rims under them told of their sleepless night, while Jennie looked pale and frightened. Throbreath was a different one and after it was over and while his mother cleared up the dishes, the governor their father, Robert told them the truth. Their father told them that it had been foolish on their part to go into such places and begged them not to go again. Nevertheless the little girls trembled as they heard their father go out having taken a gun with him, and heard the door slam behind him. Their mother hurriedly got the dishes washed, then she and the little girls said their prayer, asking not to let their father do anything rash, cautiously listening for his retreating footsteps. They dreaded that he would kill Armburg. After finishing their prayer they swept up the floor praying silently.

282 In the meantime, by questioning people the governor learned where Aronburgs slave house was. As he reached the place and entered a fearful snow storm broke loose on the wings of a fiercely rising gale, and the governor as he strided and noticed the children shivering and naked all the while at their shivering, he felt from the cold, and once in a while trying to warm their half frozen hands. He inquired from one of the overseers where the menagerie was, and he got the answer that he was outside looking for a number of beauties who ran away after spying around the place.

answering look. "I have important matters." Answered the governor with

At this time unseen by the governor another overseer ordered several children harshly to go out and buy him something for his dinner. The children feared to go out in such a bitter storm with the few clothes they had on but they dared not disobey. They started to put on a ragged cloak and old stockings for mittens over their bare arms, but the rasoul took them away forcing the children out as they were.

When they got outside the poor children were nearly hurled to the ground by the force of the windblast, the blinding snow swirling like clouds in all directions. The snow was blown in deep drifts here and there, and the bare feet of the children began to smart, as they trod in the cold all snow. The snow was whirled into their very faces as they heaved in the direction of the sweeping gale, and the children thought that they would never reach the store. They took good care not to lose the money, and after nearly five minutes they bought the things that were listed, with all the no money given to them by the overseer. When they left the store it was snowing worse than it had been snowing before. They could not see anything a hundred feet ahead of them, and when they had at last reached the factory they were nearly half frozen. They could hardly see the house it was snowing so hard. The wind howled like a stricken gull, and blew the snow down their necks and into their faces and eyes. Sadly they entered the doorway, and shaking the snow from their cloak and shoulders, brought the things to the overseer who scolded saying that they had been too long in coming back. The overseer was impatiently waiting for Aronburg, and now striding over to the overseer said:

"Will you tell the manager to step into my house here," was my cry. "With this he went out. I noticed that the snowstorm was fiercer still the wind blowing like a hurricane, tearing up roofs and shingles, and blowing down signs and fences. The countless dinner cases for the poor child slaves, who got scanty food, and plenty of castor oil, which made them vomit after every dose. The whole afternoon passed dark and dreary outside, and it was snowing fiercer than ever, the flax plants at times being as large as a man's eye. It became terribly cold in the factory, and the snow found itself in through the cracks, and underneath the doors, and many places on the machine shop little drifts of snow lay on the floor. All that afternoon the wind blew fiercely making such a howling wolf like sound that the children felt the place a little uneasy. That evening the snowstorm reached its highest fury, the ground already being covered with two feet of snow, and the highest snowdrifts were three or five feet high. Ward supper time other children were ordered to go out and buy something to eat for their overseer. The store they had to go to was twelve blocks away."

VIOLET AND HER SISTERS MAKES A TRYING SACRIFICE.

The vivian girls had happened to be there again and these little girls did not wish to see these poor little children to suffer, but the poor children we were forced to go out and there was nothing they could say. After putting on what they had the poor children went out in the swirling snowstorm, but were stopped by Violet and her sisters.

...Where little girls, change clothes with us. Mr. Curry or you will be frozen." Said joice who had planned this sacrifice. The children bewildered, averted, and astonished at first refused, but Violet and her sisters forced them to come into a vacant house which they knew happened to be heated by a fire in the grate made by themselves, and fifteen minutes later Violet and her sisters emerged again, the vivian girls in rage, the others warmly clad.

"You say that we will get the things," said violet, and off they went. It was awful fatiguing for violet and her sister to plough through the deep snow in their bare feet, not that they could not stand it, but because it seemed beyond their own strength. So they did their best to avoid the deepest snowdrifts. The little martyrs suffered terribly from the fury of the wind, and buffeting of the sudden gusts, and the whirling snow, though being able to stand the cold as they had been practiced into this so that no cold could daunt them, but it was the exhaustion that they

They suffered. They were almost blinded by the snow whirled into their face by the wind, their feet and legs were getting more numb from fatigue every minute and they felt as if they could not hardly bore it any longer. But what of the others who could not have even stood the cold itself. Yet the brave little girls did not give up, and at last they reached the store, and bought the things necessary, and with their own money. They wished to stay in the place to get rested but fearing that if they were late they would make it worse for the other little ones, they hastened out. Their sufferings from the exhaustion was worse now more worse than going to the store.

For on their return they now faced the wind. Jennie alone could not speak from the pain and nearly overcoming numbness, so Joyce had to help her. When they reached the alley where they had left the other children, they found them standing in a corner sheltered from the wind. Violet and her sisters said: "We will take the bundles to your master, as we are high exhausted, but don't follow us as it will make it worse for you than for us. We mean to shield you from the place altogether, and bring you home with us."

With this Violet and her sisters staggered into the factory, and entering gave it to the overseer, who came for it, and the change. In the darkness he did not recognize them, and next wanted to send Violet alone for a bottle of whiskey, but she refused to go despite all the threats, and so did her sisters, and he tried to give them a beating but they held him at bay for an hour with implements they had picked up and which they meant to strike him down with if he dared to lay a hand on them, and so not being able to call for help as he was the only one in the place, he had to go out for it himself. At his absence the little girls seized some quilts lying on the floor, and wrapping themselves in them stole out by one of the windows, and made for home as quickly as they could bringing the little children with them. However they were discovered by Aronburg, who failing to capture the vivian girls he knocked the other children down, and raising a hue and cry to attract the overseers who came on the jump also capturing Violet and her sisters. Violet and her sisters were seized and dragged into the factory and thrown on the floor. At this the overseer who had went out for the whiskey returned unable to face the furious storm warning that as he was being half frozen. All night long the little girls were locked with the rest in the factory their father and many police looking high and low for them. The next morning Aronburg was the first to arrive, and was again drunk and as furious as a wild man.

ARON ARONBURG SEES WHAT IS IT IT IS TO TRY TO MURDER WITH THE VIVIAN GIRLS.

He forbade Violet and her sisters to come near him, and even compelled one of the overseers to take off all their clothes and make them work while stark naked. The little girls struggled fiercely, and even screamed but they were overpowered by five men and stripped. Even then Aronburg was drinking a bottle of whiskey as fast as water, and draining it drove one of the men out to get some more, and so he drank and drank, until he was so drunk that he could not hardly stand up, but went sprawling to the floor at every step and sick and crazed, he crawled to a bedroom, while the overseers started work as soon as the machinery began to run. The vivian girls were crowded around one of the machines but despite the fury of the overseers they forced the children from every machine, and proved themselves to be so wild in their defense for the children that the overseers literally afraid of Violet and her sisters actually left them alone. At this moment the superintendent and manager Mc-Hollester, governor of all the child slave concerns operating in Galvernia came in with a couple of children. After shaking the snow from his overcoat he called one of the overseers ten times.

"WHY IN HELL DON'T YOU ANSWER WHEN I CALL YOU?" He blurted out to the overseer when he arrived. "I wish to order manager Aronburg, and see if he can place these children here as there is no room in any of the factories."

The manager took them without a word, and Mc-Hollester strolled around on inspection. Several of those brought in were left with Violet and her sisters when the overseers were afraid to approach, and when these new children saw the horrors of child slavery they cried as if their hearts would break.

Violet and her sisters looked upon them with great pity, and declared that they did not care what the wild villains would do, and did their best to comfort the children saying that they were watching a chance, and will compel all of the slaves to make a break for freedom. They also declared that they had a good father who some day will put an end to all of this slavery. This stopped their crying. Mc-Hollester stayed until noon, and Aronburg not so drunk now staggered into the room. Mc-Hollester had noticed that some of the children were stark naked and though he was really the worse of all the child slave masters, and worse than a thousand gibion [negroes], nevertheless he did not approve of this especially when so many children were girls and he said sternly:

"Manager Aronburg: What in hell does this mean? Have you no modesty about you at all?"

Aronburg glared at him but did not give any answer, and Mc-Hollester grabbed him by the shoulder and said:

"Speak man! What means all this?"

"Aronburg did not say a word but tore himself loose roughly and passed on looking daggers and his knives at Mc-Hollester and grumbling something to himself. At this moment another of the overseers who was late and who had not seen the other scene between the masters and Violet and her sisters staggered up to the vivian girls and said:

"Why are you not working? Hurry up and tense the cotton. The more you tug the colder you get. I'm telling you for your own good as I cannot help it. Be wise and work as fast as you can and you can warm up a bit." With this he went off. The little girls then felt like working but then they were bound to defy the other overseers and so they continued to remain idle until another of the wicked ones becoming braver at the sight of Aronburg and Mc-Hollester in the building came up and grabbed Violet by the naked arm with one hand, and her throat with another and said:

"You naked little brats, beautiful as you are we will open you up if you meet any further defiance at us. Go to work now or I'll take out your insides."

IS ARONBURG BROODING CHAINED?

The overseer at once discovered that they were the vivian girls, and dragging them before Aronburg and Mc-Hollester said:

"These naked beauties are the children who encircled around here yesterday. I remember how the cause of their being locked in last night. I sent seven children to get me some cats, and these brats to save them from the misery took their places. The nerve of them. What shall we do with them sir?"

Aronburg partly sobered now had come to his reason and could not hardly suppress a sneering smile as he said:

"I never saw these beautiful beauties before I'm sure. Then grabbing Violet suddenly he said:

"What in the name of common sense because of your clothes little girl? Don't you know that you will catch cold undressed like that?"

"One of the men took them away."

"Go and get the clothes." Aronburg commanded to one of the overseers.

"What do you think we are?" Roared Aronburg. "No you think I'm a monkey. These are not the clothes. They were dressed well, and now I believe I did see them before. They are the vivian girls."

"This is all they had protested the overseer."

He glared at the little girls and said:

"Is that so?"

"The little girls could not find word for answer, and so Aronburg said to himself:

"I believe the overseer who seized them tore their clothes himself so they could not have them on. If so I'll kill him for his interference of my orders."

Violet and her sisters were compelled by one of the overseers to tell what they had done, and Aronburg was touched in spite of himself. The overseer handed the clothes to Aronburg.

"I don't want them he said sulkily. 'Stick them in your mouth if you are too lazy to hand them to the children yourself. You took the off so give them to the little girls to put on or I will change your shape.'" the overseer obeyed, the little girls putting them on quickly. At this moment the Glandelinian came in with twenty more children, one a boy and the rest girls. Violet and her sisters were almost struck with terror at the appearance of this man, but he only handed the children to several of the overseers, and said about to walk out of the place when Aronburg said:

"Here, here, wait a minute. Do you think I own a nation for children?"

And he grabbed the man by the collar, and ordering the overseers to take the children out, threw the Glandelinian head first into a deep snowdrift. "Bring out more children in here and you will have to go to a hospital," he shouted at the man who ran off greatly frightened.

The superintendent Mc-Hollister turned to the little Vivian girls.

"I'm sorry but you will have to stay here for the night or until tonight at least. Then Aronburg can let your children go home. But don't come spying around here any more, because you may get caught by the wrong party, and become slaves for real, and never see your father and mother again."

With this he went off with Aronburg.

Dinner was now prepared for the children, all getting scanty food, while Violet and her sisters were compelled to bring the meals in. One of the Glandelinian overseers was very drunk, and he always staggered around the fore house bench, bumping at times into the terrified children, and against the same bench where the managers, and the chief foremen were sitting, spilling the chairs where the managers, and the chief foremen were sitting, spilling whiskey on them, and making them spill their coffee. At last he rushed into Mc-Hollister's, making him upset a platter of meat and gravy all over himself and the others as he was preparing to pass it down to one of the men who had asked for some meat.

"Confound you why don't you stagger up the walls and up to the roof, and the sky?" The manager snarled shoving the drunken man accidentally against Violet, and making her upset a pile of dishes she was bringing in. Both fell to the floor with a crash, the dishes cups, bowls and knives and forks rolling and flying in every direction any one could imagine.

A LIVELY SCENE

"He ought to be fired for drinking at working hours," said a foreman.

"It's a wonder where he gets the whiskey anyhow," said another foreman.

"I thought the fool Angelinians did not have whiskey in Galvernia or not least had it concealed. Where the fool bought his whiskey is a mystery."

"If he don't stop his drinking he will have to work somewhere else or not at all," said Mc-Hollister. "How they got the whiskey I don't know, and neither do I," said Mc-Hollister. "How they got the whiskey I don't know, and neither do I," said Mc-Hollister. "How they got the whiskey I don't know, and neither do I," said Mc-Hollister.

The drunken overseer was indeed in a blinding rage, and attempted to draw a bowie-knife as he staggered to his feet. But he was quickly disarmed. He now started a volume of clamor, and while this dispute was going on Violet who had recovered from the fall, went toward one of the machines where the drunken overseer came down upon them like a thunderbolt for being his way and not picking up the broken crockery and knives, and then turning and forks. In the meantime the wild dispute continued, and then turning again toward the little girls the raised attempted to give them a fearful clubbing, and order them to pick up the broken dishes, but they defied him and once shoved him down over a small bench with a great crash. The enraged brute then made at the little girls with a roar like a lion, but he slipped and fell tripping Mc-Hollister who was about to interfere on top of him. Violet and her sisters picked up the broken dishes as fast as they could being annoyed by the quarrel which waxed fast and furious.

Twelve minutes passed, then there was a curse a rush of feet, and throwing themselves to their knees the little girls just avoided a powerful swing made by the drunkard, as he rushed at Aronburg, who had intervened for Mc-Hollister. Aronburg dodged and then let out a left swing, that sent the assailant crashing full tilt into a table covered to the top with dishes, upsetting it with a tremendous din, every dish knives, and forks, and spoons, and scores of pans of hot water crashing everywhere with it, making a deafening and frightful din heard all over the factory. The overseer as he charged furiously for Aronburg met a blow in the eye that sent him sprawling head over heels into another table which was overturned with a crash that shook the floor, and by his queer fall he sat down with full force into a dispan of ice cold water, which Violet and Jennie had set down on the floor a few minutes before, and the water splashed in every direction, and all over the poor children, who stood looking at this sort of circus accident in silence.

When the Glandelinian recovered from the shock and staggered to his feet with the dispan still adhered to him he was in a frightful rage and storming at Aronburg furiously, and flourishing his arms wildly like a demented being, with his eyes flashing like coals of fire, he again rushed furiously at Aronburg, but received a blow in the left jaw that sent him sprawling flat on the floor senseless. Mc-Hollister himself examined the Vivian girls in a voice like a roaring bull to pick up all the broken dish dishes, and the other things, and also the overturned tables, and all the while they were working in silence he cursed and swore frightfully. Then when all was clear up, he ordered them out telling them not to dare to darken the doors of the place again.

In another child slave factory and to say, many of the children were while being worked hard were made to go without any sight of food for days days their hunger being terrible, and many weaned at their machines. The little girls alone begged god to send them some food, but he did not seem to hear, their piteous prayers even being stopped by the brutal Glandelinians. Violet and her sisters hurried home and were greeted by their parents as ones who were lost and who returned again. They inquired how they came to be dressed in rags, and the little girls told the whole story of their brave deed, and of what they went through and witnessed in the factory, but did not mention any names as they did not want their father to do anything reckless....

"What suffered worse than we did," the said. "So why not us also, as all these poor children suffered in this cruel country, swarming with the wicked everlasting life and happiness in heaven...."

Violet and her sisters could not sleep a wink over their experiences, and so they prayed all night on their knees, for the stopping of the child slavery, and without any feeling that god did not hear them. During the day however the dear little girls had a peaceful sleep and beautiful dreams. Joice who was better now, was crying when she learned from her sisters that afternoon of the child slave horrors....

"Oh, I wish god would do something for the poor children," she sobbed. "It's a terrible thing to be treated that way."

In the meantime the child slave conditions continued to spread with terrible rapidity, and also the rioting and rebellions. The Angelinian governments protested vigorously, but the child Glandelinian soldiers, declared that they had a full correspondent right to continue the child slavery under any conditions, as long as possible, and that if legislations were started, and made and increased, the Angelinians trying to put down child slavery by force, and even again and again advised and pleaded to the Calvinian governments the Calvinian governments had failed to do so. This angered the Glandelinian soldiers especially as plots had been carried out in which thousands of children had been seized from the places and swept into trains going to Abbacunia, and as the Glandelinians sent a note threatening to make another general massacre of the children....

To this the Angelinians replied stating that they will continue so, and that if any massacre of children were at again made or even attempted, or if that any invasion was started, the invaders would leave mighty quick and those caught in the act of butchering children would be shot, or crucified. After this it was reported that legislation had ceased, and this made the Glandelinians believe that the Angelinians had given it up. The readers cannot conceive the horrors of the child slave conditions. Hundreds of children had been taken into captivity, from nations conquered during the wars and sold into slavery. They were continually sold to one from one boss to another, and if any of them made a break for liberty they would be hunted down with bloodhounds. If they were retaken they would be hewn to pieces or given to the dogs to tear up. They were made to work in the factories or in the fields under the lash, and the hardest kind of work whether it was cold or hot weather. Many overseers looked over them armed like guards, and the children feared indeed to take any breaks for liberty....

The child slave conditions first started in the glandelinian country, and in the most important cities first. At the beginning the child slavery was mild, and the tollers did get fifty cents a day. Yet as time passed, the glandelinians the most of them at least were becoming hardened, and the slave conditions of this but it did not good. A year passed and the whole glandelinian country was swarming with child slave houses, and the children only got four hours sleep, and many were worked to death during the rest of the time. Nothing as yet could overrule the child slavery which was worse than death. It drove many to insanity, and also hundreds to commit suicide. Mothers even fearing the horrors of child slavery, and that their own children would be victims murdered their own children, and then themselves. After a while the glandelinian government governments by the order of their king started child slavery in Calverinia which then belonged to Abbeannia. This caused four frightful wars, especially that of 1847. Glandelinia could not prevail in either war, the last two lasting from three to four years, but the fourth war lasted ten years, and in this the glandelinians received a sound thrashing, but she would not withdraw her bloody child slave horrors, under no conditions whatever. This filled all the nations with indignation, for they knew that Abbeannia was just in her cause, and demanded of Glandelinia to suspend their child slave trades in Calverinia, but Glandelinia dared them to come and interfere. In a few years the city of Calverinia Calverine, and Andean were the centers of the child slave trades. These two cities were hells upon earth. The world had heard of these natural massacres and slavery occurred there. The world had heard of these massacres, through correspondents, and after this the glandelinians forbade the correspondents to come in. They did a case alright but in disguise as p peasants, but a good number were suspected, seized as spies, and banished to the glandelinian island prisons. Priests and nuns were also seized and banished to those horrible island prisons.

The whole world was in horror, and wondered why Angelina and Abyssinia like the sister states of Abbeannia did not do something to stop it. In 1881 the child slavery was in full sway, the glandelinians seizing hundreds of orphans out of orphan asylums, and sending them to the poky islands which they had seized as their own property as slaves. Scenes occurred here which are too appalling to relate. It is quite high impossible to escape those islands, for typhoons occur frequently the seas are always stormy, and poisonous snakes infest the fields outside the prisons by the thousands. Yet many children did make a break for liberty, and the snakes getting them crushed them beyond recognizing. Many other children were banished to Calverinia, and made to work at machine shops, and even in boiler rooms, blast furnaces, steel mills, and cold and hot dingy mines. Soberia, with all its horrors was nothing. The child slave conditions increased tremendously, and started to spread along the Abyssinkilian boundary, the Abyssinkilians protesting vehemently but to no use. Then child slavery spread with increasing rapidity, and at last in 1897 war broke out between the nation and Abbeannia's northern state. The length of this war is not predicted but it was simply terrible. Glandelinia was about to win, when Abbeannia, Domobla another state, and Proteston the sister nation put an end to the war by making a swift and destructive intervention. The glandelinian government complained bitterly about this and made short and series of general wars on these states, mastering the strongest armies that could be drafted. The renewal of the war was begun but something occurred that prevented its progress and the glandelinians worsted severely withdrew her armies.

It was believed that had they continued the war at this critical time glandelinia would have come off the victors on all her enemies, but she failed to strike them a single blow, and worse for them the fiercest interference of the plengiglonenon creatures at that time which committed more havoc than the battles drove the glandelinian soldiers out of Abyssinkile in a panic.

The cause of the sudden withdrawal was a mystery. On account of these serious situation, the child slave conditions in Calverinia slackened, but it spread to southern Calverinia nevertheless. Terrible were the disputes that occurred at this time between Angelina and glandelinia. King Procid then reigned over glandelinia, and general helly was made general of all the glandelinian armies, with him came the series of glandeo-Abyssinkilian wars, the child slave conditions at slackened everywhere, and most of the nations thought that it was abating, but it was not. It was only a sign of more greater trouble and more cruelties.

The Glandelinians after the first most extreme war took advantage of the war raging with Consentina, and Angelina against the country called Me-Hollistonia, by starting child slave places by the wholesale. Big powerful Consentina another state of Abbeannia suffering from her losses in the big war could do nothing to stop it, and soon the child slave conditions were again in full sway in Calverinia, causing the Abyssinkilians to even lose heavily in millions of dollars. In the Abyssinkilian glandelinian war of 1899 the child slave conditions appeared to reach its crisis and though successful Abyssinkilian abyssinkile could see no way to put a stop to it. The Angelinian committee held a long council and the magistrates decided that the child slave conditions must be put down by force. Yet when this movement was started, the other nations fearing the outbreak of one of the terriblest kinds of wars wanted Angelina to mediate. The Angelinians at first refused to mediate and threatened to arrest mediators if they came into the Angelinian country, but soon after they did mediate, and the child slave trades seemed to continue on without any hindrance. Hanson Vivian at last held a meeting with all the council men, and speech about child slavery in a manner that would thrill anybody if they heard it.

"Child slavery oh ought to be halted despite the mediators, as it is ruining us as well as the state of Calverinia," he said in his speech. "Haldwin has gone to see what could be done, and my brother Robert Vivian has went to see the Pope to complain to him of the action of the glandelinians and see if the child slavery evil cannot be checked by main force."

Child slavery was indeed an evil. The slavery in Soberia is very terrific in its ways but nothing exceeded the child slavery going on in Calverinia, without it being in the power of the nations to stop it. Protestants protested thus and again but of no avail. If they could get to stop it no nation could. Was their thoughts. The Pope offered masses to end to end these sad conditions, and hundreds of sad incidents like little "Wee Wee" in "Uncle Tom's Cabin" occurred. To be a little fresh the glandelinians now started to annoy the trou tourist that they came upon and to kidnap the children found with them. The tourists were then full of apprehension and avoided the regions where the glandelinians were likely to be. Later on the glandelinians had set various fires in the Calverinian cities to annoy and apprehend them. The great glandeo-Abyssinkilian war was remarkable for the numbers of children taken by the glandelinian soldiers. They were shipped also to the many Boy King Islands, and this aroused the world once more. During the last part of the war the conditions of child slavery seemed to abate, and most of the conditions were withdrawn from Calverinia for several years.

In 1911 however it began again, gradually at first, then in full full sway. Calve Calverinia had the worse scenes of the child slave slavery the world had ever seen, and this spread along the Angelinian border. This had aroused the whole nation, and many a child slave plantation or firm was at the mercy of a fiendish mob. Threats were made by the glandelinians, but she had suffered severely from the glandeo-Abyssinkilian war and was not in the mood to make war on Angelina just then. At this time general Free Masonia a societies formed among the wicked glandelinians, and these made declarations that all the children not able to work, ought to be massacred. Yet the massacres did not occur, as the world threatened war if they committed the slaughters. The Free Masons felt very bitter over this, and they held a council over this debating on what they should do should do. It turned out that they intended to slay the children in secret, but there was too many correspondents around in disguise, and the world learned of the secret attempts, and again threatened war. Yet it did no good, for many children were put to the knife and the world did nothing because it could do not. Threats were only a folly, and they realized it to the quick.

passed, and Angeline and many other cities were torn by a terrific storm, which killed thousands. It also struck Galverinia, and laid the poor Vivian dead for weeks. Wreckage was seen everywhere for hundreds of miles. Not long after the rioting at palm Mansions by the child rebels at Andress, thousands of children were found missing from the orphan asylums, the glandelinians having been victorious against the child slaves. The two governments, and scores of mobs searched for the missing children, but every one who came to the search was exhausted, the children having been found missing, since the child slaves conflict. One day governor Hanson received a letter from some Angelinian near by telling that the children had been kidnapped by the Glandelinians. The letter declared that in the glandelinian child slave factories near the gigantic city of Norma Catherine hundreds of strange little boys were held prisoners. The morning before Hanson received the letter Robert Vivian thought he had found the children, but instead he saw that they were other children, many who had the same description of the children missing, and they were rescued no however. At the orphan asylums at Pounesse-Wells little children had been seen resembling the children who had been stolen, by their descriptions of clothing. When a score of Galverinian or cavarly men under Jimin went to the asylums one by one the Mother Superior of each asylum quickly produced the children, and to the amazement to all it was found that a great many in their clothing were just dressed exactly like the children reported kidnapped. Many had beautiful white bonnets, white dresses and waists, black shoes and red stockings. Scores of them either boy or girls had blond hair blue eyes, and chubby cheeks. Many were like those of the missing children but the Mother Superior explained that no glandelinian had appeared here as yet, though she had heard that they were in the region.

The general asked the name of one of the children, and one of the little ones who was five years old, answered in a bird like voice; "Birdie Ruthie."

Following a statement made by the Mother Superior that she had seen the day before hundreds of children carried off by the Glandelinians the christian general went back to his camp gathered about fifty thousand soldiers, and made a raid on a string of child slave factories, and towns, and plantations; and searched every place, but could not find a trace of the children, as the glandelinians in fleeing at the approach of the Galverinian soldiery had probably carried the children off with them. Simultaneously other Galverinian soldiers under Fredrick Nance, had attacked a small string of factories, and after dispersing the managers and overcooking the desperate overseers had searched in vain for the children. The governor himself with over ten thousand of his dashing Angelinian soldiers had attacked a large force of armed glandelinian citizens superior to his own at Glades lands lanes where thousands of child slave rebels were defending themselves against the Glandelinians, rescuing fifteen thousand children, bringing via very hundred fold to the little rebels, destroying the plantations, and mills, and capturing the defenders, but the missing ones could not be found. Colonel B Zimmerman got news that a crowd of children looking just a exactly like those described to be missing had been lured from the asylums by disguised glandelinians, and strangled till senseless, and then were carried away to the factories. Zimmerman galloped toward where he was told the children were last seen, when before an attack of some party of soldiers the glandelinian citizens, and overseers also had fled. He soon found the children, many who were frightfully mangled, but all were dead. It was predicted that hours afterwards many other little girls were approached by glandelinians and became frightened and fled, but many of them were shot down. The whole neighborhood was aroused by the firing, as the Glandelinians had killed over five hundred children, and angry mobs, and angry fathers together with Angelinians, and soldiers, pursued the assailants, but they escaped, after shooting down six or seven of the Angelinian soldiers themselves. The governors now gave chase and though they discovered some of the children among a band of glandelinians they could not rescue them as these Glandelinians also escaped.....

After Hanson had advertised, and then advanced for two hours, governor Hanson or Vivian I mean came back and told Hanson that he and several of his cavarly men had pursued and stopped a caravan of glandelinian wagons, a seventh one being hidden in a most clever manner. Dares-not-like another officer with them believed that the children had been mistreated by some glandelinians, and then brought to the town or city of Catherine (Galverinia) and as the demand for the children was refused hurried them, and their bodies were either placed in slaughter houses, or burned to ashes to conceal the crime. General Jennings told Hanson that he had seen the children carried off by regular Ovarians, a and beaten for a good distance. Governor Hanson sent a regiment to see follow a party of glandelinians and wrote to every leader of the local armies to follow scattered parties of glandelinians and ordered his own generals to have their forces advance steadily, as now he intended to put down the child slavery by military force. That evening one of the leaders of the christian forces sent a telegram to governor Hanson saying that he and several thousand men had attacked all the Glandelinian child slave factories about the region of the Norma Catherine Metropolis but could not find any children. In a round up of the Glandelinian districts in the vicinity of Norma Catherine, Angelinian spies searched factories in pretense that they were child executioners, and questioned hundreds of glandelinians and their officers and masters during the search for the children.

The spies even walked through the tenement houses where child slavery was also going on, and talked to every glandelinian manager, but all those questioned refused to give any information of the children. In the meantime other details of Angelinians were searching for clues leading to the glandelinian factories and plan plantations as there was strong beliefs that the children were really hidden away in the city of Norma Catherine. Impetuous was given in the trailing of the glandelinian factories by the statement of Jennings, that the children would be treated very cruel, and butchered, and their bodies hidden the moment the glandelinians suspected they were being followed.

"The Glandelinians will surely butcher them and turn them to ashes if they discover your advance," Jennings had warned the two governors declaring that they must be very cautious. One more vain clue was followed up. "The children are out in a string of child slave factories south of great Norma Catherine." Was the message brought by a bird carrier. "They were seen there to day."

Sergeant Gallo hurried out toward the city, and assailed the string of child slave factories with terrible fury, scattering the glandelinian soldiery who came up to oppose in which after a fierce conflict in which over one thousand fell on both sides, but the lost children were not there. In a few weeks the Angelinian governments started a movement to bring 1,200,000 men into the greatest search ever known with the hope of recovering the children, but the Pope fearing that this would incur a great war with Glandelinia tried to cancel this movement, but in vain and vague reports came in that Glandelinia was now watching every movement with evil eyes, and had started to mobilize armies, and this made both Hanson and his brother in edately sternly order the Galverinian governments to fortify the fortifications of McWhirther, Hanson stating that a heavy penalty would come if his orders wasnot obeyed. With the declaration of a little child rescued with 10,000 others the day before who had been enslaved by the Glandelinians for more than a year that the children would be killed and their bodies burned unless haste was made in rescuing them it started the searching anew. The child who had been rescued said that the glandelinians were frightful brutes, and if they found out that the Angelinians were making movements to crush child slavery by means of military force they would butcher the children, burn their bodies so they could never be found, and send an appeal to the King of Glandelinia for help.

CHASER-RESCUED...

THE STOLEN CHILDREN ARE FOUND REALLY ASSASSINATED...

"I am so afraid, oh so terribly afraid," Shuddered the child as she sat beside governor Hanson. "I know the glandelinians. I know how terribly cruel they are to little girls and boys, and they are child butchers too. They like to strangle little girls, girls and boys. I hate and dread the sight of them, and even the sight of their covered heads makes me want to scream, but they will take you to the factories if you think I can help you any. If the glandelinian managers find out that your soldiers are coming to stop the children from being made to work, or to make a fight at Norma Catherine with them, they will surely strangle the poor little girls and boys to death alive up their bodies and burn them. "Continued the little girl her blue eyes showing her fright. "I will never forget how I felt when I was with those horrid glandelinians. The children had been kidnapped by the glandelinians. The children had indeed been kidnapped by the glandelinians this being the fate of many children as revealed the next day through a letter to the Angelinian governor, and also a letter from the glandelinian governor of child slavery in Calverinia demanding that if the Angelinians would not leave Calverinia the kidnapped children would be destroyed, but if they left the children would be returned safely to the asylums. Robert who got both the letters first turned them over to his brother Hanson who immediately ordered general order to search for the children, at Norma Catherine thirty miles away. News had been found it was believed that Norma Catherine was the place where the children had been held captive, and that the glandelinians were preparing to entrain them to Andrean the Calverinian Capitol. By the long grief and search the two governors were on the verge of physical and nervous exhaustion, and was nearly prostrated by the letter.

The governor after reading the letter flew into a great rage, and refused the demands despite the warnings and threats, and then started off with one third of his force of horsemen to follow a clew which had come from near Catherine, while Hanson himself prepared to attack Catherine. In formation regarding the letter obtained however indicated that this was the first clew and the strongest lead developed in the wide search. In which the governor had already started out on, and more than five hundred thousand were already on the search. The letter according to governor Adrian directed also that over fifty thousand dollars be sent to the glandelinians by scouts, and it promised the safe return of the children, and also of the scouts.

"But don't bring any of your force, for if you do you will be liable to incur a war with glandelinia and Angelinia. Was the warning. "And it will also keep you from getting back the children, who will be massacred."

"They are in Catherine." It went on. "But what part I will not tell. You Angelinians have caused us trouble over the child slave causes, and so we have kidnapped the children who will not be harmed if you pay the fifty thousand dollars."

The letter was turned over to Greatheart who was working faith fully on the case and who soon after went to Catherine with Gindernine, the where there were many glandelinian child slave factories. Although the letter was looked upon by many of the christian generals as the most valuable developments on the case, others declared so, and so did Hanson that the children had not been kidnapped for ransom, but were captured and held for the purpose of being brutally treated and murdered. Another letter was received by governor Hanson as he was already on the advance. It demanded that he must not send any spies, as it would be useless. Kinder nine and Greatheart soon returned from the dangerous search, with only four of his spies.

"My men have been searching the glandelinian factories and plantations at Catherine, without success, and many of my men were captured and shot as spies. It is impossible to get near their factories and plantations, for positions there are well strengthened."

"He'll dislodge them." Said Hanson with a scowl. "And massacre them if they don't give up the children."

And also the search became more strengthened the theory and they found indications to strengthen the theory that the kidnapped children were carried away by the glandelinians under governor Giacomo Mosco, and the search through the factories of the human demons has become the most dangerous part of the wide search. Many of the Angelinian generals when the search commenced believed that the children were being held captive in the outskirts of Norma Catherine, and that the glandelinians were guarding them from the christians like golf gold. Others had worked on the theory that the children were being carried across into the city child slave factories. Following the receipt of the letter demanding money another scores of spies and detectives made an investigation of Norma Catherine to ascertain if any children with the same description were there. But they never returned. In the meantime, came cavalry men, infantry, and dragoons and Frederick soldiers had been searching every glandelinian child slave factory at Norma Catherine and had a heavy search. General Richardson kindred commanded one half of the governors force sent a telegram to all local detective forces to help in the search and that the poor children would be found in the city of Norma Catherine.

All of the glandelinians no matter who they are always mean to little children and every day they have always whipped and even choked them. They made them do the hardest work, carry heavy boards, and wash an awful lot of dishes, and thrashed and choked them when they did not get their work finished in time.

The glandelinians did not care at all what happened to any of the poor little child ren children, and many indeed were afraid that something had happened to the little children that were kidnapped by the glandelinians for it was always reported that the glandelinians even killed little children for the pleasure of it. And to make it worse the glandelinians fearing the success of the searchers were getting well prepared, having rifles shot gun, and a whole lot of cannon they had stolen out of the ammunition factories. Not long after the search was in full swing several Angelinians discovered a child lying dead in the grass, and brought the dead child to governor Hanson, then scores of more came in with a dead child. (It was a similar scene like this at Crowley that started the fiercest war ever experienced)

At once Hanson was so surrounded by many of his soldiers and detectives, to view the bodies of the dead children, who were kidnapped and slain, while a doctor made a close examination of the dead children. Hanson stood amazed while over five thousand men vowed revenge. The dead children about forty in number were put in small coffins as quickly as possible which were covered with the palisades of the valley, roses and carnations, and all kinds of flow flower flowers flowers. While the big throng stood tense and eager Hanson lifted his bowed head and said:

"Here lies forty little innocent children, who were strangled to death by the heartless glandelinians. It is the duty of all of you to bend every effort to drive child slavery out of Calverinia, even if it brings a war. This is the most shameful slaughter I have ever witnessed, and I say vengeance is Angelinia's for the murder of these these helpless little children who were slain in a cowardly manner."

While Hanson was making his plea for vengeance upon the merciless glandelinians, all of the men and women broke into weeping. While from the tension grew so strong, that women fainted and had to be carried away from the scene. The governor Robert Adrian, the father of the Adrian girls, now approached, and he collapsed from the strain and grief, and sat near the bodies of the dead children, and wept, while all listened to the description of how the little ones were snatched up by the heartless glandelinians, held captive for a time, and then killed in cold blood, when the glandelinians learned that the Angelinians were searching for them. Tears rolled down Hanson's cheeks. Two days later the funeral of services were very impressive, sixteen sixteen little girls dressed in white, and carrying flow flowers stood in a group, at the head of the small coffins. The children were some of the rescued ones during the search. The caskets the caskets were carried in front while the weeping women and children filed past and took a last look at them. Some of the women were overcome with grief and soldiers had to take charge of them, and lead them out of the throng. The children were now buried and indescribable was the grief everywhere. Hanson then told them all of a nephew who was serving in the glandelinian country but who had returned and was seeking to be a general among the christian armies. The children were captured and butchered, the glandelinians also having choked the children to death, and many times the glandelinians would smother the children, by tying flannel rags around their mouths and nose until the little ones were almost black in the face. The glandelinians would always beat them with a heavy broom handle, and a stiff strap, and also would occasionally burn one of them with a red hot poker. The children were indeed captured by the glandelinians, and carried off to Norma Catherine where after a day at hard labor they became the victims of the cat-o-nine-tails, the marks of this whip being visible on their backs long after the beatings. The glandelinians drove the children out into the cold to beg, and for days they were forced to spend their time, roving through the streets and alleys begging for money to give to their masters, and as if they came back without the money they were forced to remain outside the building in the cold snow all night though it was zero weather. Many of the helpless children were crippled by the glandelinians hired to do these things. One child whose name was Violet Hiebaum suffered a dislocated arm the result of a wrenching given it by her glandelinian master. One of the children was lame because of a badly bruised left leg. These injuries were caused by the glandelinian master, who as also beat another across the arm with an iron rod. The beating was so severe that one of the child's arms was seriously injured. The poor child was obliged to carry it in a sling. The face of a little girl whose name was Jenny was continually scratched and swollen. The glandelinians even had continued to shower blows upon the children until they fainted. One day the glandelinians caught the children saying their prayers during working time, and in a rage grabbed the children by their throats one by one and threw them against a fence so roughly that they were partly stunned.

Then while the children were lying helpless on the ground, the glandelinians seized some heavy boards one by one, and hurled them especially at the poor little girls. Then they dragged them into the factory, and roughly threw them into the floor where the villains left them to recover for themselves. Day after day the glandelinians cruelly mistreated the poor laboring little children, especially for not committing any sin. The glandelinians one day because they feared at their machine tied several of the children to a tree and rubbed poison gum on their faces and built fires under their feet to try to force them to commit some sin. Also the glandelinians when this was unavailing decided to burn them to death, but a severe thunderstorm came on, and the sudden downpour of rain saved them, and gave the glandelinians a good wetting in the bargain.

On a rage the glandelinians cut them on the arm with a sharp knife. After this they often left the children locked in a sweat shop under guard for many hours at a time, where they were compelled to work hard no matter how much they suffered from the heat, and they were not even clothed properly and despite their hard toil often went without food. So our gentle readers can see that the children Hanson, and the others who were not in the children that had been captured or kidnapped children to toil the captured and slain and then dressed like the kidnapped children to foil the christian persecutors, and turn them off their trail. Most of them had the exact description, nearly the same looks and beauty for their righteousness. The glandelinians had strangled them to death, put other clothes on them and then brought them to the place the christians were sure to find them. They did deceive Hanson and her sisters had been surprised when she found trouble nevertheless. Violet and her sisters had been surprised when they learned of this occurrence, and having found where the children had been brought had went there themselves to see if they could do anything to rescue the poor children even if at the cost of their lives if need be. They had seen concealed themselves in a baggage wagon, where they were brought to the horrible factories, where they also concealed themselves witnessing all the child slave horrors at the city of Andean where it was going on. As they came within sight of the city Violet and her sisters had seen a frightful looking string of factories resembling more like great prisons being on the outskirts of the large and beautiful city. The city was surrounded by very high walls, and also were the prison like factories, which were very large and tall buildings, made of huge stones painted black. The walls were over one hundred and thirty six feet high, made of large heavy rocks squared like cubes, and not painted. It had many towers, and was armed with one hundred forty eight cannon, and ninety gatling guns. The walls surrounding the city of Andean was also armed with cannons and gatling guns, and a large army of glandelinians about one hundred and fifty six thousand in number were on camped near the city. Every building in the city of Andean were made of marble brick and the capitol was very beautiful, the most beautiful building in all of Calvernia. The streets were broad and long, like in Chicago here, only were clean and of cement. The city was full of people unsuspecting that the glandelinian child slave factories were in their midst. Violet and her sisters who were carried off toward the city were nervous when a glandelinian came up and halted the driver. He said something in a low tone that Violet and her sisters could not understand, but after a short conversation the glandelinian officer blew a shrill whistle, and a score of glandelinians came rushing from the camp as fast as they could run. They approached the wagon and two of them ran to the rear and pulling aside the covering seized the children and binding them hand and feet with ropes carried them off toward the factories while the others following abused the children fiercely. Violet and her sisters watched the glandelinians take the children before the general manager who ordered the glandelinians to unbind them, and bring them into the horrible looking factories.

Violet and her sisters knew how bad these factories were, and felt miserable as they saw the poor children fall on their knees and begged the glandelinians as pitifully as they could, not to take them there, but these glandelinians were very cruel ones, though some of them were handsome in looks as they were, and had not the slightest pity on them, and was greatly angered at their pleadings.

"Hurry them into the slave houses!" The manager ordered to several of his foremen "They go in there if they want to or not! It's not what they want. It's what I want."

THE REDEMPTION.

Then while the children were lying helpless on the ground, the glandelinians piled some heavy boards one by one, and hurled them especially at the poor little girls. Then they dragged them into the factory, and roughly threw them

The glandelinians obeyed this wicked order and brought them into the awful factories inside where it was now awful dark, so dark that the children could not see their hand before their faces. One of the glandelinians lighted a candle and proceeded on through the hall way whose bones were strewn with the bones of little children. Violet and her sisters who were following what they saw, the bones of murdered children, were almost frightened at they saw the skulls and bones and the floor of the hall way fairly red with the red blood or dried blood of the poor children who had been murdered there. The glandelinians were holding a conversation, as they walked through the eerie darkness of the hallway but in such a low tone that Violet and her sisters could not understand them or what they were saying. Violet and her sisters shuddered at sight of the children bones strewn about and along the hallway, and the more they looked at it the more appalled they became, and felt like leaving the place immediately. They were sorry that they came into the horrid place, and found it sad and lonely, and yearned to be back with her papa and mama. The place smelled like a regular slaughter house, and so sickening was the stench, that the little girls nearly vomited. It seemed as if there was no end to that long hall but at last the glandelinians came to a room, and one rushed open a wide door made of iron. The glandelinians carrying the children walked into the room which was very large and full of half naked children working like slaves at the machines which were making a deafening noise. Though the door had been open, the other children could not escape for two guards always stood by the door fresh ones coming to relieve them every hour.

Violet and her sisters saw that the children were left standing in the rooms, the glandelinians going out instantly. The whole crowd of children drew back in indescribable terror as another fierce glandelinian entered carrying a large butcher knife in his right hand. He was indeed the ugliest looking glandelinian that Violet and her sisters had ever seen. He was dressed in cloths resembling tight beeing of ink black color, and had a devil's tail tied to his back. He looked like a real fiend, and had a children, who crouched backwards from him in the greatest fear. Violet and her sisters had never seen such terrified children in all their lives. Tied around his waist was a braid of human skulls. Violet and her sisters then saw that they would not be seen, always keeping their eyes on him with drawn knives, to defend themselves in case they were seen. They were not seen however and the rascal only stood there like a statue grinning continually and still holding the appalling butcher knife in his right hand. Around his neck also was a braid of human hearts, real fleshy hearts, the blood dripping from them and onto his clothes.

THE INDIVIDUAL A MAN SHOWS UNMOST CRUELTY TO THE HELPLESS CHILDREN.

He now advanced slowly toward the mass of badly frightened children brandishing his awful knife. Then he rushed forward grabbing a half naked child, and sticking the knife between his waist band, seized an implement which closely resembled a sand bag, of the type used by tugs, and gave her a terrible beating. Then the glandelinian forced the helpless little girl on her knees with her hands extended above her head and tied to the low ceiling that way, while he beat her with the most barbariously constructed cat-o-nine-tails ever made. She was also beaten on the head with the handle of the cruel whip until her scalp was broken, and she was rendered unconscious. Then he dislocated the little girls arms, and jerked her around. Several other glandelinians then came in and rushed upon four more children and gave them a terrible beating because they were not working fast enough, and caused them for praying for the cruelly treated little girls. They inflicted upon them any sort of punishment that suited their fancy. The other children were keenly sensitive to the pressure of impending harm and timidly huddled back to the other end of the room. Many of the children whose bright faces formerly spread a vivid light around about them, moved as if in a dream, their cheeks pale, and their eyes red with weeping. Every loud sound made by the cruel men convulsed them with fright, and drove them to madden sobbing and weeping. The glandelinians left the dead children where they had been tied, and proceeded to try and make some of them kill each other for praying for the other children. Grabbing two of them one of the glandelinians brought them outside the factory, and took them toward a row of calibre cannon which was placed at the foot of the walls.

speaking in an angry tone the glandelinian said to one of the children: "I'm going to make you blow one of your friends to pieces."
The glandelinian tied the little girl to the muzzle of one of the cannons, while another at his command rapidly loaded it. The glandelinian then placed the rope in the little boy's hand and aiming a loaded revolver at his heart commanded him to fire the cannon. Meanwhile a tortoise grabbed hold of the rope which fires the cannon, and the little boy seeing a chance made a swing at the glandelinian, and the hard shell of the turtle landed right on his head putting him down and out. Then the brave and fearless led his sister to the gun. It was a pleasant surprise to his sister and she hugged him. Through this occurrence they got away and though they were persecuted for a long time, and seemed in danger of being overtaken, a young longlimb man suddenly swooped down upon the children, instantly threw them on its back, made the glandelinians scatter right and left, and flying away with the children.

CHAPTER THIRTY SEVEN

THE REBELLION.

GIANG, GIANG, GIANG, KING, DONG. Over the big city of Andream on a bright afternoon of November traveled the sudden warning notes of the glandelinian alarm bells. In every part of the big city of Andream glandelinians and child slaves paused at an instant to wonder what they could mean, and whether it was something startling. Was a large force of Angolinians approaching to put down the child slavery unchecked, and would the beautiful and brilliant city be under a siege? Must hundreds of thousands of glandelinians give up their lives in an effort to overcome the conflict? There were others: must all the child slavery perish during the conflict? There were others: who listened to the pealing notes with a joyful and startling expression. These were the child slaves in Andream, and all other poor prisoners, including Violet and her sisters who were spying around the factories at the risk of their lives. Only for an instant did these officers listen, and wherever they were, whatever they were doing, they dropped everything, turning at once to run to a common center, the glandelinian council house. At that grand building eight glandelinians changed to be present, and these eight in the main council room, at the moment of the alarm, ran to the staircase, swiftly descending to the floor below. Yet as fast as they were, they were barely ahead of six others, who dashed up from the lower stairway. After that glandelinians and their officers, seemed to arrive about every second, while there was a quick quick scramble for the telephone, calling for King Proclie who had come up from Galverinia for the present, to see if he could successfully stop the interference of the Angolinians. From there they received news that a good number of child slave factories were besieged by over one hundred thousand child slaves rebels led and helped by Galverinian citizens, and they were allied to the king's headquarters were already burning, and now was becoming very serious, as it twenty factories were already burning, and nearly a million children set free by the rebels. The order was obeyed quickly, and soon the glandelinians were at the main door of the headquarters, and were brought before the wicked glandelinian king. The highest officers in the ranks bowed before the great king and said:

"General our city is in danger from a mob of over five hundred thousand child rebels under the personal leadership of a thirteen year old child by the name of Gertrude Angolinia, though I have heard that their main child leaders are two little girls by the names of Anna and Angolinia Aronburg who are ten and nine years old. And I believe that the Angolinian governors daughters, called the vivian girls are at the bottom of all this, as they have been spying on the child slave managers, Mc-pollster and Jacob Aronburg. Our scouts say that even Beppos court house has been captured by those beastly child rebels helped by rebellious Galverinian citizens under the command of Angolinia, and Aronburg, and that their position seems impossible to be carried, and fatal to attack, for the reason that the Galverinians themselves have seized the munitions and have plenty of arms and ammunition."

The king then said:

"Stop forward please Galloosa and give an account of the capture of Beppos Court House."

Out of the crowd of glandelinian soldiers came a tall star-musted man, some what handsome looking being six feet tall, broad shouldered, his eyes which had had in them a look of fury and murder were flashing with excitement as he said: "I was out visiting a friendly foreman of a child slave factory, when the child insurrectionist floating on the flag staff, also many large wooden breastworks made from fences torn down by the rebels, but nothing else just then. After what I was watching for a while saw a great number of boys armed with sling shots approaching toward me, and to my surprise one of the boys was the grandest looking little girl that I have ever seen. She seemed to be the child rebel leader Angelina Aronburg. After some time they discovered me and gave chase as I ran yelling furiously and demanding me to stop. They even let fly at me with their sling shots, and I had a narrow escape when a grenade was thrown at me by Aronburg herself, which burst within a few feet of me my hands being struck by its fragments, as you can see that they are wrapped in bandages."

"I certainly did but it was after this had happened. After wrapping my hands in these cloths, I took shelter behind a tree, and held my persuers at bay by opening fire upon them with my pistols. As the rebels retreated, I discovered the advance of hundreds of more child rebels, girls and boys together, and under the leadership of some men, all to my surprise armed with repeating rifles. They looked like the advance guard, and soon more and more came, their ranks seeming to have no end. I had to be very careful not to let the advance guard discover my hiding place, for if I did I would not be here now. The rebel forces were advancing fast, and brandish their small rifles, and cutlasses as if they meant business. The chief leader of this advancing force seemed as it was Aronburg, who was talking excitedly, and as they came within six rods of my hiding place and halted, the only thing I did was skidoo. Fortunately I was not discovered by them as I was the others, and when at a safe distance I hid again, I saw the main leader giving some orders, which of course I could not make out. However many of the children mostly boys eleven and twelve years old with flaming torches set all the scattered shanties on fire. There was a big shanty not far from where I was in hiding, and I saw a score of the child rebels, thrusting in the torches through the doorways, and almost instantly I heard the crackling of burning wood and the shouts of the boys. From that the rebels ran to another wooden shanty, which had one of our best and new factory machines in it, and set it on fire. One of our old Shriners of gates was dragged out with shouts of derision from a barn near the burning shanty, then the whole mass of child rebels, formed a "Ring Around the Rosey" as they called it, and danced mockingly around the beautiful shrine, and mocking me as I bowed down before it, and insulted it, and then set it on fire, and joked among each other how he himself was tortured in hell. Many of our priests clubbed rifles ran at them with wild shouts and beat them over the heads and shoulders forcing them to retreat... The child rebels had set all the shanties on fire by the time one of the nearest to me caved in, and I had a narrow escape from flying sparks and embers. With my pistols loaded and ready to fire at any moment I slunk away again, and it was high time that I did, for just then a considerable number of the child rebels swarmed about the tree I was hiding behind, and looked around the vicinity to see if anybody was watching them. After that I discovered the enemy surrounding the child slave factories. A terrific conflict which I witnessed rage all that afternoon the rebels worked up in a frenzy to rescue the other frightened child ren, and helped by the citizens also made one onslaught after another, but were beaten off again and again with frightful losses. However there were too many and as the factories were already windowless and on fire the defenders about five thousand in number were forced to abandon the factories, though they had not suffered a single casualty in killed or injured, although the rebels suffered over two thousand in killed or injured, although none of them were killed. Some had been retaken during the conflict, but as the victorious rebels taking the child slaves out of the burning buildings and compelling them to join their ranks for their reward."

"It's an infernal outrage!" Stormed Proclie brandishing his sabre. "It'll be pretty risky for them to capture any more factories. Can't you get the soldiers to put down this unjust and foolish rebellion?"

"I have tried time and again, but as most of them are galverinians and have children of their own they will do nothing, and only side with the rebels to the last, and have joined them. The rebels of both sects have ammunition to last many months. The only way to worse the child rebels is to seize all the stores we can, and starve them into submission, and increase the tortures of the children, who are still in our power." This was agreed by all the officers, but Proville was nervous as he knew that if this was attempted Galverinia would be torn by a frightful war itself assessed by the Abbeismians.

"Are the child rebels threatening to make an attack any where around here near the headquarters?" Asked Proville of another officer.

"There is no signs of them around here, though they are besieging manager Mc-Hollester, and Aronburgs factories, and p, plantations in strong force, and threatening to storm the places if the managers do not give up," Said the officer.

"But were so of all they are in possession of Zimmermanns committee committees courts, and have burned them to the ground," Said another officer.

"It was once the homes of that traitorous glm glandelinian we executed several days ago," Said a soldier.

The glandelinian officers were now dismissed and they returned to their commands. Every one in the city were excited when they heard the news of the rapid progress of the child slave rebels. And violet and her sisters were overjoyed when they heard the news, and prayed more faithfully than before. One day when they were spying around another child slaveplace violet and her sisters saw that some glandelinians had captured or caught three children saying their prayers at working time, and looked at them in a way that would have killed had looks been kin knives.

"Now then!" Asked the glandelinian quickly. "How did this seige and the success of the child rebels turn out or come about. You three children were the cause of it all. I'll bet anything." "We were not the cause of it," Stammered one of the children turning a bit pale. "We did not know that it was going on. Maybe you men were the cause of it all."

"Can't you find nothing better than to blame it unto us you contemptable little demons?" Said the glandelinian. "Why you children did it yourselves, and so you are the child rebels who first work for us to spy on us, and then bring the child rebels onto us care you. Way that is our outrageous you lit tis ours and you know it." Denounced the glandelinian his eyes flashing with scorn. "You rascally little rebel children don't seem to understand how quick we can execute such bold children, and already many of our beautiful factories are in ruins, and we trace every bit of that outrage to you children, and it won't be long before we will have a chain of evidence that will show how you caused this unexpected success of the childrebels, and the destruction of our shanties, factories and Shrine. Oh we are getting a complete case against you littlestriplings, and I'm doing more than think ing too." Snapped the glandelinian in a bitter rage. "Now then you can come along with me, and we will get this matter straightened out in the slaughter room."

"Go along with you in the slaughter room to be murdered in cold blood!" Gasped one of the children turning a few shades paler while the others their faces white with terror, and their knees trembling under them cried out.

"We are not bring this on officer. You ought to know that I'm not telling /is. Please don't butcher us. Oh please don't." "I'm afraid," Replied the glandelinian officer. "That I can't understand any thing except the crime against our god Saten by causing the child rebels to burn and besiege our expensive factories, to destroy and seize our property and risking many lives at this rebellion. Now then you little culprits are you ready to go with me to the slaughter room?"

"Are we going to be slaughtered?" Asked a little girl with a shudder.

"I don't have to put you children to death unless you refuse to come along in any other way. Take your choice you young rebels."

"Oh we will go!" Agreed the child. "But it's an awful mistake officer, about us bringing on this rebellion---an awful mistake."

"Two of you can walk on either side of me," Proposed the wicked glandelinian. "And don't either of you little rebel girls make the mistake of trying to get away. We will talk this over in the slaughter room. I'm bound to inform you young rebels however that the evidence is too strong for me to have a mercy on you."

Four unhappier little children it would have been found too hard to find just then. On the way toward the slaughter room neither one of the children had anything to say.

They did not care to talk about their innocence just then, but once inside the slaughter room, one of them came out boldly and strongly.
"Officer, this is one of the cruelest things you ever did."
"Oh M. H.?" asked the cruel old glandelinian tartly.
"We were only praying to our god in the thankfulness, and you are trying to make up a crime caused by us, by saying that we brought on the success of the child slaves."

CHAPTER THIRTY EIGHT

MANAGER Mc-HOLLESTER INTERFERES.

"Do you girls call it innocence by praying for your deliverance, and causing the child slave factories to be beset, besieged and destroyed, and to set the little rebels on to the destruction of our property and lives?" Thundred the glandelinian in a bitter rage.
"But we did not do anything of the sort. All we did was to say some prayers, the prayers we always say."
"And you don't consider it a crime to pray for your deliverance so you would not only bring the child slaves on to victory, but to bring all the christian slaves down upon us also?"
"No we did not, and it ain't!"
"I do not believe you rebels," Thundred the glandelinian. "Yet admitting that you are telling the truth about saying your prayers, what was the sense of saying that that dying child by baptism baptism the other day that you knew in advance would anger us?"
"Why we wished to see her die a happy death, and see God as she wanted to, and we are glad that we done it, and will do so again. We don't care if it would ruin your child slave cause, or your old army."
Then you thought that when you saved that child it would cause trouble to our child slave factories?"
"Yes," admitted the children. "And if it happened I'm glad."
"It did cause destruction to more than one child slave factory," said the glandelinian grimly. "And we have fairly upset the glandelinian governments in our efforts to suppress the rebellion. Then you now claim that this destruction of thirty four of our child slave factories as you try to call it is now directed against the whole glandelinian nation and to us in Calvernia?"
"We did not suppose that the destruction to your factories would cause this progress of the child rebels, or one of them at least," said the children who could not help shrink a shrinking before the fierce look the glandelinian officer gave them.
"Oh you didn't!" growled the glandelinian in a fury. "And you tear up our governments which are already overworked in these many disputes with the Angolanian and Abbeemian governments. But you'll find, you young rebels that we are not too busy to run down the whole of your affair. It was you little girls who caused the factories to be attacked and destroyed, until you deny it until you're as black in the face. We'll fasten that evil job on you never fear."
The other children had not said a word since entering the slaughter room and they even were more frightened, so frightened that they had to cudge their brains for anything to say in their self defense. The boldest of them tried in a most petulant manner to set matters straight. Yet it seemed as if the glandelinian had never been so hardened, or so hard to be convinced of anything, no matter what it was.
"But youngsters like you are hardly trusted around loose," the glandelinian went on, looking at them with a most deadly scowl. "I don't know what I'm going to do with you so I'm going to keep you chained here until I can get some of the executioners down here to put you girls to a most frightful death."
"We are to be murdered?" One of the children asked with an uneasy start. The poor children had reason to be afraid of any glandelinian when he got started on the path of wrath. Now these four little girls begged pitifully for their lives.
"You don't deserve to live at all," said the glandelinian. Then after he blew a shrill whistle several glandelinians came in bringing a man that violet and other sisters who were hiding, recognized as the manager Mc-Holleston. The glandelinians left him with the terrified children, who huddled in a corner.

"Good god where am I?" He gasped. "What kind of a place is this? A slaughter house, then?"
No one at first answered but one of the children who was frightened out of her control gave a loud piercing scream.
"This is indeed a slaughter room of helpless children, and owned by that governor Federal who tries to rule Galvernia in spite of the Angelinians, governor Arumgray, Raymond Richardson federal." Howluttered in a sulky way to himself..... and faced the children with a scowl.

to himself..... He then swung around, and faced the children with a scowl. "Among landelinian butchers" He belooored drawing a fourth foury revolver. "Vamoose evet every one of you. Vamoose I say." The frightened children scattered like sheep, and Mc-Mollester in a rage strode toward the door way just as a landelinian appeared and shot him down without hesitation. Then aiming his smoking revolver at another landelinian he demanded in a stentorian voice: "Halt you damn fool in your steps. Don't advance any farther or you are a dead man." (111)

The glandelinian only laughed and dashed at him, but he fell sprawling with a bullet hole in his brain. Then several more glandelinians made the same appearance, and Mc-Gollester said angrily:

"You rodents can't have business in life that worth while.

"It was your duty to enslave children only, not murder and assassinate them without my knowing it."

"I'm getting weary about it," asked one of the "glandelinians."

"What's the fool getting mouthy about?" Asked one of the "landelinsians" with a grin.

"I was just giving a hint, that decent men, or an innocent child youn wouldn't need, and that is thrown awy on you 'landelinsians'."

Retorted a nigger keeping a good grip on his gun. "You can't find nothing to do that is not wicked enough, then you have to capture innocent children to a nigger them is it not you contemptable curs!"

"Say 'I'll knock your-b-oe block off if you can't look out." Warned one of the main puffy looking 'landelinsian with who with officers now joined the others, and Ma Hollister looking at the whole score with great scorn writ ten on every line of his face.

ten on every line of his face. "I don't suppose that you glandelinians know anything about square and : honest honest fighting do you?" He challenged. "What do you mean?" Asked one of the glandelinians gruffly. "I was pretty sure that you did not know what I meant," leered Mc-olister. "Well I'll try to explain in easy words. You soundreels were hired to be hung-I'm fully child drivers, not hitmen, and for your offense deserve to be hung-I'm fully in favor of child slavery, but not child assassination. You call that fair fighting when you destroy lives of children by cruelly murdering them? Well Well I can tell you that I don't. It's merely the work of devils just like you men are. But you will not slaughter any of the children in this building, and if you do I'll turn over to the child rebels myself."

"What's that you, impudent old fool? Dare to talk to us like that who are soldiers, and we'll run t you through the heart." Said the puffy looking glandelinian in a rage. "Sure I'll talk like that and worse." Answered Mc-Hollister angrily. "Every one of you devils are too u ugly to look at, and I dare you to try anything you like towards."

you big cowards." One of the glandelinians made a rush at him but McHoller eater quickly discharged his pistol, and one of the glandelinians fell head first to the floor. Then as the rest rushed at him he struck his pistol in his belt and leaped straight at the glandelinians, landing a stinging blow on the eye of one, and across the nose of another, sending them both spraw ling. With a roar that was like that of maddened bulls the rest of the glandelinian soldiers swung their swords furiously & hurled themselves at them. Two more glandelinians each got a bang in the ear which sent them down and out, while a third an officer a stinging blow on the chin and another glandelinian a sh arp blow in the belly also sending them sprawling. Another glandelinian soldier got a heavy blow in the back which put him out of business. But the rest of the glandelinians piled onto him, McHoller being on one midst of a whirlwind of fists, and though he ducked in under them down and to guard, and gave him a blow on the side of the jaw in the line of his sabre, saying that sleep, the glandelinians began to strike him with their sabres, saying that he had to give up as he was under arrest. But McHoller, dropping the child rebels, Then McHoller managed to draw two pistols and shot ten of them down, he was at last disarmed. He was in a rage that was something terrible.
As the enraged mob around him saw violet and her sisters standing against the wall looking on with consternation, while the captive children were nearly overcome with sorrow, and then facing the grinning glandelinian soldiers, he noticed the officer who had spoken on the child rebels, app proaching evidently in great excitement....

Violet and her sisters who were unfriended saw that the "Glandelinian officer" was evidently excited about something, and wondered what it could be. They soon found out, for the wicked Glandelinian officer pointing at McHollester with an awful scowl cried out: "Hold that man now that you've got him. That man is a murderer and a -"

"You are a liar I have never been in your army. I was only a child slave manager and I'll prove it." Hissed Mc-Hollister. "I have a mind to make you eat your lying words, and I will yet."

"Don't you dare to threaten that officer," said the soldier. "Or I'll shoot you you rebel."

"Have information that this man McJolleston after joining our child slave cause, went off to the camp of the child rebels last night." Said the officer to his staff as McJolleston stepped back. "And I also have information that he is in favor of the christians who are trying to crush child slavery, and that he has a paper to use as a decoy."

"Where was he when the child rebels suddenly appeared and besied our beautiful factories?"

R'Right among their lines to lead the child rebels right to the factories, and that man is a traitor and I can r prove it." The Glandelinian officer fairly shook with rage as he uttered this sweeping accusation.Violet and her sistersxwore fairly thunderstruck, as they heard the Glandelinian thus accused.

"Your excellency," said Mc-pollster to the main commanding officer with this lying fool will make. know that the spirit of wickedness and of great villany that your excellency have always shown, will allow this charge to go undefended. I may not sit at stake but I'm not afraid of anybody, and if I get into trouble I will really side with the rebels, and even start an uprising of the whole of Galverinia. To hell with child slavery after this. I resign my job."

"He can't defend it, and he knows it," thundered the accusing landolinian officer brandishing his sabre as if he was about to strike at the accused one. "I will admit," said the angry officer again, "that all landolinians who had trust our own god made are traitors, but that fool of a manager is the worst traitor of all, and I have papers to prove it. That is why - ordered his arrest as soon as I saw him enter this building, unseen by others."

CHAPTER THIRTY EIGHT.
Suddenly a small chubby faced glandelinian dressed in the uniform of a price appeared, and hearing the dispute threatened the accusing glandelinian officer himself with arrest himself/ if he did not come forward and prove the charge he had made against McJollister.....

Me-Hollester with being a traitor!"

"So he is," snarled the officer who seemed to be in an unusual temper that day as he had been worsted in a fury of fighting with the child rebels at Bastinado! And I can prove it. He preposterated that he was a child slave manager, a driver of child ren, but he went over to the child rebels and got instructions, and then caused the child slave factories to be attacked and destroyed, and these four children that I brought in here to be executed I caught praying for the child rebels to succeed in their rebellion, and then went he enters with other land Indians he prevents their punishments and chooses the other children from the melindas."

"You must furnish more proof than your own general parius." Said the prince. "More statements are not sufficient. Where are your witnesses that you have?"

"I don't have to have any. I myself saw him go over there. These four sneaks I caught praying to their god to increase the infernal child slave rebellion are his friends."

"What were these children doing before they were seized, or when they were living with their parents. Can you tell me that?"

"Spying on us. At least the little girls did. They got full instructions about our lines of child slave factories, and when they were discovered they tried to run away, escaping even when pursued gloomily."

"We must have proofs of this. It is true that those children, and the <sup>vivian</sup> girls whom I recognize also have spied on us but that does not bring evidence against Mc-Hollister. If all I have to say, those vivian girls are the real spies, but as this man being a traitor would not necessarily prove anything against him as he is not a glandelinian but an Abbeisannian who just aims at being a manager of the child slave factories. And if you say that this man is a traitor, and that the children are spies, how can you prove it with any witnesses?"

CHAPTER THIRTY NINE

VIOLET AND HER SISTERS DEFENDS Mc-HOLLISTER! AND GAINS HIS FAVOR.....

"Because I do not need any witnesses I tell you. I know it because I saw it all myself. Even if he is an Abbeisannian, he is not on our side, at all as I thought he was."

"I ask you if you have any witnesses?"

"I don't need witnesses I tell you, because I heard him say to the seven vivian girls that he was going to the camp of the child rebels to make a bargain with them."

"What little vivian girls do you mean?"

"The Violet and her sisters the daughters of the christian or Angelinian governor Robert Vivian. These are the ones over yonder." Pointing to Violet and her sisters with a black look in his face.

"When was this?"

"The night before the destruction to our factories, and before the child slave rebels came to besiege Aronburgs and Mc-Hollisters factories, where our side lost of the one of the fiercest conflicts of the rebellion with the loss of over 23 $23,456,789 worth of property, and losses of over twenty six men killed, while the rebels lost nothing."

"Where was this?"

"About two miles from this factory...."

"Have you any witnesses?"

"For the conflicts I have, but for the accusation I have not, but is not my word good enough. It always has been. Everybody knows me."

"Johnston Mc-Hollister, have you any question to ask the name's accuser?" Asked Prince G Cannon.....

"No but I have witnesses to prove that he is not so truthful as he seems or claims to be. I will say that now matter how or what he says or where he may get proofs, that I never was among the child rebel camps, and neither have I any information from or for them, and that I have witnesses also that can prove for me that I was besieged for three days by them, and had to yield the children up to them, and escaped with my own life. He is just telling this lie because yesterday I accidentally killed some of his men who were attacking me to force me to butcher some children who had been in my child slave factory."

"Yes Yes and my witnesses are summoned for the purpose of proving that the person who makes these charges is an enemy of the glandelinians as well as of the christians, and that the charge is a plot against us all as well as those against the christians. It is competent to bring this forward. The accuser is not on trial, but he had said that his word is good enough without corroborative proof. I wish to prove the statement false, and to show that the person is not a credible witness, and that hence his charges have no weight."

"General Darius glared at Mc-Hollister, and then Mc-Hollister said quietly:

"Violet and your sisters come forward...."

"Violet and her sisters did so without any fear of the enemy....."

As they came forward Mc-Hollister said:

"You seven little girls were witnessing all the horrors of the child slavery in my factories, and also in the others, also seeing the kidnapping of the children, have you not?"

"We did." Was the answer.

"Who were at the glandelinian committees you saw the children brought before they were brought here?"

"General Darius is the only one we know. We stole to this place and saw the poor children put into a room where those other crowds of frightened children were. The floor was rotten and broken in places, and even in one corner there was a hole as big as the bottom of a barrel where awful smells came from."

The glandelinian officer was observed to turn suddenly pale.

"After we were seeing these things one of your glandelinians came in, killed a little boy, and attempted to make one of the frightened children kill their comrade slaves, but as she would not I heard they cut her inside out while she was yet alive..."

The glandelinian general in a terrible rage shouted: "!!!!"

"It's a lie the whole of it. Where are your witnesses little girls? You can't take the unsupported words of these little Angolinian dogs. If I had my hands on them now I'd kill them in a way that would shock the very devils themselves themselves."

"Every one of you are dismissed to the main council room where we will hear the full of this concern." Said the glandelinian prince. "So are you officers. I don't believe a word of this."

McGillester then seeing himself free on account of the testimony of the vivian girls turned to violet and her sisters and said:

"You were in danger and are in danger of being held here as spies, or on the charge of being spies, but this cannot be proved about you as there are no evidences, and so you are free to do as you like as long as you do nothing rash. I will be glad if you go about the factories, and see that the children abandon their work and join the rebels. I'm through with child slavery for my part. If you succeed report to me. If not it doesn't matter to me. You understand!"

"Yes said violet. 'I'll do all I can and so will my sisters...'"

Two days after Violet who was lying asleep on a hard bench was awakened by a sense of suffocation, and she cried out to her sisters that she was choked. Her countenance felt livid to her, her breathing to was hurried, and each respiration was attended by a crowing sound. Violet had a fit of coughing, and the more she coughed the worse was the suffocation, and she made violent struggles to recover her breath. The cough became so severe that violet's face became purple, and she gasped for breath, and presented all the symptoms of suffocation. A sense of impending danger seemed to seize her, and she grabbed the bench as if for protection. Suddenly as she managed to stop coughing the room was filled with a peculiar shrill sound like a characteristic whoop, which once heard will never be forgotten. It certainly scared poor violet, but now she began to cough, and sneeze together, and her voice became hoarse. She seemed restless, and was very much oppressed, her coughing ceased to be loud and hoarse, and she became very pale, as her lungs pained. Her voice seemed almost gone, her face became thrown back, and she felt like coughing for want of air, and her head was thrown back, and she felt like coughing from her tongue out. The suffering for air became unbearable, and a staggering from the bench as the room appeared in a thick choking haze, she grouped around in the darkness for the door thinking that she had the croup, and knowing the best medicine for it. As she reached the door she heard the crackling of burning wood. Not knowing what it was she threw the door open...

A great sheet of flame belched out at her followed by clouds of ink black smoke. She discovered that the walls on her side of the room were already hot, the inside of the door and part of the flooring was already smouldering, and the room beyond was a seething furnace. With an untold horror violet knew the meaning of that shrill scream. A little girl trying to escape the flames had been burned to death in that awful furnace in that room. She quickly aroused her sisters and got out of the smoke filled room and went into another which was clear from smoke. Violet and her sisters raised the windows, which were without bars and looked out. The whole upper part of the factory on the western side seemed to be a mass of seething leap flames. The hose of one of the Galvianian firemen ran to the roofing flames. The hose of one of the Galvianian firemen ran to the roofing flames. The hose of one of the Galvianian firemen ran to the roofing flames. A long ladder was leaning against the wall, seeming in danger of catching fire at any instant, and six streams were playing on the flames. Another hose crew had directed its stream of water up to a window on the top floor. It was the window out of which the fire poured the most, and through this the hose crew poured the stream bravely.

The coupling of another hose line was being finished at this moment and after the children were taken out the fire was put out, but not until half of the building was badly gutted. Violet and her sisters were on their way to another child slave fact ory when they met the glandelinian Prince Cannon.

"Where are you little girls going?" He asked sternly thinking they were escaping child slaves.

"We are going to another factory, the one we are in is burning." Violet answered.

At this moment Mc-Hollister came up with several men, and striding up to Cannon said:

"Your excellency in that factory over yonder the managers are going to murder some children, because they rebelled from overwork. I thought I'd tell you though it is no affair of mine."

"No indeed they don't if I can get there in time." Said the glandelinian Prince with a scowl, and he at once went over to the factory, and stopped the murderers just in time.

"Bring them to me and I will take care of them myself." Said Cannon. "You men will not kill anybody if I know it."

The glandelinians showed signs of resistance though he was their main commander and the son of his father King Proville. He was not to be trifled with however as they soon found out to his sorrow.

"Reset at your peril." Urd Cannon as he and the other soldiers drew their guns. There was a moment of dead silence. The glandelinian soldiers kept their eyes on their ruler and saw a cloud of perplexity. Then the glandelinians turned to go in another direction.

"Stop there." Urd the Prince leveling his revolver at the wicked glandelinians. "Move an inch and I will fire."

But he had scarcely uttered these words when there came a report like the explosion of a number of cannon. When Cannon and his body guard went to see what it was a blinding flare of flame burst out from a house close by Violet and her sisters, like another explosion and a volume of pungent smoke rolled from one of the win windows. On a treacherous slope of treacherous rubble not twenty feet from the edge of an abyss, not far from the hose house dropping a thousand feet sheer to the rocks below, violet lay on her back, sweat strained and staring, heels and hands dug desperately into the yielding surface, as she measured the inches, and reckoned the moments between a her and death yawning in the abyss just below her. She had been hurled down this slope by the concussion of the explosion.

Slip, slip, slip, slip an inch or two at a time, she slid. Clutch as she would with her bleeding fingers, and strain as she did she could not prevent herself from rolling down, down, down with slow but heart sickening certainty. Death seemed inevitable, but at the hazard of her life little Jennie launched herself onto that death slide, and with courage indescribable carried a rope to her frightened sister, and saved her life, just as her feet reached the brink of that awful dark abyss. Guided by the light of the fire which was now burning the whole house Prince Cannon managed to rescue the two imperiled children by lassoing them. After they recovered from their scare they went with the pris prince into another child slave factory inside of where they came upon an overseer who with others were whispering together about something.

"Is your majesty ready for the strag strangling of these children who rebelled at their machines?" Asked one of the glandelinians. "If so let us do it right now."

"I don't know as yet. You two have been whispering together about something, for a while." Answered the glandelinian Prince nodding to violet and her sisters to leave the room for the present, and scowling at the men at the same time. "Why do you want to strangle them?"

"Mind your own business" Retorted the soldier.

"It's a pretty young guess that it is my business. Do you intend to murder those harmless children?"

"You bet we do." Said one of the soldiers with a snap. "They are impudent little snips, and we have a right to take the pleasure of strangling them to death, and we will do it at any risk."

The Prince took no notice of the remark but smiled and lighted a cigar.

"Well can we do it?" Asked an officer.

"If you are going to shoot them to death I'm not." Said the Prince with a most sorrowful look. "They are the sweetest little children that have ever been captured and brought into slavery, and if I were you I'd let them live. I love them even if they are Angelinians."

"Do you wish to stop us Prince Cannon?" Demanded the soldier with a wicked oath.

"Don't swear like that." Pleaded the glandelinian Prince coaxing as if he was afraid of the "You quiteshook me."

"The chief shook has to come yet. Can we strangle those four children?"

"When I was a little boy I did not like to be murdered." Said the Prince coolly. "These helpless children would not like to be killed either."

Please let them live a little while longer at least two days, and I will plan how cruel a death they deserve. Hanging them will cause them to suffer from worse strag strangulation than the strongest hands can."

The poor frightened children now fell on their knees and begged him not to let the soldiers kill them, but he said nothing.

"I want to kill them now." Said the glandelinian soldier.

"No not to day. Oh will if you are a mist you have got to wait until to night anyway at least." Said the Prince mockingly.

"We want to do it now." Urd the soldier. "And we will, or do so by force. These children caused the fire, and you want them to live. If you won't let us strangle those children we will fight for our rights."

"Though grieved the glandelinian Prince. "I've had enough of this now, and you had better be care careful. I finally say that as long as the children are with me they are under protection. If you mean to disobey me, or offer any resistance you may do so at the risk of your lives."

Oh what a scowl he gave them.

"You infernal traitor." Urd one of the glandelinians.

"Traitor-Traitor." Echoed the Prince looking at the soldiers timidly. "If it comes to being a traitor it is something that I know about children, and of protection the innocent ones need, and if you hurt them why then who then all right, I'll stand and howl like a baby who wants its mamma. I'm too much afraid of you as you are awfully big men." He continued with a sneer. "You are not fit to be called child drivers, but blood thirsty wolves."

The four glandelinian soldiers jumped to their feet white with rage and consternation.

"It's my opinion that he means to save these children and carry them off to the Angelinians," cried one of them fiercely. "I'm not going to be set at defiance by him even if he is the king's son. What do you say Child Kill?"

"I should think that we can make him allow us to shock their heads off," Child Kill said, scowling fiercely.

"And you Hate Innocence?"

"I'm with you," was the reply.

"And you Dumbhead?"

"The same."

"You impudent Prince you see we all agreed," said the first speaker.

"Either let us shock their heads off, or we'll make you."

"Either let us shock their heads off, or we'll make you," said the first speaker. A hot altercation followed, between the four ugly looking Glandelinians in which Child Kill declared that none of them were safe, while so many of the captive children lived. While it proceeded the poor children fell on their knees again, and begged Gannon as best as they could to save them from the brutal Glandelinians.

"You little devils will never leave this place alive," declared one of the four whose name was Gruel-den-Hoff.

"KILL THEM!"

At this the Glandelinian thus named went to the door to prevent the now terrified children, who were crouching together in the corner from escaping. It was a mistaken tactic on their part, because it left the Prince to deal with them singly. But Gruel-den-Hoff was still of the opinion that he could tackle the Prince alone, and get at the children, as he loved to strangle children, and this overconfidence was probably the reason why he did not at once draw a weapon. He saved his life by that forbearance. The Prince's hand was on his revolver in his hip pocket, and had the Glandelinian drawn any weapon the Prince would have shot him without showing any pistol. As it was he answered a last protest from the prince, and letting out a wicked oath made a rush for one of the children, but in the way of the Prince, who met him with a blow from his fist in the rascal's face and sent him staggering back against Hate Innocence. In a moment the scene was one of lively confusion.

Child Kill who was by the door and behind the Prince fired, but in the confusion missed his aim, and before he could fire another shot the Prince flung a heavy chair at him, and while he was dodging it the Prince rushed on him and tore the revolver out of his hand. He was a much smaller man than the Prince who flung him away into a corner like a small bundle of clothes just as Gruel-den-Hoff had recovered himself, and was feeling for his own weapon.

"You won't draw that Gruel-den-Hoff," the Prince snarled covering him with Child Kill's weapon. "I shall fire if you try to." His reply was to whip it out. But before he could level it a bullet from the Prince's pistol broke his arm. He cursed the prince furiously as he rushed forward and kicked the revolver out of his reach, as he was striving to pick it up with his left hand.

"The children must not live," he called and the latter having plenty of pluck came at the Prince again like a vicious bull. But he was unarméd. So the Prince allowed him to come close up and then caught him by the throat so tightly that his eyes bulged and his tongue protruded, and hurled him back again Gruel-den-Hoff who now held an ugly looking knife in his hand. Then the Prince picked up the other revolver, and stood with his back against the wall.

"Don't try any more of your tricks with me," he said. "I can use these guns better than either of you. Put that knife down Gruel-den-Hoff unless you want another proof that I can shoot straight." He hesitated and scowled at the prince threateningly. The prince leveled his weapon and with a curse the wicked rascal threw the knife away. Seeing that his subjects were cowed he left, Violet and her sisters following him outside. Not long after his departure a Glandelinian captain entered followed by a squad of soldiers in handsome uniforms. They were amazed when they saw a number of children saying their prayers, and with awful oaths the soldiers surrounded the children, and one of the fiercest soldiers who had a coiled rope upon his arm gave an order, and the soldiers led the children out of the house, and to a tree laden with blossoms which stood against the wind on the sea front. Glandelinian officers were collected about it smoking air cigarettes and talking. Violet and her sisters knew that the wicked Glandelinians were going to hang the poor children, and their faces became white with terror, and the little girls longed for their friend by Glandelinian to come and save these children.

A tall lieutenant came forward with the air of a man who had no time

THE VIVIAN GIRLS.

A tall lieutenant came forward with the air of a man who had no time to waste. The chief leader gave his orders, and a squad of soldiers swarmed up the tree and arranged the noose over a branch and before Violet and her sisters could utter a word dropped the noose from above and around the necks of one of the children. The officer then cried an order, and Violet and her sisters were conscious of a burst of laughter as the children were dragged horribly from the ground. The poor children were aware that they were swinging, swinging. The tight grip of the rope seemed to force their tongues out of their mouths, their necks pained fearfully, and unbearably, and their eyes seemed ready to fall out of their sockets. They could see the merciless faces looking up at them, then something like a red curtain seemed to drop before their eyes, and their hearts seemed to beat violently. Bells seemed to be ringing in their ears, the wind seemed to become a tempest and howled screeching in their ears, then they knew no more. Something like cold water splashed into their faces. The sun seemed to dance, a vast ball of fire which was being rolled up the slope of blue ether by strange black figures of Ghouls or Gnomes. Their eyelids fell again. Then they remembered that they must be dead. They remembered the soldiers with the rope and imagined them staring up at their little bodies which swung among the blossoming branches above them. Suddenly hearing came back to them, then sight, then afterwards pain. They became aware of two men, one of whom was sprinkling water in their faces from a bucket and murmuring:

"And they would even hang three poor little girls."

From all of which the children now believed that they were not dead after all. Their necks were swollen and bruised, and one of the men in a general's uniform was rubbing their necks with herb oil. In an hour they were able to get up and two men carried them to a place where they would be safe from the glandelinians. At the same time this happened Violet and her sisters had set their gaze on a horrible scene before them in a long and serpentine form its face livid with baffled venom and snarling and roaring like a wild beast. It was a young glendelmonian creature who had attacked the men who hanged the little girls. In one instantaneous moment it had turned savagely upon the nearest glandelinians striking blows right and left with its two wing wings, and though missing them sent an officer to the floor with a crushing blow in the chest then grabbing him in its claws tore his throat and abdomen open so that his entrails were exposed to view. Then this creature sprang over the dead man and charged toward a number of the overseers who were about to hurl pieces of lumber at her hurling them to the ground with broken skulls, jaws, and ribs. One of the officers seeing the commotion drew a revolver and fired at the creature, but missed, but nevertheless dodged into the bull building where the creature finding it could not get at him flew away. When the other glandelinians recovered from the scare and excitement the dead man lay on the floor face downward with his entrails half out of him or his body, while the blood was dring a muddy brown upon his face, body, and head. All the men were startled by the look in his half closed eyes.

VIOLZ AND HER SISTERS HELP IN THE INSURRECTION.

Two days afterwards the child rebels had captured a child slave factory under the management of a man called Boobhead. Little Angelina Aronburg, was backed by several friendly glandelinian soldiers who had he, helped her to capture the place and she recognized Boobhead as the glandelinian who had caused her more sorrow than all the child slave horrors combined.

"S" "Ha. So you have gotten the best of me after all at last I see." Said the prisoner as the officers crowded about. "You were slaves at your own free will, and now you are grumbling because you have to do a little work for your living."

Little Angelina Aronburg who recognized the man stood forth before them all with blazing eyes, and struck him in the face with the palm of her little hand administering slap after slap.

"Liar." She cried shrilly her eyes dding with tears. "Liar, and coward, and thief. I have a mind to put you in a place where you put me when I was in your power."

For a moment the glandelinian officers stood dumbfounded, staring at the wrathful little girl, and equal amusement was seen on the faces of Violet and her sisters who were there at the time witnessing the capture of the wicked child slave boss, and the glandelinian overseers at this sudden and violent denunciation.

"You shall pay dearly for this Angeline!" He shouted in a threatening voice. "It would have been better for you to have been drowned with your youngest sister." A torrent of abuse broke from him but his voice was drowned in a roar of execration from the officers on shore, and within half an hour the boat came alongside Boohenda ship. Violet and her sisters without giving a second thought to the wild threatnings of their friends bitterest enemy, went into the house with the good glandelinians who sought the Prince, and related to him what had happened.

"That man is a cruel glandelinian!" said the Prince shuddering as the memories brought back by the story came to him. "He will do us all the injury he can for revenge." The little girls as spent a couple of days with the good glandelinians he, helping them free as many child slaves as possible, and also heard that another siege of some child slave factories was already being effected. The children had enough food, help, and provisions to keep up the siege for a long time without suffering from want of hunger, but those besieged could not get a bite and the starvation of the besieged was something awful, and they had to give in or die.

CHAPTER XLII. BOOHENDA ATTEMPTS TO WRECK HIS VENGEANCE ON THE VIVIAN GIRLS.

The next day the Prince told Violet and her sisters that there were several gay seats near the city, and decided to show them where they were. It was a long days walk along the seashore, and they had to start early to get there before night. They walked on steadily during the cool breezy hours making only brief halts to rests. As they neared the main beach Violet saw the dark flanks of precipitous hills upon whose summits sometimes there showed huge columns of steam from volcanic matter rising into the still air like the smoke from mysterious altars. They met many cruel looking men, but they did not offer to do any harm, except grin and make sport of the poor Vivian girls. At the foot of the hills a cloud of steam arose from the ground and swayed weirdly this way and that, with the cool refreshing breezes, from the sea which was getting rough. This was Fyran fountain the bed of the greatest geyser in all the country of Glandelinia, besides which was a rude hut of wood, and turf which they walked up to and entered.

The next moment a stunning blow laid the Prince senseless. Then two hard powerful hands closed around Violet's throat so tightly that her face turned fairly purple, and her tongue stuck out as she uselessly gasped for air. She tried her best to tear away that awful grip that seemed to be crushing her neck but the grip tightened so much that she fainted. When Violet came to herself again she experienced a horrible sensation of sickness, and pain in the throat, and an oppression in her breathing. She seemed in the grip of some night mare, and did not at once recognize her whereabouts. Until suddenly it came back to her, and with a shock of horror and alarm she struggled to arise. In vain. Her feet and hands were fast, each of them separately tied with cord, and the cord fastened securely to a short stake that was driven in the ground. The ground itself on which Violet and also her poor sisters lay was warm, almost hot, and a choking sulphurous steam arose from its damp surface. Violet and even her sisters who had not also recovered recognised with a pang of despair that they lay helpless upon the very brink of the awful geyser. Raising her head without an effort Violet saw the cement like silica that formed the geysers bed, slope away at her feet to the wide boiling pool, in whose depths lurked those mysterious forces of the underworld, which periodically hurled from the well of the geyser vast white columns of scalding hot water and clouds of foam to the height of three hundred feet. She could even see the shining surface of the pool itself less than thirty yards away. A harsh laugh sounded behind her and turning her head she saw the gaily figure of Boohenda. If she had felt despair before, her heart now sank lower than ever, to know he herself alone in the merciless hands of the man, whose savage anger she had so recently provoked. Now noon was advancing, but this time there was no hope of friendly rescuers to snatch her and her sisters from the doom which started them in the face. Boohenda's first few words increased her fears. "It's my turn this time Jennie via Vivians! And there are more ways than one to the shore for a man who was born on this coast. Perhaps you had thought you had frightened me out of Andran, when you saw my boat hauled alongside my ship!"

He stood staring down at his victims who lay without answering.

VIOLET, AND HER SISTERS SET ON GOOD FOR EVIL.

CANNON SHOWS A THING OR TWO.

The little girls were tugging unavailingly at the restraining cords, and Boobhead laughed again. It was four o'clock now and he continued;
"It was four thirty if I remember rightly that this geyser used to spout. Well its now five minutes after four so you will not have long to wait. If it does not spout by four thirty I shall force it to, but I am very much afraid she will Jennie, very much afraid. You will notice." He added with a horrible smile "That I have placed you well on the leeward side so that you will not have to shiver long, when she spouts. You will be boiled all at once--- done to a turn Jennie. And so will your sisters. What do you think of it?"

The perspiration stood in great beads on the faces of poor Violet and her sisters, while their breath labored painfully in the sulphuric fumes.

"Murderer!" Gasped Jennie. "They will crucify you for this."
"Oh no they won't said Boobhead cheerfully. "I'm not quite a fool Jennie. After the eruption I shall untie your body, and those of your sisters, and if anybody should come this way, which you know is doubtful, it will appear that you and your sisters have been unfortunately surprised by the geyser, which is a thing that might happen to any one. Upon my word I'm inclined to envy you."

"Why so?" Asked Jennie.
"It seemed to her that the stake which held her right arm pinioned, moved slightly under her tugging, and a faint hope sprang in her heart, that by holding her enemy in talk she might yet with a sudden and swift effort release herself, or at least win a swifter and less awful death.

"Why so?" Said she.
"Well" Said Boobhead "You know the old rhyme;

"Wash in Freyas Fount,
And know what is weal
And what is woe."

You are about to wash in this geyser, and I hope it will make you wise. You will also learn how it is to die."

"You will also learn wisdom wisdom here." Cried Jennie in despairing-wrath. "When you who also robbed my own poor father, when you wounded in the battle of Adrian wickoy, and slaughtered Angelina Aronburgs sister in cold blood have cruelly murdered his daughters, will you dare to pass the night besides our bodies? There is another verse of the old song which says:

"Sleep by Freyas boiling bed;
And hear the whispers of the dead."

"I do not envy you, the whispers that may come to your guilty soul, Boobheads, coward, and thife thief, and murderer."
"Hold your tongue, and don't be yelling so loud or I'll check you again." Cried Boobhead.

He waited for a while staring gloomily at the geyser, then peering close in the fading light, and toward the direction of the besieged glandelinian armies.

"It's after four thirty o'clock," said he with a cruel smile. "This old geyser is quite late this afternoon."

He came up to poor little Jennie and without any signs of mercy, cruelly and deliberately kicked her in the side as she lay helpless on the ground.

"That's for sticking up for that little Angelinian Aronburg spy and rebel when she called me a liar the other day, and that-----" He kicked Jennie cruelly in the face. "Is for that lump of rotten fish they throw at me."

Then he took from his pocket a piece of flannel rag, and tied it around her nose and mouth. Instinctively struggling to free herself at the cowardly attack, and to tear the rag away for she was suffering for want of air, Jennie felt the stake wrench quite loose at her right hand. Another pull and her hand would be released. Boobhead turned and dragged forward an open box of soft soap. If turf or soap is thrown into a geyser, well it produces an eruption artificially, and for this reason it was formerly a practice of guides to throw great masses of turf into certain geysers for the amusement of tourists. At any moment now, Jennie who was suffering terribly from suffocation caused by the flannel around her mouth and nose, knew the already overdue fountain of boiling spray, might spring hundreds of feet into the air, and could her and her sisters to death with its fearful flood.

In the awful tenseness of her emotion and suffering for want of air she fancied she could hear the furious preliminary bubbling that heralds an eruption and she prayed inwardly. Boobhead came staggering back under the weight of the turf a whole armful. Keeping carefully to the windward side of the boiling pool, he flung it in, and retreated to a safe distance, and stood and waited. There was an angry bubbling, and suddenly the whole surface of the pool seemed to be thrown up several feet. The waters subsided again but a vast cloud of suffocating steam rolled across the spot where Jennie and her struggling sisters lay. Fiercely, wildly he struggled, and her right arm came free. The steam passed away, and her enemy saw her striving to get off the rope or rag that had now smothered her until she became weak, and her lungs pained unbearably, her face being fairly purple from the suffocation. The pool continued to bubble ominously, and now as the suffocation was about to overcome her, Jennie had got her clasp knife and cut off the rag, gasping for breath Jennie strove to cut out her bonds while the geyser still remained quiet. Jennie now got free, and helped her sisters Violet and Joice nearest to her as quickly as she could. Boobhead realized that Violet and her sisters might be on the point of escaping through the cords with which they had been bound were tough and not to be cut in a moment. As Jennie fell flat on the ground gasping for air which she had not wholly recovered, Violet went to the aid of Angeline. Running up the slope, and to the box of soap he hurried back to hurl it in the pool. Violet striving desperately with the last of Angeline's bonds but gave herself up for lost. Boobhead was within three yards of the pool, when there came another warning splash from the center of the pool, and in the gathering dark, a momentary white turmoil showed on its white surface while a thundering noise proceeded from it. With a cry of fear, he dropped the box of soap, but in the very moment of turning to flee, his foot slipped on the smooth surface of silica, and falling onto the slope he rolled downward toward the pool, clutching wildly but in vain at the treacherous surface of the slope.

Angeline her last cord severed, staggered to her feet, and stood horror stricken, with her sisters watching with bated breath, unable notwithstanding their imminent peril to withdraw their eyes from that struggling figure. Lower and lower slid Boobhead, and suddenly a frightful yell told violet and her sisters, that their enemy had reached the boiling pond. At that horrible, almost inhuman cry, the sea spell that bound Violet and her sisters was broken. Snatching up Jennie who was still lying down gasping for breath, they ran at full speed up the slope to the safety of the windward side of the geyser. Was it the echo in their ears of the dreadful cry, or was it possible that Boobhead was still screaming, in the awful pond. Violet and her sisters trembling at the narrowness of their own escape, told themselves that no one could fall in the geyser and live. Yet the screaming still rang in their ears. It must be that Boobhead had gotten out of the pool again, and lay helpless on its hot edge.

In the darkness Violet and her sisters stood still where they were, torn with conflicting impulses. It seemed too much that they should be called upon to throw away their lives for such a heartless glandelinian officer. Again came the frantic screaming of terror and agony. Rarely before had they known the geysers daily eruption to be so long delayed. When it came it would come in a moment.

The struggle with Violet and her sisters was fierce, but short. They except Jennie who was still gasping for breath, descended the slippery slope, but with care, and seeing a dark mass huddled on the edge of the pool, they seized it, and began dragging with main force. So hot were Boobhead's clothes that the hands of violet and her sisters were almost scalded as they pulled at them. It seemed to them an eternity of terror, as they slowly dragged their enemy up the slope.

"Ah how I suffer!" cried Boobhead in a voice made unnatural by severe pain. Suddenly there was a rumbling like loud undergrow underground thunder followed by a long hissing noise. The geyser had at last broken into eruption. A long white column of hot water towered high into the air, rising and falling, splashing fountain like in a cloak of foam and steam. With a loud splashing it collapsed on itself then sprang again from the pool, to its full height foaming and hissing. The spray was flung by the incessant wind in masses over the spot where a few minutes previous Violet and her sisters had lain bound. Boobhead lay shouting and groaning in agony on the top of the slope where violet and two of her sisters had laid him. Violet was at a loss. She knew that after such a scolding as he had received, the glandelinian would probably die in a few hours, if not within a few minutes. In the lonely hut within their view there was no remedy for such an emergency as this, but they half dragged, half led the wretch to the hut, and managed to lay him on a low army cot.

"Listen!" said Violet standing by him. "I and my sisters are going to the christian lines for help. I will leave this food beside you, and you must stay here." "Oh don't leave me Violet, my dear, and your sisters. I ask you all to forgive me, I am a dying man. Ask it of you."

Violet and her sisters looked down upon their former enemy, a man, a glandelinian who was enemy no longer. Pity was in their blue eyes.

"It is little harm you have done us," Violet answered. "Though much you have tried to do. We forgive you very willingly, but if some of us at least do not go for help, you will certainly die."

"I dare not die alone in this dreadful place," groaned Boobhead. "Stay by me for mercy's sake. Stay by me."

He besought so earnestly, and in such fear and pain, that Violet and her sisters decided to stay, though one of them should go for help. Violet was going to fall on her knees to pray for the injured man, when the house was shaken by a volcano of flame and din. A suffocating odor threatened the little girls and the man with swift destruction. Angeline went flat to the floor, where she lay gasping, and she could not speak, but seemed to be strangling. Violet had all but fallen, but managed to keep her feet. She was dizzy though as was her sisters behind her, from a sweetish sickening smell that was in the air. Violet and Jennie both dizzy from the scattering fumes of ether were about to lift Angeline when Joice cried:

"Don't lift her. Haul her walk!" And she herself sprang forward to support Angeline on one side. They led Angeline outside, though the poor little girl was still gasping as though she would strangle to death.

"Anything to make her breathe to make her fill her lungs with air," said Joice, and they began to puphandle Angeline's arms. Joice at the same time slapped her back as hard as she could without hurting her, to make her cough. Under this combined treatment Angeline soon began to feel easier. Violet and Jennie also finding their dizziness vanishing as they expelled the ether from their lungs and replacing that stifling stuff with pure air looked around to see what had exploded. Angeline was now leaning against a tree, and taking deep breaths, while Joice explained briefly what had caused the trouble when the ether bomb went off.

"Ether is the worse stuff to catch fire, that there is outside of gun-cotton or anything like that," she stated. "Just the instant ether catches fire it explodes with terrific force. When it explodes wither breaks up into water and Carbonic gas acid gas. It was the Carbonic Acid gas that strangled Angeline. She would have died if she had not gotten air into her lungs soon."

"What?" muttered Violet. "I never knew that Carbonic Acid Gas could travel like that before."

"It would not," said Joice. "With anything less than the force of the explosion behind it. But the explosion just drives the Carbonic Acid Gas into a person to stay. It's a mighty easy way to kill anyone, and Angeline had one chance in forty in coming through alive. It surely scared me. I'm sure the besieged glandelinians are hurling ether bombs upon the christian batteries, and that one exploded near here."

"But what did we breathe in, that was so sweet and sticky the ether?" Catherine demanded.

"Yes, some of the ether that was blown away before it had time to explode. The enemy are probably hurling ether bombs upon the christian lines." They now went into the hut, and finding that the man could walk a little, now took him out of the hut which was blazing furiously. By bravery and efforts they managed to bring him within the christian lines a portion of which was also besieging Cromer Andean now, and he was sent to the soldiers base hospital.....

It was one hour later that Christmas Eve that general Cannon appeared his head wrapped in bandages. He was very angry and wanted to know who struck him on the head and carried them away from the christian lines, but the little girls not knowing the man's name said they did not know. He suspected that they were shielding something, for he knew their gentle nature, but as he only intended to punish the man for their sake, he did not say anything more. As Violet and her sisters again entered the enemy's lines, and were going about in another factory in their hiding corners and nooks they were suddenly startled by the sudden beginning of the most heavy firing, and yelling, and screaming of children, and believing that the foe had attacked some portion of the christian line at Eva Grania the little girls listened, expecting that it would soon cease, but instead it increased so fiercely, that the little girls began to believe it was something worse than a battle raging. However it did soon or cease but gradually, and at last the thunders of cannons roared to add to what had been slackened in musketry and so loud was the clamor that the little girls realized that there was no sleep for them that night. Then as they were listening closely to other sounds as well they were suddenly aroused by a series of loud crashing detonations, yells, screams for mercy, and rushing sounds, or noises, as if a series of assaults were being made against the doors of the factory. Springing up they ran to one of the windows, forgetting that they were recklessly exposing themselves to the view of either the glandelinian slave drivers or to the assailants themselves who may shoot them down by mistake. Along the window fronts there was a constant rattle of rifles and pistols, the men inside the building firing upon the assailants who had already been repulsed a number of times with heavy loss.

The christians were in the streets of Evangelinia Grania having broken through the barriers, and were storming all the factories simultaneously. Violet and her sisters soon realized that the factory they were in was being attacked by soldiers led by child rebels, but who their leader was they could not ascertain. Staying by the window for a minute Violet and her sisters saw a swarm of Abyssinkilians led by young boys and even girls make a desperate assault on the doors, with axes and market butts, but scores were shot down some of the child rebels with them.

Hastily stealing away without being seen the Vivian Girls went down the hall to see if they could make their way out of the besieged place, before the Angelinians began to bombard it with cannons and grenades which they were preparing to do, but in vain as every door was securely fastened by the glandelinians against the assailants.

"Where is that infernal din coming from?" "Asked one of the glandelinian officers coming up the hall at that moment. "Sounds like the child rebels were leading the christian upon the factory."

"They are and by the sounds I hear there must be other great fights somewhere, but what is going on I don't know" "Add another officer.

"The way it sounds I believe the whole streets of the town is swarming with Angelinians who have broken our lines at one point, and they are attacking all our factories" "Was the first general's rejoinder.

Suddenly three more officers came in and ordered some of the men to follow them, saying that the assailants were going to cannonade the factory. Violet and her sisters realizing the danger decided to follow these glandelinians and slip out unseen if possible, and before they went they gave a pleading look toward heaven asking god to help them to escape the frightful turmoil if possible. As the little girls followed the glandelinian officers secretly one sowed at the assailants who were trying to force their way in the windows but said nothing. It was the same old glandelinian called Aronburg, and after they were outside and away from the turmoil and far from the shrieking conflict, the little girls went off somewhere else, hearing some officers blaming them for the failure as it seemed of the glandelinian rebellion, declaring that the vivian girls helped the rebellion of the child slaves. Fortunately they did not see Violet and her sisters. The man now had his intention on his own officers, and soon they were talking together in a low whisper, but Violet and her sisters who were listening in hiding could not understand what they were saying. Below under the factory was a cellar, which was used in case a typhoon would arise. Aronburg was always called a city of hurricanes for they came often and were unusually severe. To this the little girls had went, but before they reached it the distant conflict seemed to increase, then came a fearful and tremendous roar of hundreds of explosions incessantly, and for several minutes horrible shells hovered over the factory screaming like demons, and bursting with heavy detonations. It was fifteen minutes before they reached the cellar and then heard the conversation of the officers. Then there was three awful volleys of grenade explosions, which seemed to roar like violent thunder, only to be succeeded by three others, which seemed to unite into one prolonged roar that seemed to make the very city of Aronburg tremble. Just as they entered the cellar, Violet and her sisters saw a most horrible sight. The place was filled with murdered bodies of little children. Violet and her sisters saw that the Angelinians and child slaves were in awful peril for the glandelinians knowing that the assailants were on the point of winning the victory, decided to put as many to death as possible before they won.

Violet and her sisters were horrified to see innocent children killed by such wicked men as these, or even in such a way as these dead ones. But for the poor children, escape seemed to be utterly impossible unless God alone with his heavenly ones came to their rescue. A great screaming suddenly filled the air and a grenade approached the cellar door this being thrown by one of the child rebels. A horrible detonation told the awful truth that it had missed the cellar door, and burst inside the factory killing a score of the glandelinians inside, and injuring a score of the frightened children who had tried to flee from the missile. Six glandelinian officers had also been killed, who had been with the helpless children on every side. Another screaming told that more grenades were roaring over the factory, and these extraordinary grenades, threw the children in the factories into a panic. In such danger from the violence of the attack the proposed child massacre had to be abandoned as too vigorous defense had to be made to hurl back the desperate assailants. There was excited cries and yells, and curses seemingly in every direction, and in a moment with no thought for the helpless children every glandelinian soldier or child slave boss were now bring themselves upon the rebels and Angelinians, and the conflict became terrific. The terrific cannonading of the bursting gun grenades was increasing and coming more often crashing through factory windows and through walls in quick succession, and producing a thunderous roar. Violet and her sisters had now left the cellar as a grenade had crashed its way through, and yet they feared they would be killed by one of them yet and regretted they had left the christian lines on such a bloody night. At each violent detonation the streets seemed to tremble.

For here Violet and her sisters were in peril from the storm of grenades, and when they had reached a safer quarter whom should the little girls meet but King Cannon who was leading up a troop of Abbeismians. Oh how glad Violet and her sisters were to see him on such a noisy night. He told them where he had been, and why the factories were in such peril. The Angelinians and child rebels lost three assaults or battles that they had fought on that one evening, and now several factories had been recovered, and Angelinia Aronburg with three other leaders wounded with over 6,789 killed and nearly 10,657 injured, while over 56,789 of them were taken prisoners, their total loss being over 74,235. Many of the children who were prevented from being rescued were sentenced to be massacred on the charge of being traitors as they can't get away from their dangerous enemies, but such massacres had not occurred as the foe relieved no opportunity to do so as Violet and her sisters horrified at the results had told general Cannon all about it.

"Do you really believe in God?" "Asked Violet in something of a whisper.

"Yes indeed" "Answered Cannon. "King King glandelin of glandelinia though he is my cousin is my bitterest enemy but as I am King of Abbeismia and under the instructions of the Pope, I will make the whole war deal heavily on glandelinia as soon as I can I will for the sake of your father, and because I love you, and will protect you children from the foe, and if you ever get captured by any of the wicked Calvinian governors, and threatened with slavery like these other children, I will do all in my power to force them out with the help of the Calvinians. I love also the faithful Calvinians, and as I know the glandelinians have caused the Calvinian people great sorrow because of the child slave horrors, and they must have gone crazy with rage that is the reason they are swelling the angelinian armies to overwhelming numbers. The Pope had advised Calvinia to make war on Glandelinia at any cost for the whole christian world is in favor of Angelinia's cause as none of the nations stick up for child slavery."

Violet and her sisters knew that Calvinia was not a foolish nation, and decided that she ought to punish glandelinian good and proper, as she was more responsible in her efforts to down child slavery than even Angelinia was.

"Why do the glandelinians Butcher the little girls and boys?" "Asked Violet sadly.

"They hate the children of their enemies, and also they cruelly slay or brutalize them for pleasure. I find fault with that alright, and I fear it will bring on some great events in this war yet. For I can feel it in my heart. Even though the war had sprung into existence, the child slave horrors are worse now than they were before the war broke out."

"I know the real cause of the child slave rebellion that existed before the war itself" "Said Jenda.

"What is it?" "Asked King Cannon, looking down into her pretty innocent face. "It was because the child slave masters disturbed their peace" "Answered Jenda sweetly. "They also tried to make hundreds of thousands of the poor unhappy children work day and night, without any sleep or anything, i. out for days, and the elder children being mostly of the fugious Concoctinian race, started a furious rebellion. They also have set many of the glandelinian schools on fire, and destroyed a whole lot of property."

So then gave the full account of the child slave rebellion as Annie Aronburg had told her, and Cannon seemed to realize this. He always disliked the glandelinians on account of his misfortune when he was a little boy, and also knowing their awful cruelty to little children, and knowing that they were enemies of God.

One thing good about them was that they were mostly all crazy for hard labor, and seldom a weak or lazy glandelinian had violet and her sisters overcozen. All of the glandelinians, men or women, were very powerful in strength, nearly like small giants or prize-fighters, some yet stronger than Jim Jeffries. Gannon himself was a very tall and strong man, so strong that he could carry violet and her sisters all together. But also he seemed to be the boldest of all the men they had ever seen, and was often cruel in his dealings with the child slave cowboys who were enemies of Abbie Anna. He had no faith in the cruelty of children, or child slavery, and was cruel and merciless to the men whom he caught striking them a blow. He would have them shot sometimes, or would do the work himself in good and short order.

"Well!" He said frowning. "If the rascals are going to keep up this child slavery I will not stand it. Either General Robert Vivian, or his brother must put a stop to it, or I will myself. But as long as you little chubs remain in this region of horror, I'll have to remain to protect you myself. But don't say anything about it to General Jack Evans, or that I'm the King of the Abbieannians for it will only induce his jealousy. I'm sure, and if I'm known around here by the foe it may increase your danger of being suspected as spies, and you may meet your destruction, for the glandelinians would do anything in their efforts to hold me from committing any rescue. If once the wicked glandelinians know that I'm King Gannon of Abbieanna, and that you little girls are under my protection, and are spying about their factories to night, they will seize you from me in a cautious manner, and then you will surely be lost, and I may only find your mangled remains."

"I'll not say a word!" Declared Violet. "But the cruel men I fear might find out any way I think, and I believe that if you-----" Suddenly five hideous men rushing upon them, and not seeing Gannon in their blinding rage as they had heard the conversation, and with their guilty feelings of strangling the children, made a dive at violet and her sisters. Gannon swung around in a rage and standing between the children and the furious glandelinians folded his arms.

"What do you want?" He demanded fiercely as the glandelinians drew back in utter dismay at seeing him and a squadron of cavalry at his heels.

"We have heard your conversation, and now know why these children are here, and we want to kill these seven little girls." Said one of the wicked glandelinians with a snarl. "And we will have to do it despite the squadron you have to help them."

"Well do it at your peril!" Cried Gannon drawing his sabre and brandishing it furiously in their faces. "You are my prisoners instead and if you make resistance I'll order my men to cut you down."

The glandelinian soldiers in their guilty rage and temptation, were at first utterly reckless there being about a score of them entirely, and one of them made a rush at Gannon with his own sabre raised to deal him a blow, while the others with wicked impressions went again at the little girls. Gannon managed to wave his sabre so furiously in front of him that they were held at bay, until Gannon managed to draw his pistols.

"Now advance at your peril!" He cried fiercely. "You are my prisoners."

"But if General Manley knew of this, and found out that his King's own cousin was refusing to allow us to put the spies to death he would."-----

"Fiddlesticks!" Interrupted Gannon. "I don't care what King Glandlin knows, says, or wants, and I'll have my wish if I have to kill you men for it. You are prisoners and don't dare offer any more resistance. And tell Manley to go and hang himself also. Now then attention, right about face, ad march between the cowardly soldiers double quick time, or I'll order them to shoot every one of you!" The Glandelinians saw nothing else to do but to obey, and they wheeled about after surrendering their weapons.

"March!"

"Onto some of my men's horses and follow us back to the christian lines. This is no place for us. We will return to the lines for the enemy's attack upon your fathers' lines is quite rough to night. And it is already nine o'clock...." Violet and her sisters were helped onto seven new horses, and then the whole squadron with the prisoners went hastily for the christian lines. Gannon noticed that the sound of distant firing was stronger than before, and he believed that a general battle of the siege was breaking out. The more he gazed into their innocent faces the more he loved them even better than himself. In fact he forgot himself most of the time. Violet had a picture of Jesus Christ in concealed in her waist, and she showed it to him. Being in such a bad section of the enemy infested country, he had never obtained any good books or seen Holy pictures, and he at first did not know what the picture was of.

"Quite a sweet faced man." He said looking at it with simultaneous overwhelming awe, and love. "Is he your father, Robert Vivian?"

"He is my heavenly Father!" Answered violet. "Don't you know him! Haven't you ever seen this picture before?"

First time? Was the brief answer.

"It's Jesus Christ!" Said Jennie looking at the picture with overwhelming love filling her heart. "At least it is a picture of him." "Could you spare it?" Asked Gannon. "It's the only picture I have ever seen, and besides I have never observed a man as handsome looking before." Violet offered it to him, and not long afterward the christian lines were reached. The waves of assault upon General Vivian's lines was quite strong, and violet thought she saw a yellow streak far out on the horizon in the darkness, and looked at it closely. She remembered the yellow or ruddy color she and her sisters had seen at King Gannon's attention to it, but he knew not what it was, but believed that it was a long reflection of a strong string of camp fires far out in the distance.

"I never saw it there before!" Said Violet. "Maybe a big fire is burning, for it glows, and is getting larger." "Maybe you are right, and I don't doubt it the way the snow and wind is increasing!" Answered Gannon. "But I'm not a speculator on fires and do not know anything about that glow, although I must admit I have not seen it there before. It's nearer too I believe." Added Gannon.

"I believe it is a great fire!" Said joice, getting somewhat excited, but not scared one bit. "Once before I saw a glow like that, and it turned out to be a forest fire, and one I would not like to see again." The fury of the blizzard storm was now increasing. Violet and her sisters decided to come as near to General Vivian's fighting line as possible, but was stopped by Gannon.

"Be careful!" He said. "The enemy's attack is getting worse and worse every minute, and the firing is beginning to extend somewhere else too."

Violet and her sisters were however quite close to the scene of activity, and once had to go further back as they could not stand the din of the heavy firing. However from curiosity they did become a little reckless, and going too near to the scene they saw a large wave of glandelinians rushing like a wild king of furies almost upon a portion of General Vivian's right wing with irresistible force. Already the snow was coming down at the rate of swirling clouds, and fearing that the hurricane of battle was about to also break along General Hanson's lines, they again started toward the rear of the christian lines. It was so dark and the snow mark was so thick that they could hardly see their way, and though it was snowing to beat the blizzards of the north-pole, the shells overhead began to flash and thunder in a way that alarmed Gannon himself. Suddenly there was a sharp puff of wind, which nearly carried them off their feet, while at this sudden increase of the wind, the air became fairly white with snowflakes, and steadily the wind became so strong that they could hardly stand up. They had to lean to the lower parts of the swaying trees which twisted and writhed fearfully, the wind at times tearing the bare branches from the trees, and carrying them away like chaff, and flinging clouds of blinding snow at the storm victims. The storm increased, the wind howling like angry wolves and now began to get so strong that violet and her sisters could hardly stand up, and had to cling to some of the strong trees for dear life. Even the snow fell now so thick that violet and her sisters could hardly see anything, and the trees around them were torn of branches by the by the wind that increased furiously making a tremendous howl or screaming roar occasionally, while the great waves of glandelinians frustrated on account of the storm were seriously handicapped, and they rolled forward through the woods, seeking shelter and abandoning the attack for the night. Where King Gannon was Violet and her sisters did not know, but they knew that they were in great peril, for the wind seemed to increase every moment, making a din that became deafening, the snow seeming to hide objects at the distance of a few rods of feet.

Suddenly the little girls were startled by a tremendous roar sounding like a thousand cannon going off in one crash. Violet and her sisters in their terror, glanced back, and saw a great wall of smoke, earth, and snow rising high into the air, and then some of it descended toward them. The cloud seemed to have risen two hundred and thirty five feet high, and the cloud descended toward the ground with the speed of an express train. Violet and her sisters surely knew that they were in a region mined by the enemy, and that they were surely caught in a deadly trap for the enemy were exploding the mines to prevent the christians from advancing which they might do despite the wild fury of the snowstorm.

Violet surely knew that if a mine was under them, and one exploded it would be the last of them, and they said some prayer. The cloud of smoke still hovering so near looked through the snow shroud like some waterfall. Then a big wave of confused glandelinians rolled through the forest at an opposite direction being joined by the first, and then they broke away into the darkness, and receded out of sight without one glandelinian seeing the children. But the next wave of coming glandelinians was more than forty deep. They swept fully through the entire length of the woods hollering, cursing, and swearing, making a horrible roar to add to the howling of the storm. Some of the glandelinians passing had a full chance of seeing the children but fortunately they did not look that way.

552et and her sisters at the time happened to be close to the banks of the great Mo-Holleston Run River and wave after wave of water nearly reached the children as they even poured beyond the beach and beyond, carrying away blocks of ice, tons of rocks, and snow as they receded, but as they did not as yet reach the children, although they were ten feet of them the little girls were as apprehensive. It was not long after when a big surge of water did strike upon them and they were then swept fully into the roaring river. The next wave was not so high but it did not carry the children all the way up the beach, but back further down the river. Oh how cold the water was, but the children did not cry out as they were accustomed to it, and the next moment they were riding on the crest of a higher wave, which carried them toward the shore with the speed of a racehorse. Then they found themselves under hundreds of whirlpools of water of grounded ice and slush on the sandy beach, and being half drowned, shivering with the cold, and gasping for breath, they were again carried out down further by a bigger billow. Choking almost to death by the pouring of the water down their throats, they coughed violently, only to cause more water to flow down, which choked them frightfully.

The wave carried the choking children with tremendous speed, and dashed them against a high pile of rocks, bruising them badly. Before the next furious wave came they clambered to the top, which seemed high enough to be out of reach of the waves. The rocks were slippery with ice and snow and it was hard to take a hold of them. But they simply had to cling to the rocks, the jagged parts, to save themselves from being carried away by the wind. Still choking from all the water that had poured down their throats, they coughed until they were nearly hoarse, and shivered from the cold effects of the ice cold water. Violet had a sink skinned knee, a bruised arm and chest, while also Jennie's chest was badly bruised, and suffering pain in the heart caused by the blow she received against the rocks.

Jennie had a bruised leg and forehead, while Angelina's head was badly bruised, cut and bleeding. Daisy and Hettie escaped minor injuries, but were half drowned from the water they took in. The other little girls escaped unharmed. It seemed now so dark now as the whiteness of the snow pall seemed to lessen it, and the children half smothered by the dashing spray, and blinding snow, saw that the reef was just a part of the rocky shore, where a Galverinian lighthouse stood.

Oh if they could only get out of reach of these awful waves, but it was impossible unless rescue came. Though the snow seemed to be making it lighter, now the storm was not ceasing at all but increasing in fury. As each wave struck the edge of the rocks, the children were enveloped in great sheets of slush, blinding spray and wet slush, the coldness of the water and wind making them shiver like a leaf. The river seemed fairly white with wrathful foam, the spray being carried through the air by the squalls of wind, like blinding showers of icy rain mixed with the flying snow. All around the rocks the foam was boiling, and as each wave struck the rocks they made reports like cannons.

The wind was now getting so strong, that it tore to pieces the clothing of the children, and the clouds of spray was sent by the dashing waves to the height of a hundred feet or more. Violet and her sisters could hardly breathe in the spray and clouds of waving snow, and dreading to smother, they gasped for breath. They could hardly stand it without air any longer, and as they started to crawl up to the still higher rocks, they suddenly heard a great noise, and saw a great mass of water approaching, that was just as high as the very rocks themselves. It approached with a booming roar, and when it reached them, it fairly streamed over making them tremble, and again carrying away the children.

In the meantime King Gannon was surprised when he or any of the searching Angelinians could not find the children after the commencement of the blizzard hurricane, and staggering toward the shore of the wide river in the face of the heavy wind, and blinding snow, he reached its foam flaked beach, and searched the foaming mountains of water for the children by the help of strong searchlights from the Christian lines and with his glasses, but could see nothing but high walls of water! He was three times hurled to the snow by the force of the wind blast, and was forced to crawl along the edge and to the top of the beach, but out of reach of the heavy seas.

The wind screamed shrilly at each squall, and many times Gannon had narrow escape from a falling tree. The wind fairly took his breath away, but with his soldiers he proceeded on his way, but keeping out of reach of the highest waves, which now and then reached far beyond the beach. They always covered the beach with long lines of white foam which was revealed by the following searchlights and the waves appeared to be a block long and twenty feet high and the continuous roar of the surges was deafening. He believed that the children were almost dead, or caught by those great waves. He prayed to God asking him to bring their safe return, or their rescue in time. Getting to a part of the shore where the wind blast was out off by a high bluff, he staggered to his feet and went along a little faster at times mounting a high snowbank. As he approached the high line of rocks nearly hidden in the dashing spray a prey, he came upon several Galverinian life savours.

"Did you see anything of seven little girls?" Asked King Gannon.

"Yes," Answered one of the Galverinians. "They are, or were on those rocks over there at the end of the river, but are not there now. It's impossible to save them by boat, and no one can live on those slippery rocks already coated with a thick sheet of ice."

"But they have got to be saved, and that is all there is to it," thundered Gannon furiously. "I suppose just because you think they are not there you are afraid to chance it and would rather let them drown. Now come and help my men get them out for they must be saved."

The Galverinians made hasty preparations to do as told and one of them decided to go to their rescue himself even if he got drowned for it. Clambering upon the rocks, he crawled along slowly, but at nearly every move he was deluged by clouds of spray. Waves after waves rushed alongside the rocks with a continuous and fearful roar, but he paid no attention to his peril. Once in a while a bigger wave would stream over the rocks, and he himself had great difficulty in keeping himself from being swept away. Now to go back to Violet and her sisters. They had been so exhausted when the big wave streamed over them, that they could not hold onto the rocks, and so again had to yield to the mercy of the wild seas. But the next wave again hurled them on the higher rocks, beyond which the life savor had just passed. Still they were so exhausted now that they believed that they would have to yield to the angry seas again, and be drowned for sure.

There they were, every wave swept over them threateningly, trying to tear them from their grasp grasp on the jagged rocks and still the dashing spray fell on them incessantly, nearly smothering them. Violet was so exhausted now that she could hardly hold onto the rocks any longer, when she saw a rope coming toward her, she front and tied into a noose. Before the next wave could sweep it out of her reach, she grasped it with both hands, and the Galverinian for it was he who had thrown the rope, hauled her to a place of safety. Then as the soldiers left for a while, Violet and her sisters sat on a bench, and shivering with a thick blanket over their knees. One of the Galverinians called Violet over to him, and began to question with terrifying solemnity, punctuating each question with a twist of her arm, and reduced her gradually to screams of pain. He flung her from him with a terrible word, and turned her his unreasonable fury upon her sisters. Then the Galverinian dashed an empty brandy bottle to the floor sprinkling it with ugly fragments of broken glass. He recovered a large fragment, tested it with the ball of his thumb, and ordered Jennie to come over to him. She knew what he wanted to do or proposed to do and filled with great horror, she tried to make a dash for the outdoors, but the man who appeared to be a Galverinian, got her, and placing his rough hands in a death grip on her tender throat choked her so hard that she fainted. He was about to cut her throat with the fragment of glass, when some of the other soldiers unexpectedly threw open the door, and hurled themselves upon the lander in man who really was running his heart with their bayonets. He had gotten in the house without being seen by the former Galverinians and had laid in wait for the children, and made his appearance when the soldiers had left. Then carrying Jennie, he ordered her sisters to follow, and while the others were grumbling to themselves about the wicked glandelinians, the soldiers went out into the dashing wind, and swirling snow. Then one of the soldiers espied another little child, who had been washed up by the waves of the river, which no doubt was doing it's best to wreck the shore with the great mountainous waves. White faced, the little girl was the hue dulled now with the pallor of death, but her face stream with black hair was a mass of cuts and scratches, and her hands looked as if they had went through a meat chopper. But the next wave carried it back to sea, and the soldier lost sight of it.

A few minutes later Violet and her sisters bid good bye to their best Abbeismian friend as he started away on duty, for he had to go back to his country for several weeks, as Angelina was in terrible anger over the situation, and the two Governor generals were holding a debate to decide whether to force the raising of the seige of Ev. Evangelina Crania or not. Violet and her sisters took a last wistful look at their friendly Abbeismian, as he started toward the door of general Haxons headquarters, giving some commands to several of his officers. He was going back to Abbeismia to work for the legis Monato and the child slave conditions, a work of which he had to do, thus compelling him to leave the unhappy little girls behind, among the vicious glandelinians. He had left them their documents a case they would be seized outside the lines and taken as spies, and gave instructions and warnings to a certain Abbeismian officer, for the care of the helpless children, and at heart started on his journey to Abbeismia.

Many of the poor captured children, had been deprived of their mothers, to be cruelly worked to death or slain, the wicked glandelinians having deprived their bodies of warm clothing, and also trying to make them sin, and then kill them afterwards. This brave Abbeismian general in chief, who took care of the little girls kept his word as we will soon see.

"I'm going to make you blow the three other children to pieces before I cut you to death."

"Pull the string." Violet Viryan who was nearest, aimed her pistol at the nearest glandelinian and shot him dead. The other glandelinians with wild oaths made for Violet and her sisters and got shot down by the cavarly men. Then the brave and fearless child, with the help of her sisters, went to the muzzle of the cannons and untied the cruel ropes that bound the poor children to the guns. Other glandelinians who came plunging through the deep snow just then did not do anything to the viryan girls but attempted to seize the rescued children with the purpose of dragging them out of the way of the Angelinians but in vain for the cavarly let go their rifles with perfectly good aim and the children were taken by the christians themselves who then forced their way into the factory <sup>as</sup> in time to see other brutal glandelinians grabbing several helpless children who reeled at their machines, and binding them hand and foot carrying them outside the factory laughing heartily to themselves. They did not go far for they were captured and the children rescued.

as soon as possible. It was still snowing fiercely outside and violet and her sisters had hopes that they would easily see an opportunity to escape the enemy before it was too late. But this time violet and her sisters were so closely guarded that it evidently seemed impossible for them to make their escape, and thus they decided to spend their time in sleep or whatever they could do. So believing that nothing would happen the little girls laid down in the darkest p corner of the place, and fell asleep.

1252 "Protect these helpless children, while I'm away and if you allow harm to come to 1253 them in any way or let them be taken from you in cowardice, general Hanson vivian 1254 on this factor will cause you to pay the penalty of their lives.
1255 But despite their threat Violet greatly dreaded the Abhismanian officer, for he looked 1256 very cruel and fierce like a landolinian in disguise and a child intorher. If his 1257 looks told the truth, they would be in terrible danger of a sure death, or slavery 1258 first, and death afterwards. But as I have to say everything cannot be depended on 1259 looks. He had promised Gannon that he would protect them until they reached general 1260 Evans lines, even with his life, but indeed in a tone that sounded cowardly and 1261 dishonest. But Violet and her sisters had been fooled again, and it was only his 1262 habit in answers. He was as brave as a lion, a true true Abhismanian, and as honest 1263 as a saint, and there was no man who had ever gotten the better of him yet in any 1264 scrap over the protection of little children. Not many minutes after King 1265 Gannon had left violet and her sisters starting out with this Abhismanian had not 1266 been even touched by him, who had even let them take food out of the pantry before 1267 leaving, or anything else they liked to w eat without their asking per fession. It was

"These children and your men have been spying around our factories too many times already, and stayed despite our telling them to go-home. So we have reported this to general Johnston Manley, and he has ordered us glandelinians to slice these little girl spies into minge meat, and cut out their hearts, and show them on pikes to the child rebels."

of course when they heard that they were in danger of being massacred in this way, they and their hearers put out the little girls did not shrink, as they knew that the more severe the deaths the Christians did the greater the reward in heaven. Jennie a little more tender than her sisters was a little more frightened, and prayed the more harder. The Glandelinian holding Jennie now grabbed her by the top of her head drawing it back so that he could cut her throat. But to his utter amazement his sword flew out of his hand, as the Abbissennian officer struck it with his sabre.

"Well you are- -----"
 "You are not going to kill these children." Interrupted the officer drawing his pistol and ordering his men to show resistance if possible. "Put up your swords and surrender yourselves, and stand in line. We outnumber you glandelinian hell hounds thirty to one ad resistance is suicide."

Another glandelinian again lifted Jennie's head, and was about to run the sabre of his arms her throat, when the officer losing his temper at thus being put to shame before his own men shot down Jennie's assailant, and drawing his sabre sprang furiously among the other glandelinians xwinging his weapon furiously about him right and left. He cut some of the butcher down, but in a moment as his men took part in the fight there was a lively mizup. Enraged beyond endurance the Glandelinians piled onto him and his men furiously striking at the Anglianiens and fighting a desperate duel but many received a blow from sabres that sent them sprawling in the deep snow where they lay dead and bleeding. It was a terrible scene of carnage over Violet and her sisters.....

FINALLY they fell asleep, and before they did awaken more glandelinians entered, but without children, and observing the dead bodies of the slaughtered children, dragged them out of the way, and went over to where Violet and her sisters lay. Seeing that they were not out up like the others were, and that they were clothed, the glandelinians knew they were really alive, and not dead at all. However they had thought twice, the foolish glandelinians would have left the vivian girls alone. "Let them lay in this place," said the glandelinian commanding the others. "and we will kill them to night if they are really alive, and only sleeping. Well never mind he suddenly added. "We will open their bodies right now, to make sure they don't live."

The other wicked glandelinians were very willing. They drew their ugly knives, and went over to Violet and her sisters, the main commander putting the point of his sharp sharp sabre toward the middle of Jennie's abdomen, to rip it open, but suddenly changed his mind and got up.

"I don't believe we will do it until we have proofs that they are really alive," said the officer. But the bloody thirer blood thirsty glandelinians fearing they were alive wished to open their bodies, so after some debate the glandelinian commander yielded to their wishes, giving his men the command to do it quickly.

But Violet awoke just in time, and when she saw the glandelinians trying to kill her, and her sisters in such a cruel way, she jumped up, giving a shrill scream that quickly awoke her sisters. The glandelinians laughed as the prettiest of children ran from them, and giving pursuit, tried to catch them but it was in vain. Suddenly another glandelinian came in with three more children this turning the attention of the other glandelinians from Violet and her sisters for a moment.

"Oh please don't kill us in such a way, it's cruel," pleaded one of the children in such a piteous way as to melt a heart of iron. "We did you glandelinians no harm at all, and then yet you kidnap kidnap us to make us work, and when we fall because we are sick or overtired, you want to kill us. If you want to kill us, please don't kill us in such a way. Oh please don't I beg of you."

"If we let you live, I suppose you would try to run away, and cause the whole world to know of this slaughter," said the glandelinian with a scowl that was deadly.

"Oh no, we will kill you all right. No glandelinian christian dog children are allowed to live long if they fail to do their work. The longer you can work, the longer you can live. The christian children shall go first. Now, this prettiest one who is known as Jennie, shall go first. She shall be made to mother to death."

That was all she said for Violet knowing that they or the other children would not receive any mercy at the hands of the wicked glandelinian murderers, plunged her own dagger into the officers abdomen, and before the others made a rush at her, she got the dagger out of the seriously wounded man's belly, and stabbed another. When the third was also stabbed, but still they were in great peril, for the door had been locked again by the guards. They left the seriously wounded glandelinians where they were, and hid in the darkest corner to avoid the other wicked glandelinians who would come in. Others did come in only to take out the wounded bodies or dead bodies of the murdered children. Hundreds came to do this work, and when the day was over all the dead bodies had been taken outside, and burned, and as much of the blood as could be was cleaned up. All day long Violet and her sisters crouched together with the three or four children in the bloodless corner, watching the glandelinians carry out the dead bodies, five or six at a time, that they were suffering from now was thirst and hunger. For two days they had, had not a single bite to eat, of regular good food, and even now when the glandelinians were filled with their horrible labor, which of course they liked to do, they locked the big iron door fast when they left. Jennie was still sobbing from the effects of her fright, and was now crying for food. Violet knew that the room would soon be filled with the bodies of other murdered children before long. They yearned for their own friends and country, or heaven and prayed all the rest of the evening but seemingly without results. But they did not lose their faith in god, and even believed if the rascals did kill them the next day, their prayers for heaven would not be answered.

They could not tell when night came in that dark room, which was only illuminated by a single gas light, which made the shaded parts of the room look very black. But they decided to lay down in the dark darkest corner or where they were hiding and go to sleep if possible, so that they may forget their craving hunger and thirst. Soon the blood covered little bodies were huddled in the corner fast asleep. In their sleep they dreamed that the child rebels were making a furious assault on the factories, and their surrounding walls, and that the places were captured, and they themselves rescued, but when they awoke they found they were still in that horrible room, and there were no signs of child rebels or christian soldiers, and they wished they had at yet asleep instead of awakening so suddenly but saw the fears of the enemy and the hunger and thirst kept them awake. Violet began to feel more thirsty than ever, and so thirsty she became that her tongue was sticking out like that of an overheated dog.

They began to talk excitedly in whispers as they carried the children outside, and they talked so fast that any one would have thought they were silly. Violet and her sisters who followed saw that the children were put into a stopping street car. Then as Violet and her sisters took another car, the glandelinians who were still laughing if the tears ran down their cheeks got on, and ordered the conductor at the point point of the pistol to ring the go ahead bell. Violet's car followed, but the glandelinians did not get off their own until the car stopped in front of a big building that looked like a big prison, and then the children to their sorrow, and terror were forced toward the gates in the walls.

"A-h-h-h," laughed a glandelinian glandelinian "King Cannon, and the so sniping vivian girls and their their guardian cannot save you now, and we will kill them also if they dare to interfere. We have got six hundred children when we wish to put you out of the way because they are not a little able to work any more, and if possible we will make you even do the killing, and also eat their hearts. If you refuse you will die a more horrible death than we have intended to condemn you to. You hear?" The children did not answer, and the rascal continued, "If you do not need to give me an answer now (now) but you will suffer some when I get you inside. You are to keep these keys a little alright whether you want to or not, and I'll make you do it too. Go if I don't."

They now entered the prison house or what ever a person may call a slave pen, and passed through the hall, that were as dark as the fabled caves of orobas, when they entered what was now a slaughter room forcing the children in with them. Quietly Violet and her sisters had followed all this time. Standing in a row, held under cover by fierce looking men were six hundred naked crippled children, most of them little girls. The glandelinians were standing in the rear of the children armed with horrible looking knives, and the more children were more frightened than you can ever think. Grabbing one of the little girls by the neck, with one hand, and nearly choking her, the glandelinian said it with a fierce scowl.

"Now you have got to eat the hearts out of these children, especially this one in front of you, and if you refuse, I'll just see you. You are helpless now with us for we are filled with the determination of having your obediences."

The poor child, overwhelmed with sorrow, sorrow and terror, fell on her knees and as pleadingly as she could, she begged the glandelinians to let her and the other children go. But the wicked glandelinians forced her to take off all her clothes, which she had to do, and drawing his dagger the rascal placed it in her hand and tied it fast so that she could not throw it down then after tying her to a post despite her bitter screaming and struggles, ordered another glandelinian who to bring a child who was going to be killed in front of the little girl. The little girl was utterly helpless, and the glandelinian grabbed the arm that held the yard with the dagger, and as the little crippled boy, struggling as best he could, and screaming, was brought near enough, the rascal's glandelinian decided to try to make the boy commit a sin before murdering him. It was of no use however. Then the wicked glandelinian thought to himself that this child must die of strangulation, before his heart should be cut out. He also decided to make the little girl do the choking, whether she wanted to or not. At this moment was almost escaping her bonds, and tried to make a struggle to get free, when the glandelinians discovered it, and the men overpowered her, and tied her legs together as tightly as they could, and re-tying her to the post. Then another glandelinian grabbed her by the arms brutally. If you my dear reader could have seen the look on the child's face and you had no desire of saving her or the boy then you would certainly be hard hearted. The glandelinians indeed observed that look but laughed, and showed no signs of mercy at whatever. He now placed the little girl's hands around the boy's neck, and then the rascal placed his own on top of her hands. Then the glandelinian pressed his own hands on hers as hard as he could. The little girl did her best to pull away his own hands, and finally when she succeeded the boy was already dead. Not being able to stand such a sight and being too helpless to do anything Violet and her sisters left the place but in going through another slaughter room by mistake slipped on something and were rendered unconscious from some one striking them down from behind. It was an hour before they regained their senses, and as it was now night, the little girls wondered where they were. They could not stand the stench of the bodies of the murdered children, which they had been forced to inhale again and again. All night long they were forced to stay in this place, the doors having been fastened on the outside, and they could not get out.

Again the vivian girls were suffering from the pangs of thirst. Jennie feared that her sister Violet would die of thirst, and so made a search for a drink. (If there was one) which she greatly dreaded she could not find, but it did not take long before she found one, and it had clear cold water too. And Jennie without thinking of taking a drink first, quickly rushed her sister to the sink. Oh how refreshing was that drink, that soothed Violet's thirst. Violet's sisters also took drink, and after they drank a little they wanted, they went back to the dark corner, just as eight glandelinians came in, bringing in eighteen children, and who were screaming shrilly of fight. Violet and her sisters were sorry for the poor children, and she and her sisters decided to save them even at the risk of their own lives. The glandelinians fury struck came rushing in, and tying the children's hands behind them, placed them in ranks. ....

christians had recaptured after being lost again. The children all the ground they had

Then Gannon gave Walter Jennings a roll of paper, and told him to try and go to the Angelinian governments.
"When you succeed tell Governor Vivian that his daughters are in my care, and that were trying to abolish the child slavery."
Walter Jennings proceeded to do this and was off without delay.

GANNON SHOWS A THING OR TWO

"They are sure no end of trouble, and goodness knows they ought to have been dead many days ago. Us Glandelinians have no more time to butcher children as the Calvinians or the Abbeinnians in this region will be hired to do it."
"But these little ones are all right, and if you threaten them like this I will throw you out of the window. The poor little girls are angels to me."

As to say this was an interview with one of the main Glandelinian chieftains, and King Gannon, the Glandelinian chieftain having come to purpose Gannon to give the Vivian Girls up to the Glandelinian Governments so that they could be put to death as spies. The conversation ran thus as:

"Indeed then King Gannon, its angels enough. You have to look after your own armies in Abbeinnia, when I bring mine in on you to drive you out of Calvinia. But of course its no trouble to you as long as you side with all the christian nations and they back you up."
"There now general Gannon," Gannon said coolly: "Talk to me as much as you like by and by. I do not want to argue with a you Omani as new. Some other time will be better."

"If you knew what a menace these Vivian Girls are to Glandelinda, you'd feel as I do and the great Glandelinian general. "They have spoiled from no one factory to another, helped the child rebels win too many victories and so on. For a fact I do not have any evil feelings toward any children no matter who they be but these Vivian Girls are spies and its the duty of all Glandelinians to take such children into custody. In fact I don't wish their death nor do I like to place them under arrest. Its fortunate for them that you are protecting them for it will be an excuse for me to tell the King that I could not get them out of your grasp. In truth you knew that I could if I wanted to but as you was one of my boyhood friends I will as a friend refuse to take them. But don't tell no body as I will get into trouble."
Then standing up from his hardly finished breakfast, General Gannon, placed his hat on and went out after bidding good bye.

Gannon could see that Violet and her sisters were dear little things, so good, and sweet, and loving. Gannon though a born Glandelinian for real, was a man who ever adored poor children. He could have taken any tinkers child in his arms, and carry it home to his own heart and palace just for the sake of having it, and loving and holding it. To the Glandelinians the sight of their enemy King Gannon playing with Violet and her sisters, or holding Violet in his arms, loving her, caressing her and holding her protectively by her tender neck, was as gall and wormwood in their mouths filling them with senseless rage and revengeful feelings. Yet when Gannon had first seen Violet and her sisters deflected pathetic little little girls, in ragged clothes, he could not keep back his craving love for them. They were such beautiful and brave little children, and so wise looking, as though all the sorrows of their world was known and understood by them, and indeed their lives for five years were to be all of sorrow. First the deaths of some of their sisters the parting many times from their dear good hearted loving dady uncle and now. That evening King Gannon took the little ones up to their bedrooms, which of course was his own, spanning the wide eyed innocent faces and combing out the tangles of golden hair, with a feeling of irresistible desire to hug them again and again. He then put them each in a bed, and as there was an extra one, decided to sleep with them, to be aware of prowling Glandelinians whenever they might be. He feared that some Glandelinians would sneak upon them, while he was asleep, so he decided to play a wise game. In that bed room there were a number of empty soap boxes and these he placed on top of one another against the door. Then into an extra bed he went, but before he went to sleep he heard suspicious sounds and sat up to see if his pistols were loaded. As they were empty he hastily loaded one and waited coolly for the intruders. The suspicious sound ceased but he heard some whispering, and knew what they were saying.

They were plotting to steal the children while he was asleep. Suddenly the pile of boxes came down with a crash that shook the room, and awoke Violet and her sisters, she let out a scream. The intruders only finding Gannon awake with a loaded pistol pointed at them. Amazed and swearing the Glandelinians went out but an hour after they cautiously came back climbed carefully up to the transoms and started to pour a bottle of ether into the room but Gannon who happened to be out side at that moment caught them red handed and he pulled them down on their heads. The Glandelinians seeing that it was of no use gave it up knowing that perhaps a third attempt would probably arouse Gannon and then he would go at them like a rearing tornado.

Several hours later Violet and her sisters who were spying on the child labor firms again found that the thousands were at brain and body rack ing labor in the most horrible child factories in all of Calvinia, and that many were pillars. The room was filled or strewn with the bodies of other children and the sight of their gutted corpses filled Violet and her sisters with indescribable horror. Not far from their hiding place were two other frightened little girls whose names were Gertrude and Mary. Mary was the most badly frightened of the three even being afraid of the dark, as many little girls and boys are. It was so dark that Violet and her sisters could not see Gertrude or Mary, but when they heard Mary crying piteously and saw her reel at the machine when they knew that some one else had been over come by the hard work. "Who are you?" Violet called loudly for she knew from the shrieking of the machinery that the person would fail to hear her at the distance they were just then. The child stopped crying when she heard Violet and answered in a piteous tone:

"Its me. Please take me away from this awful place. I don't want to be here where they kill you with hard work. I want to be with the good sisters."

Gertrude was not much scared as she loved to die any death to go to heaven, no matter how cruel it is. When she heard Violet call she also said:

"I'm here in this awful place too. The bad soldiers got the Glandelinians little girls too, Violet and her sisters?"
"We haven't," answered Violet. "And they never shall. We are Governor Vivian's daughters, and we are not afraid of the Glandelinians either and afraid of no quick cruel deaths either though the death the child slaves die here are worse than cruel. The Glandelinians are all butchers and there is no telling what they will do when they get worked up into a frenzy. If King Gannon of Abbeinnia would only stop this cruelty some way I'd be glad."

Gertrude was checked but before they could utter another word a swarm of wildly yelling children rushed in flourishing long knives and rifles. A WHOLE MASS OF THEM rushed in yelling and screaming fiercely and right toward the children and the slave masters. Mary was too frightened to scream. FIERCER and fiercer they yelled, the din also mingled with the deafening crashing reports of the muskets of the Glandelinians who tried to shoot the child rebels down. At the same time furious black objects swarmed about the children seeming to strike in all directions with their long knives. But the mass of black objects seemed to press forward in a body toward the door again brandishing their weapons fiercely, striking against each other or other their sabres making bright flashes or sparks. Despite the dark darkness Violet and her sisters could see yellow objects rushing toward the black ones, brandishing sabres so furiously that they recoiled. All around them, again flourishing their sabres wildly the child rebels swarmed by the thousand, and one by one a black object seemed to fall but the conflict which it really was seemed to grow more fiercer than ever, and the black objects began to hurl grenades. Masses of black objects swarmed into the circles like rats, while a score managed to deliver a volley of grenades whose explosions in that large room made deafening echoes. The place was already on fire at several sections, and hurriedly the Glandelinians who were not in the action hurried the child slaves to the fallen then to the rear exits not hesitated yet and as soon as they were out of the room the loud booming of grenades, and the roar of musket explosion exploded the fiercest attack the child rebels had ever made and all only a few of the Glandelinians with some of the children escaped through the rear despite the bloody conflict raging in the halls which was fairly lighted by the flash of sabres and the black of steel, grenades and the roaring flames.

But on the exit side they also had to use their sabres on scores of desperate boys and girls who rushed forward with the frenzy of demons to rescue the children and they captured many of the rascals only two of them getting away. The two men who had occupied left the scene of the conflict and proceeded on their way to Governor Federal's headquarters. Mary was screaming with fright when the Glandelinians drew ugly knives and threatened to cut her with them. It took them a long time to reach the Governor's palace, but when they reached it, they were admitted through the guard gates by the guards, and unceremoniously the Governor. How glad he was to see the helpless children and how glad he was to get them into his own palace where he thought King Gannon could never make any interference.

"How did you manage to get them out of the besieged factory?" he asked. "We will try to put all the children who refuse to work, or who are not able, to death, but first we will make them suffer. You know about the furnaces don't you? Well rub that powerful lotion on their bodies, and then throw them in."

Gertrude and Mary were quickly stripped of their clothes, and the powerful stuff rubbed on their tender bodies. The furnace itself was in Governor Federal's palace, and in the room next to his. It was larger than the one than that Daniel and his two companions were thrown in and was of tons of white hot coals. It was about two rods wide inside, and seven rods long, and eighteen feet deep. From the sill of the floor to the ceiling. So much coal had been thrown that it reached even higher than the ceiling, and was hot like a small hell. The Glandelinians who went near this furnace, had the same lotion on them that is used to save human beings from suffering from the intense heat. The lotion put on Gertrude and Mary, only protected them from death but not from suffering. Down on the hard stony floor Mary knelt placing her frail little arms tightly about the Glandelinians' knees and cried bitterly:

"Let go of me, you little slave, let go of me," he cried. "I can't I can't," screamed the frightened child. "Oh sir I don't want to be thrown into that awful fire, and if you do it will kill me, it will surely kill me. I don't want to die and neither do you. Oh you mustn't you mustn't throw me into the awful fire. Please don't." And then unable for further utterance the child broke into a pitiful fit of weeping. The cruel Glandelinian had been looking down at her with a frown, and half comical look on his ugly countenance. But at the sight of her tears it was strange to see the frown and half comical look, a dead in the Glandelinians' face. From the drawn and half comical look, a dead deadly scowl was in its place and mercilessly lifting the child by the throat he carried her struggling toward that awful furnace, choking her as hard as he could. Then despite her kicking and beating at him with her hands, he cruelly threw her in. He then threw all the children in except a little girl called Jennie Sanders, who was appalled beyond description at this horrible sight and the deafening screams that the children made. They tried to get out for their suffering was unbearable, but the Glandelinians only laughed, and stirred up the fire to make it hotter. The sight of the suffering children was something appalling, and their screams and pleas for pity to behold. But what mercy did the Glandelinians have the more pitiable the children screamed the more did the Glandelinians laugh. The children tried desperately to climb the walls to get out of reach of the cruel flames, but the walls were also hot and slippery, but it was useless. The children with all their vehemence tried to get out, and beat at the Glandelinians, for they had left the door open to see the performance as they called it. But the Glandelinians only laughed and moved back in laughing like fiends. At last when the lotion threatened to wear off from the heat, the Glandelinians pulled the children out with long hooks and flung them rudely on the floor, where they writhed in indescribable agony. The little girl Jennie nearly fainted at the sight of the suffering children, but to think that she was to be thrown in also filled her with indescribable terror. Jennie who was too frightened to move a foot was now thrown in. It was awful to see what happened to Jennie when she was thrown in. To see the others suffer was awful but when she had to endure this awful pain it was too much for her. While Jennie was screaming from the pain, and trying to get out, Governor Federal decided to have Gertrude and Mary checked. He liked to take pleasure in seeing children suffering from strangulation, and ordered a Glandelinian to do it right away. The Glandelinian grabbed Mary first, and though she slapped bit kicked and scratched and pounded at him, he managed to get her by the throat, and as he cruelly he did check the poor child.

He hung limp while her tongue stuck out as she gasped for air. The Glandelinian liked to look into her bulging eyes, and to make her suffer worse he checked her with all his might. Under the arid crushing grip her throat pained, pained fearfully, and though she tried to draw up protruding tongue in, she could not. Oh it was awful. Her face was ashen, her white teeth seemed to be ringing in her ears. But he did not slack the poor child for long. The very room was filled with a piercing, nearly unearthly scream, and like a fierce catamount, Jennie sprang out of the furnace, and landed on the floor twelve yards away. The suffering little Jennie with red foam running from her mouth, glared at the Glandelinians with rolling eyes, and crouched for a spring at the wicked Glandelinian, who was checking Mary yet. But he was on his guard and tripping Mary he sprang out of her way, while several Glandelinians rushed forward to overpower her. But she was too quick for them and fled away. Violet and her sisters who also witnessed all this were ever-ready with service when the little girl Jennie lost her mind. They would rather see any child dead, than in such a state, and though they prayed to God, and asked him to make the child Jennie recover, he did not seem to hear. The Glandelinian grabbed Mary by the throat and again checked her until she became senseless, while the other wicked Glandelinians did the same to the other children at the same time. When they recovered they carried the children into another room, where the stench of rotting bodies, came from, and threw them in lacking the life, after Violet and her sisters had slipped on unseeing. The dead bodies that were laying in that room were full of maggots and and the children were screaming toward the children who were stark naked. They were terrified, for to be eaten up alive by such horrible worms, would make any one tremble with fear. They screamed loudly and piteously while only answer from out side was a laugh. The children did all their best to beat off these flesh eating worms, and though they smashed many of them with their hands and feet they were quickly surrounded. It was a terrible sight, the maggots crawling over their bodies, and though they tried to beat them off, or stamp masses of them, it was useless to try to get rid of them. They now ran to one part of the room where it seemed clear, when the door opened and one of the Glandelinians ordered them to come back, where they had stood. "Oh these horrible worms will eat us," screamed one of the children, "I would rather die any other death than this." "Yes I tell you," stormed the Glandelinian, "I'll any think that I'm afraid to come in here but I swear that I'm not and will if you do not do as I tell you." Then in a rage he recklessly wounded in, and when he caught them he threw them on the floor, where the horrible worms were swarming. As with bare hands, he reaped up a handful of the wriggling worms, and forcing open the mouth of one of the children, he put the horrible worms, which he smothered into her throat. Oh how she did vomit after he did the same to the other children and dragged them to a corner, and checked Mary by the throat. "I'll kill you to day," he said fiendishly. "You are not so important as the other slaves, and so you will have to die." "Oh I don't want to die," pleaded Mary her heart beating loudly with fright. "Oh please don't kill me, let me live. Please do." "I will not," answered the Glandelinian drawing from his waist band a knife. "I'll kill you all right." "Oh please don't," screamed Mary piteously. "I have not done any harm to you Glandelinians, and you do oughtened to kill me." "I don't care what you have done," snapped the Glandelinian. "I'll kill you all right." He ran the knife through her heart, and threw her on the dead bodies. Then a shrill scream sounded out side, and it was as loud and unceasing that it even started Violet and her sisters with a start. The Glandelinians were themselves startled, and their actions were indeed comical. Again that unearthly horrible scream, burst forth being nearly deafening. "Maybe it's a demon," said a Glandelinian coming in with others. "If it is we do not need to be afraid, but if it's a demon--" Again and again the scream was repeated, more louder, then followed a shrill manicured laugh.

Nearly all day long their eyes were filled tears. Anath had already passed since they first saw the child labor horrors, and now she had the little girl called Jennie was a raving maniac, and never before had the Glandelinians witnessed such a crazy child. She was exceedingly dangerous, and always carried a dagger, seldom letting it fall from her hands. She was stark naked and once in a while she would chew at her arms or shoulders. The worse she got the crueler were the darts of her eyes that pierced the hearts of Violet and her nine sisters. It was a surprise to Violet and her sisters when the Glandelinians came running into the room with the cruel king Precille closely pursued by Jennie who came with leaps and bounds, screaming like a demon, and brandishing the horrible dagger, while foam fell from her lips. Violet and her sisters even ran for their lives, as Jennie changed her course, and came directly for them. Every now and then she would stop to chew her arm or shoulder, which certainly did frighten Violet and her nine sisters. Violet had a sudden impulse to shoot Jennie but she could not, as she wouldn't get time as it was too dangerous to face the maniac a single minute. Jeice only prayed for her recovery as though it seemed utterly useless. Nearer and nearer drew the demented child, then made a sudden spring at Angeline. But Angeline had been watching closely, and as Jennie made that spring, she dashed to one side, so that Jennie landed on the back of a Glandelinian instead. After a furious attempt to throw her off, but as he tried to grab her by the throat, she glided out of his way. He could not hold a naked child, for naked ones are very slippery. Jennie with a scream now made at the Glandelinian with her dagger, but he eluded her spring and struck her such a blow that it laid her flat on the floor, but did not knock her senseless though it only increased her fury. With a dog like howl she bounded from her feet like a spring, and grabbing a heavy chair she flung it at the Glandelinian, springing at the same time, so it seemed landing squarely on his back, as he fell when the chair struck him. But now the other Glandelinians rushed to his assistance with clubbed muskets, and struck Jennie unmercifully, which instead of hurting her only made her like a demon. With a pitiful whim she bounded from the back of the Glandelinian, and when the others found themselves fighting hard to prevent Jennie from running them with the dagger. They tried to stop her firing as fast as they could, but she seemed bullet proof, despite the wall aimed shots. But when at last they were about to overpower her, she jumped away like a cat, laughing in a blood-curdling manner. Then she dropped or disappeared as if she had disappeared right through the floor, but she went into the place where Gertrude, and the other children were hid. If one of them was about to speak, but Gertrude interrupted her saying that Jennie was dangerous as her mind was gone. Jennie suddenly looked toward them, but seemed to do nothing. They were afraid to move though, and they were woe that they did not. Jennie would not have pursued the children if they had not ran away. Jennie now began to make silly motions, and say such silly words that it made Gertrude and some of the others burst out laughing, despite their fear. Jennie seemed to hear the laughing for she suddenly glanced toward the children and made an attitude as if she was going to make a spring. One of the children was about to run, when Gertrude caught her arm, and said:

"Don't move and she won't do anything."

It was well that she did not run, but still Jennie began to crawl slowly toward them with her dagger ready for action. But the more nearer she came the more quite the children sat, and did not move at all. Jennie was now in front of them, and gazed into their faces as steadily as a statue. Gertrude had never seen a prittier child, in such a bad condition, and it gave her heart a twang when she knew what Jennie was suffering from. She was afraid to move, for she feared that she might arouse her, but Jennie still stayed right in front of them as still as they, looking continually into their faces. There was no fear in her mouth now, but the stare of insanity was in her eyes. They thought that Jennie would continue looking at them forever, for she never moved a hair bit, though once in a while she would frown and bit her lips, but the frown would vanish as quickly as it had come. The other little girl whose name was May, had to cough, which she could not keep from doing, but strangely Jennie remained just as still as before though she frowned again, and red foam appeared between her lips. They were surprised when Jennie spoke, in a half wail and scream:

"You're bad men," she said. "You have killed my brother and sister long ago, and now seek to kill my dear father and mother, but you can't for they are already dead. Your officers killed them."

"We are not bad men," said the other little girl tears springing to her eyes for she pitied poor Jennie, knowing that she was out of her mind. Then she continued to herself:

"We are not at bad men," said the other / little girl tears springing to her eyes for she pined for Jennie, knowing that she was out of her mind. Then she continued to herself:

"Oh please dear God, please make Jennie recover from her madness and save us from the cruel Glandelinians."

And now all she could say for Jennie continued in a mild tone:

"If you want your souls purified I can do it but it has to be done by fire. I have been through it and know."

"I don't want to die," screamed the poor little girl frightened badly by the thought of being burned to death.

"You won't die," answered Jennie with a vacant stare. "I've had my soul purified, and even there's no pain."

"But I'm not bad, really I ain't," cried the child beginning to cry.

"And I ain't a man but a little girl,"

"Are you a man?" screamed Jennie. "And I'll purify your soul if you want it done or not. Don't you dare to resist me!"

With that she crawled back to her lace and kept staring at them without giving for an hour. Gertrude and her friends prayed continually, and hopefully for Jennie's recovery.

In the meantime Violet and her sisters had seen scores of other poor children thrown into the magnet filled room, and in their horror the poor children fainted, but were slowly but surely dispatched by the terrible horrible worms. Other children who recoiled at their machines, were taken with the Cat-O-Nine-Tails, and forced to work harder still when they came to though exhausted as they still were. They could not do the work long which enraged the Glandelinians and again they beat them with the Cat-O-Nine-Tails, with all their might, and longer than they did the Glandelinians. They even kept on thrashing them that the poor children were senseless to the floor. The Glandelinians only laughed at their plight, and brought them back to their senses by throwing cold water laid with pepper and salt over their bodies. Then still laughing the Glandelinians made them get up, and again ordered them to work, and though they tried they failed, for they were suffering so much from the scourging they received. This enraged the Glandelinians, still more and again they thrashed them without mercy, and with the same charge. They struck the children so hard that they again fainted and did not recover until five hours later. Their little bodies were covered with bruises, scratches, cuts, and swelling sores, and their suffering was something horrible. One little girl suffered far worse than the others as she had got it harder than they. She cried all the rest of the day, and tossed about in mortal agony. Violet and her sisters despite their exposing themselves to great peril, did their best to comfort the poor suffering children but were unsuccessful. Their suffering was indeed unbearable, and Violet and her sisters knew that they would die from the horrible scourging. Many of their wounds were bleeding continually, and when F. Violet and her sisters tried to stop the bleeding, they only increased the suffering of the poor children.

It was a lucky thing that the Glandelinians were not there just now for if they caught them giving mercy to the children they would have been given them a scourging, and they had just ducked to their hiding place in time, when the same Glandelinians did come back, but the sight of the children's indescribable suffering did not touch their blood hearts in the least, as they only laughed at the Glandelinians' threats to strike them again, when they fell on their knees, and pitifully begged the men to have pity on them, but infuriated, the Glandelinians only beat them again, and then enraged beyond endurance they again struck the little girl who was in mortal agony, and the poor child who had been suffering so much before could not stand the beating without fainting again. The Glandelinians tried to bring her to as she was suffering more but when they kept it up for an hour and she did not recover they thought that she was dead so they left again. When they were gone, Violet and her sisters went to her death, and Anselme, placing her ear to the little girl's chest heard her heart still beating, but very feebly.

"She's alive yet, but the way her heart beats and the way she is breathing, I'm afraid she is dying," Anselme said sadly.

It was right for toward night the poor little victim of the cruel Glandelinian scourges died and many a silent prayer did Violet and her sisters say as they wept over the still forms and when their cold

CHAPTER

The next day Violet and her sisters having been spying about governor Frederica headquarters saw hundreds of new children who were being brought before him. As the children were being brought in there was a great deal of excitement in the court. Governor had received a demand from little Angelina Arenburg to give all the child slaves their freedom or she would within two weeks lay siege to all the best factories on the outskirts of the city, destroy its defenses, and even set the city on fire. The governor was writhing a refusal, and the excitement in the court was more using. The letter had been brought by a special delivery boy who was requested to return his refusal without delay. Then he turned his attention to the children:

"They are dismissed for the present," said the governor. "We are a little upset by this demand." For a long time while incessant but huzzing and yells inside the court room told Violet and her sisters that that the Glandelinians were discussing the matter. Accidentally the governor had thrown the other letter toward the hiding place of the Vivian O Girls he having intended to throw it away. Violet picked it up without being seen and unfolding the letter read it as her sisters looked on. This is what she read:

"This is the fourteenth time we have demanded you to give the other children their freedom, and we are getting mighty tired, and demand once more in the name of the children's God to free all the other children, or at least lessen their misery and work, and if we are met with a refusal, which we will count as an insult we will lay siege to all the main factories managed by Governor Arenburg and not only annihilate his men who defend the factories but will if possible set fire to not only the factories but to the city as well. This is the last demand and if you refuse you will find that within two weeks we have kept our threat."

Yours truly

Angelina Arenburg.

Leader of the children fighting for freedom."

Violet let her sisters read it, then folded it up and hid it somewhere. The next day the governor received a note from another desperate child rebel, whose name was Lerginia Zimmermann. It ran as follows:

"I've received the letter intended for my superior Arenburg telling her that she is a pighead and that you refuse during her to fulfill her threats. You know what you are! You are one of the butchers out of the wicked spirits heads. Arenburg had demanded your grating the freedom of the children and she means it, and this is your last chance now to make good as you have a more enemy than Arenburg to deal with. The attack will soon come, and on your headquarters first you old child butcher."

Linda Zimmermann.

Commander of rebels of men and children."

This made the governor furious and believing that the Vivian girls were the cause of all this he ordered the men to get them if possible.

To look for the Vivian Girls however was as easy as looking for a pin in a hay stack. BUT the Glandelinians decided to wreak their vengeance on four other children, believing that the governor would believe that they were the Vivian Girls. The four little girls that were to be picked were laying on the floor from overwork when the soldiers came in, and the looks in their faces startled the children. They were dragged from the floor, and carried into the presence of the governor who seemed at them asked them fairly and ordered them to be sent a letter to the two child rebels leaders, asking them to withdraw their threat declaring that governor Vivian's children would be burned alive in the destruction of the city in case the rebels set it on fire, saying that they would be responsible for their deaths. These children were already half dead from the suffering they had went through and protested that they were not to blame, and that if they themselves, pleadingly wrote to the child labor rebel leaders it would do no good as they knew Arenburg and Zimmermann long enough and that they had become merciless enemies of the Glandelinians and would carry out their threats no matter what the cost. Despite threats promises and the like the children would not write the letters as they were thrown down back into the factory where they were before. When the next day came the children tried to hid from the brutal Glandelinians but could not. A little girl was seized first, and the chief Glandelinian decided to strangle her while the others strangled the other children. He cruelly lifted the little girl by the throat and pressed on her neck so hard that for a moment she hung limp. The poor child could not stand such an awful checking that this Glandelinian gave her, and with all her strength she tried to pull away his hands, and failing she struck at him and kicked him in the belly with her feet, but this only angered him and he checked her with all his might. Her eyes were closed as if they were about to fall out of their sockets, while her tongue stuck out farther than ever. Her throat pained her, and an unbearable desire to cough seized her but she could not. The cruel Glandelinian took delight in her awful suffering. Her desire for air, and for him to let go of her throat could not be described, and also the pain in her lungs. In the mean time another little girl was trying to get away from several Glandelinians who were chasing her but she was also caught, and checked as hard that she looked just like the other little girl was. By that time the first little girl had died, and the second one was doing her best to pull those hands, which seemed to be crushing her tender throat. Then finding it useless, she put fiercely at her enemy's face, with her fist, and yet seeing that she was failing to make him let go by kicking him also, she scratched him furiously in the face. But he did not let go but also strangled her with all his might, untill her head was thrown back and she hung limp. Just as she died the Glandelinian dropped her letting her fall to the floor while as the other Glandelinians could not catch the remaining children the chief one did. If the other two children had suffered terribly from their awful checking the third little girl being killed suffered still worse. It was far easier for the cruel Glandelinian to check her for her neck was smaller, and he squeezed so hard that her eyes bulged badly and her tongue stuck so far out, that it looked like a snake. The cruel Glandelinian, as she got the hardest checking she could very quickly and the Glandelinian also let her drop to the floor. The other children were also strangled to death, while several children, who were about to run at their machines were dragged to their feet while a Glandelinian came forward with a worse whip than the fearful At-U-Nine-Tails.

"Have you no mercy at all!" gasped one of the children in dismay. "No mercy for christians." Snarled the chief Glandelinian. Then he ordered his three companions to thrash them. It was a horrible encouraging but the Glandelinians gave them. The children screamed piteously, but as more they screamed the harder the Glandelinians struck them. In the poor children pleaded for mercy, the Glandelinians only laughed. The harder the Glandelinians struck them the louder and the more piteously they screamed. Their bodies were already badly torn and bleeding, but still the Glandelinians continued to thrash them, and their suffering was worse than we could even think. At last unable to be dragged off to that horrible furnace. Their terror was indescribable. The last queer kind of medicine which saves them from death but not from pain was rubbed well on their bodies and into their painful wounds and then despite their piteous screams and pleas were thrown in one by one, and the door slammed shut. Oh how they did scream. It was indeed terrible and too much for any person to witness.

They furiously tried to shove the door open. The pain of all this was so dreadful that they made deafening screams, and vehement struggles, to force the door open. The suffering was so awful, that it was like the agony of a damned soul. There was no friendly face anywhere to comfort them, of or rescue them, and the looks in their faces told how they suffered. In their intolerable pain the poor children piteously begged the Glandelinians to open the door and let them out, but the answer they received was a laugh. Again and again they tried to shove that door open, and clutched at the walls but it was useless. For three hours the children were let in there, and when they felt like it, the Glandelinians took them out with long hooks. Then they made large cuts on their eyes, nose, and on their painful wounds. Then they made large cuts on their bodies, and after further torture, the Glandelinians decided to make the children work for a week, without a bit to eat. Even without water. To suffer from thirst is a terrible thing, and the sufferers would die a slower death from starvation, than from thirst. After one day of hard work in the sweat shops, the children not able to bear their craving thirst any longer, and knowing that the men would not give them a drop of water to search the big rooms for a sink, but to their disappointment when they found a sink the water was turned off. However it was lucky that the Glandelinians did not intend to make them suffer from this thirst until they died. Only when they were almost about to die from the tortures of thirst did the Glandelinians give them a drink, and only a little water at that, not out of kindness, but to keep them alive until they felt like murdering them. They did not give them any food however until a week was up, and when they did they gave them the food intended for the hogs, and made them eat it or forced it down their throats. The Glandelinians at times even forbade the children to sleep, and did make them sleep, by placing strict guards over them. This was kept up for two days, and though their want of sleep was insupportable, the Glandelinians kept them awake for all the morning of the third day, but in the afternoon let them sleep. For nearly two weeks after they slept without awakening once, and all the attempts of the Glandelinians to awaken them were in vain. Some other children in a separate factory who were overcome from work, were also under going torture, the Glandelinians decided to throw them into a tank of hot water. The same kind of medicine was rubbed on them and they were all thrown in, all in a bunch. Screaming frantically they furiously tried to get out of the tank of hot water, but the sides were so high that they could not get out. Their suffering was horrible, and despite the medicine to the intense disappointment of the Glandelinians the children died, the Glandelinians drawing them out with fish-hooks, and throwing them into the room where their antiques would be taken out. Many other children had suffered terribly from scaldings received from bursted steam pipes, but even when their sufferings were not half over, the cruel Glandelinian soldiers dragged them to a barrel, filled it up with water, as cold as they could get it mixed it with strong Ammonia, and while laughing heartily, placed the first child into it head first, after tying a rag around his mouth so that he could not swallow any water in his gurgles for air. On account of his intolerable sufferings, and desire for air the little boy, made a vehement effort to kick the barrel over, but was unsuccessful. The Glandelinians only laughed at his struggle for air, and now cruelly made it worse worse by holding his feet so that he could not struggle. But then they let go again because they did not wish to drown him to death. His want of air and his suffering could not be only seen in moving pictures, if his tortures could be caught correctly. The more he struggled the more they laughed. Slower and slower he ceased his struggles, and finally ceased them altogether. Then the chief Glandelinian laughing heartily, took him out untied the rag and taking it off threw him roughly on the floor. Then taking a little girl they tied it around her mouth, and also threw her in head first. Oh how she did struggle. She could not hold her breath as long as the little boy did, and furiously tried to breathe in the water, but the water went up into her nostrils the ammonia torturing her frightfully, and yet she failing to get air. Her head seemed to swim like a top, and her lungs seemed as if they would burn up. Her heart beat fast and loud, and the longer she was kept this way, the more intolerable became her suffering and the more insupportable became her desire for air. She also soon ceased her struggles, and for good, and the Glandelinian lifted her out and set her roughly on the floor. The chief one took off the rag, and tied it quickly across the mouth of another little boy. He made a struggle before the Glandelinian could throw him in but they did at last manage.

For a few minutes he could stand it without air but soon he began to show symptoms of suffering, and tried to lift himself out of the barrel but could not. The Glandelinian chief was saying some thing to no one of his companions about the boys struggles, when two stalwart Glandelinian officers came rushing in. "The child rebels are laying siege to all the strings of child labor factories on the outskirts of the city, so as soon as you get through with giving the children three more tortures, or when you hear the roar of battle, report for duty." By this time the little boys suffering was unbearable but the wicked Glandelinians laughing at his struggles saluted the two officers, as the they went out brandishing their sabres like drunken men. Fiercer and fiercer the little boy struggled but soon grew weaker and weaker and finally ceased altogether. The Glandelinians then took him out, and after taking off the rag also threw her roughly on the floor. They waited patiently for the children to recover and when they did the Glandelinians tied two ropes on the little girl's thumbs, and throwing the other end over a transom, pulled her up and held on to the ropes. The little girl suffered terribly, and piteously begged the Glandelinian to let her down. "Oh please let me down." She screamed. "You are making the ropes break my thumbs. Oh, Oh, Please let me down." "Why!" Mockingly asked the Glandelinian, holding the ropes. "I'm sure it feels nice to hang there by the thumbs, and ought to die that way, as all christians ought to die." "Oh let me down please do." Pleaded the poor little girl, her face white from the pain and tears streaming down her cheeks. "Oh please please let me down. This is too much." A burst of laughter was her answer, and they jerked on the ropes to increase her suffering. When she was about to faint, they let her down, and untied the ropes they brought them toward the little boy while the little girl cried as if she had lost heaven. "Oh please don't tie me up like that." Pleaded the little boy, to best as he could. "It's too much for my me. Oh please don't." The Glandelinian paid no attention to him but tied the ropes to his thumbs and did the same to him as they had done to the little girl. THE little boy screamed and screamed but the Glandelinians only laughed. "Oh please let me down. Let me down." He screamed. "I would rather be checked than this. Oh have mercy on me please, please, please, let me down." "If these Glandelinians ever get arrested by the Angelinians and take us to us and ask us to save them we will not a." said Joice but by mistake. "They have no mercy on the poor child slaves, so it is our duty to see that they get their just punishments if caught." "What's that?" snapped one of the Glandelinians who had heard her. "Where are you little spies who dare to talk like that about us respectable gentlemen. Come show yourselves you little fools." Joice had meant what she said too as we will read by and by) as the Vivian Girls did not show them selves the Glandelinians did not press the matter and went on ahead with their cruelty to their victims. This torture was indeed unbearable for the little boy but the Glandelinians let the screaming child down before the ropes broke his thumbs. How oh he suffered. When the Glandelinians untied the ropes and shoved him to one side, the little boy with a piteous moan threw himself on the floor and cried as if he wanted to get rid of all his tears. They next went for the other little boy and also tied him by the thumbs. All the while he hung there in insupportable torture he screamed and screamed, but the Glandelinians let him down before his thumbs would be pulled off. After they untied the ropes, another Glandelinian came forward with a wet rag. The chief Glandelinian prepared to tie it around the little girl's nose and mouth. "Do they would smother the poor little girl!" cried Joice with some anger in her tone. "I know why you Glandelinians are so cruel to little children. You are doing this as an insult to God and Jesus Christ, who died on the cross for us and even you. God has given you many beautiful things when your nation was only young and even freedom from the ancient Angelinians when they oppressed you over the quarrel over the Pope, and this is your reward. If you are intending to kill the poor children, why don't you do it? Because you don't dare." And Joice and her sisters came out of their hiding place and boldly faced the awfully sulking Glandelinian who would liked to have snatched them down where they were but who didn't dare.

out off! I'm telling you only our own good!" answered
 "Our uncle or father cannot stop the child rebels." answered Jaiser. "And so what can I do? I can only stop them which I refuse to ask him to do because the poor children deserve their freedom, and besides I'm glad that the children are laying siege to the factories, but I'm telling you men for your own good that you'll answer to both God and the Angelinians for your cruelty to children, and there are more dangerous spies around than us, who will tell all! you have done and laugh in your faces at your misery, and that's more than we would ever do. We try to save the children and do no little-scale work either.
 We are not preaching either, only telling you men for a fair warning."

frank." He stormed. "By the name of Satan you Vivian Girls are too free the gutter-punks, and punish us eh?" He roared with a stamp of his feet. "There is no S Angelinian that could rescue the snipes, and who's the God who could save the children from us? I'd like to see you have all ready made thousands of the kids suffer unbearable tortures, and sorrows, for them." He roared again, his hands pointing to the sky, and then he broke hearted over the loss of their children. He seemed to their God for years for the return of their children, but without results. Your God is afraid of the Olandjanins, and we saw drive it."

"Many have declared 'if he went on, ' That his next timid angels could make us run for our life at one hare word. It may be possible that you Vivian Girls would like to do us something crooked, too if you dared, but if you ever try it once, I don't care how brave you little girls are, or how your parents and relations may be you would not try it again. We Omerian Gurses are too ticked to be trifled with and would sooner go to war against Angels than to be a snobby. If you girls are not with us, we will be the last team who will fight." He added with a gay tone much unkind to his ugly nature encouraged by the silence of the Vivian Girls he went on;

"I thought I'll tell you that I can make the child slaves suffer a torture that a million times more unendurable than all those you Virgins girls have ever seen the child slaves go through. You may not believe it either, but if you don't, why I'll soon prove it."
 The Glandelinian was not feeling for he meant that he could rub that that kind of medicine on the children picked for the torture and th threw them into a white hot lava filled volcano, which the city, and out of way of all rescue. The lava was the volcano selected at being sent to the that the tourists had called the fiery mountain "The its right name was Mt. Galverdis.

His volcano is more dangerous than Mt. Vivian, the Blongllessean mountain and nearly as tall as Mt. Everest, in our world. The size of the crater they knew not, but she is never snowcapped, and her sides are always sensibly warm except near the top where it is hot enough to burn almost anything. It does not erupt very frequently however though it always stay full to overflowing. The size of the crater, while which the Glandelinians do not know is as large as you cannot so measure it and that though it was only five hundred feet deep it could probably hold all the water of all the small lakes of their world. Its regular depth is never known, though King Kinnerline of Glandelinia has just explored it in 1872 claimed that the crater was nearly six miles wide, seventeen miles long, and of seemingly bottomless depth. In 1789 the city of Andromed had been destroyed by this very volcano, which had an eruption that filled the air with a cannoning thunder and for over a thousand miles. Before this mountain had become a mass her height had been 33,969 feet high the highest mountain in all this world. Her height was now now 21,645 feet high.

MR world. Her height was now less, her eyes were shades were always warm, on account of the intense heat of the sun, which was always boiling to even a greater heat than white heat.
The Andean had been twice destroyed by this volcano and over 987,456 perished in the ruins, and over 3,456,789 had been made homeless while 508 had been injured. This is the reason why the Glacelinians had to when their God.

"Gwendolinn," explained it to the Virgin Girls, and then paying more attention to them proceeded with the torture of the other helpless children. The rag was placed around the nose and mouth of one of the girls, and tied into a knot in the back of her head. For a while it was without air, but soon she began to suffer. She frantically tried to untie the rag, but the Gwendolinn had fastened it so tight, she could not remove it. She could not stand the suffering, and tried to breathe through the rag, but found it also useless. "Oh, I can't stand this! I must have air," she thought to herself. "Oh I can't stand this any longer. I must have air or I will die."

it any longer. I must have air or I will die." The Glandelinians only laughed at her sufferings, and also we quite ignored her. She was interested. They liked to see how an child suffered when she was not get any air and how one looked when it get a bad choking. They let her stay the rag on, the worse the child suffered. She had never felt such tortures but she was not and her nostrils felt hot, and also she felt. Soon she became dizzy but before she fell to the floor, someone took the Glandelinian quickly out the knot which was also too tight for them. She, and took off the smothering rag. It seemed as if she could not breathe any harder, for every moment she took in deep breaths, and she was coming, nothing like a dying child. The Glandelinians laughed at their plight and turned their attention to another poor suffering child who also was a girl. She had seen with indescribable pain how the other little girl had suffered, and she dreaded to go through the tortures of suffocation, knowing how bad it was. "I shall not die another one," she screamed. "I can't stand it without air. Here, here, on me."

"I cannot give mercy," laughed the chief Ulandolinian. "There is no mercy in my heart unless you forsake God, which I know you will not do. It is the same to her men."

"PLEASE DON'T..." She screamed, as the Glandelinians seized her. "I don't like to be smothered." "I'm sure if you don't..." Answered one of the Glandelinians as he pulled his companion to tie the rag around her nose and mouth. "Will have to be smothered if you like it or not."

He suffered, and vehemently tried to untie or pull the rag off, his pleading look in her face could hardly be explained, not on even living pictures. But it did not in the least touch the cruel hearts of the Diandelinians, and the more she tried to tear away that smothered ing from her nose and mouth the more the Gländselinnsuut laughed. Then she laughed until the tears ran down, though the poor child knelt on her knees, before them, and raising her hands in token of supplication, making signs to them to take it off. It was horrible to see her suffer, and Violet and her sisters would have rushed to her rescue, were they not in the danger of utter failure. For what chance, did little girls like them, have against such powerful men? But the little fairly got on her feet and the room, frantically trying to catch the rag, until when she sank to the floor gazing with a sad look toward heaven, did the Gländselinnsuut cut the rope and take her. Just like the other little girl, it seemed as if she could not stop breathing! But it was a great relief that she could breathe and she even thanked God.....

The other little girl was still breathing hard, though not as hard as before and the look in her face and that of the other child told that they were still suffering from the effects of the suffocation. But the Ulandeliniuns only laughed and only shook and slapped them roughly.

"It feels nice to go without air, don't it?" asked the chief Glandelinnian. "Well the next performance and to the last for a while will be hanging by your beautiful necks. But I forgot. The little you has not had his time to smother yet have you you little christian feel." Though he was at once filled with great terror s he was too frightened to answer, and the sight of her frightened face made all the Glandelinnians soldiers rear out with laughter. The other Glandelinnians were already preparing a gallows for the short hanging. The rag was too small now, and while one of the Glandelinnians made him run to get out of breath, the chief one went to get another rag. The poor little boy tried to struggle as they made him run back and forth as fast as they could but could not. By the time the chief Glandelinnian returned with the rag, he was badly winded. Quickly as possible the Glandelinnian tied it around his head and nose and mouth, dose pite his vehement effort to get away, from around his neck and mouth, dose pite his vehement effort to get away, from his cruel tormentors. His suffering was at once unbearable. AND like th the two little girls he tried to unfasten the rag, but he might as well have tried to take a piece of plaster out of the wall with one finger. Oh how he did suffer. Though going through a number of an indescribable pain he suffered so bad as he did now. His lungs pained in an indescribable manner, and his face became the color of black and blue. It also caused him to have the feelings of an indescribable strangulation and hid his face painfully terribly, walls seemed to be ringing in his ears,, and he became so dizzy that he fell to the floor. The Glandelinnians then cut the knots in the rag, but for more torture , took it off slowly. By this time he became unconscious, but not dead. The gulls were now ready so one of the little girls was dragged under the rope. She fairly hammered away at the floor with her heels, and tried to strike at the cruel Glandelinnians with her fist, but could not. The noose was placed over her head and around her tender neck. Then two Glandelinnians quickly pulled her up and struggling as she was never felt such an awful pang hang there. S he thought that she had ne ver felt such an awful shaking. But it was too severe for her and she became unconscious, with her pure tongue still protruding. Seeing that she was senseless, the Glandelinnians quickly let her down while the chief one dragged the other little girl toward the gallows despite his struggles and screams. The noose was thrown over hi her head and drawn tightly around her neck. Then she was horribly dragged from the floor and the higher he s she went the more her tongue protruded, and the more her eyes bulged. This horrible checking not only caused her tongue to pain, or caused an unbearable desire to cough, but also produced a headache. She too quickly fainted, and the Glandelinnians then let her down. A As the quicky fainted, and the Glandelinnians set about to bring her to life by roughing to the floor floor the day the temperature being about thirty below zero, and how small they had suffered. Many other children that had been captured by the Glandelinnians were being cruelly put to death by the Glandelinnians, who were aroused by the advance of the revolutionists. When the Glandelinnians were gone, Violet and her sisters separated to see if any more of the room which was something more like some dark and lonesome corner of a penitentiary Gertrude sat sad and like a forlorn child. As the screams of the butchered children outside in the streets drew nearer the factory reached Violet and her sisters, they saw Gertrude press herself down on the hard floor, and bury her face in her hands, burst into a piteous passion of weeping. For a long time she lay there, regardless of the time and feeling utterly forsaken and forlorn. It seemed as if all the children tortured by the butcher Glandelinnians were being killed, sliced up and burned alive, or being sliced open alive and their hearts taken out by the sound of their death screams. It indeed was an unearthly sound outside. Suddenly a gentle hand was laid on the tumbled golden hair, and Joice said in a pitiful sweet voice;

"Why Gertrude, what is the matter. A Are you sick!"

Gertrude though she could not see recognized the voice of her dearly beloved friend and lifted her sad and tearstained face to her's.

7) "Ho, Joice dear, I'm not sick, but the Glandelinins have been so cruel to me and God seems to have forsaken us. But I know he hasn't though it seems. Oh why do they treat us so cruel and make me blind. I cannot see the beautiful blue sky or the sunshine or the flowers any more.. Oh why do they kill and work the other children to death for and in such a cruel way and what will my papa and mama say when I do go back and they see my me blind, and my sister Jenny crazy! Uh, oh, oh, oh.."

Joice, victim with tears briming in her own blue eyes, placed her arm around her weeping friend.

he blind, and my sister Jenny crazy on, and you, I know, are all Jaice vivian with tears brining in her own blue eyes, placed her arms around her weeping friend.
"Listen to me Gertrude." She said brushing the tangled curls from his hot forehead. "We know that God seems to have forsaken us, but he has not. He still loves us, and loves us so much, that he has sent his only "Babette Son" to die for us all. Would he have done that if he did not love us. And his Son, Our Dear Lord, into whose presence all us christians went loves us more than any one can compare or even conceive. I know its hard hard to be blind my dear friend, but that makes God love you all the more. Try to hear it. We all have to suffer as long as these Glandelinians are in full sway with their wicked child slavery, but some day there will be something happening which we are dreading very much as Angelina will not put up with this much longer. You may be able to see again some day, and the first thing you will look upon will be the face of Jesus Christ, himself." Gertrude had grown very quiet and lay still on the floor. When she had finished Jaice Vivian saw a sweet expression come over Gertrudes fair face.

"I will try to be brave," she said, "But oh Joie its so hard to su suffer among these cruel Glandelinians." and the tears again filled the wistful eyes.

the wistful eyes.
"Jesus will help you dear Gertrude," said Joice. "Let us pray for him to help us."
When they had finished the prayer which was quite long, Gertrude said his to help us." When they had finished the prayer which was quite long, Gertrude said earnestly with a sweet beautiful expression on her face "Joyce when I asked Jesus to let me see sometimes if it was his will he seemed to answer me. I feel here-----" Laying her hand upon her holy breast----- "That I will be able to see some say even before I die or go back to papa or mama. His sacred touch will heal me." It was long after she fell asleep, and lay so still and white that Violet and her sisters who sat besides her, except Joyce who was kneeling before a cross praying silently, thought Angelina became suspicious. Angelina bent over the still white form, and Joyce awaited her verdict with speechless anxiety. Angelina could understand about diseases as much as a chief specialist, being learned in school. In a few minutes she arose and shook her head sadly.

"Is there no hope at all, Angeline?" asked Joice Despairingly. "U "Cannot something be done?"

"The end is probably near. She may not live until morning."

"The end is probably near. She may not live until morning." Casting a glance of sorrow at the still form, Angelina threw herself on a couch and cried in a heart broken way so strong was her pity for the poor helpless children, in the power of the Glandelinians. Gertrude had as also been like her sister Jennie, been overcome by the brutality of the Glandelinians. Her frail little body had not been able to stand it. She had been delirious after the prayer for the recovery of her sight, when she had fallen into a death like trance. The end seemed painfully drawing near. For a while after Angelina and her sisters controlled their passionate weeping, perfect stillness reigned in the room, and still the motionless form on the hardwood floor stirred not and an hour after Angelina examined her again and found that she was really dead. For a time Violet and her sisters wept passionately over the still white form. After controlling their grief Violet was about to recite a prayer out loud when suddenly she was interrupted by a tremendous roll of musketry and the explosions of hundreds of grenades. The attack which had alarmed the child labor masters all over the city had begun. For a long while they sat still listening, expecting it to disappoint them by ceasing, but it increased furiously and seemed to spread in many directions.

and seemed to spread in many directions. "Maybe the child rebels has made the attack at last," whispered Joyce. "At least. Hoope so. If the laundry will be put to an end." If the child rebels may have been the cause of the attack, at least the tension began to slacken down again, and finally ceased altogether, though occasional yells filled the air, and looking out of the window Violet and her sisters saw to their terror large forces of child rebels led by Lavinia Zimmerman, bearing toward the place they were in many flourishing large flaming torches in their hands.

They wondered how they could escape so easily but they as n soon found ou out. They had been wearing their scapulars, all through their spying tours of the factories, and it was these that saved them from the grenades, and also their faith in God. Also because grenades are not half so dangerous as the ordinary shells used in war. No more shells were coming now though they still kept heaving out side and around the fact ories. It sounded worse than the noisest "Fourth Of July". The reports of the grenades were fairly deafening, and more fires had appeared in the far distance, while the factory across the street was beginning to burn. Instead of ceasing the rear of battle was increasing very fiercely, and the grenades from the child rebels outside of the factory Violet and her sisters were in constantly made a continuous roar that was appalling.
"May they are bombarding this factory, believing that the defenders are here." Said Violet I never have seen so many grenades thrown into a factory before. Why its fir fierce, they'll be the deaths of us yet if they don't see us and stop throwing the grenades."
Every now and then the child rebels would set up a series of vehement yells a sound that their fury was only growing fiercer. Violet and her s sisters began to get nervous, and wondered if they would get rescued, or would they w burn with the building when the revolutionist would set it aba ablaze. The doors leading to the outside were all locked and thou though the windows could be easily opened, it was too high to make a jump into the street. And then the maniac crazy child? What if she she should get in some how! Then their case would be surely helpless, they thought for the maniac would surely turn them. But to think of poor Jennie being so made, filled them with indescribable sorrow, and they could hardly keep back the tears. Praying seemed hopeless for Jennie h had only grown worse and might stay insane as long as she lived, no mat ter how much they prayed. That's what they thought.
Being insane is a terrible thing, at and most insane people are very d dangerous, though more a are quite silly. Jennie was of the dangerous kind which are always pronounced a hopeless case, though hopeless cases have after a long while proved to be not hopeless. But Jennie was really a hopeless case, and only God alone could make her recover her reason, by some mirical. Though the distant sound of the battle had at first cheered them Violet and her sisters again felt and ever the hopeles hopeless case of poor Jennie, and as did Gertrude and May.

CHAPTER FOURTY FOUR.
THE RUNNING OF ANDREAN, AND THE DREAM OF THE CAPTIVE CHILDREN, AND THE RESULT AT AWAKENING.

What if they would surely be rescued, and Jennie wandering around this horrible, still a mummy, and die in the place if the city should burn. The thought of this almost broke their hearts, and they could not keep from crying. At every sound, they would give a start thinking that the Glandelinians were returning. Then too they dreaded Jennie for they knew that she is dangerous, and maybe worse than the wicked Glandelinians themselves. What increased their sadness was that they also dreaded that the child rebels would lose the battle or that some of their leaders would be killed. And also that they may never get out of the place and that they may be burned to death.

The other two little children, Gertrude and May, had no parents for they had been slain in the thypson at Jennie Terry only a few weeks ago. And they themselves had been captured by the cruel Glandelinians who did not love poor little children, and only loved to torture and kill them. To try and keep Gertrude cheerful who was more in distress than any of them Violet and her sisters played with her, and as there were pantries in their room, they ate everything that they could find and kept her Gertrude happy for hours. Finally being tired the little girls laid down on the rough couches, and sleep tried to, but for a while on account of their sorrow could not. They grew very very lonely, and for some reason it was getting very chilly inside the factory, and they were hungry in spite of what they had already eaten, but soon became very sleepy, and though they did not like to sleep on the dirty floor, with nothing to spread over them they lay down and fell asleep. In their sleep which lasted only a few hours without interruption, they had a long and beautiful dream. This was the dream.

They had been put into a very large cell, where they wandered around for a very long while, when finally they grew very tired, and sat down on the hard stone floor, just ready to cry, when all at once, a dear child of unearthly beauty, appeared before them, and asked what was the trouble, and why they were about to cry. So they told the celestial child all about it, and she said:

"Never you mind, we will all take good care of you. Don't be afraid. There is a golden carriage, waiting in the street for you. I'll take you to it, and then I'll take you to it and then I'll go on ahead, and see that supper is ready. Then dreamed that they followed the celestial child, feeling greatly awed into the street, where they found a carriage of indescribable beauty, waiting for them. It was made of a large beautiful golden flower but as before of indescribable beauty. There were two celestial children to drive it while five celestial boys were to draw it. The children who were to draw it were some of the murdered child slaves. Violet and her sisters laughed with delight, when they saw the carriage, and they were glad to take the seat upon the flower, as the first celestial child told them. Then she went away, and the children drawing the carriage, rose up into the air like if they had wings, the flower floating up with them, and the driver went behind, holding the lines, and flourishing his golden whip, which he did not intend to use at all. Violet and her sisters waved their hands and shouted with pleasure, while Gertrude and May clung to Violet and Angeline, a trifle frightened. Yet very much pleased with it themselves. On they went through the air with the sweet little celestial children, moving about them, and singing Sacred Hymns as they passed and the soft breeze kissing them, untill finally they came to the prettiest country they had ever seen, swarming with buildings made of real pearl and pure gold. The carriage now stopped and there in front of them was the most beautiful building they had ever imagined, and of immense size, and when they went inside they saw a table set with the most beautiful food that could be cooked. How beautiful and tempting it looked to the hungry children, and how easy. There too was the dear little celestial girl who had promised to take care of them, as the happy children sat in the chairs made of pure pearl, and were soon eating the delicious food, and drinking lemonade. The celestial children who had drawn the carriage, were also there, who kept the children laughing untill they had finished their supper, and could scarcely keep their eyes open they were so warm, and happy, and sleepy.

Then the celestial ones cleared the table, while a boy brought five nice soft pillows and beds as if by magic, and the happy little ones lay down in their cosy beds, with their arms around each other, and went to sleep, while the celestial children were covering them up, with beautiful blankets. How they did sleep. The moon came out, and smiled on them, the celestial ones sang to them, while the angels watched over them. When morning came the children thought they never have felt so rested, and happy before. The air was pure as the real heavens there, and the fragrance of thrillions of flowers was all about them, and they knew that the child celestials loved them. After breakfast one of the celestial children said:

"Now children, the people of the celestials country, are coming to see you, for they all love you. It's nearly time for them, so we will go and wait."

The flower carriage was brought around once more, the children stepped into it, and soon they found themselves in a lovely place with beautiful flowers of all kinds about, and green unearthly grass of indescribable beauty, and trees more beautiful still, and the air was still and sweet. There was no sun, but there was such a bright heavenly light, that it could have blinded us, and of many millions of unearthly soldiers. After leaving the carriage, they heard an unearthly horn tooting and many happy voices singing. How pure and pretty music was, and they seemed to hear all the beautiful music from heaven itself, without the least discord, and the words were as plain, as though each hymn had been sung by itself. They stood quite still listening, until a indescribable beautiful procession, came into view marching around a curve just ahead, and coming right toward them. The children started forward eagerly, as they recognized St. Michael, The Blessed Virgin Mary, and her Son Jesus Christ, The Holy Ghost, God and all the rest. The angel Gabriel sprang to the front with great gracefulness, and ran to them kneeling down, and offering the fruit of life on a golden tray, while the Blessed Mother came forward to embrace the children. The happy little ones ate some of the fruit of life, and gave some to the others, and Violet declared that there was no better fruit than this in all the world. The children wanted to have part of theirs for the celestial children, but the Blessed Virgin, taking Violet into her arms, said that they always have plenty. On to be embraced by the Mother of God. What if it really happened to Violet and her sisters, instead of in a dream. Then she asked the children to tell their story, which they did, while everybody listened with sorrow and anger, even the celestial children, on one side, and a line of celestial soldiers standing near them with blasphemous words, though how they managed to keep still so long, they themselves only knew. Of course they all know how cruel the Glandelinians were.

"But never mind," said the Blessed Virgin, pressing Violet's cheek close to hers, causing her heart to flutter more gently. "You will be much happier here than you could have been with them, and we will indeed take good care of you."

"Of course we will," cried the rest. When the celestial ones sang hymns of welcome, other celestial children told their own stories very prettily, noting out every one of them, and the happy children played with their dear dear celestial friends and had such a good time that they thought they would stay there forever. They had never seen such beautiful flowers, there were so many of them, and the perfume that was wafted up was indescribably sweet. The flowers even seemed to be alive, and the children stood about with wide open eyes. The celestial ones were already drawn up on either side, to make a passage, to the throne of the Celestial King, and such lovely creatures even, you never saw. They were more pretty than the most beautiful flowers. But at first the children, had eyes for the Queen, Son, and Celestial King, who smiled sweetly upon the awed and happy children, and told them that they were very welcome. Then the Queen Queen waved her hand, and the place was filled with such beautiful music that it was indescribable. The celestial smiled and bowed as they sang, waving their beautiful standards of gold. Peacock and silk of indescribable beauty, while some of them played on Lily horns, while all sang praises to the Queen, King, and Welcome to the innocents. The children could only stand and listen, and look until the Blessed Mother called them to sit on the steps of the throne made of the most pure pearl, where they rested, and enjoyed it all while the celestial children still kept singing began the most beautiful dance.

At this most important part of the dream, they awoke, and found that they were to their bitter disappointment that they were in the same horrible place and that it was only a dream. Oh how sad and lonely they did feel. A strange odor of smoke had come to their nostrils, the pungent reek of burning wood. As they shoved open the blinds of the window that they had closed before going to sleep a startling sight met their eyes. A dull red glow seemed to cover half of the sky, and black clouds of smoke arose from many houses in the far distances, making a night like darkness over the sky. The city of Andromeda was burning, and the air was filled with a fearful volcanic roar while countless bright flashes told them that many grenades were exploding near the factory and that now it was defended by thousands of Glandelinians. Once in a while in the far distance a large tongue of flame shot up making the lurid glow brighter than ever. Violet looked at Joice with eyes opened wide with great fear.

"We are in great danger," said Joice with a shudder. "And it seems hopeless for us to escape. It looks like if the whole western part of the city is burning up."

"Oh please dear God Save us," Meant Angeline in great fear. Oh my we slept too long. Many houses in the far distance are already burning like furnaces, and even whole districts. She was right whole districts were rearing furnaces, as indicated by the bright ruddy glow. They were in great danger for even if the doors of the building were open escape would be utterly useless. They were prisoners in a burning city. But despite the terrible danger, Violet and her sisters did not lose hope. They knew anyway that their dream would come true, and that they would really see God, and the celestial ones like they did in the dream. If they should die in the fire. But yet to think of burning to death filled them with horror for they feared such a dreadful death. They thought more of making their escape now than they did of running into crazy Jennie. So Violet pulled aside the iron rod, and swung the door open quickly.

"We must try to escape," she said to Joice. "But we will also have to take Jennie with us somehow."

"The only thing to do is to attack her unexpectedly, and overpower her some way," said Joice. "We cannot rescue her until she's overpowered, but it also breaks my heart to think of it. But it's the only way." They all went out of the room, and into the hallway, and ran toward the main entrance, believing that the Glandelinians had not really looked it, for they had not tried it yet. Violet reached the great door first, but when she tried to pull it open, she found it really locked. In bitter despair she and her sisters together tried to pull it open, but it was useless. Then they tried other exits but these were locked also.

"We must get out," meant Angeline piteously, impatiently. "Oh we must get out or we will be burned to death." She was too frightened or felt too miserable to cry. Poor May was trembling, and already crying, and so was Gertrude.

"I won't be got out," screamed May impatiently standing her feet. "Oh please let me out. I don't want to be burned."

Violet and her sisters looked at each other with despair written in their sweet faces. The lurid glow was getting brighter, making quite an unearthly or uncanny color.

"Oh there's no hope at all," cried Angeline. "Do we have to stay in this horrible city, and burn to death, within its smoldering ruins?"

"Oh please dear God aid us if thou wilt," cried Violet looking yearningly up toward heaven. Joice had got a big piece of wood, and all the little girls together tried to use it as a battering ram, to force the door of the main entrance open, but it was utterly useless. They tried the same thing on the other exits but with the same results. Brighter and brighter the glare of the distant fire grew, and the black clouds of smoke were fairly filled with the bright sparks. The roar of falling walls could be plainly heard.

Jennie was still bugging away. "You heavy motherfucker, regardless of the warning when I told you to get out of here, you didn't. Now you're in the burning beam, and that part of the ceiling bringing with it a mass of burning wood. One end of that beam which was not burning, struck Jennie on the head laying her mistretched on the 1st floor. Quickly, reckless on their own, Earl Violet and her sisters rushed toward Jennie, and lifting the beam dragged Jennie out of harm way just as one of the ceiling and the walls caved in with a roar like thunder, making the big factory tremble. They took her to their place of refuge, and decided once once more to find a 1 place of escape.

First of all he was determined to save Vivian and her sisters, at any risk; and he now ran through the heat from the blazing buildings on either side almost blistered his skin and made his clothes smolder. As he approached another child labor factory in front of which were more dead mangled bodies of children, he found that it was full of smoke and fire; he did not bother of going in: it appeared dangerous to enter any way, so he did not but ran as fast as he could looking at every building so that he would be able to see the right one he came out every building of suffocating smoke was already sweeping through the streets, hourly blinding. Gannon but he continued on his way undaunted. For a moment the smoke in passing by was so thick that he could see nothing; but he ran on and when the smoke which nearly smothered him passed by, he could see more fire approaching on his right. The building was certainly burning like strawberry leaves, and even every department in the city could not check the raging fire, which was sweeping everything before it; everything in the path of the fire being consumed like hay, and the big wall of fire behind Gannon was approaching so near that he could feel its fiercest heat very plainly. It looked like if the world was burning up the fire burned so furiously. Many child slaves who had been left locked up in the factories had been burned to death, and a on beyond where the full fugitives had fled from was consumed. Many thousands of Abbeismian women and children with their husbands fathers and others were fleeing from their burning houses, to the sea carrying what they could with them. Wagons were heavily loaded with furniture that could be saved; and though the fleeing fugitives got away from their burning houses, they never in their fears thought about the poor Vivian girls who were prisoners in the burning section of the city. But the districts where the fugitives were jammed together, burned so fast that other fires caused by sparks started elsewhere, and spread so fast that a part of these fugitives being lost in the blinding glare of the storm of fire, and almost blinded by the smoke could not see their way, and sent down the wrong streets, thus running into the danger they wished to avoid, and were surrounded by the conflagration. In vain they tried to seek a place of safety, or some street to get out; but it was useless, and they were all condemned in that horrible sea of fire. At other districts which were not burning yet, the streets were fairly packed with men women and children, and old people. Abbeismians: trains of furniture wagons fairly dotted the streets, while many fire departments, vainly tried to check the approaching hurricanes of fire. Hundreds of fire departments were put in indescribable numbers and over 100,000 fire men fighting furiously to stop the advancing flames, but they might as well have fought home, and to top, for it seemed, as one of the fire captains said: That the devil and all his legions could not stop that hellish storm of fire now.

Scores of firemen were killed, two hundred were injured, and nearly 1,000 were prostrated by the marching, singing heat, while fifty others were crushed by falling walls, and hundreds of others trapped and burned to death, over 2,000 3,000 firemen having perished in fighting the flames. Over 10,000 were injured, 1,000 of them fatally. As Gannon proceeded on his way he came upon a crowd of panic stricken men women and children, who were hurrying toward the sea, and I might as well say that the street was a fairly packed, with furniture, mattresses and wagons moving so slowly. This checked Gannon and prevented him from going to his destination as fast as he wanted to, but filled with desperation, he decided to force his way through that crowd even if he had to use violence. He knew, however, that that the only a stricken fugitives would not get away from that storming sea of fire for it was approaching faster than they could run. He faced toward the crowd, and hurried himself among them like a madman. This made great confusion among the men women and children, but he forced himself through as fast as he could, but the further he went the thicker the crowds grew. He was not violent to the poor frightened children, and even outstayed many of them. At last the crowds began to grow less thick, and soon he had all the streets to himself again. Then he sped on as fast as he could run, but soon found himself blocked by a big row of wagons across the street which were burning furiously. There was one that was only smoking, and he stepped down and crawled under it and to the other side, and proceeded on as fast as he could. It seemed as if the devil himself had been to know it would block the path of the panic stricken crowds. But anyway at the dead end they were going they would be ever taken down by the conflagration, and Gannon wishing to reach his destination before it was too late, proceeded on his way though he was already so exhausted that he could have sunk to the ground, and it was only his prayers for help that kept him from giving in.

He feared that he would never get there, and he also wished that his destination was not so far away. He could even see the fire in the direction of his destination, and he now hoped that God would check the fire as the fire departments were as helpless as if trying to drain the fire from the walls. As fast as he could run he sped, but to his despair, and already he came upon another panic stricken crowd. It is time that the whole street seemed crowded, and what a time he had to wade through it. They fairly crowded and jammed against him, and when a time he had a narrow escape from falling and being trampled upon. From the jostling and crushing many suffered from broken bones, and down children were smothered as thick the crowd was. All the panic stricken ones were trying to get away from that roaring fire storm, but as the burning wagons blocked their path, all their efforts were without avail. A thousand men women and children were nearly panicked and smothered to death, crushed in an instant in the terrible heat within the smothering streets. Sheets of burning smoke driven by a hurricane of hot blustering wind, swept down on the heads and bodies of the panic stricken men women and children, setting their hair and clothing on fire. While the dead children fled whistling through the flames and smoke, and the blustering heat hundreds of those condemned to show aside the burning wagons through many were burned to death for the attempt. The unfortunate nearest to the great wall of fire, rushed away for safety, shouting, wailing, and the fact the distant roar of falling walls was appalling. The panic stricken men women and children fought and tore each others' flesh, for as a crowd to break through the other masses. When they came to the end of the street the fire storm approached nearer and nearer, and was left far behind in their frenzy of terror threw themselves at those in front of them and killed many women and children, in being mad with terror. At still they could only make slow progress, and the conflagration behind was approaching with the deafening roar of some wild tornado. In the meantime Gannon was having a fearful time now. The pains being the danger seemed so near, saw their own children, in all the ways they could, to save them from the horrible fire death, while Gannon fought desperately to get through the crowd. Fortunately in his mad fury he was making swift progress, than the others, but still the stream of extricable tangled human beings seemed to have no end, and in his terrible violence Gannon used terrible violence to those in his way, leaving many dead and injuring others.

"If they were not such cowards and would go on more faster they would be able to escape," he muttered angrily. "Oh the poor Vivian girls, will I never get there?"

The city now looked very red, while the black smoke, from the light of the fearful fire looked very red, nearly like orange, while the noise of burning others, flew in all directions, the wind becoming a whirling gale. Gannon now wished that God would send some rain, for he could hardly make any headway through such thick crowds, which he knew could not be able to escape without thousands of them being caught on account of the rapid advance of the fearful storm of fire. It certainly did look like a hell. The air was getting more hot and stifling and the distant fires had increased to full furiously burning while districts. Gannon had only half a mile to go yet but he could move him there already, if it had not been for the panic stricken crowds. But in his relief far ahead he could see the end of the long line of people and he made greater efforts to force his way through. Staggering and pained and still he had to work his way through. But at last he came to the end of the line, and forced his way through with all his strength, hurling many to the ground. But not a single helpless child did he lay a rude hand on, though as many of the men or women fell, they bore the screaming children to the street where they were smothered to death or crushed and strangled. Being free from the mass, Gannon sped on, his way as fast as he could. This time he came upon some more children who fairly covered the street with their mangled bodies, but he had to walk over them as he was nothing else to do. But soon he left the dead snow, and continued on his way though exhausted as he already was. Far off the bright lurid glow met over the city by the sea as fire smacked Gannon to near his destination quite a short distance. As he continued on, buildings far behind him belated with a roar, and the falling debris and walls blocked the street, and the surrounding fugitives were cut off from escape. All along down the street on both sides where the panic stricken people jammed together, the walls of the burning houses collapsed, crushing hundreds, and the poor victims were consumed in a very quick of fire. My how it did advance! Gannon was Gannon's peril was getting greater every minute, and it seemed as if he would be caught by the fire before he could even reach his destination, which he noticed was already burning.

From the roof masses of smoke rose lazily, fell on the tar covered surface, and slowly died, while clouds of pink tinted smoke curled above the beautiful ferns. He dashed up the long flight of marble steps with a heavy club he had picked up battered away at the door and down it fell with a crash. A volume of black smoke belched out at him, but placing a wet handkerchief over his mouth he dashed into the burning hall of the factory. In the rear of the hall where there was no fire yet, was a winding flight of stairs leading to the floors above, and as Gannon dashed in, a shower of sparks floated lightly down, and fell through an open hatchway, to a small cellar on the second floor in which a heap of rubbish of dead bodies lay. He caught a glimpse of a man lying face down on the floor, and as he plunged up to the third floor he noticed that it was a roaring furnace. He threw one glance over his head, and perceived through a hole in the ceiling, the glare of a flame suddenly threw out a thin red tentacle which gently released a portion of the ceiling, and let it fall to the stairs once let that hole in the ceiling furnish a draft for the ignited rubbish in the cellar below, once let the flames eat the ceiling large enough, and the shaft would become a veritable flue, up which the fire would rush with a speed and force, that nothing whatever, could stay or check. Already another shower of sparks fell and he bounded down again, and when he reached the smoke filled hall, what he most feared happened. With a tremendous crashing and ripping a huge mass of ceiling above gave way and fell with a roar down the shaft to the burning basement, revealing a roaring mass of flames under the roof. As if stirred to life, the fire below sucked into activity by the draft through the aperture, in the blazing roof sprang upward quickly, and fixed itself on the staircases, staircases and the ceilings. Down the hallway ran Gannon stumbling over buckets and furniture, to the window at the end of the hall, jerked up the sash, wrenched at it until he tore it inward and threw it into the open court of a vacant room with a crash of breaking glass. Near him was that room where Violet and her sisters were. When he had just thrown the window away, that was the moment they became unconscious from suffocation. He did not know whether they were in there or not, but he went toward it anyway as the heavy cloud of smoke from burning wood swept toward him accompanied by the increasing roar of the fire. With a rush like an explosion the fire leaped through all the upper and lower stories and burned through all the windows with a jangle of broken glass. The street was partly illuminated before, now shone as light as day. Gannon snapped his teeth tightly together in dismay, for the human beings could be seen through that surge of flames. Down his own hall came more bursts of heat and flames. Dead for a minute by the sudden rush of searing air, Gannon managed to batter down that door, and seeing the children, he quickly dragged them out one by one. With his mouth smothering in gasps, that seemed to inhale molten lava, the veins in his forehead starting, and his strength ebbing with every moment, Gannon with a long rope tied all the children to a mattress, that was wet. The smell of burning cloth from the second room, the furnace like air of the place, and the stifling clouds of smoke, made the pause of a few minutes between the operations seem like storm-tides, and he fairly groaned in pain as he labored. But now tugging away on the rope, and suffocating himself, he dragged the children along the hot hall. The hall was now burning in many places, and as soon as he reached the entrance, all the hall became a roaring furnace. He quickly got them down the stairs, quickly out of the way of the belching flue, and untied the rope around them.

The encounters between the vivian girls in their spying in the city section of vivian wiskey called Andean, and the Glandelinians, and the child slaves had occurred during the months of December and starting into January but still they had just been rescued by Gannon and where he takes them will be seen in other section of volume after the description of the battle of Evangelina Granda. Throughout the whole month of November and December the early month which the vivian girls had their adventures with Gannon and so on great doings were also on during the siege of vivian wiskey.

At the moment of the arrival of general Hansons immense armies near the region of pleighburg andini landing admiral Jensinia Drakoonia had seized from a defenseless part of the rebel navy by sheer force and during severe conflicts a fleet of nearly a thousand vessels of draught form but longer and each carrying nearly a hundred nine inch guns and many others on turrents and the ships were also made fit to sent forth torpedoes. When he had also succeeded in securing this vast fleet and had it put into trim he having also secured a immense force of troops set out to storm the rebel batteries on the gorma gun shore near where it runs into the Krainis gun river these batteries being known as the Battery Line Junction and the river was called the Battery Line river. The expedition started on the 10th of November All Saints day and the main main flagship was called the little Julia Pm Francis and was commanded by the admiral himself. As fleet was divided into two sections and unluckily for him he did not know the strength of the rebel callants on which these batteries were, and his adventure with the rebels of Angelina did not prove so successful as he had hoped for. As his expedition was started it happened that on the ninth day of November in a blinding rain storm, turning to snow and hail later, he was pursued and overtaken by the Rebel Angelinian warships and cruisers and r transports, and in the conflict only two of his first fleet escaped destruction and he suffered an enormous loss in men. The battle was terrible beyond description, the cannonade having been so loud that a million of fish were killed in the river and bay and cities all around reported broken windows and shattered walls. The admiral lost everything he had in those damaged ships and though of course he had won the conflict and routed the enemy fleet with the loss of a hundred ships he had suffered the worse, and was forced to put in for shelter to the place he secured the ships and make a fresh start for the broken expedition.

This expedition up the gorma river was indeed terrific. On the twentieth of November being able and persevering he made other expeditions, go at times skirted the rebel shores as near as he dared and when ever it was possible for him to make a landing attack the rebels and take from them provisions and ammunition he did so and veritically staged a number of famous Gettysburgs and Antietams on the gorma river shore but most of his attacks were repulsed and the troops forced to this to the ship ships. It seemed as difficult to take vivian wiskey by water as by land.

The wicked glandelinian rebels however who had never held back from robbing the unfortunate galverinians now found out how it felt to be attacked and raided. One on one of his expeditions the admiral reached the nearest point toward the fortifications of juellie placken Rickson and was just in time to seize upon some rebel ships about to sail down the river with a vast number of a child slaves on board.

"At last I have had my revenge," said the admiral for more child slaves than he could manage fell into his hands, and he was obliged to abandon that expedition and take the children to the christian camps for transportation toward Abyssinians.

After his rescue of sixty thousand child slaves he again made it his object to attack the rebel shore batteries. He reached the object safely this time and succeeded in passing two fortresses after a storming artillery fire of two days and nights and shelled the batteries as the fleets proceeded on its course of bombardment. One of the ships during the duel of shore batteries and ship guns went to pieces under shrapnell and shell, fire rafts routed ten others, torpedoes and mines sunk a number and three others were lost and finally getting it worse and worse right along the fleet again was compelled to turn back.

It appeared that the rebellion of the Glandelinians was showing Glandelinia herself just now to be one of the mightiest powers in the world. Vivian wiskey was, she had already partly conquered Galverinia in the west by holding vivian wiskey, and had almost conquered southern and northern Angelina, and had destroyed a section of Angelina's navy a little after the battle of Ester Starring. But since that time at Hansons orders Angelina, Abbeaunda, Tripoligonilia and Bombobis, and also Goncentina and even Gormonina were or had been employing all men not in the armies by draft and conscription in the ship building and so within nearly eight months time had built so many ships that Angelina herself had soon a mighty fleet of warships to use against vivian wiskey and her sections.

It was Hansons purpose to open the gorma and Krainis rivers and blockade them so the rebels would not get supplies from the south on which they could maintain the wicked rebellion.

with practically the most terrible losses to both sides.

The cannonading was dreadful. The duel was ten miles in extent, the river was lashed into waves by the concussion, the explosions tore over and around the fortresses by the thousands per minute, the artillery uproar was deafening as the volleys vol vol volences blowing to pieces every minute, and fires made the scene an inferno. The fortresses suffered heavy damage, guns were dismounted and crippled parts breached but it held out successfully against the bombardment and smoke the Angelinian and Abbeismann fleet. The battered ships with masts and smoke stacks and gun turrets torn away, slowly drifted down the river, with two rebel fleets in swift pursuit. At length it encountered the fire of rebel guns on shore probably from the Battery Line river section and the inferno of guns was redoubled as the fleets fought each other. At length the most terrible part of the storm of firing broke out. Finally unable to do anything but to retreat to avoid annihilation, the crippled fleet of the christians was forced to go ground the south bend in an effort to get back to its source but ship after ship was wrecked, set on fire, of bloom out of the water, and sunk by torpedoes and mines, others were driven on the shore by attacking rebel ships and wrecked on the rocks.

While the retreat of the fleet and thing occurred. Admiral Hawkins of the first fleet died of his wounds before reaching his naval base. Drakemia the other admiral won a few victories on the pursuing rebel fleets, but sickness and discouragement broke out among his men, and at last the hardy Angelinian admiral was killed by the enemy fire on shore near Jennie. Ivanov on the north mouth of the Unbeam Creek during another engagement with the rebel fleet.

~~They~~ all the ground they had.

"Of such admirals as these, Heroes of god as well of Angelina and all Christianity, heaven never makes but one at a time, and if we lost lose like they did with such disaster again; Good bye to the luck of Angelina. We will be worsted by the rebels aurs enough. 'Thout ivian wickes being recovered we can do t nothing to overthrow this ruse insurrection of the southern states of Angelina."

whole garrison without giving quarter. General was enraged declaring this to be an outrage.

The rebel general was enraged declaring this to be an outrage. He indignantly tore the letter in shreds, and hastily ordered his garrison, and batteries to be prepared for attack, though he knew that there were ten to his one of the Nationals and their fleets had batteries which could blow all before them. But alas for the brave Glandelinian general. As troops feeling more in the favor of Angelinas cause and having been really force into the war by complete conscription, were willing to give up the water way of Carbondale. In vain did the rebel general declare he would rather die than surrender, the rebels could not find so many Nationals. They stood gallantly but the majority not in favor of the rebellion deserted or would not join the fight and the rebel general was compelled to yield. He put in his surrender but refused stoutly to sign a treaty and shot himself right before the Angelinian generals.

general. As luck befell many generals during the frightful seige of Vivian Winkey. From Lake Angelina general Frank Lassaler sent general Griffin with a troop of glandolins and ummeranians back to Norma Catherine from Androm, and instructed his generals to return with a supply of provisions and ammunition. With the remainder of his division the rebel general then worked his way through the gloom-obluminian forests to a section of the Sunbeam Creek way far from here he succeeded in capturing an unfinished christian fortress and drove the christian back to the main line, but the rebels hereafter were under fire for six weeks without giving in, and the rebels because of their hardships and suffering and frightful losses called it "Fort Damnation." General Griffin's division however met with disaster in an encounter with general Williamsberger's ummeran army into which it came into contact, and it was never known whether the rebel division had been captured or was routed so disgracefully by the Angelinians as to be unable to reorganize. The loss of general Griffin's army to Lassaler was indeed a most severe blow, but the rebel general was a man of utmost determination, and he began to plan a way out of the difficulty. Seeing he could not retain the fort he had captured from the Angelinians he abandoned it and began a retreat toward Frontonas run. In spite of cold, snowstorms, wild pursuit and harassed by insufficient food and provisions, he pushed bravely forward with his division with general under was his guide.

with general winter was his guide. Often they tramped for many miles in full retreat for miles through blinding storms, the uniforms frozen stiff, at other times in crossing frozen marshes and marshes exposed to fire of besieging artillery above the woods on high hills and fortresses, and in the cold and storms and sniped by snipers and shelled by water. The army in its they would be compelled to wade waist deep through snow and water. The army in its disgraceful retreat was almost exhausted when a familiar sight greeted their eyes: before them far in the distance loomed the gray sentinels of Fort Lucille, Jackson. A distance of thirty miles.

before than far in the distance. The distance of thirty miles. In the retreat they had in two weeks covered a distance of thirty miles. But continued misfortune continued to pursue this brave rebel general and his division. He found bitter christianian enemies on all sides who tried in every way to crush him and his division. Once he was poisoned and barely escaped death. He found even that christian agents and raiders plundered him, and that rebel troops in overwhelming numbers had seized his positions before he could reach the Lucille Jackson fortifications, and before he could rear retreat with the remaining provisions. Lsaaller heard further disastrous news. From two scouts or spies he learned that soon after his departure for the expedition he had made and met far failure nearly all of the other division under him had been forced from fort Monty and the fort destroyed. These Angelinian forces it was said were now fortifying themselves on the coast of Yor a river watching for a chance to cross over and attack a section of the great fortress in the rear. Lsaaller having been heavily reinforced chosen nine trusted brigades and hastened to give battle to this section of the besieging christian army. soon his forces overtook the retreating nationals who were attacked and routed. lasallers thought now was of fort penty. Was it still intact or ruined as he received in the reports. and the handful of men who had remained true been able to survive the dangers of the siege. On the 1st of november 1912 lasaller once more set out for the gorma gun taking with him twenty five hundred thousand men. the long trip through conflicts, and blizzards was made successfully, but alas the fort was in ruins the camp destroyed, and the rebel general found that the Angelinians had swept over the whole region, spreading terror and destruction in their path in every direction far and near did general lasaller search for clues of so many of his missing men but none could be found. He was still determined however to beat the besiegers along his part on their own guns, and managed to collect another army from Mis-Allister stanek and supplies to carry out another expedition into the christian territory of the siege. Imagine his joy when on reaching the east bend of the gunbeas creek he carried a christian intrenchment and rescued many of his comrades who had been taken prisoner by the nationals. The An Rebels prisoners having been rescued the newly formed comrades traveled together toward gorma gun, when discouraging news came. General lasalle lasaller. A fleet of glandelinian war frigates and transports carrying several million dollars worth of provisions up the river for his own divisions had been wrecked by christian shore and hill batteries and everything was lost.

No ill amount of ill luck however could turn this heroic general of the rebels from the course he had determined upon and it was not long before the Angelinian generals discovered he was making another desperate expedition. During that fatal expedition Angelinian savorly men had hid in ambush and shot the rebel leader dead and destroyed half of his division in the blood massacre.

Other horrors also occurred during the bloody wivian like wickey siege. On a pleasant day in October 1912..... General Phillip Rhode a rebel general suddenly made a bushmacking attack upon general gunwasea division of Abbiannians and his encampments. He attack had come without notice for suddenly from behind scores of thousands of trees, every rock in the region, they were fired upon in Indian fashion by the glandelinians. Many Angelinians forced to fight the rebels in the same fashik fashion turned the region and the encampment into an inferno of firearms and small cannon, the tents and ammunition dumps were fired by the rebels and the scene was exciting indeed. During this one days attack believe it will you, a thousand great explosions occurred. During the battle many myriads of men on both sides fell. It was very seldom however that the enemy ever had this method of fighting for they usually come out into the open making a bold assault, but this time they had hid behind shelter of any kind, untill their victims were too near to escape their rifle fire. They had however during the night with horrible yells sprang like phantoms at the christians and destroyed all the tents of the encampment and committed deadly work.

News of the bloody attack had spread rapidly and the main division of the christian army here became thoroughly aroused. When the assault of the enemy however became very successful and the encampment was burned and the ammunition dumps blown up, the entire frontier of the christian lines at this section was terror stricken, even the women and boy refugees who had before this escaped to the christian lines armed themselves to help the troops repel the attacks and showed themselves to be regular warriors. Little girls even when an opportunity presented itself threw stones and mud at the attacking rebels and make them know that even little children could fight them as well as soldiers even if they could not handle rifles and cannon. During the attack which extended for ten miles no general Headquarters was even safe, for the rebel attackers in forcing the christian troops from the encampments rushed in, and stealing women and children, set fire to the buildings and getting away with important dispatches and letters, and dragging their prisoners into the forest.

On the morning the attack was resumed by the enemy with redoubled violence but now more openly and the battle raged frightfully. With about one million fifteen hundred glandelinians general Ohillip swept over a whole christian intrenchment, calling on his officers and generals to press on when his men received a withering fire that committed dreadful havoc. General Groton, Medfield, Harolborough on the rebel side were killed when the second desperate assault was won, and any other christian encampments with all stores and provision trains were destroyed, and the routed christian soldiers shot down by scores every minute by their foes fled through the woods to the rear in terror. General Brookfield, and perilled coming up with two divisions tried to stem the rout and check the enemy but could not make any success, but by a curious circumstance general Hadleys troops repulsed the attack along their own line. When the furious victory flushed glandelinians burst upon this portion of a rallied christian division, the Angelinians after firing for several hours became so confused by the pressure of the attack, and seemed unable to make any defense. Suddenly there appeared another division led by a very old general with a long white beard. Immediately he seeing the situation took the leadership and gave a military command. The astonished Angelinian troops who which had been in confusion and were starting to retreat quickly recovered their senses, fell into fighting order and following their venerable leader rallied other divisions and soon the combined drove the rebels back at this section and captured three thousand glandelinians as prisoners. Toward evening most of the whole section of christian troops that had been so disgracefully routed were rallied by force, some beaten back to the firing line, and shown discipline that would terrify the devil himself till they finally were shot down mercilessly and so many beaten and threatened till they finally rallied and toward nightfall the remainder of the attacking glandelinian column were killed and driven back with dreadful loss and two more generals killed counter attacked and the christian side was wounded. The rebels then intrenched but perilled on the christian side was wounded. This region was little less than a swamp and the rebels in the night built barricades of abatis and palisades of such strong trees and limbs and rocks that they felt perfectly secure should the christian in the morning counter attack in general they preferred to resume the fighting when the morning approached by renewing the attack themselves with the help of reinforcements. Inside the captured camp were two thousand girl children and three thousand boy children who had been captured from the christian encampments during the attacks of the two days before. But the glandelinians were soon to learn they had made a mistake in collecting so many child rebels as they called them afterwards in one place. As one had said the rebels were "Coooped up for slaughter". The Angelinians had no idea of delaying the resumption of the battle untill the morning of October. Toward midnight about one million ten thousand well armed troops under general Winalover with cannon and machine guns came on a well armed front, and despite suffering from stinging cold, the biting wind, and the fatigue of wading through deep snow made a violent attack of savage fury covered by a terrific artillery storm that smashed the encampments with lead and wounded glandelinians, torn tore down the branches of trees, split trees in twain and confused even the children who were fleeing to the rear of the camp. The Angelinians had no idea of children being in the encampments or of other wise the artillery would not have been fired at long range. The rebels however had been taken entirely by surprise but they fought desperately all night long making an inferno snow out of the woods. One regiment after another of the Angelinians were shot down, untill more than two hundred thousand lay dead or dying on the snow covered marshes. The rebels however were killed alone in greater numbers, and at last the Angelinians pressing onward and onward in the face of a fire of rifle and cannon that tore through their ranks even to the rear they carried the first encampments and set fire to the first line of palisades and forts capturing 10,000 rebels and rescuing the children. Five hundred glandelinian camps were burned to the ground by morning, and with them perished nearly twenty thousand wounded glandelinians and the rebels of the other encampments kept the christian back from by their were firing. General Gannonia the rebel commander was taken prisoner by the Angelinians driven back made his escape, but later was taken prisoner by the Angelinians and his troops dispersed. One of the Angelinian generals whose name was Gannonia was so badly wounded that he had to be supported but he said to general Gannonia who had been captured;

"Pardon me that you will try to stop the rebellion and we will spare your life."

But the old glandelinian stoically replied;

"I would rather die before I would surrender to christian dogs which would be unworthy of myself. We will fight to the last man rather than allow you christian dogs to recapture wivian wickey."

The other rebel troops who still held the remaining encampments they had captured waited untill noon of the third day before they tried to get their revenge. When five Angelinian divisions and two brigades and two others on the left of Phillips glandelinian force made an assault that carried beyond any fury ever known, but the Glandelinian resistance was just as desperate and the battle raged most wildly all the rest of the day. They knew they were fighting not only for their lives, but for the future of wivian wickey. With heroic efforts and with great determination they struggled the to subdue the christian storm and repulse thirteen most desperate assaults. At the same time a 1 their generals made every effort to keep up the confidence of their men. The christians troops however soon captured the second encampment and all the artillery after sustaining losses never recorded before since the battle of Ester Starring or Angeline gun.

During the fray another christian general whose name was Church succeeded in capturing the generals wife and child of the enemy side in taking his headquarters but they were immediately released on orphanage. The recapture of the encampments had cost the Angelinians more than one million in killed and wounded, and a great deal of provisions and tents. Twelve other christian encampments consisting of cities of tents and even barracks miles in extent had been completely destroyed, and many fa country sides within the christian lines laid in waste. But the perseverance and courage of the christians here brought them the brilliant victory and the main foe line receded the following day and for the rest of the time until May all was quiet at this section of the siege.

Still in the meantime the Angolinian besiegers under invasion were building other fortresses of siege on the gunbeam River. This river unite with the great gorma run to form the Kramind and the Angolinians considered the junction of the two mighty rivers one of the most important gateways to force way to Ivian wickay. As soon as general pinmiddle of the glandelinian army here learned what the Angolinian besiegers were doing, he decided that the time had come to settle the matter for good and all. He found it impossible to start assaults at that time as garrison batteries were keeping up a continual storm of destruction everywhere with shot shell and high explosives, mines were gorging the ground and woods were being shattered so he decided to order the Angolinian besiegers to stop the work and a young officer with a troop of soldiers bearing a flag of truce was chosen to be the bearer of the important order. It was lieutenant Frank Monteculmer then only more than twenty years of age. He young lieutenant found a dangerous and difficult journey before him indeed. The country through which he passed was full of hostile christian soldiers, there were no roads or bridges these having been destroyed by the besiegers, and deep snow covered the trails. But he was always fearless in the discharge of duty and after many exciting adventures and once caught in an ambush and escaping and hardships the for journey was completed with only six of his three hundred followers remaining, and the messenger tried to slip into the christian lines to give the message. He was however captured with his companions who securing the letter held him as a spy and sending one of his companions back to the rear of the lines said:

"You may tell the rebel general that we are possessing this part of the country, that we will press the siege to the utmost, and we intend to go on with out work until Ivian wickay falls and the rebellion is ended."

The brave young officer thought a rebel however was not shot as supposed but held on probation. There seemed nothing to do for the glandelinians but to build extra fortresses to add to the bigger ones and in this way to a possession of outer works of the christian line of siege. A large body of glandelinian engineers and construction workers were sent to begin work on a spot on which general Allister Stanek had selected in his plans, but the Angolinians who had moved to that section in far larger numbers than the rebels had supposed, drove the rebels to their own lines after a hot skirmish lasting three hours, and capturing the stronghold finished it for themselves within two days. This they named port pique. The Angolinians however did not win this victory without further bloodshed.

General Washington of the rebels made an attack of general violence upon the fortress a week later and many of the Angolinians were killed and wounded and other carried away as prisoners but the attack nevertheless was repulsed. In great haste the rebels now began to build another shelter near their main fortress for they well knew the Angolinians would next attack them. In the remembrance of the conflict the glandelinian general and his body of troops fought bravely and desperately but they could not so long withstand the superior force of the Angolinians and he was obliged to surrender his glandelinian force, the enemy were now throughout aroused over this disaster and determined to drive back the christian concentration and force a passage through the Sunbeam River. Accordingly general bradton an old experienced glandelinian soldier was sent over to the beleaguered glandelinian territory to lead the rebels in their fight against the Angolinians at this point, with him came the gray coated divisions and regiments of the regular Myrdic A. Allisterian army. Now thought the wicked glandelinians who were delighted over this: "We shall soon see the christian dogs fleeing to the rear and we will break their line of siege."

There was indeed no disputing the fact that general bradton knew a great deal of fighting in the regular way against Angolinian armies in the open field, but it was equally certain that he knew nothing whatever about the fierce fighting he was to undergo in the forest section of the besieging lines against the Tripontigonians who were concentrated concentrated there. General Allister Stanek however had given general bradton some sound advice about the best method of fighting the Tripontigonians, and warned him to proceed cautiously and quietly. But general bradton replied that while the Angolinians were no doubt more than a match for the Glandelinians, they certainly could make no impression of the Zimmermannian regulars of which he commanded. It was therefore with flying banners and loud music and roll of drums that he marched his soldiers against the christian trenches to rattle the battle. Alas when too late general bradton found that his young superior was right. He saw he had to attack the christian enemies who poured a withering fire out of steep ravines, from salients, from impenetrable marshes, and from high breastworks that could not be scaled, and from behind trees shrubs, and thickets. But he pressed the attack with desperation moving his columns in long lines firing as they went until the woods was hidden in smoke so thick you could not see a hundred yards.

The glandelinians were brave indeed but to stand against the christian fire was impossible. The enemy were more than willing to fight, three times their long lines surged up to the strong positions of the christians tore their way through the abatis, but could not reach the enemy whose fire of artillery and rifles was annihilating. For five terrible long hours the attacks were continued however with desperation and for the same length of time the Angolinians kept up their murderous fire, and once the Tripontigonians with mad yells that echoed the woods above the roar of battle counter charged with savage ferocity and sent the repulsed glandelinians fleeing for their lives. At the end of that time fields of dead and wounded glandelinians lay dead and the confused survivors were firing as they retreated. All of general bradton's generals and other officers of even the lowest rank were killed or wounded. He himself had seven horses shot under him, and fourteen balls passed through his coat and the dreadful carnage before he received a mortal wound, and at midnight by the light of the torch while the battle was still raging the officer who took his stead read the burial service over the grave of the common commanders. When the young general sadly led the defeated Glandelinians back under fire to their own positions and made ready to repel an attack from the christians should it come. In the meantime general invasion had shown some interest in this terrible battle and sent a force of brigades to stem the tide of advancing rebels. With them in command of the reinforcements advanced the daring brave general seguinay who had done so much for Ivian wickay and her sisters during their time in the "Reign of Terror" inside of gorma Catherine. Fresh from the scene of battle he had come. Seguinay's first advantage that evening caused the capture of a general Gwesgoe a brilliant success indeed, and a hard blow to the rebels whose bloody attack over a line of battle six miles long was slaughtered with such a disaster. This repulse gave the christians control over this section of the position's next move toward mid night caused the enemy still greater alarm. For with eight million troops under command of a hundred generals and through directions by telegraph and wireless the general cross a long line of the enemy's works and positions and captured Fort St O'Phillip and Joan which had been in the possession of the enemy and captured a large force of rebels. This was known as the first Gibraltar of Ivian wickay to be captured by the Angolinians. For it had been one of the strongest fortresses of Ivian wickay, and one of the most important, for it stood on Cape St John's Island at the entrance to the mouth of the Gorma River. It covered a large plot of ground, and its thick walls were over a hundred feet high. With capture through resistance however caused general seguinay over one third of his army in killed and wounded and all of his battleflags were torn to shreds by the fierce firing during the engagement. Once in possession of this famous salient the Angolinians at this point were soon able to control a part of the gorma River and prevent the enemy in Ivian wickay, from receiving help by this water way. Batteries were to be erected here so they could fire into the city. In the following morning Fort Diquesada also fell into the hands of the Angolinians after more stern fighting for three hours. All throughout that day also the fierce fighting continued with savage fury.

The decisive action of this battle came on the afternoon when the Angolinians captured the main line of trenches in the woods extending for seven miles. For weeks the Glandelinian generals at this point had known that the besiegers were planning to force the siege even closer and would attack their strongholds at this point, and had used every means in their power to strengthen the defenses. He had expected the attacks to come as mostly from the christian besieging warships and pun' boats below in the river but he they had been sadly mistaken.

During the main assault general Frank Wolfe with several million men scaled steep heights in the woods and joined battle hand to hand with the rebels in a manner that astounded both enemies themselves. Words indeed could not described the astonishment of the rebel generals when on that bloody afternoon they saw the Angolinian forces forlong their way in the face of the most murderous fire and crashing through abatis and every kind of obstruction. Was it possible that these were the Angolinian soldiers attacking so desperately all day long without a moments respite, and that the ships below were bombing the position were really soldiers or demons. The situation was indeed a most desperate one for the Glandelinians but the rebel generals never flinched in time of danger.

"This is serious business with the dirty christian dogs," he said calmly and immediately gave his orders to have the artillery in open upon the successful attackers. Officers through all that seething inferno of smoke, bursting shells, rifle fire, yelling of fighters, crash of musketry, and the ringing of steel on steel, the nicking of horses, and the cries and groans of wounded and dying, spurred their own horses forward, now in one direction, now in another, and among the troops that were in the greatest activity spurring them on to fight to the last. By ten o'clock that evening or night the rebel generals had rallied to their now shattered Glandelinian forces and amid shouting and redoubled firing, rushed in a counter assault upon the Angolinian foe. But the Angolinians had pushed forward with such force and v ferocity that again the enemy were obliged to fall back.

Montie Calmer of the rebels a general mounted on his spirited horse, galloped back and forth in the inferno among his disordered troops, trying in vain to spur them on to make a fresh counter attack. But they had given up all hope of hopes of standing their ground here and many were already running for their lives. As the general was swept along by the wild rush through the woods, a bullet entered his back and fatally wounded him. Tenderly supporting their gallant commander, his body guard led his horse to the rear of the line. The next few minutes he had died. When told that the end was near he said:

"It is better so indeed, to know that I can only be happy to realize I shall not live to see the christians drive my troops out of the Red Riding Hood woods. His dying thoughts were for the men of his own army. His last words to one of his glanderlinian generals were 'The probable humanity of the Angelinian soldiers sets my mind at peace to know they are good to wounded glanderlinians in battle. Feel toward them as they have caused me to feel though they are enemy enemies. Do not even let them perceive they have changed masters.'"

The confusion and distress in the battle field of Red Riding Hood were so great that no coffin could be found for the dead glanderlinian commander and he had to be laid at rest in a deep grave under an elm tree. There was no cannon to fire a volley over the grave of the brave glanderlinian soldier for all the cannon were used to suppress the wild christian assault, but the glanderlinians that loved and trusted him, and even the Angelinian enemy that had defeated and killed him, respected his memory and afterwards honoured his name for though a glanderlinian commander he was not a wicked man and fought only because he believed his cause was right and did not think the war was over child slavery but that the Angelinians had unjustly invaded Glanderlinia.

In the capture of this strong steep salient in the woods general Wolfe and glegemari had assisted general Pankhurst and had shown great courage and skill in the grand assault. When the report of their brilliant conduct reached general Hanson he decided that general glegemari should be placed in main command of the army operating here, and the main foe forces driven from the field. The enemy had as he knew retreated to their last positions up on high steep hills. Many officers opposed the idea of such an assault upon the stronger position of the foe to which the enemy had been driven and some generals declared that general Hanson must be mad and asked Hanson about the affair. General Hanson conducting the battle also said:

"Mad is he! then I hope he will bite some of the Glanderlinian generals." No one knew better than general glegemari the difficulties and dangers of proceeding on with the desperate assault, and of the undertakings that had been assigned to him. Could he capture that formidable position to which the enemy had been driven after the loss of one of their generals. A great responsibility rested upon his shoulders. If he could capture it the battle would probably be ended. He at once ordered his fleet of ships to continue the bombardment of the foe salients and then concentrating his forces and waiting for the morning waited for the promised reinforcements before him on high salients lay the enemy in a more strongly entrenched position than before. All along the salient were placed foe cannon and general glegemari felt it would be almost impossible for him to force this position. He knew also that even general Hanley himself was starting forward with a part of his large army to oppose him. One the approach of daybreak however his scouts made a happy discovery. With them scouting they had saw a number of steep narrow paths winding along the sides of the cliffs to the heights where the position of the foe were. If only his men could get up these rocky pathways. After thinking the matter over carefully general glegemari decided to make the hazardous attempt.

Before eight o'clock in the morning the divisions of redcoats and purple coats made the assault. It was a long hard climb indeed under fire of shrapnell and canister and rifle balls from above, and many troops had to go up almost perpendicular cliffs with only here and there a bush or tree to hold to. But by sunrise the army had completely made the ascent, and after raging the battle once more all day the enemy were forced from the stronghold with terrible loss and in confusion beyond describing and the stubborn battle was finally won. Thousands of small fires were built in celebration for the victory.

Nevertheless for both sides many mothers mourned for their loved ones that fell in this terrible battle, and the people of many nations forbade to profane the grief of the stricken christian mothers with the clamor of their rejoicing over the victory.

With the fall of this vast Glanderlinian position the rebel power in this section was broken and the Angelinians became in possession and started to construct besieging works here. The rebels had also surrendered all the land and woods in this location and the christians came into possession of other sections of woods also and the siege was tightly contracted.

Had any one dreamed to walk in the lines of the violent glanderlinian rebel troops under general Hanley himself concentrating his left wing just arrived a little beyond Evangelina Crania after his great victory on Hanson's army any one might have a chance to meet a very tall man, apparently carelessly dressed, with a slouching gate and an air of indifference. Such was the general appearance of general Cuba Anna. But if any one had seen this same Glanderlinian general an hour later in the glanderlinian generals headquarters building or tribunal you would have scarcely believed your eyes indeed. In the heat of an exciting debate over the situation of the christian siege of Vivian Wickey this glanderlinian general's look form was soon to straighten, his calm face became intense, his wicked eyes flash fire, while the magic of his words held his scores of thousands of hearers spellbound. After his first important speech concerning the siege of Vivian Wickey, a one of the glanderlinian officers who was also a listener said:

"He can make our bold blood run cold with his horrible descriptions of the siege, and our hair stand on end."

Such was the power of this great Glanderlinian orator and general who thought he could help in bringing about the breaking of the siege of Vivian Wickey as formally said to be known as the "siege of Vivian Wickey or Lucille Jackson. Let's see how it happened."

A little after the bloody battle of Evangelina Crania after general Hanson's army had fallen back a considerable distance toward Gunbeam Creek and started to concentrate heavily in numbers there and erect breastworks and salients a demand to general Mic-Allister Stanek was sent by general Hanson himself to surrender or give up the city of Vivian Wickey and her fortresses. By this demand the rebel authorities were obliged if they did so to surrender a vast "Abraham" and in this way would break the rebellion, and would enable general Hanson to throw his army into Glanderlinia.

"It is therefore only fair," said general Hanson to Hanson his superior. "That the glanderlinian authorities should surrender the city and give up their rebellion."

Now among all the Glanderlinian generals inside of Vivian Wickey it was believed an insult by the christians to demand a surrender of general Mic-Allister. Or hundreds of days during the siege already their generals had stood against the christian besiegers and they did not see any reason why they should yield now. Each glanderlinian general had his legislature, elected by Mic-Whitherqueban at the time, and if it chose to accept the demand for surrender, well and good.

But as the glanderlinian authorities were not allowed no voice in the national government, and as the surrender would be an unconditional one, it seemed to them "very unjust" that general Hanson "the worse christian dog of all" should decide that Mic-Allister Stanek should surrender Vivian Wickey and her fortresses to the nationals. Prominent generals such as general Hanley himself went scouts and men into the very besieging christian lines to protest that a demand for surrender was tyranny. From throughout the captured sections of Vivian Wickey the rebels were aroused over the demand of surrender. And furthermore the glanderlinian generals did not want any christian generals to dare demand anything of them and they declared that in spite of heaven and earth fighting then they would be able to protect themselves against Hanson's and Hanson's besieging armies of christian skinflints, and that any true bearer hereafter sent toward their lines would be shot down without mercy whether he carried a thousand white flags or even an American Standard besides their own.

They even declared that despite the size of the besieging christian armies, if they received armies from all of the world, and from all of heaven itself the christians could never capture Vivian Wickey within ten years. The Angelinian generals however did not pay any attention to the protest of the rebels and kept up the heavy shelling of the many glanderlinian positions and earthworks and the city itself. The leaders and generals among the glanderlinians therefore urged all the higher generals to refuse to answer to any further summons to surrender, and general Cuba Anna was one of the foremost of these leaders. The wicked man even said to say befied God and all heaven to capture Vivian Wickey for the christians, and again repeated that Vivian Wickey would never be captured within ten years.

A few moments after he began to speak against the demand of surrender his listeners were leaning forward in breathless silence. The young general's father who was also there, was so amazed and delighted by his son's mastery of words that "tears of ecstasy streamed down his cheeks. When the oration came to a close the soldiers bore Cuba on their shoulders out of the building and carried him through one glanderlinian company street after another in triumph. At this general's name was to become known throughout the whole of Glanderlinia and was afterwards called the Patrick Henry of Glanderlinia.

At the time of the six days battle in the Red Riding Hood Woods, he was given his gallantry during the struggle a higher commission. On his thirty first birth day only a few days after receiving the higher commission a debate arose over general Hanson's demand to surrender of Mic-Allister Stanek's surrender of Vivian Wickey.

On the day when the surrender of the city had been demanded by general Hanson, all unnecessary workings in the foe armies was suspended, bombardments and forays increased more frequently, and flags were raised at half masts. Bells were tolled, there was a tumult of explosions, a uproar of whistles in all parts of the city, and every other sound of excitement. Urged by general Adams the glandelinian Assembly sent to general McAllister Stanek a letter asking him to allow a general assault upon the whole besieging forces but general McAllister did not wish to risk a disaster and refused to do so declaring that it was best to let the christians make all the attacks possible. Nevertheless to press the siege all of the christian generals were bent on doing everything possible to annoy the glandelinians. General Hanson concentrating near Marquial and the Marquian and silverbell fortresses sent forward immense troops to the Jennie's Bridge and Norma's Bridge with orders to attack on the first order sent in.

"In this way," said general Hanson vivian. "I will force my way to the fortresses and attack them..."

Two brigades landed at Longhorn wharf near Jennie's Bridge, and marched to the Commons of vivian Wickey Junction, where they started to parade with much pomp. The rebel forces were suspicious and nervous over this scene, and as they might have been expected trouble came before long. Rebel engineers and other workers busily at work constructing bridges and pontoons and felling trees and making abatis managed to check the advance by snipping fire. The glandelinians near Jennie's bridge tried every possible means to cause the christians to withdraw and one day in January 1913 after the christian forces had been concentrated there for about half a month in ever increasing numbers with artillery and earthworks constructed a mob of glandelinians suddenly appeared, and attacked a large body of christian troops and dazed the christian Lobster Backs and Blue Fished Backs to the fire. The Red coated and purple coated christian soldiers not only accepted the challenge and discharged their muskets and cannons into the crowds of soldiers killing and wounding but rushed at them driving before them and crossing half way over the river after them until stopped by the fire of guns near Aud Aurande called.

On the afternoon following this massacre and repulse of the rebel troops the glandelinians in this vicinity rose in their might with one voice for the rest of the time their cannons of the forts and shore batteries kept up an unceasing artillery duel that shook the earth resending a volcano of flames and din from the christian lines, and during the storm of firing general McAllister sent a courier to the christian general declaring that they had no right to concentrate troops so near the river, and demanded that the hated christian dogs be withdrawn.

After much discussion general Hutchinson decided to make an assault upon the enemy instead, but this did not satisfy the christian generals. put nevertheless three hundred companies of men led by general Adamsonia after a council in hall decided to move to the attack. The Angelinians held general Adamsonia in great respect and he earnestly insisted that all the companies or none should be sent forward to assault the foe works.

"All the companies or none!" Or A. All the companies or none. "Shouted thousands of voices in the building and in the company streets. At length the christian general though very loathing was forced to yield, and he prepared for the attack.

Indeed of the long siege of "Lucille Rickson as vivian Wickey was called it had been said by the whole world;

"vivian Wickey led all the horrors of the war, was the whole centre of the rebellion, the cause of the ferocity of the war and the responsibility of the bloodiest battles of the war." and others said;

"Though he did not take personal command of vivian Wickey general Hanley led vivian Wickey nevertheless and was one of the world's greatest generals." It was certainly doubtful whether the courage of the mighty host of besiegers would have held out if many of the highest christian generals had not worked night and day, always cheerfully, always hope fully, urging their armies in every battle in all parts of Calvernia to stand firm for the Liberty of Child Slaves.

To return to the exciting events of vivian Wickey nothing after the beginning of the concentration of Hanson's army near Jennie's Bridge aroused the rebels so much as what was known as "The vivian Wickey Tea Party" a raid of a score of thousand of tea ships captured on from the enemy by the christians and either sunk toward into the harbor of the tea dumped overboard under fire from foe guns on both sides of the river shores. During the siege the glandelinians were more fond of tea and coffee than we are ourselves, and accordingly when christian scouts learned that of vessels by the thousand had passed the blockade by some trick loaded with canisters of tea for the besieged the Angelinians scouts reported it and general Hanson declared that the tea should never be allowed to reach the foe lines. Notices were posted within the besieging christian lines inviting many men to meet under many trees, to take such action as would allow the making of a daring raid, and capture all the tea ships possible at any cost. At this moment news arrived that three more squadrons of ships were on the way down the river.

"This tea," said general Hanson, "must be captured for our own supplies." And if the enemy attempts to frustrate us we will make ourselves more dreaded than the plague or pestilence. Another meeting was called, and seventy thousand soldiers fully armed to the teeth filled the roads and encampments and overflowed into the company streets. They sent for one of the shipping officers and put to him the question:

"If you make the raid will you take the tea to general Hanson's lines as directed?"

"His reply was," The governor general Robert vivian gave no notice that he will not permit me to do so at present on account of too much severe activity of artillery along that section of the siege. But the tea will be taken to general Williamsborger Zimmerman's lines instead."

"Then said general Adamsonia," This meeting can do nothing more and on with the raid as decided." It had been previously arranged that this remark of general Adamsonia should be a signal for action. Men mounted horses and a whole division of men went to Jennie's Wharf in the night where a pale moonlight showed the many tea ships at anchor.

"If the tea cannot be captured it shall not be landed on rebel shores." Cried the general in command of the expedition.

It certainly was a stirring time when had leaped aboard the vessels, and after being through an inferno in which many were killed and wounded much of the tea had been dumped overboard into the river or the ships sunk or towed by gunboats toward the christian lines side of the water. In the affair forty two thousand chests of tea had been captured and three hundred dead eyed and the ships that were even raided were set on fire by the christians and they abandoned them. This raid cost the christian soldiers a loss of three thousand five hundred in killed and drowned and 10,000 in wounded, the most desperate raid ever made in the face of the forts but it was a splendid affair and gained for the christian great fame. The enemy lost 1000 ships that were burned and three hundred in disabled or partly sunk. six others were floating derelicts. It may be called the "Boston Tea Party" if you wish but nothing of that sort ever happened here. During the raid all the christian batteries had covered the work of the raiders by a terrific storm of shot shell and high explosives and the artillery duel had caused great destruction. The expedition brought all the tea after being under fire for two days safely within the christian lines after having lost ten gunboats, four ships of their own and two thousand rowboats and many a brave man. It was a desperate expedition but it won. Hanson laughingly said:

"Let the rebel drink steeped catnip and pennyroyal. It will do them good."

The news of this tremendous and successful but bloody "vivian Wickey Tea Party" quickly spread not only through the whole besieging christian armies, but all over the country of Calvernia and Angelina and all over the world.

Hanson galloped in every direction also to tell of all movements of the enemy, and throughout the country there was great rejoicing over the daring exploit under the foe fortresses of Ridgemoor, Silverbell, Quicksilver, and Silverbell. The Fort Silverbell was inactive at the time. Over the raid the glandelinian generals now formed in vivian Wickey a strong Provincial Congress and chose general McAllister Stanek as president. In the same time the First Continental Congress in vivian Wickey again met in Norma Catherine, and here too general McAllister Stanek became an imposing and powerful figure. He appeared in a brand new uniform of splendid blue gray coat color, new hat, new at silk stockings, and shoes new and his chest bedecked with all kinds of medals, all provided by many admiral glandelinian friends. None of the ardent glandelinian generals who met in that famous glandelinian Congress in the besieged city of vivian Wickey worked harder for the union of the glandelinian armies, against the christian besiegers, than did stout hearted general McAllister Stanek.

"I should advise persisting with all our might in our struggle against the national and active with all our might to prevent them securing live liberty for child slaves." Said he. "Though it were revealed from heaven hell, and earth that nine hundred million, and nine hundred and ninety thousand were to perish in the siege, and only a thousand million to survive and retain the rebellion. One such glandelinian hero must possess more enjoyment and happiness than a thousand million child slaves should have. Let our battle cry be 'Down with christianity and on with child slavery.'"

While this wicked glandelinian Congress was in session general Hanley himself was concentrating his armies toward Jennie's Bridge and concentrating already twelve thousand big cannons in order that he might be prepared if general Hanson vivian should make attempts to force his way across and storm any of the fortresses by river. He had great confidence of another victory having known how he repulsed Hanson at Evangelina Crania. And yet before the convening of the Second Glandelinian Continental Congress in vivian Wickey in 1913 an event of tremendous importance happened near Jennie's Bridge. The glauco Angelinians had fired the first shot in the battle of Jennie's Bridge that was to startle the whole world and show them the viciousness of the seige. General Hanson, Vivian the main christian commander in chief and governor general had sent twenty brigades out beyond Jennie's bridge. He had heard that the Glandelinians had stored a great ammunition dump at Concordanna and he resolved to either seize it or blow it up. So on the night of January 12th 1913 one million eight hundred thousand Angelinian and Abbeinnian troops set out for Concordanna. They had even orders to stop at Toledo and a try and capture general A. Gubia for it was known that he was in that town on the outskirts of the foe lines that night ready to start the next day for the rebel Congress at Vivian Wickay. The Angelinian generals knew how important a part this Glandelinian general had been playing in the Glandelinian assistance or resistance, and he ordered general Walter Jennings to capture them and he would send them to Abbeinnia and other rebel generals and have them tried for treasons.

Now thousands of Glandelinian scouts and spies and been quietly watching the Angelinians, and knew exactly what general Hanson, Vivian and his generals had been intending to do. It had been agreed upon that as soon as the Angelinian troops started toward Concordanna, a sea of lanterns and other lights would be shown in positions as a signal to horsemen and scouts and generals who were to dash into the lines and spread the news that the nations were advancing. General Whilliamson passed through the Roxbury section of the Glandelinian encampments and the waterston section, and general Reverer rode through other sections getting troops ready to stop the advance. As general Reverer spurred his fire steed into the Lexington section of the rebel encampments a shell bursting in the air mortally wounded him during the wild battle.

The discovery was now too soon, gleaming the sound of marching infantry and the redoubled roar of thousands of cannon like the rolling of drums was suddenly heard on the night air the sky being blinding with the flashes of shell explosions and flaring searchlights and confusions again began. In haste general Parker assembled his divisions of Glandelinians behind his artillery and machine guns on the meadows before the stream near Jennie's bridge.

"Stand your ground at all costs," ran his commands. "Don't fire your rifles unless they are within good range, but if they mean to make an attack let them receive hell!" It was almost daybreak when the Glandelinians saw the Angelinians under general Pitcairner marching into the woods on the right, and saw Angelinian at artillery dragging in long lines on the main commons.

"Lie and disperse those Glandelinian villains!" Shouted general Pitcairner. The Angelinians under fire of the batteries rushed forward but the Glandelinians did not move an inch from their works. The Angelinian artillery in no time caused seven thousand Glandelinians to be killed or wounded, the Angelinians having been the first to fire in that battle. The Glandelinian generals Ademaonia and Gubia were by this time taking their way safely across all the meadows toward Ju Julio castle and forty eight hours later they were on the road to the main section of Vivian Wickay. After their deadly work at this section the Angelinian soldiers pressed on victoriously, destroying whatever military stores they could ever find, burning bridges and firing houses and one wooden fortress. "At when the call to arms came with the tragic news of Jennie's Bridge the wicked glauco Glandelinians proved their ferocity. At the commands of their officers they rushed for their works and snailents to defend them and even pawters and spoons and dishes were taken to the trenches to be used as small cut up abatis stopping to put on coats cold as it was, the generals and officers rode far and near toward the scene of coming action. Across the bridge at Jennie's Vivian, squared other brigades of Glandelinians just as calm and resolute, ready to give their lives for their wicked cause, and there they met the red and purple troops near Jennie's bridge in another fierce battle for the possession of Vivian Wickay, in which unestimated numbers of men and soldiers of both sides were killed and wounded.

General Pharlaster's division of Angelinians fearing to have been caught on bad ground and seeing overwhelming Glandelinian troops advancing against them started to slowly retreat toward their own lines but the Glandelinians thoroughly aroused warned forward to a desperate attack, and as they came forward by the hundreds of thousands they fired from behind trees, fences, bulwarks, and ledges of stones, from windows of houses and from ravines, and nearly thirty three thousand three hundred Angelinians had fallen before the retreating columns had reached their own positions in snail y but they had caused severelosses among the enemy lines as well though they did not succeed in repulsing them. This occurred on the hour "ine O'clock in the morning of January 7th and was the first memorable day of the Angelinians who had still advanced concentrated upon Primary Hill and Minute Gunn Hill which were the flanking heights of Vivian Wickay ten miles north of the Lucille Jackson fortifications.

These hills made a good commanding view of the whole of Vivian Wickay and stood about a thousand feet high above sea level. General Hanson, Vivian thought that if he could secure these heights with more firearms and concentrate heavy at artillery in its ascent he would be able to hold it for junction for good and cannonade it all the for treasons nearest to him. When the Glandelinian generals heard of this, one million one hundred and fifteen thousand men under general Prescott advanced up a section of the hill after dark and after several desperate assaults a desperate assault drove the christians there from it, and spent the whole night under heavy fire of 100 guns in building strong embankments thirty feet high for protection. It gave the greatest astonishment of general Hanson, Vivian and his generals when the winter sun rose, and he saw general Hanley in command of the ascent. The poor Angelinian general in chief but his tip in disappointment.

"Are we able to recapture those heights?" He asked of some general who stood near.

"Those desperate Glandelinians will fight as long as there is a drop of blood left in their bodies..." was the reply. The sold of the day was intense, but ten brigades of the three million Angelinian troops troops supported by a heavy artillery fire from batteries on the christi positions and christian warships on the river, and from mortar guns elsewhere and under general Kinderman started at noon to climb the steep heights.

First all the way of the advance their line was torn and gapped by artillery fire from the rebel guns, then machine guns, took the place of bigger artillery and caused dreadful havoc. The left of the advancing line soon faltered and recoiled but the rest of the christians pressed on with shouts and yells, but as the survivors neared the top they were met with a terrific fire of Glandelinian machine and rifle fire combined. They pressed doggedly however over the top and drove the foe back, but Hanley desperately hurried reinforcements and soon the Angelinians advanced from their exertions and from their losses fell back down the hills. An hour afterward fresh divisions rushed forward to make a second attack, and after the contest had been renewed with redoubled fury and the loss of both sides dreadful the Angelinians were again driven back a second time with a fearful loss of men and officers and with torn and tattered battle flags all that was left to them. The hills were strewn with dead and wounded.

"Will the brave Angelinians give it up now?" "Can the Glandelinians hold it?" These were the questions burning on the lips of thousands of war correspondents, who from the highest hills near the scene watched the terrible battle.

Over her a heap and windrow of soldiers all torn and gory the Angelinians Ang 1 Angelinians with wilder fury rushed forward once more and facing a withering fire of cannon and masonry surged above the high breastworks and after a five minutes desperate hand to hand fight with bayonet and clubbed muskets were driven back again with one division annihilated. They were just like the sea driven over a ship's decks with one division annihilated. They were not yet defeated and half an hour later and shattered, but though driven they were not yet defeated and half an hour later while all the christian guns roared in a surface of flames a fifth assault was made with terrific violence, the conflict being wild indeed. The Glandelinians again drove the christians back in a deplorable condition as if they were withdrawn from a disastrous shipwreck, but the Angelinians rallied for the fifth assault, and the Glandelinians fired as before. In any event the fierce Glandelinians who had toiled all night with shovel picks and the like could not have gone on fighting so desperately for many more hours against the constantly increasing armed numbers of advancing christian assaults and troops. The foe however stood manly against fourteen desperate assaults raging the wildest battle ever seen in this section and the roar of 10,000 cannon and 50,000,000 rifles pistols, and revolvers and nearly three thousand machine guns of the christians were making the land cove to order a retreat as the odds were so great that the resistance of the position untenable, but nevertheless it was claimed that the resistance of this sort could have been so tenacious and remarkable that a battle of this sort could scarcely be called a victory for the christians but, it was nevertheless and a brilliant one at that got your hat. General Hanson, Vivian Vivian's soldiers and generals were indeed astounded to find how well the Glandelinians under general Hanley could fight. The brave stand of general Hanley at Jennie's bridge as the battle was called strength handed the besieged in their determination to keep the fortresses and city from being captured by the Nationalthe Glandelinians had now given up all hope however of bringing any a successful plans of working vaned and driving in off and they believed there was only one thing left to do to fight it the end, to the close of Vivian Wickay. General Robert Vivian or his brother had failed to the besieged at Vivian Wickay. General Robert Vivian or his brother had failed to capture him and thus force him to stop urging the Glandelinians forward. General Hanson Vivian once was desperate enough to try bribery. He sent general Gage a messenger to offer both Ademaonia and Gubia valuable gifts, and a powerful position and other things of great importance if he would desert the rebel garrisons at Vivian Wickay and come over to Angelina's side and leave off treason against god which Wickay and came over to general Samuel Ademaonia when the messenger was but who could imagine the anger of general Samuel Ademaonia when the messenger had been forced to sent a messenger. The indignation of the wicked Glandelinian general knew no bounds and first he blasphemed before he sent in a reply.

"Tell that christian hellhound Hanson, Vivian," he angrily replied. "That it is the advice of general A. Adamsonia to him that he is no longer insult the feelings of a besieged nation at 11 Vivian wickey. No personal consideration shall ever induce me to abandon the cause of my country and also to let him that if he was aided by heaven and earth he could never capture Vivian wickey within ten years. And we can prove it."

The glandelinian general was one of the signers of the Declaration of the continuance of child slavery the famous wicked document drawn up by the wicked glandelinian Congress in Vivian wickey, which stated that no christian nations have any right whatever to matter how great a sin child slavery is to interfere and try to put it to an end, that no children belonging to the glandelinians as property no matter how they are treated and even murdered and so on or even made a life of hell ought to be made free and independent like others especially when they are christians. When general Adamsonia signed this wicked statement he felt it was perhaps the proudest moment of his life. By his side sat general Hancock who dashed down his nose in huge letters.

"In order," said he, "that the christian doghound general Hanson, Vivian, or any of his generals, and even the authorities of the christian government, may read it without a telescope."

"Now," said some other signer, "we must all hold Vivian wickey together on a long together one or the other and down with christianity."

"Yes," quickly replied another man who also signed the paper, "or we shall all perish separately. To hell with the christian dogs!" I hope the dear readers will remember as clearly as possible that the Angelinians general besieging Vivian wickey had no idea of allowed the wicked glandelinians to hold any sections of works between the gorge gun river and any of the Evangelina Grande heights if they possible could help it. All attempts in the meantime day by day had been made to stop the enemy forces building and erection erecting new fortresses, but having by desperate raids captured Forte Franquise, La guif, and Vermorel, general Washington was chosen to carry an expedition against one of the fortresses started in construction, and he had to travel with his divisions through the wild foe territory to accomplish the movement. It was at this time the depths of the coldest winter Galverinka had ever experienced it was thirty below zero and the army had to march in deep snow through dense woods continually fired upon by snipers and ambushes, had to march over either swollen rushing streams of frozen ice choked river waters, and the general had traveled uncomplaining for three days once in a blinding blizzard. It was a perilous journey indeed. The country region here was full of glandelinian snipers, roving squadrons and bands of fierce gargolians, whom the rebels tried by every means to entice the capture of the Angelinians. This made the expedition extremely dangerous, for the glandelinians despite their hundreds of sorties and raids and everything had many traps for the general and his commands. Yet for the time being he not only escaped disaster, but succeeded in getting within sight of the fortress under construction. He then first concentrated troops, and waited for reinforcements with the coming of clearer weather. The point where the gorge gun and the Sunbeam Creek joins to form the Mid-Hollister Run Mouth seemed to be the best location for the capture of the military fortresses of the foe and accordingly the Angelinians began to build great works there and concentrated heavy batteries of cannon. But the glandelinians knowing the results to Vivian wickey if this was won by the Angelinians decided not allow the christians to progress, so not long after to the surprise of a regiment of engineers at work thirty thousand glandelinians suddenly appeared, and after an attack drove them from the woods with the loss of half their number.

The rebels then took possession of the unfinished sentinel and abatis. General Washington seeing what happened advanced with a brigade of Abikanians to drive the glandelinians from the important point. General Washington took personal command. This had started early in December. For one month the conflict raged in series of fights, and progressed in victories for the christians in all possible speed. When at Meadow Turn the centre portion of the christian army was heavily attacked. Ten thousand rebels were killed and wounded in a charge lasting only two minutes and twenty thousand were taken prisoners, while the christian side only lost fifteen thousand men. When the excitement of the first real action of the long contest was over, and victory again was to general Washington he exclaimed: "There is something that tells me that the glandelinians are the most desperate fighters I ever saw. General Washington realized the danger of so long a stay within reach of the foe lines and such long fighting in the enemy's territory of Vivian wickey, so he ordered a part of his army to recoil toward stronger natural positions and in great haste formed long lines of abatis and works to which he retreated. Here he was again attacked furiously by a large number of rebel troops who outnumbered his right wing four to one. The struggle turned out as a slight victory again and regular troops under general Vermonia was sent to drive the foe altogether back to their own lines so with banners flying, and drums beating the troops started forward in heavy column on a pleasant day. General Vermonia was an experienced officer, and knew every thing of war in the glandelinian wilderness. When the main christian commander warned him of the dangers from thousands of unseen rebel snipers he calmly replied:

"Those savage glandelinians may appear indeed to be a formidable enemy to Angelinian and Abikanian troops, but we can show him that upon us under any conditions it will be impossible to make an impression."

This poor general was indeed a brave one indeed and he sacrificed his life for Angelinia's cause. The chariot in which he gallantly set out, a body guard galloping on each side had to be abandoned in the rough roads when foe snipers started a perdition of rifle firing. A hard march and fight he indeed found it.

After a time general Washington advised and ordered the sending out of many parties to clear the wooded region of snipers but it failed with terrible loss. General Vermonia felt bad over this, but nevertheless with Brave Angelinia colors flying in the wind pressed boldly on though his losses by now was dreadful in that wooded inferno. Soon came a fatal disaster for what general Washington feared soon happened with the most terrible yells and shouts, the glandelinians continually appeared in ever increasing numbers with machine guns to add and hurling grenades together, simultaneously opened a murderous fire of musketry and pistols from behind trees, bushes and rocks over a stretch of thirteen miles. A conflict ten times the violence of the Battle of Antebam in the civil war raged, and the poor Angelinian soldiers though they charged furiously again and again all day long were mercilessly shot down by thousands upon thousands per charge, without ever getting at their enemies in a hand to hand conflict. Soon seeing officers and generals falling also the men ceased to such an inferno before became panic stricken. They did not stop to obey their officers who even tried strict discipline, but soon fled in terror, firing wildly as they ran. General Vermonia remained in the thick of the bloody fight until he was borne from the field mortally wounded. General Washington lost three horses which were shot under him, and he himself was wounded in two places and torn one sleeve and his coat tail to shreds. Before general Vermonia breathed his last, he acknowledged to general Washington that to take any foe positions in these woods just now was utterly impossible.

This defeat was a most bitter blow to the Vivian wickey expedition expedition expedition but preparatory preparations were at once begun for greater efforts, and again general Washington began busy himself for the capture of the foe positions at this point. This did not prove an easy task at all but soon it was accomplished. The glandelinians soon recoiled at the manner the Angelinians repeatedly assaulted their positions and so being overwhelmed at last they resolved to retreat. They blew up the works and magazines making dreadful explosions, set fire to all the wooden and bifurcated positions they had erected and recoiled toward their own main lines. The Angelinians placed their tattered flags on the wreckage and held this position gallantly for the remainder of the long siege.

In the meantime one of the glandelinian generals who had not made good to orders he had received was forced to resign his commission and another general was put in his stead by the Abikanian state.

When the Second Glandelinian Continental Congress met at Vivian wickey the battle of Jennie's bridge had been fought. It was now necessary for the glandelinian Congress to come at once to the support of the defence armies of besieged glandelinians and they decided to pick up all men who inside the city of Vivian wickey in all sections were loyal to glandelinia and draft them into his army so as to organize a regular army with a new commander in chief who was to be the Abikanian state chief lieutenant. When general Adamsonia rose and said: "I have but one gentleman in mind for that most important command, a gentleman from glandelinia who is well known to us all."

His eyes were fixed upon general Cobin, who from modesty quickly darted out of the convention room. Nevertheless by general Adamsonia's name through the glandelinian government authorities general Cobin was unanimously chosen commander in chief of the entire armies of all the glandelinian armies there. With indeed a full understanding of the great trust placed in his hands, this glandelinian general soon solemnly pledged himself to devote his life and our energy to the cause of the glandelinian nation and that he would uphold child slavery..... put different than other glandelinian generals he had declined to accept any pay for all his services..... On the 21st of January this glandelinian commander set out on horseback from general Vermonia's camp through the woods and thence to Jennie's bridge, accompanied by his adjutant general's son and a soldier. They halted at New Jennie's bridge and learned the details of the battle of Jennie's bridge if you please gentlemen. With increased speed general Cobin pressed on toward Jennie's bridge, where headquarters had been provided for him in a large fine old mansion taken from the christians in the battle, after the house of general Williamson, a christian.

As he rode into the house glandelinian men, the shouts of the millions of delighted soldiers and officers, and the shouting of thousands of cannon gave him a warm welcome. When he had been welcomed before, under the weeping willow trees (Hays they did weep at the folly of rebels against christianity) which may still be standing general Cubia drew his long sabre that looked as long as a fishing pole and took formal command of this section of the besieged Glandelinian army. General Jergamin Bandolon of a Jeresayama division of Urmucanandus had been with general Cubia at Yungolinia Grn Gra Orania. When general Cubia was made first commander in chief of the Morra Catherine ar das general Jergamin marshaled his divisions of infantry, shuraphlooters and artillery to Jennie's bridge regions As general Cubia learned that the Japanese christian troops and their besieging fleets of battleships and gun boats and other craft and also their batteries and fortresses were planning a new and general attack upon the foe positions at Jennie's bridge, he sent Japanese troops westward to repel the drive back with the loss of all its provisions and ammunition and thus was left driven back with the loss of all its provisions and ammunition among these wicked Glandelinian troops when general Knoxhead appeared with troops and fourtyhundred cannon. He had after desperate fighting of ten days with batteries infantry, cavalry and small field pieces captured fortress Ticonderama on the Simbaux Creek from the Christian Besiegers, and had dragg dragged all the captured guns all the way with Japanese numbers of horses and sledges. The time had now come when a section of the besieging christian forces were withdrawn driven out of the region of Jennie's Bridge. On night probably on the 26th of January 1918 under general Cubias direction and also of his generals and other officers hundreds of thousands of men engineers soldiers construction workers and the like in themoonlight worked silently and threw up extra intrenchments on the heights overlooking the region of Jennie's Bridge. The next morning the Angolanin generals and the army and all their officers were completely astonished. One of them reported to general Hanson Avian broadly,

"This morning at daybreak nybreak we discovered forty two strong redcuts on the heights overlooking the river of Sumbun pun and creek, and two long high ones of excellent formation on their flanks. They were all constructed and raised speedily at night with an expedition equal to that of the pits belonging to what they called in the story Alandins wonderful lump. From these hills and heights, the Gandelindians command our whole position, so that we must drive them from their post or fall back to other portions of the works."

General Hanson vividly said that he had forced Hanley from the works at the Red Riding Hood Woods and also from those positions at Jewell's Bridges could scarcely believe his eyes when he beheld the series of fortresses through the fog of smoke from artillery systems elsewhere.

"These rebels," he exclaimed bitterly, have done more work in one night than the whole American army at Dorchester Heights near Boston in the 'r rebellion could have done in forty months. I had hoped the rebels would attack me," but now I'm going to attack those heights come what may."

done in forty months. I had hoped the rebels would be going to attack those heights some what way. " He saw however that something must be done. go between two and three million men guarded or protected by two or three thousand cannon were sent to assault the heights, while other forces were sent on transports and other ships protected by the battleships to bombard the fortresses by water of the three rivers, where the christian troops were soon to be quartered. While the troops prepared for the storm a violent artillery fire of terrific fury broke loose from Fort Red Riding and Hood, Silverbell, Cindarella, and the roar of destruction was so tremendous that the ships responding with 10,000 cannon and adding to the uproar could make no headway, but they toosing at the mercy of the waves caused by the tremendous shocks. The artillery storm continued for two days and nights without ceasing while on both sides and all up and down the river the rain of explosives fell in torrents, and the wrecked transports could not land. One section of the fortress Cindarella and Red Riding Hood were not cut off fire, but the ships were threatened with annihilation as some sections of Cedarbine and Vivian with general Hanson add to order the commander of the fleet to retreat up the river at night fall and discontinue the bloody water engagement. General Hanson Vivian was also vexed to find his ten desperat; assaults on the land side repulsed with terrific slaughter though his troops had time to strengthen their breastingworks, and that he could glandelin drive the rebels out. The christian fleets laying fully exposed to the destruction fire of the forts and enemy shore batteries, and also to the fire from the heights, was compelled to retreat down the river, and the admiral resolved to land his army at Halifax junction two miles north of the wicked rebels were cheered in the morning of the 27th therefore during a cold day the wicked rebels were cheered to great happiness by the sight of the entire Abkhazian Abhiamunin and other christian fleets of thousands of ships and transports, bands under with soldiers and renamed refugees retracing down the river. General Hanson had also failed to capture the heights but his army however had not retreated but remained in the positions they had captured. The success of this second engagement was unaccountable and he would not reveal it at all if it was possible but was a triumph for General Gubin a regular George Washington for the Angelinians. In only a few days with his forces of Angelinian soldiers with the help of the guns from the fortresses, he had driven from the gunboat river, an army of ships and troops, surrounded by an experienced generals and admirals. The Angelinian Congress at Livan Jickey passed an unanimous vote of thanks, and the whole Angelinian nation praised him for doing such great service in the rebellion. It however was clear from the movements of other actions of thousands armies and the Christian fleets that they meant to make their next attack upon New Yorker for they also desired to obtain control of the great Krandine river to make a blockade of fierce means. Accordingly General Gubin carried a section of his right wing to that point. Fortifications of great strength had been erected erected and the river shores, but millions of Angelinian troops were encamped in Brookliner and on three islands, Staten River Island, Stanok Island and Turner Island. So it was impossible to make out whether the Angelinian generals concentrating more and more artillery intended to attack New Yorker itself, or that part of the shore that just lay across the Norm river itself.

When too late he found that the latter was to be the fighting point. In the battle of "Childrens Daily Runtom", waged on the site where a new section of the Lacaille picket fortifications stood, the gladiolinian were defeated with terrible loss, thirteen generals, and driven for three miles back with the loss of ninety pieces of artillery six provision trains, and twenty stan standards of colors and thirteen hundred thousand prisoners of which one general was taken mortally wounded. The night that followed was a sleepless one for the gladiolinian general in chief Gubia and at daybreak the enemy showed the dangerous position of his own army shelled by the national guns on V Marye heights and attacked by infantry and cavalry from two directions with rebellious violence. With his telescopic he could make out that the army was completely completely surrounded and was too far to be protected by any of the fortresses. Nothing therefore was left but to withdraw as quickly as possible. He however urged the battle. The that day with increasing fury tearing up by ones divisions of christian troops, charging again and again until eighteen onslaughts along a mile of battle front thirty miles in length had been made, storming christian positions in the face of many guns and infantry storms and finally when night came on seeing his losses too dreadful to continue fighting any longer he started to retreat under cover of a dark night and a blinding snowstorm and windstorm storm at the same time. The retreat was so well planned however under fire of artillery and pursuing riflemen at that that general Gubia became a greater gladiolinian hero than ever. But night under cover of the intense darkness and the blinding clouds of swirling blustering snow shots the divisions were rushed down to the half half frozen waters of the yornu gun river and embarked either in boats, or warped across pontoon bridges, while many sentinels remained in sight above the breastworks to guard the rear while a army of gladiolinians was left behind to stop the swift advance of the Abbeasians and cover the retreat. By the time that the last of the gladiolinian troops had reached the shore and swarmed over the pontoon bridges, a thicker fog of snow enveloped everything, but nevertheless they were harassed by the Abbeasians who pursued and shot many of the retreating gladiolinians down. The retreat was also disastrous as the losses was awful. When morning dawned cold and still snowing heavily, not an A gladiolinian soldier remained on the dangerous shore. General Gubia had refused to enter a boat or march across the pontoon bridge until until the last a gladiolinian soldier had crossed. He had been incessantly exposed to the fire of the Angelinians and was slightly wounded in three places. In the retreat he has had lost three hundred and seventy five thousand men in killed wounded or captured and many pieces of artillery and provision wagons, and a hundred standards of colors and many prisoners who were color bearers. For three days and nights general Gubia had had no sleep and for all that time he had been in the saddle.

Though it was a great success for the christian rubevlogers, the Angelinians had yet to learn that the rebel dog Cuba would never stay beaten if he could help it. On the very following afternoon with /between two and three million men, the daring rebel general recrossed a portion of the river, made dangerous by huge cakes of floating ice and swift currents, and strode into the militia in the blinding snowmets, still reeling surp surprised a great section of the militia army at Jennie's Bridge. He captured a hundred and fifty thousand prisoners, and a large quantity of ammunition and provisions. He was forced to retreat back across the river when the main militia army concentrated against him. This brilliant desperate raid, one of the biggest raids of the war, together with his success north of Jennie's bir bridge that following night, shattering the many sections of the besieged armies and the Angelinlian nations, they now began to feel overconfident that the siege would be reds resisted successfully. After the long battle of Jennie's Bridge the great Angelinlian commander was sorely in need of money and troops, so he appealed for help to general Mic-Allister Stanek. General Cubias letter was delivered before daybreak. Without waiting for the sun to rise, general Mic-Allister started out in the cold winter morning, and finally had ordered as many brigades as possible to go to general cubias assistance.

Even in a few hours fifty million five hundred thousand dollars were on their way to general cubias divisions. Indeed there were times when it would have been almost impossible to carry on the war if the resistance to the siege if the glandelinians had not received their sources from Calvernia a few days later during the resumption of the battle at the Romaine twenty five miles from fortress Red Riding Hood, each side lost over a million men, and the glandelinians were finally driven from the field with great loss of men and officers. Again two days later they made another desperate assault with redoubled violence, but met still more disastrous defeat, and the eyes of all the glandelinian generals daring and their bravery so great, that the eyes of all the glandelinian generals throughout the whole city and its armies and garrisons were turned upon general Cubia. They found to their amazement indeed that the glandelinian generals could easily successfully fight disciplined Angolan soldiers, and that the first section of the glandelinian army was commanded by a military genius of great ability.

So many of the millions of wicked but brave glandelinian soldiers suffering from cold and hunger, with ragged clothing, and shoes so worn that blood always marked their footsteps, had been marched at times to many winters quarters which were ten times worse than those of the marauders at Valley Forge but the glandelinians still fought on with dogged courage and determination. Many hundreds of thousands of glandelinians had become ill from exposure and wounds suffered in battle, and were obliged to seek shelter in the city sections of the river valley, until the sufficient numbers of trees could be cut down and tents built. It was indeed a horrible siege and though the christians could not as yet capture the city, and the foe could not raise the siege, it was even now the foe who were really getting the worst of it for they were suffering, and the Angolanians had no woes but only that received in battle. They all had all the comfort necessary all the shelter they wanted and all the provisions necessary. But help was soon to come to the glandelinians for general Franklin at Calvernia fighting for glandelinia just as earnestly as Mic-Allister Stanek was fighting at fighting for glandelinia though in a different way tried all means to relieve the suffering of the glandelinian soldiers. Though general Franklin prepared to send troops generally in command of the immense armies at Calvernia, general Mic-Allister and money and ships to the river valley. When this news reached general Mic-Allister and his armies, the poor half starved soldiers outside in the wilderness unsupported by the main armies as they were cut off by the christians, shouted for joy. Other encouragements came when a splendid glandelinian soldier offered to drill all the drafted soldiers. Among the many bitter trials which general Mic-Allister Stanek had to endure was the treason of general Benedict Tribuna. At the beginning of the siege he was one of the bravest fighters in the wicked glandelinian army. Mic-Allister Stanek had made him a general and entrusted him with the command in person of the garrisons of the fortresses of Lucille Jackson on the river Gathelina river shores. But in a mad moment of envy and spite because general Mic-Allister Stanek would not allow him to destroy his child slaves to prevent them from being rescued by christians, and when this actually happened, this glandelinian general turned traitor. With an Angolan messenger, general Andrew Turner, he entered into a plot of great desperation to surrender the Lucille Jackson fortifications to the Angolanians. Happily for the glandelinians, the plot was discovered in time. General Tribuna was captured by a scouting party of gathelina and through his being examined the conspiracy was discovered. Andrew was sent as a spy, and Tribuna was persuaded for many miles, and he too would have been executed as a traitor had he not been fortunately escaped into the christian lines. Strong and as brave a man as he was, general Mic-Allister Stanek shed tears when he walked into general Tribuna's headquarters a few hours after the glandelinian traitor had escaped, and learned for the first time the treason of the traitor. General Tribuna did not bring his supplies. He was finally discovered by the christian armies and the christian lines who had entered to assist him from general Tribuna and seeing the escaped traitor in the christian lines, he was shot by a squad of soldiers on horseback they shot him down from a horse. On his death bed the glandelinian traitor asked for his old uniform that he had worn the day he made his escape, and which he had always kept in spite of it.

"Let me like the others of glandelinia die in this old uniform in which I fought many battles for the city of Vivian Wickey, and my country," he said. "I hope glandelinia will forgive me heartily for ever letting me down."

Indeed in the following chapters of this volume and the others we dear readers shall learn if you wish to do so more details of the ferocity of the Lucille Jackson siege and the lives of the great men and generals of both sides who took part in it. It had already required nearly a year of the terrible fighting and suffering and yet no efforts seemed possible for the rebels themselves to bring either the siege to a close or force the christian armies to raise it and retreat and despite their best of that the christians could never take it in ten years their hopes of a success were waning. The Big Vivian Wickey siege strange to say had in it many smaller sieges such as sieges of small outward fortresses, sieges of glandelinian armies such as Carbondale and so on. Now comes another and a dreadful one it was too and if you do not believe it try to fancy you are one of the besieged. The siege of Little Girlia ended with the surrender of a vast christian army and this is how it happened.

In the southern section of the siege near the site of Jennie's Bridge general Marion Cornumilis Armerman commanded a large force of Abbieannians and Angolanians, Calvernia and also Angolanians, and general Nathaniel Greenburg with a vast section of the rebel army belonging to a portion of general Mic-Allister's army. Glandelinian army came upon the christian position early in the night and slowly but surely drove the christians out of the north section of the positions, and even from the region of Jennie's Bridge, and into a trap after suffering dreadful losses for the victory thus gained. He had an able assistant in general Mariona Hanson, who attacked the christian army at many points skillfully pushing through the wet lands of the river region in the face of a scorching fire extending for ten miles, and by his daring and by his ability of handling the great onslaughts was much feared and even hated by the christians and like Marion in the American revolution he was called 'The Glandelinian Swamp Fox'. When general Cornumilis Armerman reached the main section of his works, he found immense Glandelinian troops under general Herdrude Lafayette ready to dog the very rear of the christian troops, and drive them to Turner Hill near Turner Run. Here hard pressed and after fighting for three days he was defeated by the rebel armies again, and then seeing escape impossible he tried to fortify himself. General Cubia and Washington who was now with that part of the army which lay near Jennie's Bridge watching the movements of general Hanson Vivian and his brothers army under general Robert Vivian who commanded the Angolanian and Abbieannian forces in general felt the hour had come for the final victory. Glandelinian warships numbering three thousand big dreadnaughts, fourteen thousand gunboats and other war crafts were in the river and mouth of the river, and these were immediately sent to Jennie's Bridge, and other regions to prevent the escape of general Armerman's christian army by sea. These fleets soon started a bombardment of many thousands of cannon on a firing line of six miles in length and terrific was the clamor and heard for nearly five hundred miles. Incapable was the damage and the christian fortresses and positions were threatened with annihilation and the wooded country in the section was scathed. The shells exploded in reports as frequent as raindrops on the roof of a shed during a thunderstorm and the noise was horrible. Knowing what the result general would be general Washington hurried his own troops to the region of Jennie's Bridge, but while he was secretly crushing his armies southward a considerable force was left to the right at Jennie's Bridge near the heights. This caused general Hanson Vivian and his brother to believe that general Washington was still striving every nerve and effort to prevent the capture of the heights.

For more than two weeks after general Washington reached the northern portion of Jennie's Bridge the region by ships and glandelinian batteries and fortresses was bombarded night and day and the scene was as if the whole of heaven had broken out. One general's headquarters was said to have had a thousand shot and shells passed through one wall and the whole region of trees and woods was shattered, the land ploughed up and the river tossed into waves by the concussion. Finally one of general Cornumilis Armerman's generals Fairfax Angolanian for cowardly region despite the protests of his officers and generals marched out his own division of soldiers and surrendered. After he had been relieved however by general Hanson Vivian who discovered the siege of the christian army and after the enemy attack was repulsed with who wholesale loss in men officers and ships, general Armerman felt that despite his love for god and his country he could never forgive general Fairfax for surrendering his army to the enemies of god, and when general Hanson had said, "The general shall not be shot, but exiled and disgraced for life" general Armerman answered "It would be better for him to die than suffer such a fate but as it is your order so be it."

The surrender of Cornumilis Armerman general was a sad blow to the christian armies at Vivian Wickey. At St Francis's Tavern the traitor was tried, and then exiled. Tears filled many of the eyes of the christian generals as one of the main ones said:

"With a heart full of love and gratitude we should always realize what we are doing in the behalf of the poor unfortunate child slaves, and not be foolish enough to surrender our swords and arms to the enemies of god like this one did with without sufficient reason."

The cowardly general had demanded a second trial saying he was not guilty of surrendering an army because of cowardice but it was refused. He had to go and join the many enemies of Galverinia who were being deported in the Eastern coasts.

Though the rebels inflicted many repulses upon the christians at times and made them suffer heavy losses it was surely evident that no christian positions had ever been retained when captured. What should be done now? The nationals were aided by general Hanson Vivian and even the greatly feared Arab general Aronburg. The latter was in possession of Jennie Vivian and they wondered what should be done to oust the "Terrible Wrath of God". The glandelinian continental Congress in Vivian wickey, had already been made up of all kinds of glandelinian generals and officers chosen by general yic-Allister Stanck to act for the rebel army in carrying on the desperate resistance against the besiegers. Now that at Jennie's Bridge a bloody repulse had been received by general Manley This Congress general yic-Allister felt was not enough to carry on the war at Vivian wickey itself. Even the wisest glandelinian generals easily saw that, if the siege was to be held out against the christians successfully, they must have a strong National Government inside of Vivian wickey itself. A mighty glandelinian Federal Convention was called to meet in Bloody woman Catherine. General Washington was the main presiding officer to attend and here the greatest document ever written was drawn up and signed by three thousand two hundred and thirty nine generals noting as delegates. It was called "The sustaining Child gave Constitution of Vivian wickey. General Washington was its first signer and general yic-Allister, was the oldest man to write his signature to this famous glandelinian paper which later in the siege was captured by christian spies, which was to have been the law of the rebels at Vivian wickey.

One of the glandelinian generals had from fear that the city of Vivian wickey would not hold out against the christian besiegers long had resigned his generalship but through some reason or other whether he did resign or not and was leaving the rebel lines with his resignation sheet he happened to be seized by christian scouts scouting parties of christians. He claimed in his protest that he was in the war no longer, that he had resigned his command, but the excuse of the christian officer was that he was a rebel nevertheless and so was made a prisoner.

The glandelinian constitution however provided that a main leader should be chosen, and general Washington was the unanimous choice of all the generals. He was therefore even compelled to take the oath of office on the balcony of a building before crowds of glandelinian soldiers, from whom thrilling shouts went up, myriads of flags waved in the breeze, and countless cannons and rifles boomed a greeting to the rebel chieftain now elected in Vivian wickey as main commander next to general yic-Allister Stanck.

Do not think however that this glandelinian general had an easy task before him. Many months of fierce conflicts, bombardments, and ship stranding fortresses had laid the country all along the rivers banks and in the region of Vivian wickey was waste, and many serious questions were discussed, misunderstandings and disappointments arose, and by the efforts of the christians to press the siege harder Washington found that the path he and his armies tread was indeed a thorny one.

Indeed it is not strange to say that the eyes of every nation whether christian or not were upon the city of Vivian wickey, watching the experiment of a new form of glandelinian government in a land made desolately the most terrible war the world had ever heard of.

"Surely such an unheard of thing cannot succeed," said the nations across the sea. "Vivian wickey in time will fall for god will make it so."

Yet that glandelinia had come softly through the first section of this bloody crisis was a surprise to the world and it was due to the wise guidance of general Washington. The glandelinian authorities and Tribunals in woman Catherine had made no mistake in choosing its leader, for this man proved himself great for one by one the difficult difficulties were mastered, but through all his efforts it did not seem a cheerful aspect for it only brought the anger of the besiegers and reckless damage was being done in the outer sections of Vivian wickey by bombardments besieging cannons. Corn and wheat in the hands of the rebels could not grow on account of shell fire and tramp of so many millions of soldiers during charges, and when this was really all over after nearly two years and a half it was never forgotten. At only two short months was left to this brave glandelinian general, while riding forward in advance of his troops in another battle in December during the battle of Jennie Vivian he was severely wounded beyond recovery and in two hours was dead. In the hour that he was laid at rest after the battle the tears of the whole besieged nation told its grief and fury toward all christianity.

The glandelinian Congress had adjourned suddenly on the hearing of his death in battle, and for the remainder of the see soon session the members of the glandelinian Tribunals wore mourning, while in every part of the besieged sections of Vivian wickey there were public testimonials of grief. Even all the glandelinian ships and fortifications lowered their flags to half mast, while the city of Vivian wickey suspended crepe for ten days from all her public standards and flags.

Crepe was also suspended from all door doors and windows. General yic-Allister Stanck of Vivian wickey had in my brave generals like Washio Washington but none were more noble or more unselfish in his devotion to glandelinia's cause than general Richard Purgatorian the second main commander of Vivian wickey. This general in chief of the glandelinian armies besides being one of the wisest generals known had however any noble qualities, and chief among them was his thorough patriotism for his country and his favor in the rebellion. He was about fifty years old and when young had fought in the great glandelinian war of eighteen fourteen one. When he was sent as one of general yic-Allister Stanck's delegates to the glandelinian continental Congress in woman Catherine he and general Washington became acquainted and were soon the firmest of friends. After the glandelinian armies had clashed in series of severe engagements in the region of Jennie's Bridge there was some great doubt in general Washington's mind indeed as to what the next move of the christians would be under any of the Ange Angelinian commanders.

"Nothing thought the main christian general in chief 'Can be so harmful to the glandelinians as for us to get possession of all the rivers running either through Vivian wickey or past her. By thus controlling the rivers and all the land near the rivers and all the heights we can keep any of the main armies of the rebels from a safe elsewhere from coming to the aid of Vivian wickey."

"Accordingly the brave christian general Hanson Vivian sent orders to general Howard Jerseyton in the season just before the battle of Kwanglinia Granda to march his forces and artillery down from the northern section of the siege by way of Lake Angeline, try and take fortress Aurandecillo, and if successful proceed toward fortress Vivian. A second army under general Ledgerton was ordered to start from the left of the main christian line, ascend the yic-Hollerston-run to Lake Angeline on the other side, capture the fortress Silverbell on the yic-Hollerston river, and join Jerseyton at fortress Vivian, while general Howard Hanson was to bring up a third immense army from Quillia Jackson. If this plan had succeeded general Purgatorian and his whole army garrison and his defenses and fortresses would have indeed been in such a bad plight that that section of Vivian wickey would have fallen. It failed and to any because of the foresight, seal and heroism of the wicked glandelinian commanders and particularly because of the skillful manner in which general Purgatorian controlled the armies at woman Catherine and H Julio Galia. General Howard who had had desperate fighting against a section of Hansons left wing recently not far from port Turner, began to have considerable respect for the wicked glandelinian soldiers under Hanson Handonia, but the christian general Howard Jerry Jerseyton though brave was honest. He declared: "If general Hanson will give me 10,000,000 men and artillery I will soon as possible march through all of Vivian wickey."

This promise Vivian quickly granted this request. Ten million men were given to general Hanson Vivian quickly granted this request. Ten million men were given to him from an entire portion of the christian lines and many guns, the army consisting of Ablesmanns, many Galverinians, and Abyssinians, and even yomonulans who had been won to the side of the christians. At first general Jerseyton's promise did start out fairly well. General Schuyler of the foe side had been strengthening the northern defenses of a certain section of works not far from fortress Aurandecillo and no one would have dreamed that these outer works would not withstand any christian attack. But it chanced that near these foe positions there was a long line of high steep hills, and general Jerseyton saw that if he could get many divisions and batteries of artillery up those ridges, he could fire down into the fortified works, and the glandelinian troops there would be helpless. Under cover of shelling and night and day infantry fighting elsewhere of sanguinary character, he made this desperate and hard march and concentration, and the next morning general Henryque St Clair of the rebels was astonished to find his divisions and fortified works at the mercy of the Ablesmannian guns. He held out for four days however against the heaviest artillery fire and desperate infantry and cavalry assaults, but he was soon obliged to retreat, and hastily abandoning the fortified works, he retreated toward fortress Aurandecillo leaving many wounded behind. The Ablesmannians followed close on his heels, harassing the rear of his troops as much as possible, and it was only by leaving all his baggage and ammunition behind him that general Henryque St Clair managed to escape to other strong treble trenches built by other foe divisions, and here he joined a portion of general Francis Stanck's divisions of Zimereannians.

General Jerseyton was so desperately jubilant over this tremendous victory that he triumphantly sent the news to general Hanson Vivian by telegraph. When general Hanson Vivian received it, he declared that at last he had beaten all the rebels and that the siege would soon be won.

But unfortunately for general Hanson Vivian all the glandelinian armies were not in this region. To be sure general Jerseyton had not far to push on to reach fortress Vivian, where he expected to join the other divisions of the christian army, and give general Hanson Vivian still further cause for rejoicing. But general Francis Stanck resolved to make this advance and attack the hardest of general Jerseyton's life if possible. Only one great road led through the forest, and the rebels who were not constantly engaged with the christian attacking christians fell to work with a will to make the road impassable. General

Francis Stanek had a few hundred thousand soldiers provided with axes and explosives, spades and torches, and supported by infantry, they were made to work by night and day. They chopped and blasted down many hundreds of thousands of trees so that they fell at a fashion directly across the roadway. Fifty great bridges each a mile long across the Sunbeam Creek were destroyed by fearful explosions or burned. Small streams running into the Sunbeam and Norm Rivers and elsewhere were dammed so that the water overflowed over the banks and made the ground for scores of miles so swampy that the Angelinian forces could not cross with heavy guns.

For miles on either side of all roads and driveways and put out of reach of the cattle and provisions were sent into "Ivian" Lake and all freight cars burned. Soldiers of Christ, and all railroad lines were torn up and the resources of the country in or wrecked, for general Jerseyston was depending upon the resources of the country in the region of seige to feed his armies as he marched and fought day and night.

So as to say all the glandelinians not engaged in the many days fierce engagements worked in desperation, even mining the ground everywhere blowing up columns of christian troops, goaded on not only by the defeat of the works near fortress Aurandecillo, but by the horrible outrages committed by the fierce Abyssinkilians with the Angelinian armies. At least it was claimed horrible outrages but it was none other but the rescue by force of thousands of child slaves as often as the opportunity presented itself. Jenny Angelina the beautiful little daughter of general Stark Clargyton held a slave for two weeks after having been taken by a rebel raiders had recently been seized by Ange Angelinians who mistook her for a glandelinian girl scout, and when her true identification was known she was sent back to her fathers protesting arms, and the country rang with the news of this, and other such great deeds. General Francis Stanek's men indeed had made a most hard "Promenade" for the christians under general Jerseyston. It took him twenty days beginning early in November to fight his way over four miles so desperate was the defense and resistance of the glandelinians who kept up an inferno of rifles and cannon upon his advancing troops for those twenty blood days. Footsore, hungry, and exhausted, the Angelinians at last reached the region of fortress Ivian. But the general saw from its size and forbidding appearance that he could never capture it in his condition, and near by what did he find? Not a glandelinian army further retreating from him for general Francis Stanek who had retreated across the Sunbeam Creek had pitched his tents and was galling at his lines with artillery and machine guns and infantry attacks. Every day that he could delay any general christian attack, meant just so much more gain, for general Furgurtorian was hurrying his forces to his aid. General Jerseyston was indeed sadly in need of ammunition. He therefore chose about a thousand men and officers mostly of Gal verinians and Abyssinkilians, and sent them back toward the other part of his army coming up near "Landerston" where he had learned they had captured large supplies of military stores from the enemy. But general Hia-Hollester Johnston and his stalwart stalwart Zimmermannians were carefully pressing upon this army also and carefully guarding all approaches toward fortress Ivian. This glandelinian officer had fought in all the battles of Norm a Norma gathering one of the best At Garbondaler also and Princeton. He was also considered one of the best glandelinian generals in the army. When news came that the second portion of Jerseyston's army was moving through the woods toward his left, a rebel troops of the strongest numbers were sent forward to stop their advance. On the morning before they met the National general Hia-Hollester Johnston mounted a high rail fence and thus addressed his generals:

"My generals listen to me. We are about to fight the dirty christian dogs known as the Abissinians and Galverinians. If you are worth your generalships prove it now when the battle resumes."

For two hours this section of the mighty engagement raged. The glandelinians had any many cannons which had been placed into positions, and when the cannon shot and shrapnel gave out they used machine guns, and loaded the bigger guns with stones, doorknobs and everything of solid weight they could load them with. A furious war the defense of the rebels that the Abyssinkilians torn and with their columns shattered and with ten generals killed and wounded fled in terror and panic into the woods. Many others of the Galverinians and Abissinians were shot down in the most dreadful numbers or taken prisoners and put to flight. Less than one hundred thousand men returned of the one million advancing toward the christian left to reinforce general Jerseyston.

"The whole region is full of rebel troops and ambuscades. The woods are full of rebels." shouted the many half crazed Angelinians who finally made their way to the rear for safety. This was not the only bitter story of disappointment for general Jerseyston. General Ledgers' army had advanced from Ortona through another portion of the same wilderness as far as the "ain" right, when it was met by dense bodies of glandelinian troops under brave old general Edwin Founterton, on their way to reinforce Fortress Ivian. Again the opposition forces fought in a death struggle. The Glandelinian general hunter was mortally wounded, after being shot six times, but amid the drew dreadful carnage he rallied his troops when they were on the verge of defeat and refused to leave the field or even to rest.

He gave orders for the saddle to be taken from his dead horse, and placed at the foot of an oak tree. When he sat down, he coolly smoked a cigarette, and continued to direct and cheer his men, until after another desperate attack the Angelinians were driven back in confusion and with dreadful loss in men and officers. After this section of the long conflict the glandelinian national banner was flung to the breeze on the works still retained and the sight angered general Ledger, as a red rag angers a bull. He vowed he would carry the flag away with him or die in the attempt. But general Francis Stanek was just as determined that the precious Glandelinian flag should not leave the works. When news of the results of the fight on the right reached him at his main lines, he called his generals in a council and asked who would volunteer to make a desperate assault upon the very christian lines themselves.

"I will quickly replied general Arnold George. 'General Furgurtorian sent me here to make myself of some use. I will go dangerous as it is.'"

The drums beat the call for volunteers, and more than one million one hundred thousand men responded. Ten desperate assaults were made upon the christian lines but without success, and during the last assault some Angelinian spies were captured, among them a half witted officer whose name was not learned. The spies were being condemned to death as they would not reveal the strength of the christian armies. During another counter assault the glandelinians were again defeated and one of the officers who defiantly waved his gray coat at the foe was wounded twice and the coat shot full of holes. At one other point a section of the attack had worked perfectly before it was repulsed. When the Angelinian officers saw swarming troops in gray coming in overwhelming numbers like the countless leaves of the trees overhead, he saw that he could not withstand the assault. The christians along his section were driven back in such haste and in such panic that tents powder and cannon fell into the hands of the rebels and it took desperate assaults numbering ten to retake them. General Jerseyston was now in a most dangerous situation. General Furgurtorian and the guns of Fort Lucille picked General Ledgerston who had marched his men forward to crush the rebels, was now swiftly being worsted and retreating to the rear. On all sides divisions of glandelinians were cutting off general Jerseyston's retreat to general Hanson's lines. His men were sorely in need of provisions and ammunition. He must push on toward fortress Ivian at all speed or retreat some other way. General Jerseyston coughed and fought his way through as furiously and as rapidly as possible toward fortress Ivian and for those several days of fierce fighting neither side could claim the victory. Then came the first decisive victory of the battle. General Arnold stood impatiently watching his patient long lines of attacking troops moving forward under a storming fire of musketry and cannon and could see the hundreds of gaps torn in his lines until he could bear the horrible sight no longer. Jumping on his horse, he galloped into the thick of the fight. The fire along the Abissinian line now was terrific. Yet the sight of their old commander cheered his glandelinian troops to greater efforts. Fiercely and more fiercely the battle raged, and the assault soon was successful for at last the Angelinians and other christian troops running out of ammunition after fighting for two hours hand to hand with bayonets and clubbed muskets, and throwing stones and snowballs were driven from the field with wholesale losses. Brave general Furgurtorian shared with general Arnold the glory of this Glandelinian victory. A bullet entered Arnold's shoulder and another struck his hand, and he was also wounded in the lung. Two hours later he died in that moment of triumph. During that time general Gates of the foe had captured an Angelinian officer.

"What would happen to me if I were caught now?" asked the glandelinian general.

"Quickly the Angelinian officer replied. 'You would be hanged for treason.'"

"How come I would be hanged for treason?"

"Because any one who attempts to overthrow christianity is guilty or claimed to be guilty of rebellion against god whether he is really doing so or not and so is treasonable."

"But it is not a rebellion against God."

"Does not matter." Was the answer. All you glandelinians are charged with it just the same."

Nothing but retreat, a disgraceful retreat and a sad one was left for general Jerseyston. Six hundred thousand glandelinians however had been taken prisoners and the enemy had only captured six thousand from him, but nevertheless the foe captured great quantities of munitions and many cannons which the retreating christians were forced to leave behind them. When the news of the remainder of the battle of Jennie's bridge was carried from fortress to fortress till all of the foe garrisons and armies knew of it many of the glandelinian generals were glad to hear of it for they believed general Hanson had done wrong to increase the seige of "Ivian" Lake.

go the dear reader can readily see if how much work there was for general Lyons to do so. Indeed the slight little slimp limp that so nearly kept him out of the ranks was lost sight of now. Cool, judgment, kindness, patience, energy, hopefulness-----and no presumption, these were indeed the qualities that counted in this tremendous crisis. He set to work with will, and soon won the respect and affection of his troops. He contrived to get all the better food for them he could, and to make all the Glandelinian soldiers more comfortable. Gradually he brought back the spirit of self reliance, and hope and with reinforcements reaching him from the Allister Stanek he was able to increase their spirits.

Now no one knew better than the main commander in chief of Vivian Wickey how hard a problem general Lyons had before him now, and able men were sent to his aid -- general Morgannia, Danielsonia, a Glandelinian sharpshooter, general Whilliam Primary, and general Light Horse Harry. At Cowpens early in December, 1912 a division of general Lyons army under Morgan a set a section of Glandelinian troops under the famous general John Signaury, with a much smaller army, Morgannia won the day but got wounded himself and suffered dreadful losses. At last it began to be seen that the Glandelinians were not to be taken for granted. General Lyons was the head of the Abbeasmanian army at Vivian Wickey at this section of the siege was furious and enraged when he heard of general Signaury's defeat and disaster.

The hero of Cowpens knew perfectly well that general Morgannia's army was known by all Glandelinians as the "Terrible Terrible" army would be concentrated against him until a vast Glandelinian army would be concentrated against him. Morgannia felt that his tired men were not strong enough to win a second battle against Signaury, so he lost no time in making a retreat. At dusk his army crossed the Sunbeam creek. Not in pursuit a force of Abbeasmanian soldiers, reached this stream a few hours later, but rather than risk crossing it in the dark they waited until the approach of morning. A heavy snow fell during the night until two feet covered the ground. The water despite the cold temperature of the weather had so swift a current that it did not freeze and the snow was falling so heavily that nothing could be seen at all fifty feet away, and the Christians were so delayed that general Morgannia was unable to reach general Lyons army in safety. General Lyons saw that it would not be safe for him to attempt to fight a desperate battle again while they were in such a weak condition. So he began the most famous retreat that astonished to say soon ended in his last day. This retreat however was thought out with great care and skill. By most clever planning he brought both divisions of his little Glandelinian army safely together two miles south of Jennie Lyian, where he expected that fresh divisions of Glandelinian troops from Lucillia would reach him or wait for him at least be opposed. But these divisions had not yet arrived, so general Lyons continued his retreat toward the fortress himself. If he could only manage to get across the river Sunbeam and into the thick Red Riding Hood Woods before the pursuing portion of general Morgannia's army could overtake him. It was a weary march fighting battles every day and stopping at night, but the hardships of every day were made easier by the little army from point to point fighting furiously by day to stop the heading Christian advance and retreating by night, moving over hills, and across small streams, that for lack of bridges or boats, had to be forded as no time could be wasted to construct pontoon bridges. For did he dare to forget for an instant the dangerous game he was playing with general Morgannia's army. One night after a long ride through another blinding blizzard general Lyons alighted at a large inn not far from Vivian Wickey. In reply to a question the weary Glandelinian general said:

"Yes indeed, I am hungry, tired, penniless and alone."
The landlady's wife who happened to be loyal to the Glandelinian cause, and who had hoped that the Christian besiegers would soon be forced to raise the siege, happened to overhear the remark, and so in the shortest time possible, a very hot supper was placed before the weary Glandelinian soldier. Then handing him many little bags of gold and silver and paper money that she had managed to save (she was the loyal Glandelinian woman said).
Take these you will want them, and I can do without them for Glandelinia's cause. This spirit of sacrifice on the part of many women and men of the loyal Glandelinians to Glandelinia was the only thing that made it possible to resist the siege so long as they did. At last the main Sunbeam river was crossed in safety. Lyons had arranged many hours in advance for pontoons and boats to carry his artillery over and men to cross, but when the pursuing of Abbeasmanian and Glandelinian troops reached the shore, they could find no way of getting to the opposite bank.

For nearly two hundred miles the small Abbeasmanian and Angelinian army had followed close on the heels of the Glandelinians driving them clear from within sight of Vivian Wickey to prevent them from coming to the aid of the besieged but now the Angelinians were obliged to halt. Indeed as soon as this small Glandelinian force was rested, and reinforced by other troops coming up from the south of Glandelinia, general Lyons recrossed the river, and at Tribunal Court House on December 15th he fought a battle with the Angelinians under general Cornwallis. Though the Angelinians managed to repulse with great success every assault the Glandelinians made and claimed a victory extreme in the end, they were so worn out that they retired toward Vivian Wickey.

General Lyons now began another rapid march to the south. He wrote general Morgannia Stanek: "Be determined to prevent the Angelinians who had pursued me from getting back to Vivian Wickey or the besieging lines from whence they had come." "The enemy will be obliged to follow us, or give up all the posts in this region."

His plan was to cut off his pursuers from the main Christian army at Vivian Wickey and thus prevent his getting the much needed supplies and foodstuffs. General Lyons was soon completely successful. One after another the Christian fortified works at one point to another were captured. The Angelinians now began to despair of their chance to triumph.

"We do the fighting hard, get beaten disasterously, rise and fight again with redoubled effort," wrote Lyons.

At the battle of Gloria Serr Springs the Glandelinians won a great victory. The Angelinians were pursued by the divisions of general Morgannia, and Morgannia, for more than thirty five miles toward Vivian Wickey, and over half of the Angelinian army was lost. General Lyons had done indeed what he set out to do. He had driven the Christians who had per pursued him back toward the way they had come from, and yet in the Glandelinian armies few of the world's greatest soldiers ever accomplished such wonderful work with so small an army as general Lyons did. Next to himself he was the greatest general of the Glandelinian Revolutionary war.

All along the line of his victorious march honors were heaped upon him. The Glandelinian Congress at Vivian Wickey, gave him a vote of thanks. This great soldier however who had indeed endured so many hardships died from the effects of a mortal wound received when chased by Angelinian troops who fired upon him. The whole Glandelinian country mourned his loss.

Glandelinia however to day of the date of the siege was proud of her series of victories near Vivian Wickey. He had six private armies in the river, and six guarding the bay of Vivian Wickey and ten other armies guarding the Glandelinian coast and looking inland. During the time of inactivity for fleets when the scores of thousands of Glandelinian battleships came together for review in Vivian Wickey's monstrous harbor, millions of noncombatants whether Christian prisoners or free sympathizers enjoyed the sight indeed. How bold and powerful the Glandelinian dreadnaughts looked, those gigantic floating fortresses of the sea, as they rode on the dancing waters. But they indeed were no match with the Christian navies and so Glandelinian fleets kept away from Christian battleships. They only attacked a Christian fleet when they overwhelmed one.

Holding out against Angelinia's mighty armies with eventful success success as they did, yet the Glandelinian nation even at the beginning of their fierce and bloody Revolutionary war was quite at the mercy of Abbeasmanian and Angelinian on the rivers and sea. All their ports were blockaded even along all sections of the Glandelinian coast and all the vessels which the Glandelinians had owned in the river captured by the Christians were thousands of iron schooners and sloops or sloops which had been seized and either interned or transferred into Christian gunboats.

As soon as the bloody siege of Vivian Wickey became certain the Glandelinians knew they must have many fine rafts to rebel attacks down the river and they began to build them as fast as they could. But money in Vivian Wickey was scarce. The Glandelinians though they drove the remaining inhabitants of Vivian Wickey to work building ships found that they could not build and equip an army equal to Angelinians and Abbeasmanians which were the strongest navies in all the world.

But if many large ships and guns were not to be had to protect the river portion of Vivian Wickey there was no lack of brave men who dared to make expeditions down the rivers to capture Christian dreadnaughts by suddenly surprising them.

When the Glandelinians began to collect their largest boats in mostly barges and steamers into something that could be called fully manned fire rafts Admiral Thomas of the Christian side decided to make an expedition down the river at the risk and learn the strength of the Glandelinian navy. From the mouth of the vessel Admiral Thomas flung out the Angelinian flag, and the little fleet started on its expedition on the fourth of December 1912 for the region of the Lucillia island fortifications, and succeeded in capturing four large Glandelinian dreadnaughts, with provisions and military stores and got away also with many child slaves.

But the most important result was that it convinced the Angelinian generals in command of the besieging christian armies that Admiral Thomas was a man to command fleets in a "sort of difficulties." His short cruise was the last he had ever made when he was not in charge himself. He was given command of the Providence, and a whole christian fleet of a thousand dreadnaughts, and he cruised along the river and shot frequently from the reach of poodlie, icken to portress Gaderine even firing upon them at times. In six days he had captured sixteen glandelinian dreadnaughts, and burned three hundred large wooden ships in the river used as transports, and put ashore a large force of Marines at Jova Scotia bend of the Jorma river, and freed several scores of thousands of child slaves, captured a number of rebel regiments and brought all back to the christian lines with also two ship loads of salt fish. He considered this a good six days work.

However and news greeted him when he returned from this eventual trip. A large part of Jimmermannian and gargolin forces under general Jimmermore had completely ruined many stretches of property, burning three towns in the rain, killing all the stock, destroying bridges and fruit trees, and carrying off some children who had been captured as slaves. But the Angelinian Admiral could be a hero under all conditions and circumstances.

"This is indeed a part of the fortunes of war," he only said when told of what had happened. "I accept the animosity of general Jimmermore as a compliment to my devotion to the cause of liberty for child slaves and shall rescue them again as soon as I see the opportunity. I will show the glandelinian authorities of Jockey that they will have no fortunes left not even their swords."

Not long after this general Janson summoned Admiral Thomas to his headquarters for his advice on naval matters. The victorious young admiral proposed such a daring scheme that it startled all the generals.

"It's not enough," said he, "that we only chase and capture glandelinian vessels on the river. We must run through the gaunt gunboats of guns of the fortresses and raid Jivan Jockey or any of her divisions."

About this time general Jemma Jivan arrived with his own army determined to help his father and uncle in the fight to reduce the fortresses of Jivan Jockey. He told his father and uncle that Admiral Thomas was right, that two run the gauntlets of the fortresses and raid Jivan Jockey who would show the glandelinians that it was not alone outside of Jivan Jockey that the Angelinians could be feared, but inside of Jivan Jockey also. At length the plan was agreed to after much debate and Admiral Thomas was given full command of the entire christian navy operating against the besieged glandelinians.

"The flag of Angelina and Jiva twins," said Thomas as he looked at the standard. "We can never be parted either in life or death, so long as we can float in our expeditions we shall float together. If we sink we shall go down as one."

Admiral Thomas had received orders to have his fleet of dreadnaughts and other warships in complete readiness to set sail for the planned expedition at a moment's notice. The glandelinian go across was breathlessly awaiting news from all sections of the besieged Jivan Jockey. Would general Janson Jivan and his brother, or Constantine Jronburg succeed, or would general Jic-Allister Stancks carefully laid schemes end in the complete defeat of the christian armies and compel them to raise the siege and retreat. At last the joyful news arrived. General Janson Jivan's armies were repulsed and diminatoriously defeated in his assaults upon the high s of Kvandelinian Grand during the battle of Jorma Jemma Jiva Jock.

Scores of thousands of horsemen galloped with the tide in every direction, riding day and night, eating their meals in the saddle, stopping not one moment for any kind of storms. On the river or sea many glandelinian battleships were racing to Jivan Jockey, while they telegraphed the news news to the capital of Jandelina. Never before had any of the sailors and marines on board the warships had such a wild chance as this. Admiral Thomas of the glandelinian fleet was himself on deck everywhere from two days without an hour's rest.

In little more than three days now the Angelinian fleet under Admiral Thomas anchored near the fortresses in the Jorma river. As one of the Angelinian battleships sailed into one of the ports of Jivan Jockey disguised with flags as a rebel ship by flying the glandelinian flags the glandelinian vessels was a welcomed her with a salute of guns. Thus it happened that the Admiral was the first one among the Angelinians who had so come compelled to the enemy to salute one of the christian aid ships. With all possible speed after spotting down the river Admiral Thomas hastened to general Janson Jivan and his brother. Admiral Thomas had however hoped ardently to procure in Janson's riverpositions a much larger fleet than he had now with him, but in this he was disappointed as Janson could not spare fleets just now for any expedition so war hasardous. So determined to make up in daring what he lacked in size of the fleets, he put out from the river of Jemma Jiva Jock, then he suddenly and unexpectedly met the first section of a glandelinian fleet, in the Jorma river. The rebel fleet seeing the christian fleet did not wish to come into an encounter but the retreat was cut off by a portion of the christian fleet and so the first fiercest battle on water followed. The Angelinian ships were much larger than the glandelinian ships and carried more big guns on turrets and led the glandelinians a蓬蓬 like Admiral Thomas it would have won out nevertheless.

The glandelinian fleet opened fire and battled furiously for six hours the guns of both fleets thundering in a deafening rumour. Two Angelinian ships were blown out of the water with all on board, six were sunk, and six then disabled but the glandelinian fleet threatening with annihilation finally surrendered. Thus Admiral Thomas made his first grand success in capturing a whole glandelinian fleet of a hundred dreadnaughts. It was a great blow to the pride of the glandelinians at Jivan Jockey to find that so suddenly one section of their fleet of warships could be beaten by the so called "christian dogs" below belonging to the Angelinian navy. Admiral Thomas then under fire from two fortresses responded with his guns, and his marines and sailors on the captured ships also opened fire upon the fortresses with glandelinian ships and by good management and by great skill a while running a gauntlet of a hundred thousand cannon which made an ear-splitting roar tremendous to hear the whole fleet victorious and captured made its way down the river to safety after setting many houses on fire and breaching one fortress and the prizes thus captured were towed to the Angelinian section of the waters. The Angelinian general could scarcely believe that Admiral Thomas under fire of fortresses and shore batteries as he had been could have accomplished so much. They had heard the noise of the tremendous engagement and had been wondering what was up. The river shore was washed to the width of six hundred feet by waves caused by the tremendous concussion of the storm of artillery and nearly a score of million of fishes were killed and windows in many buildings in Jivan Jockey broken. Now on the tress of all trees were shak off by the vibration, and indeed it had been astonishing to the general as general Janson on had been ordered by general Jimmermore Jimmermann to allow Thomas to have more ships the general thought after all it would be more wise to help the proposed expedition as much as possible so it came about that after the damaged ships of the captured rebels and christians combined were repaired other ships were added to the fleet until Admiral Thomas had nearly five thousand seven hundred big ships all painted black in color. General Constantine Jronburg had taken a good liking to the brave Angelinian naval hero while Thomas felt for Jimmermann the respect and affection of a son. The Admiral loved to talk with the good general and had at times heard a great deal about the hero's hero's heroism of the Jivan girls, and learning they were in Jemma Jiva Jock either spying or prisoners decided to make an expedition up to that town and bombard the foe works there.

"Those brave little beauties," said Admiral Thomas, "by their features and by their ways and hero's heroism help me to keep up my courage under difficult situations and make me persevere in my endeavor to make a successful expedition. In honor of go Jocket and her sisters, he named seven of his flag ships. The violet Jivan, Catherine Jivan, Angeline Jivan, Joice Jivan, Nettie Jivan, Daisy Jivan, and Jannie Jivan. With these ships with such beautiful names leading his immense squadron Admiral Thomas set off for down the river to make the expedition. In the Angelinian naval history there was nothing to equal the glorious victory of this fleet, its fleet sustaining losses terrific managed to run the entire gauntlet of all the fortresses doing considerable damage after passing through an inferno of gas geyzers, explosions by the scores of thousands, seas of fire from fire rafts, under fire from shore batteries and assailed by ice fleets, torpedoes and gunboats. He passed portress Jickson under fire from nearly a hundred thousand guns, passed under fire the fortress of Gaderine and Jemma and Phillip and soon forced his way up to the river stretch running through Jivan Jockey. Under fire he covered in six days a distance of eighteen miles and lost nearly a hundred ships which were sunk and a hundred others which were disabled and sunk and his losses in men was unestimated though he declared that nearly a hundred thousand had been injured slightly or seriously.

In this fierce fray and in running the gauntlet Admiral Thomas had succeeded not only in running all the way through to the river passing into Andean section of Ivinn Lake but also had succeeded in alarming and insulting the whole coast of Ivinn Lake by crushing all attacks upon him, annihilating every line in possession of the foe, by crushing all attacks upon him, annihilating every tan squadron of enemy gun boats and silencing many shore batteries and setting every wooden fortress on fire until at night the light could be seen two hundred miles from Ivinn Lake. The din of this fierce engagement was heard for seven hundred miles with his success Admiral Thomas had seized two Andean fleets and captured two hundred thousand prisoners, forcing up the river in Andean the Angellian fleets now came along to the fortresses inside of the section guarding both sides of the river in Andean then in the remainder of the engagement he won his greatest victory. At first the rebel garrisons thought that they had to deal with the Abyssinians or Abissinians battleships as they were of a color when usually Angellian ships are of light blue but with the aid of glasses the commanders of the fortresses made out that the ships were Angellian.

It is probable that Admiral Thomas made his way through the river despite all opposition. It is probable that Admiral Thomas made his way through the river despite all opposition. It is probable that Admiral Thomas made his way through the river despite all opposition.

There was indeed more work ahead than he had supposed, for from seven in the night until twelve o'clock at night the fierce last section of the battle raged. The thunder of many cannons and the sharp roar of exploding shells, and the glare of their smoke and rockets and roman candles made the scene very sublime. There was little wind and the water was calm, even the moon was shining so bright that it was almost as light as day. However the firing was hottest Admiral Thomas could be seen giving his orders, clearing forward his arms and having all to ruin the fortresses or break them if possible.

When the brave Admiral at the words of the fray sprung on the hill in quarter deck every one who saw his example or heard his voice began to cheer and shout. The Admiral had but to look at any one to see his brave, four after hour had passed in the smoke confusion, and uproar of battle. Nearly a hundred more of his ships had gone down, and when he saw that he had committed all the damage he could he decided to run back again. He had hidden into the enemy's territory even if all the ships had gone down. He had hidden into the enemy's territory even if all the ships had gone down.

At last the Andean garrisons knew the determination of Admiral Thomas, who had resolved to take the return trip back to his own ships or go down with all of his ships. A Andean fleet was sent against him but was battered and sunk. Eighteen hundred ships were then sent against him, torpedoes and submarine boats tried to blow up his fleet but his guns annihilated them all with an accurate fire. Many torpedoes hit the ships but they passed fortresses and committed more damage in that in seven hours and sunk a number of ships and with an army wounded but still the of the surviving ships were crowded to overflowing with wounded but still the battle went on. He fought his way out of Andean and down the river until he had passed fortresses and committed more damage in that in seven hours and sunk a number of ships and with an army wounded but still the of the surviving ships were crowded to overflowing with wounded but still the battle went on.

At last by the greatest skill and daring Admiral Thomas brought his fleet alongside fortresses Haroun-Haroun and in the redoubtable din of the fray his fleet fell overboard and he received a wound in the thigh by a shell fragment. One hundred men a lot and offered to dress his wounds but he replied, "Never mind the lot or my wound boys. Fight right this out first give me the lot and treat my wound afterwards."

Still the hundreds of thousands of cannons boomed, still the shells and big explosives did their deadly work. The river was full of floating dead fishes, and filled with a mass of wreck. Floating down southward and near of the dead were also floating on the water. It was a scene as of Andean and the Hellish lake of fire, explosions and fire combined. One great explosion heard and a cloud of like a hundred million cannon going off in one simultaneous report and a cloud of smoke and everything with flash and smoke seemed to rise into the air. A scene as of a volcanic eruption at night. Some of the bravest of the admiral's officers in command of the ships now moved to draw their ships a little nearer to the fortresses Haroun and breached it a little. One by one the river side of the walls were breached but to silence the guns or force the fortresses under submission was no use. The commander of one fleet had surrendered and now Admiral Thomas had a large number of ships with him. Many of the Angellian ships finally sneaked out of the zone of fire after an engagement of twenty days and nights were hardly damaged that they were fast sinking. The Admiral therefore had all the wounded wounded men removed to the captured prizes, and then watched in silence and relief the steady retelling of some of the road ships in their watery grave. The "Islet Vivian,"

James Vivian, point and point of Ivinn had been striven in by soldiers with no craft and also had sunk. glowy noises noisily their decks strewn with the dead who had fallen in the tremendous battle they also sank from sight.

To my hundreds of thousands of dead I give the gold of dearly valued ships for their coffins. Gold Admiral Thomas when he again was before general Haroun Vivian in recalling the mission of his expedition and the damage he had committed.

The very last that mortal eyes ever saw of these four beautiful flagships and the other three hundred wooden ships was the distant waving of their ungilded flags as they went down. One of the first greatest naval victories of the world had been won by Admiral Thomas. It was the only time that any one with a fleet of warships had dared to run the entire gauntlet of fortresses to raid Andean. Admiral Thomas had succeeded in getting his battered survivors and the fleets he had captured from Ivinn Lake to Ivinn river positions without being overtaken by the pursuing fleet of Andean ships remaining. He then went to general Haroun to see his the Ivinn river being lost within the Christian lines by that time and on account of their testimony of his deed which they also gained they seen and heard about he became the hero of the hour. General Haroun Vivian allowed his little nation to throw their arms around the brave Admiral and kiss them, and after he did so to them he presented him with a gold mounted sword, and when he returned to Ivinn this general gave him a number of gold medals and two gold and diamond crosses. The Angellian world was amazed and encouraged by such a splendid expedition up the river. It had cost the enemy dear and Haroun Vivian who had received the only part of the blow was apprehensive for the many fires caused by the bombardment could not be put under control and by day a cloud of smoke hung over the city and at night the sky was red with the glow.

Admiral Thomas had tried by every means in his power to capture one of the fortresses during the terrible engagement, but the guns were too powerful, and so not having been able to do so he at least brought the prisoners and the ships he had captured into Christian waters. The battle then ended without any of the fortresses having been reduced or captured. The Angellian generals showed their confidence in Admiral Thomas by sending him on another expedition afterwards, and on trips by water to Angellian Agatha on great numbers of grant importances connected with the Angellian government. A few weeks later when the siege was growing tighter on the general Haroun asked Thomas to serve as highest admiral in the navy of Angellian and take full command of Angellian's entire navy. He at length consented. In other smaller conflicts Thomas gave fresh proofs of his abilities but finally he received a wound that laid him up for life. His poor admiral spent only three days in an Angellian army hospital where he was greatly nursed and loved and all doctors did all they could to pull him through, but he died at the age of thirty five and was mourned by the whole Angellian nation. He was laid to rest in a separate cemetery outside of Ivinn Lake, but after the battle his body was brought back to Angellian Agatha and buried with every honour.

Any one who ever saw him in his most glorious personal pleasure and comfort to his own people in trouble and distress indeed does a very noble thing.

This is exactly what general Haroun Vivian the second son of general Robert Angellian did when he came to Ivinn Lake to help his father and under army accomplish that plan of forcing their way into Angellian grounds and establish a large army around Ivinn Lake and make the enemy give in. Haroun was as we said before the son of the honored general Robert Vivian and heir to large fortune left by his second uncle Antonio Vivian. He with his brother who remained loyal and his little sisters lived before the rebellion a very happy life, surrounded by all the luxury, in a mansion that had nestled among the beautiful hills country of Ivinn in Angellian. He loved liberty and the desire to help those in need was the main characteristic which he early showed like his little sisters. When he was seven years old, his sisters not then living yet, he always heard and would complain about the horrors of old slavery. One day the little boy was found in the ruins of the big galathea after having been running away from home.

When overtaken by police he confessed the reason he ran away. He went out to get a little money from him he was sent to Haroun to be adopted by him present at the Angellian capital but the poor and slow of Haroun and his life among the Christian nobility though they were all rich and kind to the poor did not attract him. He longed for the freedom of child labor, and dreamed that he would one day help to make lives more of labor and free for child slaves. What dream once true.

Now he had several beautiful sisters, and was a great commander in the Christian armies. General Haroun Vivian who was like his brother never wanted time in talking about anything that needed to be done—he fell to work and did it instead of keeping his momentous mission tentative, contenting himself with saying "What a fine thing it would be for us generally to take a hand in that work." He moved forward monstrous armies to help in crushing the defense of Haroun in on the sunken Greek.

view of the vi victorious enemy. And finding that two lines of heights was a better place to dominate an attack, and to command the edge general Hanson ordered intrenchments to be made there. At this time the enemy for scouts discovered what was being done. It reported to the commanders general Tisonderoga of the rebels crossed over the river with 70,000,000 men to capture the christian positions, while the warships in the river and some of the fortresses rained a storm of shot and shell upon the attack under cover of a terrific fire from the enemy advanced furiously to the attack under cover of a terrific fire from the ships and the fortresses, and twice they were sent reeling back with dreadful loss in officers and men by the terrible fire of the christians whose guns almost responded to the fire of the ships and fortresses but also repelled the two charges. The glendallin attack twice was cut to pieces. They rallied for the third time and against they rushed to the assault in greater numbers. By this time one division of Angelinians had only one round of ammunition left, and after firing that in the face of the glendallinians who surged up to the works like a tidal wave they used their guns as clubs and drove many a bayonet through the foe soldiers, and flung stones and snowballs, and did every effort to beat them back, but without ammunition this division could not stand long; before the desperate enemy, and so they were driven step by step, from their breastworks, at the point of the bayonet. In the first action of this battle however the Angelinian division had proved that they had the courage to stand against the glendallin regulars, and they could fairly count that as good as winning a victory.

about an hour afterwards a large force of christians under three commanders were mustered forward to the relief of those hard pressed. the works the foe had captured was very strong indeed, but the Anglinian forces by a sudden dash and advancing in three lines, took retook the position but with great loss. the works were recovered with all the cannon and ammunition and many Anglinians were taken prisoners. The remainder of the Anglinians had been attacked by the foe when great numbers were killed.

were recovered with 11 the German and Soviet prisoners. Valuable stores much needed by the Angelinians had been attacked by the foe when they won the assault, and though the capture of the position had been a great gain, to them it was a tremendous blow when the Angelinians managed to retake the position, in the face of all a all obstacles. He was commander in chief of the besieging army, to them it was a tremendous in the face of all a all obstacles.

General Hanson who was commander in chief of the besieging army, heard of the action going on he made preparations to keep his other divisions in readiness. The glendelinian army he knew was made up of fierce fighters, though poorly clothed in places, and though he had expected that the foe now had very little powder and food he was sadly mistaken. It had been however the first duty of all of hanson's generals to drill the men and get them ready for the coming battle, and get the forces concentrated in all works possible. While hanson was doing this and sending reinforcements to his right which had been attacked, he was careful to keep one glendelinian army to his right closely shut up, so it could do nothing; and the main foe line came on to attack him. General Hanson's troops under general Vermont had hid close to the town of Montpelier since the beginning of the last two weeks and it was also decided by general Purgatorian to carry the christian position at this point by storm. So early in the morning the assault was finally made. The glendelinians fought furiously and well, but the christian position was altogether too strong for them. General Barbee the foe leader to led the assault was killed, and his aid true guard was wounded. His assailants were forced to retreat and during the retreat general Wooler of the foe fell wounded.
General Hanson had placed his

The rebels gave up their attempt to take the city and returned to their own quarters. The remainder of the fleet was left back to their own quarters.

The secular forces failed to take the city. The secular forces sent all their divisions against other christian positions. At first general Waldert at this point tried to defend the position but losing seventeen thousand men he could not hold out long against the foe amount of twice his number, though his troops owed down thirty thousand rebels. After he retreated to a new work he rallied but the enemy attacked him again with redoubled violence, and defeated them again after a hard fight, but though the landlindians finally won this slight victory they did not follow it up and two days later during a blinding snowstorm, general Hannon with great skill, successfully withdrew the engaged troops to the captured positions to batteries. The successful enemy crossed over from the christians there to retreat the rescue of the besieged landlindians, and forced the christians there to retreat and liberate the small garrison of besieged, this small force of christians therefore crossed the sunbeam creek to Hannon's main line of positions but not until he they had given battle seven to seven times to the rebels.

h Thus far as the siege had progressed the enemy were still holding out, but nevertheless gave the Angelinian authorities of Abil Abbinianim feeling confident that the war would be won sooner or later resolved to pass a decree that would set all child slaves free. go accordingly on the day of December 17th the Angelinians adopted the Declaration of Independence for all child slaves in possession of Glandelinia. by it they declared that children should remain slaves in the power of the Glandelinians no longer, but be set free at any opportunity. This was a very bold step, when it was not positive whether the rebellion would be overthrown or not. but it pleased the Angelinian nation and her states, and gave them a new object for which to fight during the meanwhile the Angelinian generals combining a great plan sent all the christian fleets of warships which could be mustered and all their armies against the foe positions at Ewangelinia Grania anew. This time a disaster occurred which was terrible in its effects indeed, but not to the christians. General Burgaritor who had been asked to take command of the forces left there by gene general Niss-Alister and Umley entered strong batteries and his own forces and tried most desperately to defend the Norma possionis and the Ewangelinia Grania heights assaulted by overwhelming numbers, but having only seventeen thousand cannon against eighty thousand of the heathens to defend the heights he could not long hold out against the christian forces which stormed the heights and despite dreadful losses swarmed over the summit like leeches and drove all before them taking possession of the heights, winning where general umson had failed so disgracefully a little later, got to hold what they had gained was out of the question. On the afternoon of the same day the enemy recovering from the disaster and shock made a fierce counter charge and drove the christians from the hard fought positions after a most sanguinary fight of four hours. Winter was now come and with it was a time for the glandelinians and a good time for the christians. Though the enemy had drove the christians from the Ewangelinia Grania Heights the main force which had advanced so furiously was still in possession of Norma possionis, and the rebel generl Henry Darger was fleeing across the gunbeam creek toward the main Puellie Jackson Fortifications pursued by a force of Angelinians under general zimorime. As the whole glandelinian army at Julio Gallio was in despair, the city was under fire of a hundred thousand guns of all sizes, parrot guns, howitzers, mortar guns and great nine inch guns and also Krupp and Catermeyer guns, and for a time everything seemed lost as for six days in succession the main forces of christians made one fearful and desperate assault upon the heights of Ewangelinia Grania after another like storming tidal waves and by night kept up a dreadful artillery storm in an attempt to snike the heights untenable. Early during one day of this most bloodiest battles fought near Julio Gallio, general Washington reached with a large force of zimoramarians the main stretch of the gunbeam Creek, and crossing the pontoon bridges, and sailing all the boats within his main reach, gunboats and other ships which had been abandoned by a fleeing troop of christians got his defeated army safely as o across just as the advance guard of the Abbinianians came up. He felt that he was no safe untilithi the gunbeam creek should freeze over, when he felt sure that the Abbinianians would advance on. but nevertheless this glandelinian generals was not yet feeling himself to be beaten. He had decided to keep quiet untilt chri christians. He did not think the Abbinianians would make any attempt that night to cross over as the gunbeam river was full of floating ice and a fierce snowstorm had begun. The glandelinians had never supposed that the christian christian armies confrontig the rebels at this point would attempt to move at such a time, and the glandelinians across the river in fancied security were making merry in honor of the repulse of the main christian assaults on the heights of Ewangelinia Grania. As night was falling general zimorime took twenty four of i brigades of Abbinianians and Angelinians, and with them silently crossed the stream in spite of the storm and ice while he made a chain of chains of batteries along the shore of the stream. Landing on the puellie gunbeam side of the shore and river he suddenly fell upon the unsuspecting glandelinians there and overcame the whole force after a most sanguinary contest lasting all night, to ing taking a hin hundred thousand prisoners and killing over five hundred thousand glandelinians. The main glandelinian general Washington was mortally wounded, and died a few days afterwards.

Two hours afterwards general Kindersley managed to cross another force of Abissians at another section of the river with his whole army and occupied the captured works. At sunrise general Purgatorius in person with a large army attacked him, most furiously and a most desperate struggle raged all morning. Kindersley holding on and decimating Purgatorius' columns, the Landolinian general not relaying his supports which he ordered receded from the dreadful slaughter. During the meanwhile general Kindersley was quietly withdrawing a portion of his army on the left, leaving his engagements in full array to deceive the enemy who was attacking his main line. He marched this division around general Purgatorius' rear where he struck a severe blow and defeated the whole of Purgatorius' army after a severe fight. Before another Landolinian army sent from the succillie pikesen fortress coming to Purgatorius aid could overtake him, general Kindersley's army was strongly entrenched on the heights of the captured positions. Then during the rest of the day by a series of skillful movements and attacks, general Kindermine by night fall forced the whole foe army in that location to leave the region and retire to the fortresses again. These brilliant victories even though Evangelina Grania Heights were not captured revived the Angelinians and their ardour ever more, but before the close of the action elsewhere however they had suffered a most great loss. A glandelinian fleet sailed or straggled from Vivian Wickey with a transport carrying a large army, and soon after entered the Norma River. General Kindermine surmising the object of this expedition, hurried southward a fleet of christian ships and an army also, and met the glandelinians on the north Bend of Gunbeam Creek near Evangelina Grania. After the most desperate fight his army had ever engaged in before Vivian Wickey alone, his troops were badly beaten, and so Evangelina Grania was still in the possession of the foe and Kindermine had to retreat. In two days afterwards general Kindermine receiving reinforcements attacked the city of Norma, besieging and shelling it to utterance, but nevertheless despite his fearful artillery storm and despite the assaults he delivered one after another in endless succession he failed to drive the glandelinians from it.

Although general Kindermine had lost the Evangelina Grania, another portion of the christian army attacking the foe position at the right of Norma, Cassinia during the artillery storm won a splendid victory. General Burgoyne with a large force of glandelinians charged upon the christians to drive them back to their own positions. He intended to get control of Gunbeam Creek so and so cut off general Kindermine from retreat to the Gunbeam Creek and from the rest of the country and the main christian lines. Crown Junction, Port St Edward and Peter fell one after another into his hands, and for a time he appeared to have everything in his own hands or his own way but he suffered tremendous losses for the christian christian fire scathed his advance most dreadfully and he lost a hundred officers and ten generals for his success.

It was indeed a fearful conflict around Norma, Cassinia. Hour by hour amid a fierce withering fire of cannon and musketry along a forty one mile battle line christian troops troops under generals Massach, one Connectioner, Hampshire, and former came to the scene and opened fire with artillery and in rifles and used machine guns face to face with the enemy making the region a regular slaughter house, and as the christian army constantly grew stronger the foe a headlong advance was being slowly checked. One section of the christian forces had fallen back, slowly to the Heights of Caldwell near C. I. Caldwell's gun, where general Kindermine with new forces came up and took personal command and directed the fearful battle. General Burgoyne's main line had gone steadily forward despite the most tenacious resistance he had met, but many brigades on his left, sent to carry a christian trenches, had been repeatedly counter attacked by Abbia Abbia's and utterly destroyed. In one of these most desperate fights on the main stretch of the Caldwell's gun near the right of Norma, Cassinia, general Hanson's Francis Starkline with his fierce Calverinians beat a tremendous glandelinian onslaught of a hundred thousand men, and took one hundred and sixty five thousand prisoners and scattered the remainder of the force of rebels until they were utterly dispersed. At the beginning of the desperate assault general Stark in yelled to his men:

"We must beat the rebels now or we will be annihilated. Stop those yelling demons before it is too late."

They did and hell seemed to have broken loose along their lines. At other portions where the christians had thrown up earthworks twenty feet high armed with great Centimeter and Calibre cannon the rebels made a fiercer attack upon the christians. But here after fighting incessantly all day and making thirteen onslaughts the rebels gained nothing but excruciating losses. The rebels here were utterly surrounded and their own union was rapidly giving out. They had found then that they must either crush the Nationals to give up their plans. Making another attack late in the evening, they fought as desperately as men really wishing to die, but the Abbia's yelling like legions of fiends, and cursing fearfully opposed them like leeches at every step, and the glandelinians were driven back in frightful confusion toward and into sections of burning Norma, Cassinia, where they were soon completely hemmed in by the army of christians under general Massach. Escape seemed impossible for the rebels but all night they wily stood the siege and bombardments gauged and stormed with fire from ruins and barricades in the streets. Every time the christian forces pressed their attacks desperately into the town.

This repulse was a great great success for the rebels, and nothing that had ever happened since the war and even the siege began did so much to encourage the glandelinians at Vivian Wickey and to give them so much utmost confidence in the hope of final success of their wicked cause.

Thus the rebels had held out against the christians at Norma, Cassinia and Evangelina Grania and the battle was now known as Caldwell's gun and lasted six days.

The days before Christmas and the main Evangelina Grania horror was a terrible one for the glandelinians. The whole glandelinian force outside of of Vivian Wickey was a most hard one for the whole concern for they were compelled to be on winter quarters under intense artillery fire, and roar of shells thundering in deafening roar above and around them. The millions of men under fire, and exposed to storms and cold suffered more intense hardships than can be ever conceived. They had hardly any clothing or blankets, many were without shelter constantly as explosions destroyed everything and they had to form dugouts and caves to shelter themselves from the terrible christian artillery storm. And often the many streams of wounded also under fire were often compelled to walk through deep snow barefooted, making their trail a by bloody footprints. Gold, starvation, disease, and havoc of shell fire and burning wreckage and all other hardships had carried off about one third the number of men besieged outside of Vivian Wickey and her protecting fortresses, and still the glandelinians were desperate and meant to win or die in the attempt. The glandelinians were as desperate as American traitors in the American Rebellion against England, but unfortunately their bravery was useless, for the glandelinian cause was a wicked one and no wicked cause can ever be won.

Even many Angelinian agents went among the starving glandelinians and offered them good pay, and plenty of food and clothes and shelter, if they would desert the wicked cause and come over to the christian side, but none of them were wise enough to listen to the good proposal which would have saved them so much suffering. Outside of Lucille Jackson and Vivian Wickey nearly fifty million glandelinians were besieged and general Mic-Allister Stanck, Purgatorian, or even Manley could do nothing to aid them.

Though it was not a complete christian success the battle of Caldwell's gun was the cause of this disaster to the enemy. A number of most able glandelinian generals came from Norma Catherine to Julio Callio through tunnels to help the besieged army of glandelinians under general Purgatorian, and so in November 30th 1912, general Mic-Allister Stanck sent a large fleet of warships to assist in breaking the siege within a siege.

These ships did little good despite all the wild uproar of cannonading and the glandelinian Congress now became alarmed at this turn of affairs and tried to bring the siege within an end by all means possible. The glandelinian authorities had offered to set aside all the horrible laws concerning child slavery provided the Angelinians would lay down their arms and raise the siege, but none of the christian generals would listen to any proposals of any kind whatever.

Their own Congress had declared all child slaves should be free, and nothing but the stopping of the rebellion of glandelinia would satisfy them. The glandelinians then tried to make efforts to bribe christian generals to betray their holy country and cause. They even offered general Consentinian Aronburg, fifty million dollars and the surrender to him of a part of Vivian Wickey and all the garrison, if he would only forsake his country's cause.

General Whilliamsber Zimmermann and Consentinian Aronburg calls himself sent by the stinging answer:

"I'm not Judas Iscariot and never was. And I am not worth worth purchasing, but such as I am all the devil's gold, and all the wealth of the world is not rich enough to make me turn against God as you propose. I do not sent any more agents as they will be shot if they again come to me."

SKIRMS OF DISASTERS AT VIVIAN WICKLEY

When the news that the Angelinian forces had besieged Purgatorian's first grand division reached general Mic-Allister Stanck, who was then making investigation for spies in Norma Catherine he said:

"That is not the right way to say it about those christian dogs. It is general Purgatorian that has captured the christians."

It was not long before general Mic-Allister Stanck found this to be untrue. As long as the Angelinians held on there was nothing that could be done, because vindictive and Hanson were watching everything closely, and was ready to fall upon the besieged within short notice, should any portion of the rebel army attempt to move out of their protecting dugouts and other ground first fortifications known as the outside fortress of Damnation. It was worse than the situation of the enemy at Carbondale.

In the earliest part of the month of December if you pleased to say general Purgatorian saw that if his besieged army stayed any longer any longer in the bad situation it would be completely shut up, as the other army had been at Garbondaler, at the beginning of the siege, or be forced to surrender. General Purgatorian therefore decided to make a retreat through his secret retreats, and so one night to make good his escape he decided to have one portion of the army strike a desperate blow so that general Madison and "Indepine" would not be in close pursuit as he knew the character of the Christians now. The Angelinians had already captured two million of his men and he did not like to risk another such disaster....

Finding that nothing could be done therefore to break the siege within the siege but by such a desperate plan, general Purgatorian telegraphed to the admiral of the glangelinian fleets to sail south and capture one of the Angelinian wooden fortresses. From that point if the fleet would be successful the enemy then landing on the shores could overrun everything in the southern section of the siege, but the fleet making a desperate attack with nineteen hundred ships after a desperate artillery duel with christian shore batteries for two days and a general night was beaten with the loss of two hundred and fifty ships, and so general Purgatorian saw that nothing could be done in that section. Indeed during that siege within siege, there was little success on either side if you please.

General Wayne Caldwell who was called "Mad Caldwell" made a most brilliant dash upon a portion of the windermine left wing and managed to capture two christian sailboats on the Caldwell Run but the glangelinian general in pushing on in the face of a withering fire of artillery and musketry and machine guns was killed, twenty of his staff were wounded and his division shot to pieces. It recoiled from the captured work in confusion and was half destroyed in the panic that followed before it got safely back to its own works. Simultaneously another glangelinian fleet attacked the christian wing by the water side and feinted at an unusual time within Angelinian's fleet. Many ships were badly disabled in the terrific conflict, the glangelinian flagship was destroyed by shot and fire and it was sinking under the admiral, but nevertheless he continued to fight until he was killed and the remainder of his fleet forced to surrender. The admiral on the glangelinian ship had fought so well against the christians, that although he was killed and his fleet forced to surrender, the glangelinian authorities gave him a honorable burial. When someone told Admiral Thomas of this he said laughingly:

"Well if I had him in my possession I would have buried him in the potters field." The fury of the siege was now carried on mainly at every point and the ferocity of the most extensive artillery duels, duels within duels as to say was increasing with redoubled fury and vivian wickey sounded as if she was becoming a million volences from so many cannons roaring on both sides and so many ear-splitting explosions of shells, and disaster us blasts.

But while either side did much severe fighting in series of battles at every portion of the siege, general Purgatorian now resorted to another desperate plan to compass the ruin of the siege within a siege. General Mariomanna Aroulston who had been able to perform many brave deeds during the siege was then in command of planners and go-mans run and go-mans land in front of Lucille pickens the most important point of the siege on the Sunbeam Creek. Some time before he had severely reproved one of his own generals for too much misconduct and blunders, and this general was very angry and began to feel bitter of his cause. The glangelinian knew that he was feeling against his cause secretly sent agents to him as soon as possible, with whom he conspired to surrender the section of No Mans Land provided they would give him a large sum of money about two hundred thousand dollars and a higher position in the glangelinian army.....

The bargain was made, but a band of Angelinian Gentian was members fortunately captured ten of the glangelinian agents as they were trying to get out of the christian lines in disguise, and so discovered the treasonable plot. The traitor general Frank Smithers at once fled but a did not succeed in getting away to join the rebels and he and the ten agents were shot, the agents for a spies and the traitor, traitor in disgrace for treason. If the plot had not been discovered and the siege of vivian wickey would have surely met a most disastrous ending and then vivian wickey would never have been able to be besieged again. It was discovered also through many papers and letters found on the traitor that he would surely have fought against his own country country, and so though he had relatives and even a wife and child they were forever disgraced because they had a father who was a traitor and were exiled from the country even though it had been no fault of theirs.

during the time of the treasonable plot being discovered, the glangelinians had captured after a fierce fight of four y fourty days beginning in November to December a small christian fortress, and then rapidly overrunning the whole of the region advanced in heavy numbers with the purpose of breaking the siege of Purgatorians army. There was believed to be no christian force now to oppose their advance in this location for the christian army in the fortress had been compelled to retreat, but at Lincoln the glangelinians had surrendered to general kindermine and the enemy thus advancing did not know of the peril the he was driving himself into. General kindermine sent generals Marion ghriley, Melodia Pickernae, gumptner and six other daring generals, with immense brigades to go to the point and give the advancing glangelinian troops as much trouble as possible, while he himself would watch every movement of general Purgatorian. During the fierce engagements however the glangelinians would retreat to the swamps of gunbeam Creek when ever a strong force of christians pursued them after giving them a repulse, but every time a number of Angelinian wagon trains were left unguarded, or small parties of christian troops became separated from the main army, bold glangelinian leaders emerging from their ambush, would suddenly fall upon them with dreadful ferocity and destroy and capture them. His kind of bloody fighting was kept up continually, and the Angelinians even with their strong forces, could never feel a t entirely safe in the country, but another disaster was coming. The foe who had captured the christian position w and which was advancing to break kindermine's siege of general Purgatorians army had come in collision with general kindermine's divisions on the extreme left after driving back the commands sent against them by kindermine but in the regular main battle the glangelinians were most disastrously defeated however, and the army scattered and cut off from the escape by river. Everything had depended upon the generals Marion, Sumpter Pickens, and the others of the christian brigades sent against the foe and by drawing the rebels troops into a trap they had accomplished more than expected and the glangelinian general Calc Caldwell was also caught in a trap and escape by river was cut off by gun boats and warships. A general Guilford of the christian side had been severely wounded during this tremendous action general Benson Green was sent to succeed him. He then took command of the victorious christian left wing, and continued to fight the new besieged army at every opportu opportunity intending to force it to a surrender under any conditions.

On December on the fourth day general Greene's Ablesannian forces, under general Sumner bent another glangelinian onslaught led by general Cowpens in which the foe general was killed, but when general Cornmiller of the foe advanced in general attacks and made the battle become general once more a portion of the christian army was threatened with annihilation and forced to begin a retreat. The generals at this point however managed so well to stop the recoil that he kept the glangelinian force under Caldwell's command forced to retreat through and into the swamps, till after the most sanguinary fighting they were fairly worn out. The christians now pressed onward and renewed the battle on new ground with redoubled fury. After a harder fight, the christians were again repulsed with enormous losses, but the rebels were so badly shocked and their lines so horribly torn in the bloody encounter that general Caldwell of the foe side said:

"Another such victory would not only prevent us from resuming Purgatorians army but would ruin us and force us to a surrender. General Cornmiller could not follow the repulsed christian troops under general Greene, and dared not risk another action, but nevertheless he was not able to escape and did not know what to do should the christians attack him again. General Green now moving with troops and bravely resumed the battle on general formation and soon cleared a stretch of country ten miles in length of the rebels and captured thirteen works and nearly two thousand field pieces. He resumed another section of the battle a little later driving the foe from "ed riding" Wood's rings in the woods, and already general Green were masters of the country and had recaptured the positions which the other christian forces had abandoned before. General Green, kindermine, and others now carried on the battle in the most severe manner, while engineers and raiders burned many houses, set stockades on fire, and destroyed all towns and villages of encampments the enemy had abandoned in the wild flight.

Indeed a large majority of the people of Protestantia were clamorous for war against Glandelinia, but the Protestant king only decided to send ships and provisions at any cost to the help of the christian states engaged in the effort to overthrow the wild rebellion.

General Hanson now knowing that Hanson's main armies were concentrating before Evangelina Grania with the purpose of forcing the foe positions there under Manley did everything within his power to press the siege, and attempts fierce and sanguinary were made to cut off the water supply of the enemy, and also to prevent provisions reaching the enemy by finding means to destroy the underground tunnels from Calverine but all these proved fruitless. Simultaneously many christian ships from Calverine but all these proved fruitless. Simultaneously many christian ships kept searching many strange vessels coming into all ports of the vician wickey city, and carrying away shiploads of child slaves and sending them to fight fiercely we were even arming many elder child slaves and sending them to fight fiercely to retain their freedom and help free their younger friends. General Harrison was appointed commander of a large band of armed child slaves each lad or even girl who were armed and these happened to be chased by rebels but despite both sorts being boys and girls they fought desperately defeating their pursuers with great loss and showing that even they could fight as good as the soldiers themselves.

The enemy had already done everything in their power to oppose the siege of vician wickey very bitterly and all the time it lasted if you please to mention while the time came early in December while general Hanson's armies were concentrating before vician wickey and Evangelina Grania two christian divisions were sent on Hanson's orders to force their way into Julio Gallo by desperate assaults, but they had no success. One of these under general Whilliam Heller soon fell back to his own defenses disobedience of his commands without striking the enemy even a blow. And when a big force of Glandelinians followed after him, and appeared in seemingly overwhelming numbers around his troops this Angelinian general became good and scared, and surrendered his troops, and with it a stretch of christian trenches ten miles long. All of the christian generals and even Hanson vician were very angry that no resistance was made, and the troops who had been thus disgraced and who had been eager to fight wept at the disaster and disgrace, but as good soldiers they had to obey, even though they knew their commander was a coward and had the backbone of a jelly fish. The general was immediately tried for cowardice and sentenced to be shot. The other division immediately tried a for cowardice and sentenced to be shot. The other division made the attack through and part way into Julio Gallo but was ultimately captured and their commander slain.

While the Angelinians were thus again repulsed in their plans to force a way through Julio Gallo, the christian fleets under another admiral won some brilliant victory victories in Lake Angeline. Three days after general Heller had disgraced himself at Julio Gallo by his cowardly surrender general Hull Fuller commanding a large christian fleet of strong gunboats and merrimacs stormed one of the shore batteries of the foe on the shore of Lake Angeline. For two days the fleets and the shore batterbatteries fought a desperate duel and many ships were sunk or disabled but finally the foe flag on shore was hauled down and the christians were soon in possession. Many ships of the christians had however been so badly riddled, that they were sinking and had to be abandoned. This was the beginning of a long series of other fights on sea lake and rivers that followed, in which the Angelinian navy won its up utmost glory.

All these conflict I wish to remind the reader are not raging at one point. Many battles hundreds raged all over inside and outside the siege of vician wickey between the months of November and December before the battle of Evangelina Grania and many were for victories at that.

During the month of November on the fourth three other armies were sent to make a desperate effort to fight their way through Julio Gallo to the foe water works and capture and destroy all the water systems so the enemy would be cut off from water supply. Two of the armies were captured however before it could do anything, and the third under general Caldwell found all it could do to defend itself from Glandelinian attacks after it had forced an entrance into the city despite the fierce fire from the fortresses. So the Glandelinians still held possession of all the water works and the attempt to cut the rebels from the water supply was again frustrated, and as the enemy were not only wasters of vician wickey but of the full state of Angeline, line in which vician wickey was, it was feared that next the enemy would attempt to land a big army from the Glandelinian and Glandelinian fortresses, and make an effort to storm general Hanson's whole line and Hanson's also.

Simultaneously to this Jo Annie vician himself had determined to take a part of his army and use a fleet at his command drive a portion of the foe out of the city by an expedition up the vician River. Everyone knew that general Jo Annie was brave, resourceful, and full of energy but it was feared that his plan would fail. He went to work however preparing for the advance of his troops, and of the fleet which was to move simultaneously, and soon it was started.

There near vician wickey at the point into which the river enters, he suddenly met a Glandelinian squadron on the 14th of November, and at once offered battle both fleets opening a fierce fire at once. Jo Annie's flagship in which he commanded in person called the St. Lawrence engaged three of the Glandelinian warships at once and meeting simultaneously fire from enemy forts until she was riddled with shot and shell and out of ten thousand men he had only eight men aboard left to manage it. When Jo Annie vician thought wounded bore his flag and survivors away rowed in a long rowboat to another of his flagships under Admiral Saunders. He was named Catherine vician in honor of his sister under Admiral Callied the compelled to pass in close range of the guns of the enemy of one of the fortresses which fired a storm of great broadsides at his boat, but though many big geyers of water shot up all around him and almost filled it with water no shots struck him, and he reached the decks of the other flagship in safety though slightly wounded a second time, and rescued the fight more fiercely before.

In a whole days fight however the Glandelinian fleet was annihilated and the Angelinian fleet many ships having been shot to pieces finally was compelled to retreat the expedition having been frustrated by the engagement, but then during his retreat he came into clash with another squadron of foe ships and after another battle lasting two hours the whole for squadron finally surrendered.

Jo Annie vician then went back to his third flagship captured by the foe during the engagement and relieved the swords of the Glandelinian officers on deck but he would not set one free and held them all prisoners as traitors.

This was the only expedition Jo Annie vician ever made on water and afterwards commanded costly armies on the land.

As soon as general Hanson vician had learned of his nephew's attempt on the river he decided to push a force forward across the vician river and carry an attack into Julio Gallo himself. A full force of the enemy retreated before him, but he followed this division of rebels so closely that the enemy could not retreat to the Heights of Evangelina Grania. His troops that pursued then at once surrounded them and on the twelfth of November attacked, broke their line, and after inflicting severe losses forced them to surrender. Led by general Tecumseh another division of Glandelinians kept up the fight desperately for five hours until their general was killed, then they scattered and ran in the utmost confusion to the shelter of the woods and main christian position. This position was thus assaulted by the christians but the enemy offered such tenacious resistance that the assault was repulsed with great loss.

To add to the severe troubles of the besieged general Hanson had moved forward his armies in an effort to get around Evangelina Grania and as to help Hanson vician's army and surround it, and their movements for a long time was successful, their shelling and attacks spreading terror for ten miles. Finally general Jackson Evanson with an army of Glandelinians and Glandelinians, defeated general Eagle in a desperate battle and put an end to this movement for a time. Simultaneously the Angelinians won two brilliant victories on the rebels by sinking a Glandelinian at vician wickey and capturing it, and capturing another at vician wickey. These victories greatly cheered the christians, but as they could not however be followed up they otherwise did little good, and some time later these captured positions had to be finally alone abandoned.

On the eighteen of December 1912. The christians under general Palto sent a division of 1,122,000 men from general Hanson's right from vician wickey to make an effort once more to cut off the enemy's water supply, and at the same time a strong fleet sailed up the river. The christian plan was to take away all water supply of the enemy so as to reduce them to thirst and end the siege, and if this failed to at least make a desperate expedition and clear all the rivers from the enemy fleets and shore batteries, and make a cutting off the river. The vician wickey was captured in order to sever vician wickey from the help of the Glandelinian and Glandelinian fortresses. This you remember was what Admiral Thomas tried to do earlier in the siege, but this plan failed this time as it had done before but more disastrously. There was at the time a fleet of 1,500 big Glandelinian merrimacs two thousand feet long at the river ports guarding vician wickey, and they stood their own and had all attacks of the christians in check. Another rebel fleet, under Admiral Hakdonoh str stemmed down the river from the water entrance of the city fell upon the fleet of christian ships and completely destroyed them. As soon as the advancing christian troops learned of this they broke up their camp, and hurried back to their own positions without stopping even to save their sick and wounded. The Glandelinians had suffered many reverses already but toward the end of this second expedition attempted into the city they had been threatened with a greater disaster. The powerful christian fleet which had moved up the river had been supported by another fleet and by a large army marching on the shore and had made the intention of taking the water supply of vician wickey. The Angelinians knew that if they secured control of the water supply of vician wickey and deprived the rebels of all the water by not even permitting them to secure any from the rivers they could easily proceed up the rivers through all parts of the water ways of Vivian Wickey and soon possess the whole of the city without assailing the fortresses themselves and force the enemy to surrender even before the fort fortresses would be captured. There had been however inside of Vivian Wickey on all river fronts numerous fortresses also erected by the enemy and these land forces and all were prepared in time to meet this onlooker for attack.

General Mic-Allister Stanek hurried his troops to the river fronts inside the city from the Mic-Whiridian fortresses, ordered forward all the troops that were within reach, and compelled many of the glandelinian citizens inside of Vivian Wickey to become soldiers and fight. This intrepid glandelinian general and soldier determined to resist the advance of the christian christians. He strengthened the garrisons in the forts on the river sides in Vivian Wickey, but the foremost forts proved useless as the fleets destroyed them and made the garrisons surrender. There were small lakes also just within Vivian Wickey which lead into the rivers by other channels, and other christian fleets and taken possession of these lakes and so bombarded the fortresses from there, and then landed and marched, forces of troops across the rivers under fire. Mic-Allister hurried troops then in this direction and fought then all the way until dark put an end to the struggle. This battle however lasted two days inside of Vivian Wickey and the streets were strewn with myriads of fallen of both sides but finding he could do no more at this point Mic-Allister managed to force the glandelinian troops to recede a short distance and then had them throw up a long line of works along the river fronts. On December eighteenth the Angelinians made their grand attack. These soldiers were the flower of the Abbeismian armies, and being used to hard fighting on many a battle field, they did not expect to have much trouble with Mic-Allister troops. They pressed the foe far into the city and fortresses but for two days were continually under the deadly fire of the zimmarannians and glandelinians from fortresses, earthworks, barricades in streets, and from all the windows of houses and doors also and from housetops and even from towers and churches, and after making a fierce assault of six hours duration they began to waver and falter. For six days again and again the Angelinians and Abbeismians rushed headlong at the enemy making repeated attempts to force the works and houses and each time were driven back by the unerring fire of the enemy from their positions of concealment. The christian commander general Helion was killed, and two million of his men fell in the streets, and before the line of earthworks and fortresses. They then gave up the attempt and hearing one of their fleets had been destroyed in an engagement elsewhere and other attacks repulsed, they returned to their own big fleets of ships a badly beaten christian army and gave up the bloody expedition. It was found just now impossible to cut off the foe water supply.

While this was in progress rebel ships thought they might safely defy the Angelinian power, and began to make attempts to seize as many besieging ships as possible. Commander Caldwellian rushed against them with a fleet down the Norma River from the north, captured nearly a hundred glandelinian ships, and transports, succeeded in entering a number of glandelinian harbors of Vivian Wickey, bombarded the fortresses, and forcing rebel soldiers to free many child slaves retreated before they could be fired upon with disastrous effects by the main fortresses. From that time for a while however there was no further attempts by rebels to seize Angelinian ships.

In the meantime as the Angelinians having concentrated along the borders of Angelinia and northern Calverinia child-slavery had been gradually dying out in northern Calverinia, because the Angelinians were in fully authority and had many armies to prevent the foe from coming to the rescue of the besieged at Vivian Wickey, but elsewhere where the enemy were in possession of Calverinia, and especially at Vivian Wickey child slavery despite the war had been growing stronger than ever.

During the siege of Vivian Wickey while general Hanson's army was beginning to concentrate in the vicinity of Evangelinia Grania and now possinia, Angelinian engineers and countless soldiers were at work such as digging fortified canals, building ponton bridges under fire, constructing new works, and harbors for their own use during the siege, and other works such as banking dykes over the rivers and all the work was constructed continually under fire either from rebel artillery, or from snipers with rifles in hiding.

But the greatest disaster was now threatening all nations especially opposed to glandelinia. Foreign goods of any kind could not reach christian ports on account of enemy ships, and so prices began to soar like a balloon. Everything in Abbeismian began to be more costly than anything in the United States is now or ever will be. People who were poor in Abbeismian or other nations could not buy any kind of goods because they were too expensive and goods used on christians was not imported and so the approaching christians for children of other nations and grown people also was becoming a very gloomy situation. Farmers were losing profit in Abbeismian, and this resulted in raising all kinds of food stuff high and factories in all nations were beginning to shut down because they could not obtain goods to manufacture. A great many foreign goods had at times managed to come into the Angelinian country but such ships were besieged by foes. This was caused all on account of the Aronburg situation known as the original cause of the siege of Vivian Wickey though what the Aronburg situation was had been a strange and deep mystery.

Great canals had been made by the christian leaders in which to protect their warships and make it easier to transport troops and artillery to the front.

This was indeed the beginning of a great system of canals, which during the latter part of the siege covered the region before Vivian Wickey like a network.

After missions were aroused by the situation of Vivian Wickey all over the world, and people thought that many christian nations would make an attempt to intervene in Angelinias behalf but the smaller nations were afraid of glandelinia. Flomlinia however especially her ruler passed a law in December permitting foreign goods under any conditions to come into Angelinia ports guarded by Flomlinia warships and Protestantia did the same thing, but the glandelinian government threatened that if such measures came continued Protestantia and Flomlinia would be at war with glandelinia also. This aroused Protestantia who therefore declared war against glandelinia. In Angelinias behalf and sent warships and soldiers to help Angelinia crush the rebellion.

There were during the siege two other great battles seven days after the fearful struggle at Evangelinia Grania and now Christass was part. One of the battles was raging for two days at Sao River near fortress Red Riding Hood with the glandelinians and zimmarannians northwest of Julio Callion Junction with fortress Lucille Nickson, but the rebels were repulsed with great loss.

The other conflict was a long and terrible one and raged at the same place but occurred three days later. This battle was brought on by an attempt of Angelinian generals to concentrate new positions in this location. The glandelinians had positions in sailents high breastworks, and in mountain or hill passes and their lines of men and machine guns and other artillery in swamps, or Calverinia Everglades where it was difficult for Angelinian soldiers to reach them, as the enemy fiercely fought for five days, many lives were lost and terrible was the number of injured and dying. The battle cost the Angelinians many myriads of soldiers and officers and such annihilation before the glandelinians were finally driven back.

During the approaching month of January after news came in that nations already witnessed a sad diffused christian day general Bureau Van had been stationed by Hanson to take command of the army and brought there, while now Hanson was making plans to form and concentrate the other army near Aurandeenlio.

His purpose was to capture fortress St. Rudman if possible by sinking a fleet and move as if against Aurandeenlio. The strength of the siege had been growing steadily for several weeks a week. New christian fortresses made of earth and gravel and sand bags and plastic logs and iron and concrete had been spring up, and were concentrated in many numbers at many points, more duels with artillery

The excitement about the capture about the rescued children was growing greater every day. The laws that general Hanson passed on the 17th of January giving all Angelina soldiers and officers the right to make raids into foe lines at every point of the siege, for the attempt to secure child slaves, to use as their own children and free them from the horrors of slavery was so offensive to the Angelinians Congress, that the glandelinian Congress at Vivian Wiskey passed immediately what was known as "The snipers Law" which in effect gave the Christians a great deal of trouble and though children had been rescued by thousands it cost heavy losses in men and officers who dared to make the dangerous expeditions.

In many cases great mobs of Angelina soldiers rescued many runaway child slaves who had been caught by Glandelinian pursuers, and who had been about to be taken back to the glandelinian encampments.

Finally two events occurred which made the glandelinian besieged more angry and defiant than ever. One of them was general Hanson's main issue called "The Great Angelina Decision." It was the law among the besieging Christian armies that if any number of child slaves were brought into the Christian lines, they should be free but in the main decision the supreme Christian generals decided that all such laws made by the glandelinians concerning the retaining of child slavery was completely unconstitutional that was to say they were very contrary to the laws of God and humanity combined, and therefore had no say or stand, and afterwards that any number of glandelinians found persecuting children whether children of slaves or not were to be shot down in cold blood like dogs, for no rebel had any right to have children as slaves. The northern parts of the besieging Christian armies loudly applauded this great decision. They declared it removed all barriers to the hope of keeping up child slavery, and that as Angelinians no one should be allowed even to submit to any such injustice to a innocent children, boys and girls.

The other event was what was known as the main child slave raid. General Brown Johnston was one of the most daring Christian leaders of all times. He was indeed an ardent active every man, and during the early part of January 1913..... he resolved to make an attempt to secure a great number of children, and raid a portion of the enemy lines in the southern part of the siege itself. He therefore got together a large body of cavalry, suddenly entered a section of the enemy lines near Harper's Run, and seized a strong arsenal there after a fierce combat, and securing everything besides many child slaves turned all over to the Angelinians.

He also proposed to overthrow many sections of the glandelinian forces there, set all the children free he could, and even place arms in the hands of the elder children. But during the time of his second raid his little company of cavalry was overcome by a detachment of Gargolian horsemen under general Caldwell and also by a force of glandelinian marines sent from Lucille Pickens, while the captured Christian general was delivered up to the glandelinian authorities near Lucille Pickens by whom he was tried for conspiracy, treason and murder. He was shot to death on Jan. 22nd 1913. )))

This raid of the Christian troops made with such daring at any risk fanned the flame of passion to such a degree that there was no question in anything concerning the war except that of crushing child slavery at hell's gates even. The Angelinian forces were still the strongest armies ever concentrating before Vivian Wiskey, but the Evangelina grand horror had for a time rent it in two, and now in the month of January during the time of the discussion of what should be done with rescued child slaves the army had received two new men as generals, Douglas Stephenson of an Abyssinilian division being one, and general John G. Anderson of an Abyssinilian division being another, please don't another. General Douglas represented the Angelinian forces as his best friends, who though not in favor of the extension of any parts of the Christian armies, yet believed that the divisions of Angelinians in each territory of the outside of Vivian Wiskey and they alone had the right to say whether children should be rescued and be taken as the children of soldiers, or set free in better form and attempts made to locate their parents of said children who may still be living.

The other new Christian general however on the other hand, represented the extreme southern part of the Angelinian forces, who insisted that any one who rescued children had the right to obtain them as their own and to raise them as if they were their own children and declared that their parents could never be found. Nevertheless the Angelinians were determined to drive out child slavery from glandelinia and galverinia at any cost whatever, and so decided to press the siege of Vivian Wiskey to its utmost.

As soon as the recent battle had been over and the Christians had secured possession of the entire stretch of the Red Riding Hood Woods several of the glandelinian armies had prepared to leave the region for better shelter. A great many of the leading glandelinian generals had however always held that the Christian siege would be perpetual before it would win out, and even had repeated their wicked blasphemous boasts, but only a small league or partner ship among some of the rebel generals declared that no glandelinian army had any right whatever to withdraw from the Red Riding Hood Woods, not even when ever it happened to choose to do so for it was retreating cowardly from Christian enemies. General Carolinian who had led the movement, and declared to withdraw his troops out of all portions of the Red Riding Hood Woods did not however do so and still stayed there with his lines only three hundred feet away from the Christian lines. Generals Alabama Georgian, Florinidia, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Frank Texas all brothers, had withdrawn their forces out of the woods, the Angelinians having advanced quickly as possible seizing, such fortresses, arsenals, and abandoned glandelinian Navy Yards of the glandelinian government of Vivian Wiskey as were within their respective reach and now started to concentrate upon the foe more threateningly.

The other glandelinian armies or divisions who were still in some portions of the Red Riding Hood Woods waited, in the vain hope, that the trouble now started at Sunbeam Creek, would probably be settled without much more severe fighting. The glandelinian forces that had thus made this secession of the woods chose a general Caldwell for their main head, and many other generals to surprise any advance the Christian forces under general consentinian Ironburg or the others might attempt. The whole army of besieged was now anxious. Many plans were proposed by all the glandelinian generals to adjust the serious trouble now started, but they all failed, and through that month of January every day brought his-allister Stanek a most tremendous battle of the siege nearer and nearer to the verge of a most tremendous battle of the siege.

The positions of the foe in this emergency was one of great difficulty and perplexity. Many various glandelinian officers, representing the enemy forces, and acting as glandelinian judges in Vivian Wiskey, marshalls, generals, head child slave masters collectors of runaway children, foe postpa postmasters, and district attorneys, had all resigned from fear of disaster should the Christian press the siege, and there was no way therefore for a while in which the rebels could exercise any authorities on Vivian Wiskey, and prisoners and child slaves were escaping by the scores of thousands every day. General Buchanan as chief commissioner of Vivian Wiskey could not and would not admit that it was within the power of any general or glandelinian officer to resign at his pleasure at such a critical situation, and yet he fully doubted to resign at his pleasure at such a critical situation, to force the officers back to his right under the glandelinian constitution, to force the officers back to their commands by a fierce measures, even if he had men and forces and laws strong enough to do so. But he had neither and the glandelinian Congress refused to give him authority to make the officers come back to their respective commands by force. It was evident therefore that nothing could be done one way or the other, until general his-allister Stanek should take up the matter.

When general his-allister Stanek did make a decision over the matter seven glandelinian divisions had left the Red Riding Hood Woods, and the remaining divisions were awaiting the course of events. It was not certain what they would do, but they all claimed that any division or troops had the right to abandon positions when too near the Christians whenever it pleased when it did not relieve the support asked for. In Vivian Wiskey most generals held that not one of the divisions had any right to leave the Red Riding Hood Woods without orders or being compelled to do so by Christian attacks which they could not stand before, but there was in fact a great difference of opinion as to what should be done to retake the woods. Some said that the glandelinian divisions should be made to go back to their respective positions by force, while others thought it would be better to allow them to abandon the woods in peace. Many of the most eminent and wisest men of the glandelinians held the latter opinion for a while while at least.

General his-allister Stanek who was a glandelinian general of calm wisdom and discretion, hoped to settle the question among his generals peacefully. He declared that he did not intend to interfere with the generals who were withdrawing their troops from those woods as the Christians already held them in their possession, and furthermore that he had no right to do so, but at the same time he did plainly understand that he was determined to force out the Christians everywhere in the woods, and to recover the fortified works and arsenals, the property of the glandelinian Constitution had seized.

The matter had gone too far to be settled without trouble however. While matters were in this uncertain state an event occurred which made the coming of another bloody battle certain. General Anderson with a small company of Angelinian troops, held fortress Charles in the northern section of the siege, which had been one of the few fortresses in the northern Angelinians. The Angelinians therefore not been really captured by the Angelinian Red Riding Hood Woods still further, demanded wishing to push on through the immense Red Riding Hood Woods still further, the surrender. The glandelinian general refused to give up the fort, whereupon the Angelinian batteries under general Maurice costello bombarded the fortress with thirteen hundred cannon. The fire was kept up for nearly six days and nights, and the rebels seeing their food supply and ammunition exhausted finally abandoned the fortress, and making a couple of fierce counter charges drove back the Christian infantry line of the right and then escaped to the river and across at night.

The greatest or first greatest struggle of the northern part of the seige was now about to begin. It was to be a terrible conflict indeed, for it was to be a struggle with the Allister Stankes, Jamelinians, and Coesentianians Gronburgs immense christian army. The armies were already made up of the very best men of the nation and once when the conflict was once fairly begun, it was certain that not one side would submit untill forced to do so.

not one side would submit until forced to do so.

The forces of christians were good material of which to make soldiers but during this time many rescued noncomatants among the men folk had insisted into the christian army and were at first not goodsoldiers. They had to be taught many things, they had to learn how to march, and how to fight battles.

A force of Angelinian troops had already crossed a portion of the sunkeah Creek and took the two small salients called the Fortresses of Arlington and Alexandria, where these troops threwup fortifications to prevent the rebels from reaching the Red Riding Hood Woods from any parts of the rear. A certain section of the glamo, glandelorian army had established an enampment at the north Bend of the river where a small stream flows into it called Strudrus Junction, and their whole line was along both creeks about twenty five miles from the Red Riding Hood Woods. Thus during the early part of the month of Januray general Gonsentianin Aronburg had sent general Caldwell with a Ange lidian army to march into the woods where the christian armies under yindorins was fortifying itself. He and general Ma Ma Maurice costellio ha having gained several small conflicts secured control of that whole region.

The first real action of this battle was fought two miles west of the woods on the 21th of January 1913. A gmelindian army under general gylfiorfer , whose army was stretched along the whole region in a long line of cannon and infantry and earthworks, crashed against the christian line in a herculean attack. each division of this section of the fierce fighting numbered nearly twenty million men. these men on both sides were new to the way of fighting out in the open but they were indeed most brave and full of enthusiasm. or many hours of that day the battle was so hotly contested that it was doubtful which side would win it, but at a decisive moment a part of the christian army was suddenly attacked on its left flank, by a force of gimmermannians which had suddenly arrived on the field. these christian troops thinking they were about to be surrounded, wavered and retreated, and presently toward noon the whole divisions broke into a wilipanis, and fled in great disorder toward the woods. whose effects of this first action-of-the bloody battle on both sides was very great, but in different ways. The gmelindianians and their generals, wild with the joy of victory, thought the battle was over, and consequently became overconfident and careless. Among the christian generals who were thus beaten, everyone was much discouraged, but in a little while as the enemy were pressing on they began to realize the magnitude of the undertaking before them and saw that a greater effort must be made to stop the foe attack or the siege would be broken. volunteers of christians were pouring forward everywhere from other encampments to repel the rebel attack, and general gylfiorfer who was made commander in chief of the armies in Red Riding Hood Woods, spent an hour in his efforts to rally the disordered christian troops under general Caldwell who was wounded.

During the remainder of the noon time there was a great deal of most fierce fighting but the glandelinians were finally checked and again driven out of the woods. Simultaneously a Angelinian force of two million men crossing the Sunbea Creek near Gerteudes Junction came unexpectedly upon a large body of retreating rebels who had stopped fleeing and formed a gigantic ambushade. In the bloody contest that followed the Angelinians troops were badly badly defeated, and driving from the field, and in trying to get back across the stream many of them were killed by shot shell and grape, or drowned and taken prisoner. While this disaster during the battle was very discouraging to some of the christian generals, it nevertheless stimulated them to a more vigorous effort.

By night time during the lull the Angelinians generals with Zimmermann at his advice had formed a plan for carrying on the battle. There were three most important things to be done, if possible. One was to take the main force of the foe in the right at Sunkana Junction, which had been made the chief rebel strength, another rest of the country, and not any. The enemy who had occupied Iwian Wickey had always seen even before the bloody war an agricultural people, that is they had lived by wholly cultivating the ground, put in the capture of Iwian Wickey had had they had seized nearly a hundred thousand factories, and so had at the beginning of the siege depended upon Calvernia and their other possessions of Northern Anglinia for their supplies and militia military goods, for which they received to carry on the war, with all the ports of Iwian Wickey now closed by this most stringent blockade the world ever heard of, so that no vessels of their own or other nations could neither enter nor leave them, and with the blockading of the river the enemy now were effectually cut off from communication with the entire world. As a result as stated before all goods that the enemy had secured in Calvernia could not be obtained at any place or nations and so goods and provisions on other nations like at Abbeinnia rose to most fabulous prices and, while in Anglinia, Christmas goods and also other nations Christmas goods and presents could not be had at all, and millions of factories closed down. If therefore a ship owner succeeded in taking a cargo of goods into the ports of Iwian Wickey, and bringing out a cargo of anything, his profit would be very great. In the hope of making such profits many glandelinnian merchants went into the business of blockade running. They had built many small but armed fast steamers, and pointed them the color of Anglinian battleships and flew the Anglinian flag and so loaded with goods they attempted to make their way not into the ports of Iwian Wickey only but other blockaded ports of Glandelinnia also with the intention of exchanging the goods but all of these ships were captured by the vigilant warships guarding the entrances to the ports of Iwian Wickey, and not one escaped, but nevertheless up to now the business of the desperate blockade running had continued until all of the glandelinnian ports of Iwian Wickey were so fully closed that no ships could slip past no matter what flags they had for disguise.

We cannot of course comprehend all the various movements of the christian armies in such a little space as this during the night, nor can we describe all the disasters and explosions that occurred that occurred during this great battle. We can tell only in a general way what was done. At Ten o'clock at night gone general Grantlinia, with the help of twenty hundred big gunboats and ten hundred foot mercenaries under the command of Admiral Poterton, after starting a fierce bombardment that caused heavy losses and incalculable losses and dam damage captured two great strong glandelinian fortresses half a mile long on a portion of the gunbeaux Creek, one called Fortress St Peter and the other the fortress of St John, taking nearly fifteen million prisoners and twenty thousand cannon. Terrible had the cannonading been and shook the ground with so much force that the branches of all trees in the vicinity had been shattered. Great assaults had been made by the christian troops and the batt o had raged like an inferno but before the success came about. This was in deed a most severe blow to the glandelinians under general Caldwell, and seriously interfered with their general plans of operations in that region near the Red Riding Hood Woods. Without these fortresses they could not maintain their armies in this section any longer, and so our armies had definitely remained in those woods so long finally retreated, abandoning all of that region within four hours, and most of the river bend to the National Troops of the Salvation Army of Angolonia.

the ground like a tremendous earthquake and the rifle firing was so extensive and incessant that smoke covered the scene like a forest fire. General Francis Smith however managed his advance and battle line so with such great skill and daring that everyone was apprehensive, for after driving back one of the immense christian divisions under general Fremont and capturing a christian town under general Blenis at Keys Tone, and another under general Shields at Port Jennie, he suddenly at night after repulsing the extensive christian onslaughts slipped away, and marched or retreated hastily but safely back toward Jennie. A christian contesting every inch of the ground with great stubbornness and inflicting dreadful losses upon the advancing christian line who surged through that battle inferno of Red Riding Hood Woods in the first most extensive conflict of the war.

While all this was going on in the night the glandelinians under general Johnston attacked general Cullen at the very stream itself, near Jennie. In this desperate contest of charges which lasted two hours and a half the Rebels were beaten with severe loss, but the glandelinian commander was badly wounded and general Gordon had to take command of this division. Toward the end at the approach of morning the third day of the so stubborn battle, general Francis Smith recoiling toward Jennie. A christian with his army from his desperate advance in the Sunbeam Creek Valley suddenly appeared behind general Cullen's lines. General Caldwell also sent many other divisions to act with Francis Smith in the attack on the flank and rear of the christian armies, hoping to compel it to retreat toward the Jennie. A christian creek and thence toward Sunbeam Creek. This move was unexpected and the battle raged thus on front and rear all day long with the most frightful fury, but during the struggle the christian generals knew that something must be done and that planned. The movement of the foe being unexpected and as something had to be done, general Caldwell decided to abandon the attempt on Jennie. A christian, abandon his positions before the town, and retreat with his army to Jennie's Landing, on the Sunbeam Creek. Even before he began to do this, the glandelinians fell upon him heavily, and for seven hours at night the contest still continued.

General Cullen's army marched at one hour and fought the next, and wherever the glandelinians could strike the christian armies a fierce contest followed. The glandelinians again and again tried desperately and most gallantly by desperate maneuvers and by fierce attacks at all points during the night raging a general battle to cut off the retreat and to capture or crush the christian army, but general Caldwell managed the retreat and fighting with the greatest ability, and at last the army reached Sunbeam Creek. In these terrific charges that fearful night, sometimes one side had the best of it, and sometimes the other, but it was then a great sorrow to the Angelinians that general Caldwell after going near enough to this portion of Jennie. A christian to see the old Church Steeples and other buildings, had been forced to retreat to the river, where the christian fleets of gunboats and other warships, and christian batteries protected him.

The situation was now soon to be reversed during this tremendous battle. Four months since the beginning of the Jennie. A christian seige the rebels had feared that the Angelinians would march into Jennie. A christian, and the Angelinians had hoped to capture Jennie. A christian, and end the seige and war that way. Now general Caldwell the main foe commander at this point, during the following late night marched eastward, and there was now danger that he would advance on and again make an attempt to strike Concentinian Aronburg's army on the flank and recapture Red Riding Hood Woods. General Popper was sent into the region to meet general Caldwell, but in a conflict at three o'clock in the morning on the old field of Red Riding Hood Woods, he was beaten with great loss and forced to fall back to the protection of the defenses of Red Riding Hood. General Caldwell flushed with the tremendous success of the fourth day of the battle so far, now resolved to carry the conflict into and through the Red Riding Hood Woods, and so pushed on on in the face of fierce opposition of four hours and crossed the Sunbeam Creek, into the forest, and threatened general Baltimore's flank. A glandelinian division or army was again at last in the Red Riding Hood Woods, and dismay and consternation spread everywhere. General Lincoln called for all his divisions, and all troops within reach were ordered up and the fury of battle became extremely dreadful and wild. And general Cullen's army itself had already been brought around by marching, and other portions by boats and pontoons from Jennie's Landing to the Woods, and with all the force that could be mustered, Cullen after repulsing a violent glandelinian attack set out in pursuit of the retreating rebels in his own front.

Everything now hung on the result. If Cullen could not force stubborn Caldwell back it was probable that the glandelinians would pour again into all sections of the woods and possibly get even around Concentinian Aronburg's flank before another army strong enough to check it could be sent to the point of danger, and then the woods would be lost and all the christian positions in it taken and the whole christian line of seige at this point broken in three parts and driven back. If this disaster happened the seige would be frustrated and could not continue.

Of Cullen at this critical juncture was so fortunate as to find out during his attack from a paper captured from one of general Caldwell's officers just how general Caldwell intended to divide his army and march in ten columns against the christians.

He hurried forward therefore in order to fall upon one of them, while the other columns were at a distance held in check by other christian force, and a storming fire of christian batteries. This surely thwarted general Caldwell's plan of attack and advance, and forced him to fall back to the stream so as to allow his other columns to come together again. Where Cullen pressed the attack with extreme violence. Both forces fought with the utmost desperation, ferocity, and determination, for both sides recognized that the battle was to decide whether the enemy were to retain or recapture Red Riding Hood Woods or the christians to retain it. The loss on both sides during this fourth day of the engagement was enormous. Neither army however that bloody day could drive the other from the field, and so neither could claim a victory. During the evening and early night they still lay facing each other without further fighting, then seeing that his plan was hopelessly frustrated, general Caldwell quietly fell back toward Jennie.

During the night as soon as the christian army could be strengthened with fresh troops and supplied with ammunition, it again crossed the river into the river city of Jennie. A christian. The christian general Cullen having been wounded, general Glocklin was now placed in command, and took positions before Caldwell at Jennie. A christian. The glandelinians took positions behind their works on a line of heights back of the town and after the christians shelled the town at night the foe despite the destruction all around waited for the National army to cross the Sunbeam Creek again and resume the attacks. This was done as soon as daybreak.

Glocklin led the army across the stream under shell fire, through the half burning portion of the town, and up the heights toward Caldwell's strong line of positions. Here the terrible battle was resumed with horrible fury, and more than twelve million soldiers fell in one day while trying to take the glandelinian works and fortresses by storm. Sixteen attempts to carry the heights were made by as many strong brigades under general Kindermine and Caldwell of the christian side, but they were literally cut to pieces and driven back in the wildest confusion. It was a useless sacrifice. General Caldwell's position was too strong at Jennie. A christian to be taken by assault, and general Glocklin withdrew again across the stream.

While all this was going on in front of Jennie. A christian, the armies in the woods elsewhere were also busy. The glandelinians under general Bragger marched Nooga troops into the woods on the left, driving the Ange. Angelinian troops under Bushville and Louisville clear to the river and a little beyond cutting the divisions all to pieces and the christian generals were wounded. General Grantlin whose divisions under Gorinth were moving up in time sent all the troops he could spare to the assistance of these three crushed brigades, and they reached general Louisville army just in time to save it from annihilation. General, General Bragger had now to retreat, and after general Perryville on his side was killed he went back across the river leaving one quarter of his army in the woods either killed wounded or prisoners.

On the same day in the northern bend of the battle line, general Grantlin attacked the glandelinians under Lukana hoping to capture his force. The conflict raging all day was fierce and sanguinary, and the glandelinians with dreadful loss of privates, equipments, stores and ammunition were driven back with disaster and conglomeration of confusion, and though their general was killed, they were not captured. They in retreating joined another glandelinian force at nine o'clock at night, and at eleven o'clock attacked general Gorinth and Great Hearts army with great vigor, but again were defeated with immense loss, and were pursued for a long distance.

Late in the afternoon after his series of adventures and defeats general Bragger having retreated into middle Sunbeam Creek Woods, established his divisions and ordered general Murfrees to move forward to repel the christians advancing against him. General Cranier who was now in command of the christian army under Lincoln who had been wounded, attacked the glandelinians there who had rallied and the great battle was renewed at this quarter with tenfold fury. Both sides gave time were more than obstinate, desperate, and determined, and neither would give way though they were making for themselves a bad case in some. After fighting for all the afternoon, the two armies still faced each other, and two hours later fought again most desperately on the same ground. Then general Bragger once more failed and beaten, fell back toward Jennie.

While general Cranier was thus holding the line throughout Red Riding Hood Woods, general Grantlin while his forces were attacking elsewhere had prepared a plan for the reduction of fortress Aurandocallio. He had collected a great quantity of ammunition and prepared to march his snatching forces down the Mic-Hollister and Pandora Railroad at that point so as to get to the rear of Aurandocallio if possible. General Hermaner with another fleet, and a christian fleet of warships, gunboats, and transports under Admiral and generals Porterson and David Porter was to descend the Sunbeam Creek and advanced upon the General Caldwell seeing how much he had gained now decided to try and take possession of the Red Riding Hood Woods once more. With all the troops he could gather and with the help of more coming which had been sent by Mic-Allister Stanck, he pressed on and moved in his armies in three columns. At first on account of the

in their own work. The Maracanian with a troop of soldiers endeavoring to escape, but was driven back after he made two desperate assaults. He was pressed with, Again another siege within a siege was closely guarded. He unusual energy. very avenue of escape from the town was strongly fortified. A line of strong fortifications sixty miles in length, which had been at the capture of Jivian was thrown up in the rear of Jennie Jivian from behind which were posted two hundred thousand pieces of artillery which poured for two days and nights before already an incessant fire of shot and shell and high explosives upon the besieging Angelinians until grantling arrival and then he had to bring up strong batteries to answer the fierce fire of the besieged and the terrible cannon fire made such an shock as to ruin many buildings not only in Jennie Jivian but throughout the whole of Jivian wlk Jolney also. he christian army on the river side threw great bombs into the streets of Jennie Jivian all day and all night, so that between the fire of the christian fleets on one side, and that of the besieging army on the other, the besieged soldiers were in constant fear and terror. he escape the dreadful storm of fire that swept over the place threatening as it seemed the annihilation of itself the soldiers abandoned their wooden fortresses which had been sited to pieces for the whole length, and dug caves in the side of hills and made gun nests and dugouts and deep trenches ten feet in depth and three feet wide, in which all the time during the siege they had continued to live and answer the christian fire. Already since the two weeks siege of Jennie Jivian had been going on at the beginning of January the food of the glandelinians had ran low, mules, horses and other animals were killed for eating, and everything even horrible was done to ease out the scanty rations of the besieged. even the child Javes who could not stand the strain were killed for food, and famine and pestilence had stalked the streets and besieged lines all through the siege even before the outbreak of the battle of Je gunbean junction of which the siege had brought on, while all around was a circle of fire. he and finally came for after the two weeks siege, the Angelinian artillery had battered down every construction set many fortresses and the w works on fire, and finally with one tremendous rush general grantling troops on the evening of the fifth day of the battle had captured the defenses which the enemy had held so fiercely after such a long heroic defense, and the glandelinians being hard pressed and threatened with annihilation by the assaults of the christians surrendered by night fall and general grantlin took twenty seven million men as prisoners.

Jennie Vivian as we have learned was not the only place of importance to be taken before the control of the great and beautiful river was wrested from the glandelinians. Port St Joseph two to seven miles below was also strongly fortified, and the reduction of that stronghold was also part of the plan of battle for that day. About the time that grantlin began the general movement against Jennie Vivian, another portion of Caldwell's christian army under go a general "Darger", crossed from Red Riding Hood Woods, into western gunbeam Greek region, and routing the glandelinians in a tremendous conflict of two hours duration under general Oldtimer pursued them far through the woods and drove them close to their own works. Turning about under fire, a swift series of attacks brought them to the gunbeam Creek proper. Here a fleet from Jennie Vivian joined him, and pontoons allowed his army to cross to a point a few miles north of Port St Joseph.

In the meantime a larger force under general Whilliam Schloeder had been gathered under general Baton Bouger south of Port of St Joseph. General Hanson another of the christian forces advancing on the doomed town or fortress of the enemy and Whilliam Schloeder from the south soon invested it. Two of the most desperate and wild attempts were made to carry the glandelinian works from by storm, but both were repulsed with frightful loss and two of the christian generals who had conducted the main force of assault were killed and Whilliam Schloeder was wounded by a bullet in the lung. The place sustained under fire and assaults for more than forty hours all the horrors of this other inner siege, when on the morning of the sixth day Port St Joseph being almost destroyed also succumbed. The gunbeam Creek was now free after five days desperate fighting, and the glandelinians of Andrian was now completely cut in two.

THE STORMY BATTLE ON THE CENTRE!.....

The rest of the bloody fighting, during the same fifth day took place east and somewhere else around Jennie Vivian. General Roseanna, marched against the foe in the north east of that place, and general Braggard fearing that he also might be cut off and shut up in that town, retreated toward Caldwell's main line at eight o'clock in the morning. General Caldwell seeing the danger, hurried general Gordon Streeter with a large force from his main left to the assistance of general Braggard. With this help at about eleven o'clock Braggard suddenly turned on Roseanna, at this section of unbeam Creek. The conflict raging over eight miles of ground especially in length, lasted two hours, and the christians were badly wounded, worsted I mean. General Thomas Grantheart who had command of the left wing of this section of the christian line if you please, held his ground however, and so prevented the temporal victory of the glandelinians from being complete. Two hours later still under heavy fire general Grantheart fell back to the Red Riding Hood Woods and general Braggard followed.

For two hours fighting fiercely and desperately the christian division was closely shut up, until it was almost threatened with annihilation and was nearly exhausted of its ammunition. At toward evening relief came. General Hooper was sent from Linders army with two immense corps, and general German Standard brought his division from kindernines division, while general Grantlin took command.

The fighting was repulsed and began as to say at Seven O'clock at night and lasted until twelve. The Angolinian troops took the glandelinian works on Lookout Stream, and gunbeam junction in two of the most brilliant charges of the battle. Braggard was driven from his main position also with the most heavy loss and had to fall back to the support of Caldwell, where he being badly wounded the command of his army was given to general Mic-Jollester Johnston.

General grantlin on the following morning ordered German to push at once into east gunbeam Territory, to the relief of general Gdeburn who was besieged in a portion of the Red Riding Hood Woods by a glandelinian army under general Streeter. After making an all days desperate effort to retake the works and secure the christian force he had besieged general Streeter withdraw as German force approached.

Simultaneously that morning an army under general Banker with a fleet of warships and gun boats under Gus Plums went from Gunbeam junction up the whole stretch of the Gunbeam creek under a gaudiest of fire from rebel guns and shore batteries, where fighting and destroying one glandelinian fleet after another in six desperate conflicts on the river in one day they were joined by a part of general grantlin's christian army and fleets from Jennie Vivian. The purpose of this new expedition was to conquer upper Vivian Lakey and Andrian. The Angolinian army was badly beaten by general Raymond Richardson Federal on one fierce four hours conflict on land and water at one time, but held its ground in another contest the next few hours.

The expedition proved a failure however, and as soon as they could the forces under fire went back to Gunbeam junction. ....

Nevertheless general grantlin, whose brilliant series of victories during this titanic battle, had stamped him as one of the ablest generals of the besieging christian armies under Hanson or others, and by general Hanson was appointed his Second Lieutenant, while general Mic-Jollester Johnston by the glandelinian authorities of Glandelinia herself was appointed commander in chief not only of all the foe armies but of all in Calverinia and elsewhere. General grantlin himself had all the troops of christians such as Abyssinians, Abbeannians, Angolinians, and the others, brought together into many vast and tremendous armies since his arrival at Vivian Lakey, and bringing tow of his own into great Vivian armies, one in Red Riding Hood Woods, under Leander, and the other near Jennie Vivian under Herman he proposed to force the battle to an end. His plan was to have all the grand divisions operate against the enemy at the same time on the sixteenth day of the battle. The northwestern army was to make the other portion of Jennie Vivian and even glorify its objective point, while the southwestern one and the one in the woods was to march into the enemy's very territory, rout all the wicked glandelinian armies in that section, break up all the railroad and other systems of the foe in the south of Jennie Vivian if possible, destroy all its foundries, arsenal arsenals, child labor mills and plantations and other slave houses, destroy all store houses, and if possible cut the glandelinian Confederacy at Jennie Vivian in two again.

The glandelinian army he knew under general Caldwell and Mic-Jollester Johnston were now nearly exhausted with the bloodiest contest and the christian general grantlin hoped by this plan to end the battle that day. He ordered the advance to begin as early as midnight. It happened however a little after midnight say about four hours four minutes after twelve the northwestern army had crossed the Gunbeam Creek by pontoons and boats under shrapnell fire and under fire of glandelinian snipers, and pushed on in the face of great wooded region mostly desolate and except swampy though of course full of roadways and two railroad lines running through it. It was however a perfect Calverinian jungle. There Caldwell's main line altogether was met the following morning, and for two hours the two main armies stretching for twenty miles were locked in deadly combat, swaying and surging through the tangled woods as now and then another of the long lines of combatants advanced or receded. Many times fighting of savage character occurred in which both sides had exactly the possession of the sawworks. So terrific was the storm of musketry and artillery fire that the woods looked as if it was swept by a forest fire, and the fighting was simply terrible. Amid the din of battle, and the horrible "Devil yell of the enemy, and the christian battle cries the woods resounded with the cries and moans of the countless wounded and dying. Countless trees were haled and torn to pieces by minutes and canister, shattered by cannon and shell and looked as if a tornado had torn through it. Shrubbery not exposed to deep snow was shattered by the close fire of musketry and machine guns, which was incessant and the goons was one of conglomeration of wild confusion and a panorama of horror.

Finding that after such a disastrous conflict that at general Caldwell could not be dislodged and also noticing that one of the bloodiest contents of the siege in this quarter was one from the numbers fallen general grantlin moved immense troops under general Herdrude to the main left, and general Caldwell concentrating forces at the same time along his own right, resumed the battle along the stretch of Gunbeam Creek with redoubled fury. Where the two forces fought with greater fury for four hours, when general grantlin despite his tremendous losses in men and officers managed to swing a large portion of his army to the left again, and by making six tremendous charges in the face of a withering fire in which men went down like the leaves of a forest in a storm outflanked the rebel general, destroyed half of his wing, captured 10,000 pieces of small and large artillery and made the foe recede in that direction. The battle was exceedingly horrible and flags of both sides were ragged and torn by being exposed to the murderous fire.

Simultaneously at Ginderella junction near North Bend general grantlin made a four general assault upon general Caldwell's main works just at daybreak. This onslaught terrible and astonishing to say only lasted ten minutes but amid the firing of musketry that sounded like countless cannon, the slaughter was most frightful and that one minute beat all the four hours horror at the battle of Peter Starling. The Angolinian troops five million strong and divided into many divisions charging upon impregnable earthworks and fortified salients lost more than half of their men while the other columns on consisting of ten million men lost simultaneously more than seven million, and twenty generals, who while the wicked glandelinians protected by the works only lost a million. Moving to the left and right simultaneously and increasing the battle to a wilder fury, general grantlin concentrated at last before the foe works under general Peters and Richmond Shoemann.

At last after half of the night and early morning fighting general Grantlin had won his point but at horrible cost. He had lost already over twenty million men in killed and wounded alone and ten more in prisoners and disabled or driven crazy by the din. His plan now was to hold the works there where he had captured, and gradually push his left wing alone farther and farther around the town of Jennie. If general Caldwell should be forced to retreat, both sides knew that if Jennie ivian should fall into the possession of the main christian armies under Grantlin and Caldwell, all of the sections of Aurandocillo may be cut off from aid of Lucilla Jackson, and then a general Hanson ivian would make an assault with his main army that would compel the Landelinians to abandon it. For the next eight hours the desperate siege went on, with incessant and sanguinary fighting in general, while little by little Grantlin's main left wing was pushed forward so as to encircle the Landelinian armies.

In the afternoon of that exceedingly bloody day general Caldwell sent Carl Staley to threaten general Concentinian Gronburge's flank once more, hoping in that way to divert general Grantlin and Caldwell's attention and compel them both to raise the second siege of Jennie ivian. General Staley went into the woods toward the rear, and for a time general Concentinian Gronburge's army or flank was really in danger for it was fiercely assaulted. Very few christian batteries were there, but Zimmerman hurried great forces from all various points of his line, and sent eagerly to storm the confederates of Landelinia.

After fierce fighting in the rear of the works Carl Staley had to give up the attempt. General McAllister Earl persuaded him all the way through the woods toward the Landelinian position, and during the advance and retreat continual sharp fighting followed, and three Landelinian generals were killed, Frank Winchester, Frank Fisher, and John Fuller, in which on that day both sides combined lost seventeen million men, but when the action was over general Earl held complete control of the gunboat valley, Grantlin and Caldwell meanwhile, firmly holding his positions in front of Jennie ivian and Aurandocillo, despite many foe assaults, and being under for the artillery fire held was steadily tightening his lines around Caldwell, McAllister, Johnston and his armies. The whole scene around Jennie ivian was like an inferno and the noise as if many volcanoes were in violent eruption.

While these brilliant victor victories were being achieved in the field before Jennie ivian, the army commerce of the Angelinian fleets was being rapidly destroyed by thousands of armed foe cruisers carrying an unknown flag. These vessels during the capture of ivian, which had been built in Calvernia, and sent to ivian, which were armed but other warships took out arms had great cannons placed on the ships, and when all this was completed the enemy officers took command. The chief of these fleets was called the Alibaba, commanded by Admiral Raphael Simon Legree.

This ship throughout the whole seven days battle of Sunbeam Junction and even before it began, had scoured the river of Yorma gun, capturing many Angelinian merchant and transport ships, and making it dangerous for any amount of unarmed or even armed ships to sail under any flag that Landelinia did not like. At last during Grantlin's fearful morning action on the seventh day, a fleet of war ships commanded by Admiral Thomas met this destructive Landelinian fleet, and after a conflict of two days, the Landelinian fleet of this kind was annihilated. The Landelinian admiral was taken aboard the Angelinian fleet with many of the surviving Landelinians, but the majority of the rebels being able to swim like fish made their escape to rebel shores. The loss of both fleets in number of men was nearly ten thousand in killed wounded and prisoners. The Angelinians lost no ships while the whole foe fleet was destroyed every ship sunk or blown to pieces.

While general Grantlin crossed the gunboat creek on his bloody attack in Red Riding Hood Woods, Shermania began his march upon the foe under general Georgia. This Landelinian general slowly fell back before him, fighting stubbornly hour by hour and making fierce efforts to check the christian advance. There were four great conflicts or charges made before general Georgia at last took up his position in front of the northwest section of Genderralla, there he meant to stay and force Shermania to attack him behind his breastworks, but just then during a scouting tour he was mortally wounded by an ambush into which he ran into, and McAllister Stanek the main commander of ivian, which placed general Hoodwinked in his place. Hoodwinked attacked Shermania's army again and again making thirteen charges in all but without the slightest success. McShermania into instead of resorting to the slow process of a siege, pushed great troops past the junction, and cut his enemy's line of supplies. Hoodwinked was now forced to abandon Genderralla Junction at once, to save his army badly crippled from capture, leaving Shermania and his christian army in possession of the great Landelinian or Calvernian railroad centre of ivian, which. On leaving Genderralla, Hoodwinked at once pressed northward and attacked Washers division of Abyssinians.

For two hours he attempted to keep general Great Hearts left wing closely besieged in the woods, but at the end of that time Great Hearts wing forced its way out and Great Hearts coming to the assistance broke Hoodwinked's army all to pieces captured.

A GREAT EXPLOSION
THE DISASTER
RECONSTRUCTION.

At last after half of the night and early morning fighting general Grantlin had won his point but at horrible cost. He had lost already over twenty million men in killed and wounded along and far away in the mountains.

For two hours he attempted to keep general Grant Harts left wing closely besieged in the woods, but at the end of that time Grant Harts wing forced its way out and Great Hart coming to the assistance broke Hoodwinks army all to pieces captured one cap quarter of his men and routed the remainder. The glandolinian again had and at night fall fought most desperately to a regain their lost comrades and their dead, but was again beaten and broken to pieces once more.

As soon as it was learned that Hoodwinks was moving toward Nachers army Sherman set out to force his attack through the heart of the rebel positions further up beyond Gendaralla junction, and move from Gendaralla junction to Jennie Vivian. Despite fierce opposition everywhere, in the field woods, and along both banks of the three rivers and even Sunbeam Creek, he forced his way in attacking forces spreading out over a wide expanse of country, forcing the foe from railroad positions such as on the roads, in box and cattle cars and vandals, from railroad stations and in fenceways and a drive ways, and capturing all the foe stores that were left strewn the whole region with countless dead and dying. It was more of a massacre than a battle. Finally on the hour of Hoodwinks second defeat Sherman had already entered Jennie Vivian, and finished his famous drive through the middle of the rebel positions, and Jennie Vivian was fully in possession of christian troops.

It was now fully plain that G. I. Caldwell's beleaguered and half destroyed army could not hold out much longer. The glandolinian army so in once which had been cut in two when the Sunbeam creek was opened and taken possession of by the christian fleets, was again divided by Shermans triumphant attack and movement across the rebel central positions. Admiral Landerton had taken the fortresses in Gendaralla junction by storm, and in the evening of the seventh day, a land and river force, after a most desperate fight, took fortress Ann, and so closed the river harbor of Jennie Vivian so the enemy ships could not enter it.

THE END OF THE BATTLE OF SUNBEAM JUNCTION.

The combined christian armies under Grantlin, Kindernine, and Caldwell now pressed Caldwell's glandolinian army at every point, while Great Hart placed himself between his collector Johnston and prevented him from giving aid to the besieged. Cavalry forces of Abyssinkilians, Goncentinians, Calvaerianians and others swept through the territory in all directions encountering the enemy in thousands of bloody skirmishes in one hour at just as many different points. Sherman with his army set out from Jennie Vivian, pressed through the small Columbia woods, and after making some desperate attacks with the glandolinians against the glandolinians under his collector Johnston, entered the woods on a Raleigh gun. As soon as Sherman took Colocabin woods, the glandolinians withdrew from Red Riding Hood Woods entirely. The glandolinian army under Caldwell was now completely cut off from all access to in any of the rivers.

At seven o'clock that evening of the seventh day of the battle, general Henry Darger pushed a big force around Caldwell's flank, and gained a decisive advantage at Forks Bend. The next hour a general advance was ordered all along the christian lines, which after further desperate fighting broke Caldwell's whole front, and forced him to retreat from the rear of Jennie Vivian toward Aurandocallio. Caldwell now struggled hard to free himself from the terrible coils in which Grantlin had enveloped him, and to get away with the last remnant of his badly torn army. Pressed on every side he was compelled as well as his collector Johnston, to abandon all portions along Sunbeam Creek in the section of Red Riding Hood Woods, and moved westward in the hope of joining Johnston, but after retreating, marching, and fighting all night long, he found his men actually starving, and suffering from cold and exposure and would surely have surrendered if an outlet had not been discovered through which he withdrew his main army and retired into Aurandocallio.

During this time other conflicts raged on the river Norma gun when commodore Anders fleet of Abbeemian ships completely destroyed a glandolinian fleet in Norma Catherine Bay. Simultaneously another glandolinian fleet took refuge in the fortified harbor of Vivian. The command of Admiral Beppo, and Commodore Se Sickles. A Angolanian army under general Shornor was landed near by, and after severe fighting demanded the surrender of the harbor, but was quickly destroyed in a desperate battle with the christian ships. Santiago Harbor was soon surrendered to the fleet of the christians and a new christian army under general Millerson then began to occupy Porto de Grace gun.

In this region the rebels finally agreed to withdraw from all sections of the Red Riding Hood Woods and hostilities for a time came to an end here, after Jamie Ivian was captured. On the evening of the last day of the battle one Angelinian Angelinlin general was treacherously shot by a glandelinian spy in his headquarters. He died a week after the battle, and was succeeded by general Hanechin, jurmer.

CHAPTER FOURTY SIX.

A GREAT EXPLOSION.

One morning a week after this battle just before sunrise when the temperature was down to thirty below zero and snow lay four feet deep following a gigantic blizzard and hurricane, a great explosion through some suspicious origin occurred within the christian lines which killed an unestimated number of soldiers in the wrecked fortresses, and shook down many buildings in Ivian Wickay.

The effect was if an earthquake had occurred. For at the same time the prisoners in Ivian Wickay and all the foe were awakened and surprised by a loud thundering noise, which was followed by a blast that blew out all windows and a shock like a severe earthquake. Of course most buildings withstood the second earthquake shock, but many others were damaged and some were shaken down. Julio Gallio nearest the scene of the blast suffered most. Hundreds of child slaves and prisoners were killed in the falling ruins, and many more thousands were injured. In some gathering fires broke out quickly in the dam damaged buildings, and could not be extinguished because the water mains were broken by the concussion. The fires burned for daystill many buildings in the section of Ivian Wickay was destroyed, though of course the fire was not so tremendous as at Andreen when all that section mostly went in smoke and fire. A vast multitude of glandelinians devoid of shelter in account of the buildings they were driven from sought shelter in tents, and for a time there was danger of famine and of terrible loss from many dying shortly from exposure to the intense cold, but food and other supplies were furnished promptly by the other portions of the glandelinian army. Not disheartened by their terrible disaster the glandelinians at once began to make attempts to rebuild the ruined portions of the city.

Thus the explosion in the christian lines though so distant had caused the enemy greater suffering than it had the christians.

From the effects of the battles and disasters therefore it was seen that the besieging Angelinian forces were unable to be subdued.

All since the siege of Ivian Wickay however all trade with many christian nations had fallen off greatly with Calverinia, because of the devastation of so many ships and of the plague-like and boyling illnesses by series of great conflicts numbered by hundreds and the Ange National people all over the world were shocked at the sorrow of their children over the giftless christmas days.

And at the suffering of the Calverinian people, and on January fifteenth a yormomina battleship sent to the aid of the Angelinian besieging fleets was blown up in Ivian Wickay Harbor of Lake Angelina, by a glandelinian torpedo or mine. For these reasons yormomina decided that glandelinia withdraw from Ivian Wickay, and yormomina sent her whole fleet of ships to help bottle up the enemy at Ivian Wickay.

Also in the meantime there were great railroad disasters inside and outside of Ivian Wickay as many trains of soldiers of both sides were wrecked, many other trains had been stopped running, and general Cleveland had been forced to stop all trains to restore some order.

Not far from Julio Gallio during the time of the battle of Sunbeam Junction on the tenth of January probably an appalling disaster occurred in the Sunbeam Valley, this valley lying between beautiful but precipitous hills, derives its name from the beautiful war torn Sunbeam River which flows through it toward yormo gun. The strongly fortified works and arsenals of the christians, thrown up and situated in a broad basin in the foot of the beautiful valley, contained not only monstrous forces of besieging christian troops, artillery and all kinds of provisions but twenty twenty five thousand child slaves taken from the enemy during conflicts and raids, or rescued when running away from the rebel lines. Above these positions large mountain streams entered into the Sunbeam River. Near one of these, the south fork had been formed before the great war started, as a summer pleasure resort for Calverinians, a large deep artificial lake, six miles long and three miles wide, the waters of which three hundred feet higher than the christian positions in the valley, were held in check by an immense dam. Despite the coldness of the weather the water of the lake was only frozen to the depth of a foot, and the enemy general yormomina thinking that if he could cause a flood disaster which would break the siege lines decided to blow a breach in this dam. So after two weeks of work his engineers constructed a gigantic hidden mine under the lower wall of the dam which had cost three hundred million dollars by Angelinlin to build and when all the glandelinians were safe the mine by means of electric batteries were sent off in one tremendous explosion that made the valley echoes and roaches like a hundred million cannon.

THE DISASTER.

The explosion being of terrific force tore down the whole wall in a mass of wreckage and stone and the smoke hung over the valley like a fog. The released water in millions of tons rushed madly down like a cataract, crashing through the narrow valley, and carried everything before it. The encampment received the full force of the flood and everyone of the children including all the soldiers were swept to their death, and all the encampments works and everything of military material was swept down the valley clean into the Sunbeam River, which rising rapidly with the torrent from above, spread clear across one quarter of general Hanechin's whole territory, and gaining violence as it went compelled him to abandon his flooded headquarter's building. All the encampments were dashed down to pieces. Even in Hanechin's lines thousands of men women and children refugees sheltered in encampments thus flooded, unable to flee to the hills were caught up by the awful waters, and drowned in an instant, while hundreds of thousands of others clinging to the wrecks of houses or to the tree tops, were carried down the seething river into the foe's territory where the rebels instead of rescuing them shot them to death, or blew the wreckage to pieces so they all would drown.

This caused intense suffering but fortunately for the time being the stiller sections of the flood finally froze over and the horrors abated. At it did not break the siege, and some of the conspirators who had caused the flood were captured and shot as murderers. The explosion which destroyed the dam and caused the flood had brought on a double disaster. It had produced something like an earthquake of a second duration which was felt for nearly fifty miles, especially east of Julio Gallio, but especially in Aronburg Section of Ivian Wickay. In Aronburg section of Ivian Wickay by the tremendous concussion ten million dollars of property was dear destroyed, and many glandelinians, and non-combatants were killed or injured by falling buildings. Even the finest houses, and churches and public buildings, the historical landmarks of that section of the Calverinian city was destroyed or damaged.

Great fires also broke out. As usual as was their experience the degraded degraded glandelinians quickly began at once to clear away the wreckage, and to use them to make works and trenches to repel attacks which of course never occurred yet at Aronburg. The explosion also caused a tragedy. General St. John was killed by a falling building when the flood rushed on Hanechin's best friend was killed by the death of this general was an event the christian lines, and after the flood the death of this general was an event beyond historical interest indeed. Witten with painful and incurable wounds on account of the wreckage hitting him from the falling building hearts of the soldiers suffered with a tranquil fortitude which deeply touched the hearts of the soldiers and refugees throughout the whole besieging christian armies. While his strength was gradually ebbing away, the old hero spent the closing days with the story of his life to many friendly children who had come to visit him. He death of no american probably even Washington, Lincoln Warfield or even Grant. So moved the popular feeling as did that of general St. John of Hanechin's command when the army held as marveled by the tremendous glandelinian rebellion when his death was finally announced, embiged mourning were everywhere displayed, not only within the besieging lines at Ivian Wickay but throughout the states of Angelinlin, Calverinia, and other Angelinian states, and city vied with city for the honour of his sepulture. The place selected for his final resting place was Rivervine Park Pandora (Calverinia) on a beautiful spot overlooking the great Kralinlin River.

The day of his burial January 24th was observed throughout the whole Angelonian nation as a holiday. His funeral was even attended by all generals who could get a fourlough and even by the Angelonian ruler and even the Pope and any cardinals and bishops and priests and by nearly a million children, and by great numbers of people, and even all the chief officers of the government, and by all orphan asylums, by the go vernors of all Angelonian states, and by all the most distinguished citizens of the country. Ivian Wickey and others even Mansion most of the duties at Ivian Wickey could not attend expressed their regret deeply and poor general Mansion cried like a baby and Mansons eyes were dimmed with tears. An imposing military escort representing the regular army, and the militia of every Angelonian State followed his bier with the most solemn tread, while the people of all christian nationalities in Calverinia gathered from near and far, lined the way for miles, with uncovered heads, to testify their sorrow for the nations saddest loss. All veterans of the Ange Indians marched side by side in the long procession, to do honor to the memory of this the illustrious soldier of Ivian Wickey who had done all he could to preserve the seige and succeeded, and whose last message to his friends and general Mansion was an ardent plea for the speeding victory of the besiegers so there could be a cessation of the great strife and animosity. The saddest scene of the procession was of the weeping of many children, the weeping and his hysterical grief of the general's wife, his grand children, and his own, and the exciting part was the fury and rage of many who denounced the glandelinians as assassins and vowed that the war must be carried on until glandelinia was vanquished.

Another sad scene also happened within Mansons lines at the time the flood within Mansons was within full way. General James gutten harleson, who had endeavored to secure a number of escaping spies who had gotten away with some important maps, letters and plans he had in his possession, and failed was shot in the back by another glandelinian who went to his headquarters, while surrounded for nearly three days the general lay wounded in his headquarters, while the whole country and besieging army waited for the news that was sent out from the sickroom twice a day or more. At last the same time Mansons best friend died, general harleson also died, and so throughout the whole Calverinian country the people and armies were in mourning for two great heroes. Every man woman and child a child felt that a friend was gone. The assassin and spy had been captured after being pursued for three days by cavalry, and infantry, both with a troop of bloodhounds, and when captured and taken within the lines, the spy was shot, and the assassin burned at the stake.

Two new generals had to be put in their places but it did not ally the sorrow any.

All during this time things occurred that indeed proved th at the seige of Ivian Wickey was more exciting and terrible than could be comprehended by any nations of the world. All workmen operation railroads belonging to the christians refused to run trains into Ivian Wickey or its neighborhood and allow the trains to be captured and called a "Railroad Strike" against the rebels. This peculiar Railroad strike as it was called, soon developed into rioting and fierce fighting and spread all over the country where rebel territories were existing.

Glandelinian and regular militia were called out to subdue the rioters around the region of glandelinia's Calverinia, and a good deal of bloodshed followed between strikers and rebel troops. In the town of galesburg one hundred and fifty strikers were killed, many buildings and cars were burned in Ivian Wickey where no trains ran at all, and much valuable glandelinian property was destroyed. In Ivian Wickey there was sharp fighting for the possession of trains, and even after the extensive riots were quelled, the glandelinian government of Calverinia considered it necessary to retain troops in all mining districts of Calverinia to prevent the Calverinians from burning up the coal mines and shut off the coal supply for glandelinian soldiers and Indian inhabitants.

Already throughout the war while Ivian Wickey was being besieged, a peculiar contagious fever upon which summer or winter had no effect upon in halting raged with great violence in many sections of the besieging lines, and in many southern cities and villages of Calverinia itself. It was believed that the enemy in desperation during the seige of Ivian Wickey had seized laborites and deliberately let loose the germs among the christian lines by hurling the bottles through cannons as if they were bombs. Thousands of soldiers and women and children died of the strange disease, hundreds of thousands were stricken, and business in other portions of the country where it provided was suspended in the cities, and there was much suffering among the people. Money food, clothing, and medicines were badly needed for the stricken ones, and all the people of Abyssinkille, Angelonia, and Abithennia, poured out their tremendous wealth and provisions like water to help their plague stricken brethren in the war stricken south. Rich men all over gave tremendously large sums, men of small means gave what they could, and even the poor and beggars dropped all claims they could spare into the boxes that were set up in public places to receive them.

Physicians and nurse nurses from all parts of the country volunteered their services and went south or to the armies, and the besieging forces around Ivian Wickey, many to lose their lives by the dreadful scourge. There was more danger in going into the fever stricken armies, cities and territories of Calverinia than there was in the fiercest battle, and the many who thus endangered their lives to help so many of the sick and suffering, displayed a heroic heroism worthy of the highest honors. Even after the battle of gunhouse junction the disease at some localities was still raging though from the resistance it received it was steadily declining.

In the vicinity of the section of Ivian Wickey called Federal there had been two tremendous battles one in October, and the other beginning in November lasted two months.

Fifty skirmishes had brought on the first battle known as the battle of Harrietown, and in one charge general Pattersons army of eighty one generals and one hundred thousand infantry men, and three hundred thousand cavalry and dragoons was led into an ambush and massacred. While conflict lasted nearly two weeks and ended in favor of the rebels. General Denner was killed in making a great assault upon the enemy works, and one general bearing a flag of truce to have wounded brought in, was treacherously shot in the back by a traitor who was captured and hanged. Many others in conspiracy of this deed of treacherous ways were also tried and shot or hanged.

The other big battle took place at Dakota junction, at the beginning of which a brigade of christian troops under general Penner was surrounded and massacred not a man escaping. During the ensuing months after many days of and nights of desperate fighting the glandelinians were driven from their positions and kept at a distance without further combat.

The great fires which had broken out in Julio Gallic and some other towns on account of the two explosions within the christian lines, shaking down buildings had destroyed property worth two hundred to three hundred million dollars in Julio Gallic alone, and nearly a hundred thousand child slaves and prisoners were without shelter. This terrible disaster had elicited an outburst of generosity among the glandelinians such as never before witnessed in any country, but all the child slaves received was dingy, cold hovels and half ripped tents for shelter and were kept at work outside. Within twelve hours after the reports of the two great fires had been flashed over the wires, glandelinian trains laden with food from the secret tunnels from Calverinia laden with food, and clothing, were running from all parts toward the besieged city underground. In every section of Calverinia in possession of glandelinia, in every town and city, the enemy were at work, attempting to devise means not only for the relief of their stricken brethren in Ivian Wickey, but also to help force the christians to raise the seige.

About the same time a disastrous and bigger fire one of the biggest fires of the world early in November swept through a great lumber region of southern Calverinia just before the snow fell, burning the forests in three Calverinian states, and as the fire had originated in the Ivian Wickey region and was heading generally that way it was believed that the incendiaries had made the fire in effort to break the seige that way if nothing else would. The fire burned many villages, and farmhouses, and even threatened big towns and small cities, destroying the lives of thousands of people. One part of that forest fire struck upon Baltimore Calverinia which consumed the finest part of that city. Throughout that whole month millions of fugitives fled and continued to flee from place to place to another pressed by the tremendous forest fire which during the approach of winter was finally put under control by rains and snowstorms and fighters finished the work and thus saved Ivian Wickey from being threatened.

Now to say since the beginning of the worse section of the seige between November and January the blockade and the seige itself had caused many horrible scenes to ensue in other christian nations. It was a regular panic. The prosperity of many countries suffered a severe shock. Bank crashes came similar like those of other nations. A many banks failed, railroad building stopped, more and more factories were shutting their doors, money became scarce, business was almost coming to a stand, and countless numbers of people were thrown out of employment. Very hard times were following everywhere, and it was feared the people of the nations on account of the war would feel the effects for many years on account of that world wide panic. No doubt many millions of people lost all their savings and the poor suffered terribly.

During the same time general Franklin Hammer of the rebel side was tried before the glandelinian senate for removing the glandelinian Secretary of war in Ivian Wickey from office without the consent of the glandelinian congress. It was claimed that in doing so he violated one of the glandelinian laws passed by the glandelinian congress and was therefore guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor. There was great excitement through the city and glandelinian country itself throughout the trial, but soon the senate voted the general not guilty, and he was acquitted.....

For many months during the siege of Iruya, when General Byron Hero of general divisions left wing had been trying to lay a cable loaded with mines under the Norma river at many points near Iruya, but it soon was demolished by the rebels. One cable of mines was laid in June but it could not be successfully laid under such conditions, and worked under fire in no broad extension of a stream of water, but the general, who was a man of great patience and perseverance, had faith in the undertaking and it was, and at last just before the battle of Evangelina Granja opened, after many failures and discouragements succeeded in his great enterprise. From that time many other cables loaded with mines have been stretched under the mighty river, and as it completely checked the attempt of blockade running on this river and kept the foe plants bottled up in Norma gathering the Angelinian besiegers would not know how to get along without them.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Although the battle of gunbeam Junction was over there were many questions still that grew out of it to be settled. In the first place since there might be some question as to the right of general Grantlin to give or rescue children as daughters and sons of wounded or unwounded Angelinian soldiers, an amendment to the Angelinian constitution of general was passed, which finally gave the consent in full at Hanson's reported a agreement put the most perplexing question of all was how to reconstruct the long line of captured works, and to fortify Jemima. General Hanson Iruya maintained as they had been for works they never needed reconstruction at all but only at the damaged portions; the united the Christian forces also to possess their old works as well as the new, but the majority of the generals on the contrary, thought that the works being once in possession of the enemy laid on account of many being damaged fortified their rights as earthworks, that if constructed they were now to be regarded as low fortifications, and that it remained with the generals to say what should be done. This did differences of opinion led to a bitter controversy between the chief general and the disagreeing generals, but finally general Hanson who had the way put the matter up to the fact that the works are going to be done with as he saw fit, and further argument was to be out of the question after that work of reconstruction went on each steadily sometimes under fire. One by one they were turned into long but low and strong fort fortresses, and finally the Christian besieging positions everywhere became more impregnable than ever, and intentions realized that despite his repulse at Guverine Hills so long ago, his intentions to bringing armies to help the siege had been a success but that even he for a time was even directing the siege, a occurrence which was astonishing the world.

Best general general Hanson in a battle and he came back as at you a hundred fold and with disastrous effects.

As soon as the news of the capture of Jemima Iruya and many points of gunbeam Creek, and Red riding Hood Woods reached general Hanson Iruya he began to lay plans for the capture and seizure of the enemy positions on Evangelina Heights, and making the whole section of the Chris enemy positions there a Christian possession. He had expected that all through the war, that the only thing he cared for, was to bring the Angelinians into submission, and preserve the Union of the Angelinian nation from ruin. No one else could have done anything so good as he had probably if it had not been for almost tragedy Hanson's second plan to capture Evangelina Granja would have been a success. Just five days after the capture of Jemima Iruya, general Hanson himself discovered a spy in the room of his headquarters, and in a tunnel with the spy general Hanson was shot and badly wounded and the spy escaped shooting another officer through the head who had tried to intercept him, the news of this shocking deed sent a thrill of horror throughout the whole country as well as the army, but there was no rolling of any kind, though the spy was captured and shot three hours later. This thinsy put general Hanson out of commission and general Goncentinian Aronburg who had at the same time Evangelina Granja was raging won brilliant battles was asked to take command of general Hanson's army until the general recovered. Hanson himself was shot in December on the first day and was laid up until the fourteenth when he was able to take command once more. Then he prepared for his plans again and soon concentrated large armies before Evangelina Granja and moved on with great strength to try and capture Norma Ossinia.

GENERAL PICKFORD BRADLOCK'S EXPEDITION.
HI HIS DEFEAT.

THE EVENTS AND PROGRESS OF THE SIEGE AROUND THE OR NEAR THE SECTION OF VIVIAN WICKY CALLED ANNA ARONBURG.

FROM JULY TO NOVEMBER, 1912.

At the early part of the year when the christian armies first intrenched before the sections of the city called Anna Aronburg with artillery, palisaded forts, and big concrete and other fortifications and long lines of artillery on hills and fortified works the enemy for a time only preferred to surprise the besieging christian armies by attacking like the American Indians did, but only there was vastly more in the force than ever an Indian chief could muster in a hundred Indian wars. Hundreds of thousands of gladiolins to repel a christian onslaught would shoot from behind trees, or from the midst of thickets, rocks and ravines, or when attacking themselves they would stealthily attacking and overpower christian sentries and men sleeping christian encampments by night, set fire to their vast numbers of tents and barracks, and as the occupants rushed forth from their blazing dwellings, strike, cut or shoot them down or take the survivors prisoners.

The first serious action of this part of the siege was with the enemy called the Omerian gladiolins. This section of the city is situated in the south west along the coast and not divided by any rivers. The christian fleets guarded all its ports and the armies held fire on the land side. The battle thus stated was called the "Battle of the Goli Golems" and this was waged almost within the bounds of the besieging lines under General Gonna Gonna. General Massacher added the other christian troops to repel the gigantic gladiolin onslaught led by General Brainerd, General Harrington also gave help with his divisions, and the first section of the rebel assaulting line was almost destroyed. The conflict occurred on the first day of August, August.

The most severe action of the battle raged on the second day. The enemy on the morning renewed the onslaught by attacking the christian divisions under General Swansy, capturing the encampment, burning the barracks and tents and military stores and turning the captured artillery upon the christians and driving them through and out of the encampment after severe fighting and murdering many women and children who had sought refuge in the christian lines at the time of the beginning of the siege. Other gladiolin forces joined later in the onslaught, and within a few hours attacked were made upon the christian lines along a line of about ten miles. The battle lasted over two days during which time twelve or thirteen christian encampments were destroyed, more than forty others defended by fortified works and artillery were heavily attacked by rebel infantry and cavalry, supported by gladiolin cannon and the fire from the forts and partly destroyed, or burned, some were captured to be retaken, and the most dreadful scenes of slaughter had taken place, and several hundred thousand Angelinians fairly lost their lives. By confusion among non-combatants which had before this taken refuge within the christian lines having fled from Anna Aronburg, many families were separated, and different members especially children being carried into captivity and slavery. Many of the prisoners for whom ransoms might be expected were held, and many children with other prisoners were kept until an opportunity offered for putting them to death or sending them away off into life long slavery. Men prisoners were held for exchange if they were soldiers, but non-combatants men and women were imprisoned in Anna Aronburg and the children even infants were forced into slavery compelled to erect fortified works and dig trenches, and help build fortresses, and children found not fit for work were butchered, clubbed to death, and their dead bodies either eaten or cleaned out or burned, other children were roasted to death over a slow fire, many more were torn open and their entrails taken out while alive, and many were subjected to tortures too terrible to describe. Leading Angelinian officers who had been taken captive were hung or shot on the charge of being spies, and hundreds and thousands of child slaves were even through the blockade shipped to the Blenglomenean and Boy King Islands to be sold into slavery. An Angelinian general was also slain when taken prisoner and his head was cut off taken to Anna Aronburg, and mounted on a pole and paraded through the rebel encampments and through the streets of Vivian Wicky.

With the repulse of the enemy the battle was ended. Losses were too dreadful to be estimated here.

Since the beginning of the siege and until the month of November the whole time was spent before the section called Anna Aronburg in a constant conflict a regular war itself at Vivian Wicky, and no doubt with so many conflicts around any portion of Vivian Wicky and elsewhere in its vicinity the whole siege itself was later known as "A war within a war". During the month of July itself at the section of Anna Aronburg it can hardly be believed to be so but at a scattered place here and there the enemy in an effort to break or raise the siege made hundreds of petty and severe attacks upon all portions of the christian lines on the edge of the siege itself, by ships going down the water and rivers, shelling the christian coast rear almost constantly, and by land attacking the encampments and positions, and in many cases terrible massacres took place. All along the christian front there were even midnight attacks, waging conflicts so fierce and deadly that the firing of muskets and masonry on both sides made the scene as if a fierce conflagration was on instead of a battle. For general and many other christian officers there were thousands of hairbreadth escapes, women and children rescued from rebel troops, rebel generals and men taken prisoners, and whole squads of officers fell in these horrible conflicts, and fearfully indeed were the thousands of incidents of this cruel and merciless conflict. The common danger of the siege had aroused the indian forces at Anna Aronburg under general royal williamson. During some of these conflicts the enemy had determined to attack the christians by both land and water and shell their positions simultaneously. One land expedition made by a company of a whole legion of troops was a failure, a crushing failure. Men were shot down by the christian guns like snowflakes falling during a storm, and so dreadful was the rebel losses that many generals were appalled. The fatal expedition thus meeting such a disastrous disaster never reached within two hundred yards of the christian beleaguers. One of the rebel naval forces consisting of two hundred his battle ships took Port St Amos and conquered a section of works on the christian rear and captured a certain general headquarters and landing troops drove a portion of the christian rear in, but elsewhere attempts against Fort Quebec and Montreuil were unsuccessful these two rebel fleets being badly put out of commission with the loss of thousands of men killed wounded and drowned.

Port St Amos however was soon retaken by the christians whose batteries on the main lines opened a drum drum fire upon the rebel fleets on the river beyond the east of Anna Aronburg streamling past christian rear, and another expedition of a rebel fleet against fortress Quebec failed miserably. These serious of conflicts raging night and day lasted seven days and nights successively. In this terrible seven days struggle the christian right grand division under general Bromie Angle suffered greatly from the ferocity of rebel troops called the Mic-Hollesstinians and Gargolians. General per Dearf adds troops along a portion of this same ground which had suffered from conflicts early in the siege was the scene on one of the most terrible nights. Many officers on both sides in the whole history of the siege at this section. Many officers on both sides fell, the firing was terrible, and the roar of cannons shook the earth like an earthquake and smoke thickened the air as if it were a fog. Even after this this section of the christian line was for a long time subjected to attacks from rebel troops but each attack was badly defeated. In the progress of the conflicts general muscoras alien told to destroy a provision train in the christian rear he being a force of glandelinians would have had arrived from the east with the effort to help the besieged by making a breach in the christian rear. This battle on the rear lasted about four days the only most important incident of the conflict being the capture by the combined forces of Mic-Hollesstinian and Zimmermannian rebel troops of the strongly fortified position of the christian rear under general Lewisburg, near the river itself. This was considered the main christian rear guard abattail of the besiegers, the daring, the utmost reckless bravery and perseverance of the rebel troops, gave the rebels a reliance upon their own sources which they never forgot or lost. At nevertheless to the disgust of the glandelinians during the fourth day of the conflict their co-commander general Bretener was killed and the positions thus gained so bravely lost, and the rebel expedition a failure in the end.

CHAPTER TWO.

LESSONS BROUGHT ON BY THESE BLOODY FRAYS.

Several other rebel armies coming from the rear especially from Southern Calverinia had taken part also in the expedition against general laurus Burs rear guard. The other rebel troops however bore the brunt of the four days bloody conflict known as the battle of Annapolis and had suffered the most in each of the four days battles which had been graphically described. They had met with the heaviest losses in provisions and lives and army property, the conquest of the works and their loss being the most serious blow they received from the Nationals.

The rebels had however learned two things especially in this location. What they must not protect themselves more as an amount of attacks are going to drive the christians from Lyvan Wicky and that the besieging Angelinians were always ready any time to meet any attack designed upon at any point it was thrown upon, and second that the Angelinian troops were over equal in efficiency to the Glandelinian regulars, whole Angelinian officers and generals were often superior to those of the Glandelinian army.

By the middle of the month of July it had become very evident that within a few more weeks at least a struggle must take place between the besieged glandelinians, and the besieging christian troops in the vicinity of Anna Aronburg for the control of the whole region. Up to this time the siege of the town had been so tight that it was termed by one christian general.

"So tight was the siege of Lyvan Wicky at all sections, especially at Anna Aronburg, Julio Gallo, and Norma Catherine, that the whole city could have been compared to a little child hugged tightly in its mother's arms so that it could not get away from the loving embrace, only that this embrace of the city itself and the rebels so far was far from a loving one from the key things looked to me."

several times during the conflict of short but sanguinary charges a few christian troops had been sent out beyond and into the enemy lines. A vast region some of them had been in this location was held by the rebel troops. For the whole opposing sides was getting ready for the final struggle. The Angelinian generals were determined to make a great effort. Thousands of explorers were sent out to find out the position and the explorers under fire were killed or wounded but still they were not without only reports that they Anna Aronburg was beyond to be captured.

To secure the great counts at least in the vicinity of Anna Aronburg so the siege could be pressed with honor it was decided to keep out all rebel spies who could learn plans and other accomplices, and to establish lines of communications with Manleya away along the norma gun river, Lake Gertrude Angelina, and thence to Sunbura river and Frank and the Gulf of Melville Bicksonola.

Among the erected defenses on the eastern frontier was a long line of concrete and forts made of earthwork protected by abutts and cannons and the fortress was known as Lt Lawrence. On Lake Melville Maxwell near the distant town of Gildred Maxwell was a rebel line of fortifications called Fort Gaudandion. This guarded the main entrance into Lyvan Wicky from the Valley of the norma gun and held off the christian blockading ships at a distance and three thousand cannon guarded Gaudandion.

So to protect the christian lines of communications about sixty new forts during the latter part of July were built between Norma gun and Angelina gun. The skill with which the locations of these forts and fortified works and abutts were selected was shown by the facts that many of them since became a city of besieging forts and fortified works and encampments. The garrison of one of these forts exceeded one hundred and twenty five thousand men and officers, while the garrison of Gaudandion numbered 11,250,000. The greater part of the country in this region throughout the whole siege was contested almost as wildly as if all the fiends of hell and all the lost souls possessed the region and fought each other mercilessly for the mastery.

Accordingly to the siege many christian generals had different claims as to their successes throughout the first two weeks of July. General Henry Englisher claimed that he had won a large part of ground westward toward Angelina gun, general Henry Hanson claimed to have won all the territory west of his own line of attack, while general Indian claimed the whole thing by right of his occupation with his troops, artillery, fortified works, and encampments. Neither any of these generals respected any claim with their personal interest and so they had many dispute disputes among each other, not hostile ones as enemies but disputes which during actions made them strive to outdo the other in heroism and thus proved terrible enemies to the rebels and stubborn reckless fighters and in their service during the new siege never lost a battle. Their explorers and spies and scouts, and even members of the Gemini brought back such glowing accounts of the enemy strong positions that many other scouts and even generals went out to look for themselves. As soon as the Angelinian generals had learned of the success of this enterprise they began to increase the number of their forts and to build a line of forts near the Anna Aronburg limits. One of these forts nearly a mile long and constructed of earth and rubble and outlined with abutts ten deep was called Fort Presque, and another called Verangote and another called Frankliner.

The Angelinians who scouted here and there constantly every day seized some rebel surveys and scouts and destroyed a rebel outpost on Miniania river. General glawderton sent general Washington to carry an official letter to general Melvin then at Pandora Calverinia asking him for advice as to the carry on of the siege, and he was also directed to find out how many Calverinians were loyal to the Glandelinian cause, and how many were loyal to the christian cause, and if possible to gain their friendship and support.

General Washington was only thirty years of age, the undertaking involved a winter journey to Pandora as well as a summer one a journey of about a thousand miles from Lyvan Wicky to Pandora, through first enemy territory extended five hundred miles, and then through friendly territory and large wildernesses of trees. After tedious journey on foot as no trains were running yet no road being open having been tied down as if a strike was on on account of the Aronburg situation the brave general accomplished his mission but not having encountered a peril peril too many to be written here, sometimes going on horseback, sometimes by seizing a rebel train and escaping with it, or by taking hand cars and riding down on it with a company of men always under fire and meeting nearly a thousand hairbreadth escapes. In account of the expedition to Pandora gave proof that the siege must be carried on as general Hanson or superior governor general Hanson Lyvan advised. A small christian force for the start was sent to protect a fortified work begun by christian engineers at the Junction of the Angelina gun and Evangelina St Clair rivers which was considered to be the key to Anna Aronburg and was called "Gate way of Lyvan Wicky No. 2."

The commanding officer having died of wounds received in a skirmish, general Washington who was second in command took charge of the little christian army which was constantly under fire from rebel artillery and snipers. The rebels learning that the christians had occupied the position sent a force which after more sharp fighting drove them off on July 15th and built a fort of their own there in one single night, naming it Fort Captura. The rest of the rebel force pressed on after the retreating small christian army. The rebels outnumbered the christians and after another severe skirmish the christians fell back still further. He finally built a small stockade fort and attacked here by superior numbers he was again compelled to retreat once more. In these three severe skirmishes general Washington had fired with his own hand the first shot in a struggle which was to become almost forty miles in extent a battle the results of which have rarely been surpassed in their far reaching influence in the first year of the bloody rebellion. This battle known as the Battle of Gunner's Bluffs, at Six River Junction differed from previous battles in the following particulars, that actual hostilities were mostly resumed in the old time locality of Angelina Run, that the struggle was a main supremacy between two Angelinian armies, one a rebel and the other a National, that it was to decide the question whether the enemy could prevent the capture of Vivian Wickey within ten years or not, and that before its conclusion, most of all the armies around Vivian Wickey became involved simultaneously making a perfect war of the world.

The rebel armies in Vivian Wickey throughout all centuries, felt an never before that a common danger threatened them, and many of them saw that the explanation of the Christian seige was involved in the coming of the greatest conflicts the war ever had.

The cause indeed of the Angelinians and even of the Angelinians themselves were seen to be serious ones, the other first battles around any portion of Vivian Wickey had been brought on mostly on account of the terrific seiges in Norma Othertine and Julio Gallic, but the rest of the battles were only efforts to sustain and crush the advance of the rebel governments inside of Vivian Wickey had constantly advised the rebel delegates, delegates and generals to united in repelling the danger everywhere in Vivian Wickey, during a full of activities in front of Anna Aronburg three hundred and twenty five rebel delegates from Norma Othertine, Mic-Whitther, Julio Gallic and Andromed met personally at Julio Gallic to consider the terrible state of affairs and to meet delegates from other sections of the besieged city whom whose help they hoped to win over to their side many of the deliverians in Vivian Wickey, or at least induce to remain neutral.

Some of the Angelinian delegates of this convention afterwards became well known among them general Hyster Mylet. A plan of Angelinian union was adopted and forward to the rebel to legit legislatures and to Angelinians some of the rebel generals unanimously rejected it stubbornly on the ground that it gave too much power to general Mic-Allister Stanck, and for a time the rebel government a so rejected it on the ground that it gave too much power to the Angelinians good in bringing the many glances. Angelinian armies were closer together.

The authorities of Deliverine in the month of July 1912 had sent add additional troops to be ready for the coming conflict. At the beginning of the seige what had made it really hard for general Hyster Mylet during his advance on Vivian Wickey was a belt of forest and small mount and or hilllocks great streets dyes, and swamps almost impassable for armies and even for the largest bodies of soldiers on account of two rebel troops occupying these parts with too many cannons and earthworks and it can never be imagined how hard it had been for the Christians to progress their advance and drive the foe out of these woods.

During the month of August from the foist to the fifteenth a plan of attack by the besieging Christians was made along the natural lines of the rebel communications. These were (1) the great Norma Gun River (2) taken Angelina and Mic-Hollister (3) Gunner's Bluffs and river. The broad branch fortifications of Mic-Hollister protected the approach to the mouth of the Norma Gun River and could be used as a strong military base for the attack against the coastline of Christian forces of besiegers. Beaquemack the most strongly fortified port of Anna Aronburg with the possible exception of the Mic-Whitther and Lucille taken fortifications was the key to the mouth of the Norma Gun River, and its valley. Fort's Snow drop and snows and Teconders defense the lake Mic-Hollister Route. Port Oedernine controlled the upper deltas of Norma Gun and the northern part of the Vivian Wickey territory and so long as any of these fortifications should be held by the rebels the city section of Vivian Wickey would never fall into the possession of the Peom Evangelins of the Angelinians.

GENERAL PICKFORD BRADDOCKERS EXPEDITION HIS DEPART

General Pickford Braddock was sent out from a part of general Hyster Mylet's right wing as commander in chief of an expedition down the Norma Gun with an army and fleet against Anna Aronburg. These forces the fleet itself was to attack the Angelinians on the shore fortifications called Evangelina Acadia, at Crown Pointersburg, at Evangelina and at Due Quener. General Pickford himself led the land expedition against the last named place on the fourth of August. He had been carefully warned by general Hyster Mylet against such a method and Angelinian methods of terrible warfare. The other Christian officers in un including General Hyster Mylet had also repeated the warning. General Pickford however persisted in his own method of conducting a campaign up the river toward Anna Aronburg. Near fortress Due Quener the army was fiercely attacked by the Mic-Hollisterians and Ouarinn under general Hedrud. The battle with an unknown name raged two days, but the regular Christian troops were so severely and badly beaten twice on each day, their general on the second day was mortally wounded, and all their artillery and stores lost and many Christians taken prisoners. General Wallace Handernine upon whom the disabled army involved conducted the retreat skillfully with the remainder of the army, keeping up a running fight, and fighting during the retreat twenty battles along a route of retirement of twenty eight miles stubbornly contesting every inch of ground until rescued by the main Christian army. The losses of the Christian soldiers in this part of the expedition was great, and much of this region during the battle was ravaged by the victorious rebels. After the battle was believed to have been called Virginia Acadia one of the fleets boats returned.

head the first shot in a struggle which was to become almost forty miles in extent a battle the results of which have rarely been surpassed in their far reaching influence in the first year of the bloody rebellion. This battle known as the battle of Quamby Hundreds of the Six River Junction differed from previous battles in the following particulars, that actual hostilities were mostly waged in the old time locality of Angeline Run, that the struggle was a main war between the rebel and the other a National, the second day was mortally wounded; who was killed in the battle many christians taken prisoners. General Wallace Handerson upon whom the disabled army involved conducted the retreat skillfully with the remainder of the army, keeping up a running fight, and fighting during the retreat twenty battles along a route of retirement of twenty eight miles stubbornly contesting every inch of ground until rescued by the main christian army. The losses of the christian soldiers in this part of the expedition was great, and much of this region during the battle was ravaged by the victorious rebels. After the battle was believed to have been called Virginia Acadia one of the fleets having; belonged to general Pickford made an expedition against the shore shore fortifications of Acadia also held by the rebels and after a tremendous conflict in which the rear of many cannons was innocent and exceedingly loud the assault was successful. It was in this part of the bloody campaign that occurred the expulsion from the region of the disloyal Galverlinians rich and poor alike of all their possession from Grand Park Section which was captured by the christian victors. For driving so many disloyal Galverlinians from their homes with the loss of all their possession, and causing the separation of families the Angelinians had been strongly denounced by the enemy. It seemed indeed of course it was a cruel thing to do, but it would not have been done if these Galverlinians who had really been born Angelinians had not favored the enemies of God and their wicked cause; and it had not been done anywhere until a most every resource of patience and perseverance had been tried in vain. On account of their fully supporting the rebel cause and the whole rebellion itself it was deemed a military necessity.

The disloyal, disloyal Galverlinians in this part near Anna Aronburg were known to have been simple minded people who did not seem to understand that as their country had so long passed under the rule of the Angelinians they could no longer aid the rebellion, but were bound to not as subjects to the Angelinians. The unfortunate exiles hundreds of thousands in number were forcibly distributed among the Abyssinilian countries and Abissinilian states further north.

The Angelinians elsewhere of the same expedition after several severe reverses were successful of their operations along the Lake Angeline routes.

In this tremendous expedition they were aided by loyal Galverlinians, in part of the expedition against a section of portress Cederline was a bloody failure, and many lives were lost, two armies crippled and half a fleet of ships destroyed. On the following day hostile hostilities resumed, spread all along the entire shore shoreline in a commanding that threatened to shut down everything from the din and concussion, and to the other sections of the opposing lines, big forces of opposing troops fighting fiercer on the coast of Lake Mis-Hollister, and glandelinians and Angelinians fairly destroying each other on the northeast section of the siege of Anna Aronburg. General Mounter Montcalmer was commander in chief of the rebel army at Anna Aronburg and was one of the bravest and most skillful rebel officers that had ever appeared in Anna Aronburg. In another day his troops, and shore batteries and glandelinian fleets of gunboats and warships had driven the Angelinian fleets and christian armies out of the disputed territory, gained more Galverlinians on his side and was preparing a strong and united fleet at Mis-Hollister Stanoker to attack portress Scotia and New Aronburg junction. By these three days of battles in this expedition the rebels seemed to have the advantage all along the entire stretch of disputed lines.

Hitherto the Angelinians An elinian general mansion had sent out inefficient leaders, who had scorned the advice of the other christian leaders and looked down upon their Angelinian troops and their methods. However six days later general William Ernest Evans was sent to conduct a new expedition. At once the influence of a strong Angelinian leader was felt wherever the Angelinian authorities commanding the siege had any interests. He saw that the struggle between the besieged and the besiegers was to be fought in all sections of Mis-Hollister and all over the Galverlinian country as well and he and mansion acted accordingly. From then on his general officers he treated them all with the most consideration and favor, and though the command was to still remain in the hands of officers from mansion's command able men and other generals were also sent out.

MORE AN ELINIAN PLANS. VIA ANNA ARONBURG SPRING SPRUCE WOLFE.

The Angelinians in their new campaign choose of necessity the old lines of attack of the weeks before. One day after a fierce and sanguinary conflict the branch fortifications of Mis-Hollister, all its outer works and cannon and breastworks and a fleet of rebel ships and transports and gunboats and fire barges were captured and the foe there forced into a surrender. Later portress Due Quenser deserted by the glandelinians in on the approach of an overwhelming christian force was occupied by christian troops and renamed Fort St John. In this expedition general William Evans took an important part. A desperate attack on the shore works and batteries of Mis-Hollister which the rebels had erected on the shores of Lake Angeline in a circular formation failed after a heavy loss in life on both sides. In this conflict a thousand cannon had been attacked by sixty brigades of christian troops. On the same day elsewhere the Angelinians resolved to attack the enemy once more by the same three routes as attempted before. The Norma Run, Lake Mis-Hollister, and Unheus Creek. General Spruce Wolfe who had shown the most conspicuous bravery and skill in his attack upon portress Mis-Hollister was entrusted with the command of a large army that was to make an expedition against Bequer.

It was expected indeed that the main forces sent by the three routes would join him in the attacks upon that stronghold, but on account of six weeks resistance of the enemy in contesting every inch of ground successfully they were not able to do so. Becquer the key to the Yorma run and Anna Aronburg was the second most important place of Vivian Wickey. The rebel general in command of the main army and of the defense of Anna Aronburg compelled to draw many valuable forces of men for its defense from the other places weakened his lines. The weakness of the rebel armies at Anna Aronburg not receiving any supports from Mic-Ailister A Stano or Purgatorian now became evident toward October, general (Mic-Ailister) Stanok had furnished little if any reinforcements, while the men and supplies that had been sent or brought to Anna Aronburg had found it almost impossible to reach their destination because the Angelinians practically controlled the entrance of the gunboat rivers mouth with the Yorma run and thus had Anna Aronburg cut off from the main army. If the Angelinians could get possession of Anna Aronburg no effort of the enemy elsewhere would be successful of retaking the siege. If the Angelinians could not capture Anna Aronburg they would not be able to maintain the siege beyond January that was now so quickly approaching.

CHAPTER THREE.

THE FALL OF ANNA ARONBURG, ANGELINTA THUD H.

The Angelinian armies besieging Anna Aronburg on the other hand had an army more than ten or even times as great as that of the besieged rebels, and were easily able to reinforce their troops in any engagement or expedition whatever, their equipments moreover were combat and easily accessible, and supplies for their troops could be easily obtained from the main army of besiegers at Vivian Wickey proper.

It was therefore easy to foresee the coming results. The main struggle for the main issue however was to be no child's play. The main rebel general was a brave and able and skilful man. The capture of Anna Aronburg was essential to the Angelinian success in maintaining the siege of Vivian Wickey itself. More than once many of the Christian generals were almost ready to give up their efforts to take this fortified section of the city so far divided from the rest.

Standing up on a high cliff general Spruce Wolfe with his staff saw that a certain section of Anna Aronburg and the main rebel positions stood upon a high stretch of ground between the Yorma and Angeline gun rivers and the St virgin and not only protected on three sides by fleets of rebel ships and gunboats and long lines of taming shore batteries but also by precipitous rocks which were thought to be completely insurmountable by any attacking force. General Wolfe determined to seal sea the cliffs while Christian fleets should steam up the three rivers and attack and destroy or languish the rebel fleets and shore fortifications and batteries. So first the battle raged on water for three days and this being successful after the destruction of many ships on both sides the shore batteries also being carried and turned upon Anna Aronburg and let loose a terrific hell storm of fire general Wolfe pushed forward forces of men either by boats, or by pontoons and wading the river, and the soldiers in immense streams landed at the foot of the bluffs. Two dozen brigades of volunteers scrambled up the cliffs in the face of a merciless withering fire that shot them down in scores of hundreds, but they were soon followed by larger numbers of men, and soon after desperate fighting the rebels were driven from the edge of the cliff and a portion of their force captured. The rest of the force covered by the tremendous gun fire of twenty five thousand cannon along the shore and their own batteries and from those of captured rebel and Angelinian warships combined soon crossed over, hundreds of thousands of men slinging their muskets over their backs, and then crouching at trees and bushes the hardy troops climbed the steep ascent. Rebel cannon and machine guns depressed to reach them ploughed the steep high hill side survivors had gained the down to destruction by but within a days time the survivors were made upon top and pressed the forces of the enemy back. Ten desperate men were made upon the rebel batteries above and they were captured. In the remainder of the conflict which followed the next day on top of the high ground both commanders of both sides were wounded the former lying upon the field and within another day all the rebels and loyal Angelinians driven from house to house and street to street in fierce sanguinary fighting was captured. For ten days raged the wildest battle tried most at that quarter but all the attacks failed with dreadful slaughter.

By this victory 10,000,000 child slaves and other captive children were rescued and sent under strong escorts of Cavalry to the main Christian lines. Later general Montreale line of fortified works and forts were captured during a tremendous conflict on the following eleventh day, then Crown Pointersburg, and other points had fallen, the Angelinians being everywhere triumphant. Thus the capture of Anna Aronburg by early November proved to be the first, greatest turning point of the Vivian Wickey siege. It decided that the siege of Vivian Wickey with Anna Aronburg in possession should be retained, that Christian success in the long ending should prevail. It made possible the producing of the most tremendous siege of the whole glawin-glandico-Angelinian war.

By this tremendous victory at southern Vivian Wickey which astounded the world itself the Angelinians gained possession of all immense territory east and southwest of Anna Aronburg and north also and many islands on the three rivers. All these as soon as possible were fortified by Christian besiegers and by them the town itself was used as a part of counter siege of Vivian Wickey and was soon as strong and fortified that it was not certain that any rebel army could

It was expected indeed that the main forces sent by the three routes would join him in the attacks upon that stronghold, but on account of six weeks resistance of the enemy in contesting every inch of ground successfully they were not able to do so. Bequer the key to the gorge and Anna Aronburg was the second most important place of Vivian Wickey. The rebel general in main command of Vivian Wickey or Anna Aronburg compelled to draw many large forces of men for these defenses.

By this tremendous victory at southern Vivian Wickey which astounded the world itself the Angelinians gained possession of all immense territory east and southwest of Anna Aronburg and north also and many islands on the three rivers. All these as soon as possible were fortified by Christian besiegers and by them the town itself was used as a part of counter siege of Vivian Wickey and was soon as strong as fortified that it was not certain that any rebel army could ever retake it again.

In Vivian Wickey itself the beleaguered glandelinians were having a hard time of it. The people the soldiers and all the soldiers inside the city had very few of the comforts and conveniences that make life easy for us. All roads and streets were very bad and to get a cup of coffee was so scarce that no one hardly had anything of that like of drink. The rebel even had no matches and had to build fires with flint and steel, had no coal for fuel, no oil, no coal oil lamps and no electric as the Angelinians had cut off all electric power to Vivian Wickey and the enemy being under constant bombardment were unable to form their own electric machinery.

So a tallow candle was their only dependence for light, while a flint, steel and tinderbox took the place of matches.

The worse horrors of the great siege had been experienced by the Angelinians the soldiers, most of the money and provisions to carry it on had been voted by the authorities, soldiers, and people. Nearly one half of the National armies that had enlisted in the early part of the war had taken part in the siege of Vivian Wickey and they believed that the success in the capture of Aronburg which occurred in November on Thanksgiving day was due largely to their own efforts. They had become better acquainted with one another, had learned their own strength in conducting the siege, and were led more and more to depend upon themselves, and not to look less and less for failure and depression. Prominent War correspondents and others and others saw these things at the time, and said that the rebels in giving upon the section called Anna Aronburg were really preparing the way to the Christians for a speedy capture of the whole of Vivian Wickey and even the Boy King and Elenglooseman Island islands.

CHAPTER FOUR

CONSPIRACY OF GENERAL MIC-HOLLESTER JOHNSTON.

Before the Angelinians were fully secure in their new possessions there was a terrific conflict with the glandelinians under Mic-Hollester Johnston at Chey Chevrolet. This was the result of a so called "Conspiracy of General Mic-Hollester Johnston." This rebel general as written before was next to Mic-Allister-Stanek the highest of all generals in charge of rebel armies not only at Vivian Wickey but elsewhere throughout Calverinia, one of the ablest of his race and a nation, a man who united the characteristics of worse barbarians as well as glandelinians with the skill of a thousand George Washingtons. In one, he had been an adherent of the "Devil." He could not believe that the rebels in Anna Aronburg had been defeated and the city captured, and if so thought it would surely be recaptured. General Algonkin who had been a Calvinist by birth but from early days a foe of Angelinia was greatly disturbed by the defeat of the garrison and troops at Anna Aronburg. General Mic-Allister and Mic-Hollester Johnston saw that if Anna Aronburg could not be retaken Vivian Wickey would surely be caught in a stranglehold in a few more months, and believing that the Nationals might be driven back from Anna Aronburg he on the last day of January 1913 marched his whole army toward Anna Aronburg through Vivian Wickey itself while Mic-Allister threw at once a big army in his place to prevent the Angelinians from securing a foothold on Norman's Bridge. Mic-Hollester Johnston even got other divisions of rebels and even other soldiers and civilians at that to join him. He even succeeded in inducing a hundred thousand loyal Calvinist men to join the war "Conspiracy." At the beginning a number of besieging posts were surprised, and the garrisons captured or massacred, fronts Christian encampments were attacked, great fires broke out and then a battle started that became general and for a time it seemed as if all the horrors of a Evangelinia Granada scene was about to break out here, but no account of fighting could bring success and finally Mic-Hollester Johnston abandoned his attempt on Anna Aronburg and gave up the expedition marching back to his former positions.

WHAT THE SEIGE OF VIVIAN WICKY HAS CAUSED.!!!!
A STRANGE RESTRICTION ON ALL TRADE CALLED THE VIVIAN WICKY NAVIGATION ACT. MAYBE IT WAS A GRAND ACT. LET'S SEE IF IT WAS AND WHO PROFITED BY IT.

IT is foolish to remember and maybe we can remember at that that after the siege of Vivian Wicky had extended from the beginning in the early August and to January it was thought by the rebel authorities of glandelinia essential to control and regulate if possible all trade in every way, and it was deemed good policy to close all christian and their own ports from all foreign shipping, especially of all nations that may favor christianity or at least show sympathy with the national cause of Abidinania and her states. So as early as the beginning of the siege of Vivian Wicky glandelinian Navigation Acts had been strictly passed. These laws and many others also passed and forbade all nations under penalty of destruction to their ships and trade to trade with any country but glandelinia, they required that all commerce should be carried on in only glandelinian vessels at least thus shutting out all competition, and forcing all foreign goods to come through the glandelinian markets and be subject to rebel duties. Most of these glandelinian laws however had been unheeded, and on account of the defiance of all other christian nations as many new ships specially made of wood and all steamers armed with big guns that to protect glandelinian shipping itself the rebel authorities passed a new law forbidding any glandelinian to export any goods except in glandelinian built ships and not to receive anything whatever from any nation siding with Angellina or defying their laws.

The worldly trade was also burdened on account of the siege of Vivian Wicky itself. In many nations there was interference with many thousands of manufactures, and even the manufacture of hats, paper, leather, iron and toys, and other articles for Christmas goods was absolutely put out of commission. It was true that frequently these laws of the rebels could not be enforced but nevertheless all nations knew the peril to their ships from many glandelinian submarines, and so they were afraid to take chances though they did trade with Angellina with her eastern shores where rebel boats were not so many.

In the month of December just a little before Christmas on account of the approaching worldy Christmas sorrow on account of lack of christ mas presents and goodies a serious effort by some nations was made to to struggle desperately against the Navigation Acts of glandelinia, and on account of this danger many additional revenue officers were appointed by glandelinians to watch for all foreign ships and to have them torpedoes if they dared to approach any ports of western Calverinia or Angellina. The rebels of course not having control of Angellina could not very well do anything along the coast of Angellina but for the time being had full control of all ports not blockaded by the Angellinians in Calverinia. The glandelinian officers found that smuggling was extensive even in christian blockaded ports of Vivian Wicky and Calverinia, and to stop this and gain evidence concerning it, they applied to glandelinian courts of for Writs of assistance to aid them in their search for smuggled goods. These writs were warrants permitting the rebel revenue officers to search any house on in Vivian Wicky for goods whether on suspicion or not.

The glandelinian governments at this time, not only in Vivian Wicky, and in glandelinia part of Calverinia but also in the country of glandelinia itself, was wickedly corrupt and that bribery was recognized even by the officers of state as a regular means of securing legislation. Thus the rebel Navigation acts was very hurtful to all nations and so if any one could imagine what a Christmas Christ Christmas just passed they could have wept of sorrow indeed. Just before Christmas probably the scores of millions of children waking up on that dreary Christmas day, no goodies, no toys or anything to gladden the day, snowstorms and rainstorms accordingly to climate making things worse, and still greater was the number of grown people who suffered just as hard. On this Christmas however chickens and turkeys were available, but only for the rich and well to do, and they had hard times in obtaining it at that. The poor suffered the worse, and there was no doubt that millions of children fairly cried their eyes out and probably prayed that Vivian Wicky would be captured shortly. Millions of masses had been offered for that day for the ending of the war, and surprise a very surprisingly as it was no Christmas Mass was offered. All were Masses of St. Bernard and bee beseeching petitions. Novenas were offered, Grand Processions of sorrow were made and all rites also for the obtaining of the peace that Vivian Wicky and all ports of Calverinia should be soon be free from the blockade and rebel troops.

Shall a Simultaneous to this a great Stamp Act occurred throughout Angellina and her states. It however was not like the Stamp Act in America, but one with styles and fully with Representation. It was a lawful one, a celebrated Stamp Act, which was the purpose to tax all Angellinian with people not fighting in about a Stamp Act occurred throughout Angelina and her states. It however was not like the Stamp Act in America, but one with ideas and fully with representation. It was a lawful one, a celebrated Stamp Act, and one passed with the purpose to tax all Angelinian rich people not fighting in war with the intention of raising more money for the support of the nation in the war of not only causing the speedy capture of Lucille Jackson and Vivian Wiley but to help bring down the rebellion of the wicked Angelinians. This act in some portions especially among the rich Calverinians met with great disfavor among Calverinians who were especially rich and only like money and cared very little about the poor, the cause of Angelina or about God either and when they realized the Stamp Act might be enforced they fell away and joined the rebellion. This celebrated Sta. Act went still further. This became a means measure designed to raise a strong revenue throughout all Angelinian and Calverinian and river ports to prevent smuggling of plantinians and sympathizers. The act passed early in November was to go into effect that same month. Under its provision every legal document, every marriage certificate, every newspaper and every almanac, all books, and stories and all manuscripts, and everything of manufacture was to bear a stamp before it could be issued, or in the case of legal papers be of any force at all. Such a law of this kind however affected any one, who wished to buy even a newspaper, for he was compelled to pay for the stamp as well as the paper. The value of the stamps varied according to the circumstances or according to the value of the thing bought and sold. The stamps however were not like the adhesive ones that is used for mailing letters and packages, but were impressions on the paper of religious pictures and other objects.

Among all Angelinians there was no opposition against it from the fact that out of the entire population over three quarters and a half did not vote against it, but many disloyal Calverinians rather feeling the cause of plantinians in their hearts made strong speeches against it and tried to form many rebel sympathizers among all the Calverinians but throughout all the war only one third of the entire population of Calverinia favored the rebels. Thus the reason later in the war the cause of such rebel devastation of Calverinia.

Indeed if the Angelinian stamp Act attracted no opposition among the Angelinians it was far otherwise among disloyal Calverinians. Violent remonstrances were forwarded to the Angelinian authorities, violent and blasphemous speeches were made constantly against it urging Calverinians loyal to plantinians to join the Insurrecto army, and all rebel assemblies loyal to plantinians denied the right of Angelina to tax the people even if the people had not voted against it. Many of the speakers accused of treason were arrested by Angelinian officers by scores but nevertheless all kinds of wicked associations were formed all over the Calverinian country to keep up the wicked agitation and rouse many Calverinians if possible to the enemy cause. When thousands of stamped papers came to Calverinia it was seized and destroyed and the religious pictures on the stamps insulted and spit upon, and all those who had dared to accept offices as stamp distributors were forced to either resign or were forcibly put out at the point of the sword or bayonet. The time soon came for the gracious act to go into operation, but there were neither stamps or officers. This strong and traitorous action and resistance indeed had not been anticipated by any friends of even plantinians, perhaps not by any even disloyal Calverinians. Some other plantinian Calverinians had not approved of the act yet he counselled and warned submission, and even suggested the names of important Calverinian persons who he thought may be very suitable for stamp distributors, while general Rindard became applied for such an office himself.

Indeed the news of the full failure of the Stamp act in the disloyal parts of Calverinia caused great surprise, disdain and even sorrow and embarrassment to many of the Angelinian governments. Even many Angelinian merchants who were suffering alarming loss of trade on account of the rebellion petitioned the Angelinian authorities to repeal the law from at least Calverinia itself, for the wicked determination not to obey the act had been followed by an agreement to join the rebellion itself. General Roswell Puster Johnston who had been summoned before general Rindard near Gurandecillo to give his opinion on the state of affairs in Calverinia elsewhere outside of Vivian Wiley had told them that the wicked disloyal Calverinians would not submit and were threatening to join ranks with the rebels.

Moved by all these things the Angelinian authorities repeated the Angelinian glory not of Calverinia alone but at the same time passed a Declaratory act setting forth that all Christian governments of Angelina and Abbeemina, with the advice and consent of the Abbeemnian King had, hath for the support of the nation to crush the wicked rebellion, and of right ought to have full power and authority to make laws and statutes of sufficient force and validity to bind the colonies of Calverinia subjects of the Nation of Abbeemina whether plantinians born in Calverinia or not in all cases whatever, and that all those who showed such rebellious nature were not traitors against their Beloved Country, but to God, and not only that but they had no right therefore to vote in any of the Elections, unless they came to terms as degraded.

REAL OBJECT OF THE ANGELINIAN TAXATION.....

In their joy in the repeal of the measure the disloyal Calverinians at first overlooked the Declaration Act and thought that in this measure they already had the Sons of God beaten. But not so. Angelinia was not disposed to let the foolish and wicked rebel sympathizers alone. Already on account of the war many portions of the world itself suffered on account of the Vivian Wickey affair and its strange Aronburg Mystery. Calverinia also was burdened with woes all over; Angelinia herself was burdened with small debt, she had spent much for the effort to overthrow the rebellion and free loyal Calverinia from the glandelinian rule, and knew that the Calverinians as loyal citizens of Angelinia ought to bear the share of the expenses. It was voted for so now why should they oppose what they actually voted for. And it is very important to remember dear readers that the whole purpose of this represented and fully voted taxation was not to help pay the expenses of the Angelinian armies, Angelinian governments and others at home, nor was it any efforts to help pay the interest on the debt, all the expected revenue was to be spent in for the help of the loyal Calverinians nor all of the Calverinians themselves.

There were two main sources of expense in the Calverinian country, first, for the defense of the Abyssinkilian Frontier in the north bordering northern Calverinia with Abdeannin and Abyssinkile, including for the building of many forts and works on rivers in possession of loyal Calverinians, and maintaining them, second the salaries, of the Calverinian generals, and other necessary outlays, and for the support of the many child slaves without parents and other orphans sent to Abyssinkile and Angelinia, and for the building of orphan asylums and for the restoration of robbed and ruined property in Calverinia by the rebels, and expenses for the bringing home of many Calverinian soldiers fallen in battle on the Christian side, and for the support of all Calverinian poor, churches, schools and hospitals and hospital camps and for the poor and needy rendered poverty stricken by the war itself.

Thus the need of these expenses could hardly be questioned by the Calverinians. The ground of the objections however came only from the Calverinians who opposed the Christian cause, not that they did not wish to pay the taxes but that it was an effort in some mysterious way unseen to help suppress the Christian resistance to the rebellion itself. One of the taxes had been ordered to be raised without anybody's consent as it had been voted for, and all taxes had been laid by bodies of elections which had all kinds of representations. None of these acts were infringements of their rights. Good and loyal Calverinians were willing to pay any and everything to support the cause.

Simultaneous to this an act had been passed requiring all the non-combatants of the Calverinians to support all troops and homeguards, which had been quartered among them to protect their homes from the enemy raiders. Many rebel sympathizers refused to obey this righteous law and thus the troops were not commissioned to protect them. This was doubly repulsive to the rebel sympathizers. Though the Angelinian authorities had been forced to repeal the Stamp Act in Calverinia it was only because its continuance was declared in the repelling act would be attended with many inconveniences on account of those siding with the rebellion.

And the trade which had been made with all nations before the war through the water way of Vivian Wickey and Aronburg and Federal Federal had been very profitable to the Christian nations themselves and now the seige of Vivian Wickey was not only a cause of irritation, but also of most heavy losses. Even the other nations could not secure from Calverinia or Angelinia such articles as glass, paper, water colors, and teas and coffees.

Throughout all the first six or seven months of the seige of Vivian Wickey there were many incidents which are worthy of note. In one several important rebel men were seized who in civilian clothes were believed to be spies. It was nevertheless looked upon as an outrage by the rebel Calverinians. Not long after this a rebel sloop of war and a gunboat was seized while attempting to run the Angelinian blockade. The seizure was the occasion of a terrible riot or conflict which forced the Angelinian ships and revenue officers to take refuge on a battle ship. The news of this incident decided General Adams to send more troops in this vicinity and quarter them in the Christian fortresses. In the state of feeling which then existed it is not strange that an immediate encounter of some violence occurred and fear of a general uprising of the rebel forces once more induced General Adams to strengthen the works more and more. At the same time of this occurrence several rebel soldiers captured were tried as spies and on the charge of murder. General Adams anxious that some justice should be done, consented to defend them. All the accused glandelinians were acquitted of the charge of spying and murder, but three however were convicted of attempting to murder some children with the besieging Christians and condemned to be branded in the

with a red hot branding iron as they did to child slaves as a punishment. The sentence was executed in open army court and all the prisoners were thus discharged but held for exchange. Another incident which stirred the besiegers happened near Island No. One. A rebel warship called the Haterburg working as a rebel revenue ship was stationed near the city of Vivian Wickey by the way to enforce the Navigation acts of glandelinia. Her wicked commander

In their joy in the repeal of the measure the disloyal Calverinians at first overlooked the Declaration Act and thought that in this measure they already had the Sons of God bent on, but not on Angelina and not on the

Another incident which stirred the besiegers happened near Island no one. A rebel warship called the Haterburg working as a rebel revenue ship was stationed near the city of Vivian Wickey by the bay to enforce the Navigation acts of Glandelinia. Her wicked commander was unusually rude and cruel and extremely severe in the exercise of his commission. He did not confine himself to vessels of other nations, but on the Christian shores of Vivian Wickey within the sight of the besiegers he landed men at different places on the river coast, and seized cattle, sheep, hogs, and indeed anything he pleased, and caused the most cruel and atrocious murders of helpless children who were seized and acts to the children which would cost a sin to describe. This conduct caused great indignation to the Angelinian officers and so during the time of one of her raids one battery of the Christian opened fire on the ship and in the short engagement caused her to run aground. Very soon she was attacked by eighteen hundred boats filled with soldiers. Her crew were overpowered, and set on shore as prisoners and the vessel forced off the shore by six Angelinian Marines and taken possession of. Though large rewards were offered for the apprehension of those who murdered the children, or who took part in the previous deeds as the crew thus captured were new men and not the same as the ones committing the deed, no one among the prisoners would give any information whatever and kept their mouths shut refusing to tell even if they died at the stake for their silence.

The action of many of the Christian generals in particular in conducting the Vivian Wickey siege was greatly influenced by the publication and circulation of series of letters from many persons in sympathy with the Angelinian cause in which the whole situation at Vivian Wickey, was clearly and forcibly, and ably reviewed. One of the writers was a man of wealth with a large family, of education of great ability. In one of his grand letters he expressed what the most thoughtful men of Angelina of all classes believed when he wrote to Mansion House;—

"Let all these truths be indelibly impressed upon our minds in particular; that no one in the world not even our selves can be ever happy again unless all child slaves are set free, that we ourselves cannot be free without the children being free, that we cannot be secure in our property either in Calverinia or elsewhere if the rebels still hold Vivian Wickey and be able to ravage the land, that taxes imposed upon us by Angelina do thus help to secure the freedom of child slaves and help the Christian armies, that duties laid for the sole purpose of raising money in this way by voting are just taxes, that attempts to lay such duties on the plans agreed and voted upon is tyranny for any one to oppose, that this opposition can never aid ought to be never be effectual, even if it would be the united efforts of the armies of traitors in Calverinia siding with the rebels against the Glandelinians."

On these principles the subsequent conduct of the many Christian generals not only holding the siege of Vivian Wickey but even elsewhere throughout the whole country was largely based. Even peace war refusal refusals by many good Calverinians to use rebel goods was very general. The exports to the rebel quarters also showed a heavy decline. Those sent to Glandelinia fell off more than one half, while those of other Glandelinians were not more than one sixth of their former amount. And even the presence of Angelinian troops all over Calverinia made it almost impossible to avoid collisions and many severe skirmishes had already occurred in all parts of Calverinia but no general battles.

During the recent battle of Red Riding Hood Woods which had raged four weeks in series of bloody contests another general by the name of Mic-Fern Hindcock who had received a mortal wound had died and general Thirder George had succeeded him in command this on the Christian side I mean not just now speaking about the rebels. In the early days of his commission he was regarded with much affection by his soldiers and generals. General Mansion himself wrote to Mansion, Vivian;

"I can scarcely conceive a general of better dispositions or more exemplary virtues, or more truly desirous of promoting the full welfare of all his soldiers. This commander wished to be an absolute general indeed,--to be an officer in reality. He followed his aim with the dogged perseverance. Favored by many good days of luck and circumstances he had succeeded in getting many portions of the enemy's lines under his control and though his means all of the Red Riding Hood Woods were in the possession of the Angelinians, and the region was then placed under commanders that was sure to follow his wishes. It was evident however to general George that the rebel main positions could not be forced, and the horrors of the siege was getting on his own nerves especially the effect it had upon the whole world in general and at times he almost felt responsible for the land and Christmas day though he had not been there at Vivian Wickey at the time. No one of the nations could buy any goods from either Calverinia or Angelina, and millions of merchants of other nations were presenting or asking petitions after petitions and having masses and Novenas said, Processions made, and processions offered for some relief from the war restriction on the general trade."

At first to do something for the world in general. Mansion had some desires to lessen the blockades for a temporal time but he found out the blockades had nothing to do with it at all that it was the enemy themselves who had caused all the sorrow.

On the day of the bloody Red Riding Hood's general Lord Northington who had also received his commission in place of a general who was disabled for life in the same battle had made attempts to mediate with some of the rebel generals in an effort to try and end hostilities and stay the progress of the Revolution but the enemy generals however as refused to accept any mediators one of them writing to general Mansion;

"Your Excellency general Mansion;

No mediators can be allowed within Confederate lines of Angelinia. Please do not send me it is annoying. We purpose to hold the rebellion to a finish.

Good luck to you and your efforts in general we remain yours truly;

Glandelinian authorities.

Nice of him to write such a letter to a enemy was he not!!!!"

ANGELINIAN COMMITTEES OF CORRESPONDENCE.:::

In the month of July 1912 general Samuel Stanek of general Mansions right wing at a general meeting of christian generals in Oak Hall, Jennie vivian (Poor little Jennie vivian) moved that the thousands of com committees of correspondence should be abruptly appointed in the different towns in the province of Calverinia, to state the reasons and conditions of the siege and of the province in particular to commandate and publish the same to every Calverinian and Angelinian and other Abbeonnan towns and cities and to the whole world in general. This was prepared to be done though it would be indeed a risky job for the correspondents and they took their very lives in their hands. Also general Farrer proposed that other committees of war correspondents and news paper reports should be appointed throughout all of the Angelinian states in order to produce unity of general action. The proposition was accepted, committees were soon appointed in all of the Angelinian states remaining true to Abbeonnan, and later in the whole world itself.

And already owing as was thought to the rescue of so many child slaves by main force throughout all of Calverinia and during the invasion of Glandelinia early in the war, Abyssinkile and Angelinia herself had already an immense population of homeless and parentless orphans and child slaves. A hand and no room for them in orphan asylums. The affairs produced by this was in disorder. To aid the millions of children it was provided that all persons that were rich or not were to adopt children under penalty of deportation if refusing them, that those not able to take care of children would be given means to do so, and would be giving a means to own property as well.

Many persons in Calverinia however though born Calverinians or not were not particularly crazy for children though they had favored the cause of Angelinia and so many when offered children to adopt had refused them on the ground that they had enough children of their own to take care of. They continued the refusal under any conditions, and some who had taken them had threatened however to return them to the rebel authorities again for resumption of slavery.

Also the authorities not receiving demands for children as expected, resolved to send out many children than to Angelinia and Abyssinkile, to Pandora Calverinia, Angelinia Agathia, and Glorianna and some other places for adoption. When the first trainloads arrived at Abyssinkile and other places, though it was on a Sunday the committees of correspondence met and gained from the agents of the Child Slave Adoption plan a promise that the children if publicly adopted would be protected fully from the rebels in case they ever happened to invade Abyssinkile, and that the children should not be sent throughout any war zone districts of Calverinia where they would be in danger of being massacred by the wholesale by rebels and rebel soldiers. On the following Monday a great meeting of citizens of the City of Abyssinkile voted unanimously, that all the children that were to be left over would not be sent back to Calverinia over even if they found no homes to adopt them, but should be entrained for Abbeonnan, without being unloaded from the trains. Meantime up the Erminia river many child loads of rescued child slaves arrived into Abyssinkile. The Abyssinkilian governor however refused to allow the ships to sail up further into Abyssinkile as near its border the rebels had batteries on both sides of the river and the ships were liable to be shelled. Another mass meeting of citizens and soldiers was held and it was again unanimously voted that the ships shall pass through into Abyssinkile under the protection of Abyssinkilian warships and merriments. So that following night before nine o'clock a stream of war ships approached the transports loaded with frightened and crying children and moving in file before and behind and on each side of the ships pulled through the gauntlet of batteries. The rebels and the ships were forced Angelinian authorities. The governor of the state of Angelinia was shaken even by the eloquence of many opposers. Thus the disloyal Calverinians received the punishments they well deserved.

At first to do something for the world in general. Hanson had some desires to lessen the blockades for a temporal time but he found out the blockades had nothing to do with it at all that it was the enemy themselves who had caused all the sorrow. On the day of the bloody Red Riding Woods horror general Lord Northering who had also maintained his position in the war.

...towed into the straits and passed through into Abyssinkile under the protection of Abyssinkilian warships and merrimans. So that

Many warships were sunk, thousands were killed or wounded on both sides but the ships ran through with not one child harmed even though a number of transports were sunk by rebel gun fire and torpedoes shot from submarine submarines. This action was called The Children battery gun party taking place December 16th 1912. Six hundred rebel guns had been disabled from the return fire of the war ships and two hundred s landed. The rebels had forty thousand cannon altogether. By this daring expedition the rebels had been surprised and one of their generals had died.

The Angelinian ships had great daring in passing such a gauntlet of batteries and though we did all in our power to prevent them we can hardly help admiring them for their bravery in which the way they safely conducted the transports through at such risk and loss of life. I give them my good luck wish in general. They were certainly brave and deserve credit. My total loss in that bombardment was one hundred thousand killed and wounded. But the National fleet a loss lost is beyond my estimation.

This engagement happened ten miles north of Abyssinkile and had nothing to do with the siege though. In Abyssinkile not one child missed a home. In Abbeinnia all found room for adoption, at Pandora (Calverinia) and Gloriana, all trains coming there with children left empty, and all ships were emptied of children. Everyone adopted them and such a wholesale adoption was a surprise to the world. The government authorities over this gave great praise and though having many millions more on their hands proposed to find room for them also. Many poor classes who adopted children received what few pensions could be spared and many received help in any other way possible. It was the grandest act the Angelinian states had ever accomplished.

THE FIVE INTOLERABLE ACTS OF ANGELINIA

When the news of the refusal of the children in Calverinia from the disloyal subjects reached the Angelinian authorities, they and even general Hanson, Ivian and his generals were very angry, and passed five acts aimed directly at the rebellious subjects of Calverinia:

(1) All disloyal Calverinians should be deported. (2) All their property being enemy property should be seized and given over to Angelinian authorities. (3) All leaders of such conspirators should be arrested and shot for treason. (4) That all houses and other immovable property belonging to the rebellious Calverinians should be destroyed. (5) That all rebellious subjects believed to be Calverinians who had born people or children in Calverinia should not be allowed to retain them on their time of deportation, unless receiving a legal permit. For otherwise families and husbands and wives for punishment would be torn apart.

It no doubt was a cruel measure but Abbeinnia always dealt harshly with any one who rebelled wickedly against her authorities when they should and were really Angelinians and wickedly go into the side of gods worse enemies in the region of commerce with all the disloyal Calverinians was shut off by blockades and forbidden, no vessels of any nation therefore was allowed to come in or go out. This was of course to also punish the disloyal Calverinians who would stay still remain in Calverinia. The other was a transportation rule which allowed persons and others charged with child murder and rebellious purposes to be transported to Abbeinnia to or to the Island Prison for trial. Other orders completely revoked the Calverinian charter, in taking away from many assemblies of Calverinia all power of appointment and giving it to the governor of Abyssinkile who had also the main power of refusal. No public meetings were allowed, no Calverinians who could not prove they were born Angelinians and sympathized with the Angelinian cause would be allowed to vote or retain property of any kind or marry in Calverinia. These acts were specially directed against all disloyal Calverinians who through some favorable circumstances could still remain in Calverinia. Another was an enforced quartering act, this legalized the quartering of stationary armies of Angelinians in the effort to watch all movements of suspicious and rebellious subjects.

The last of it was the Child Slave Act. This reorganized all Angelinian government authorities in Calverinia, and provided for the free exercise in Calverinia of using means to run down all child slave owners and masters and confine them in prison as criminals. It also extended the limits of the Province to Angelinian rule. As had been seen the disloyal Calverinians felt that the state of Calverinia and her provinces belonged to them by right of conquest during the Gloriana-Abbeinnian war of Eighteen Forty One, and by the Angelinian authorities. In every one of these acts the disloyal Calverinians saw a direct blow at their very liberties, and many realizing that they were really in the wrong fairly repented and saved themselves from the worst to come. However these acts had not been passed without strong opposition in each house of the Angelinian authorities. A government authorities however were too strong to be shaken even by the eloquence of many opposers. Thus the disloyal Calverinians received the punishments they well deserved.

In the meantime the effects of the yivian whiskey seige was even more severe than the whole world believed it to be. Almost all the interest of the whole world with yivian whiskey and other Calverinian ports were connected with the world with yivian whiskey, ship building, grant commerce, and fishing were the means of the livelihood of most of its own citizens. And almost all of the supplies of Calverinia and Angelinia came to the world through the streams of yivian whiskey and from it to and across the sea, and the chief means of communications with the chief christian and other nations of the world came from it. The effects of the seige made it so that nothing could be brought to it by water or land not a sheep, not an ox, not a bale of hay or provisions, not a single fish, not even any kind of bundle. Fish and other provisions sent to yivian whiskey from Calverina through the secret tunnels to the suffering besieged had to go through two hundred miles of tunnels by underground trains. The condition of the city was a hard one to both non-combatants and Glandelinian soldiers alike, but the worse sufferers was a long bayw combatants who received nothing from the enemy but the corpses and sometimes nothing at all for days and were in a half starved condition.

The whole world was protesting over the horrors of this seige and its effects upon them all and made day after day an a time of prayer, and implored God and his Angels to give them a all one heart, and one mind firmly to oppose by all just and proper means, every injury to the worlds rights. Members of every nation on account of the situation held a meeting, at which they received every nation against Abbiaennia was a rebellion against all of the christian world in general, that it was an attack upon all nations, and that the committee of correspondence should consult the committee of other nations on the subject of holding a general Convention of nations throughout the world and decide whether the nations should intervene against Glandelinia or not. This measure was approved by all the nations of the world, and at the request of Protestantia.

While these meetings were being made news was received of the many battles which had raged around yivian whiskey. It excited the liveliest apprehension. Rumors of the doings of the enemy as uncivilized, brutal, oppressive, and dangerous to the whole world were passed everywhere at a meeting of the Kings and Presidents of all nations over which probably even U.S. Occided, a ball was passed and another added that they would religiously maintain and inviolably adhere to such measures as should be concerted by the general nations in common, for the preservation of the lives of women and children, liberties and fortunes, and the preventing of another such Christmas day. Like meetings were held even in Abbiaennia. There was a general agreement beforehand to abide by the decisions of all christian generals. Meanwhile secretly help was still being sent to the besieged rebels in yivian whiskey. Also came from Calverina, money from other sources, sheep even from Calverina, and supplies from all other parts of the land in possession of rebels through Calverina. Even encouragement to stand firm against the besiegers was sent to yivian whiskey every from every quarter.

One of the greatest meetings of the Angelinian generals themselves occurred December fifteenth 1912 at Carbondaler in a old University. There were also besides the generals one hundred and fifty five delegates present. Indeed it was a very able body, the Angelinian commanders having summoned and picked their very best men.

General Allenburger, Americo, and du Bernard early from Pandora, Harold Pemberton and Frank Fredrickson, from Angelinia Agathia, John Derophia, and Christopher Augustine from Angelinia in junction Angelinia and John Gladors from Glorinanna were among the number if you please to know.

These delegates were chosen in different ways, from Committees, some by the seige assemblies, and others by conventions. The convention however was held with cautious all the members wearing black robes and hoods. It issued an address to all the christian armies besieging yivian whiskey, one to the Abbiaennian government, one to the government of Angelinia, and one to Abyssinkila. A declaration of rights of all kinds for child slaves was also drawn up, and an agreement to use every means to bring about the rescue of as many child slaves as possible. The declaration also recited the various wicked acts of the Glandelinian authorities in yivian whiskey and Norma Catherine, and also declared that the whole of Abbiaennia ought to support in the seige itself. After providing for another meeting to be held on the following month the meeting adjourned.

While this meeting was in session many Angelinians had made raids and forages capturing arms and provisions, the charter rebel government of Glandelinia had been overthrown by the Angelinians, and the real direction of affairs was now in the hands of the Angelinians. By the effects of the raids arms and ammunition and artillery and important stores had been captured at different and various points, and twenty million rebel recruits men on account of the frequent raids were ordered to the front to suppress further raids. General Hanson himself the main commander of the besiegers around the southwestern section of the seige hearing of these proceedings, began to fortify his own works more on the western and eastern sides. And learning that there was a considerable amount of gunpowder and military stores in his front still in the possession of the enemy, about twenty miles from his right wing he determined to seize it if possible. He also had been ordered by general Hanson Angelia Vivian and by the Angelinian and Abbiaennian government to arrest two rebel generals who had committed many untold outrages and to send them to Abyssinkila to be tried for murder and treason.

They were now near Carbondaler and it was evident the foe would hurl immense bodies of troops to take the town if possible.

which for rebel troops were almost impossible.

In the meantime the effects of the yivian wickey seige was even more severe than the whole world believed it to be. Almost all the interest of the whole world with yivian wickey and other C Iverinian ports were connected with the Placid Calverinian zone. Ship building, great commerce, and fishing were the means of the livelihood of most of its own citizens. And almost all of the supplies of Calverinia and Angelinia came to the world through the streams of yivian wickey and from it to and across the sea, and the chief means of communications with the christian and other nations of the world were there.

CHAPTER NINE.

IN MORE ACTIONS AT CARBONDALER IF YOU PLEASE.

Though general Mansions preparations had been made with indeed the most greatest secrecy they were however discovered for many Glandelinian spies were all around watching the doings and finding out the intentions of the Angelinians and general Wyrddn Caldwell a leading rebel of Julio Callio sent general Paul Barker to warn the Glandelinian generals in chief of the approaching danger. It had already been agreed upon that if many forces of Angelinian troops should start by land the signal corps should mount the signal stations and signal with flags but if by water the thunder signal signals should be given.

General Paul left at twelve o'clock at midnight before the proposed concentration or advance of the immense christian troops, he was slowly rowed over the Norma run river and when he landed, he heard many thunder signals and many lights flashing back and forth along the shores of the river on the rebel side itself. Indeed a strong horse was waiting for him and he sprang into the saddle and galloped off. As he dashed along toward his own encampments he was pursued by Angelinian soldiers but nevertheless he got away and roused the rebel troops along the route of his dash making something like a Paul Revere or a Heridan and then he hastened on toward the main rebel lines itself. When told by some one that the Nationals were guarding a portion of the road he was dashing upon he replied:

"To hell with the christian dogs. They will not stay there long when the troops start against the national line. The Abbeinnians are coming to concentrate upon us and we must fight them back. They are coming out from Carbondaler."

They were indeed not far behind the rider himself but when the first column of Angelinians eight hundred and fifty six thousand strong reached the region of the foe lines near the fortress and fortified works of Perophian the rebel troops drawn up in battle line were waiting for them with cannon and machine guns. A desperate attack however was made but the attack was repulsed and during the whole retreat of the christians the Angelinian troops were exposed to a most galling withering fire from behind rocks, trees, houses, snowbanks, and walls, fences, and houses even. The retreat soon became a rout, until the Angelinians were reinforced by other troops from Carbondaler. The fire and pursuit of the rebel troops did not cease until the christian troops were under the cover of the guns of their many warships on the river and the christian batteries on the fortified works and along the eastern shores of the river. In the beginning of this battle the loss of the christian side was one hundred thousand, in killed and wounded, the rebels lost nearly three times as many and one general. The battle of this character raged four hours and a half. At once on account of this occurrence the assemblies of general declared that general Purgatorian ought to be considered and guarded against as an unnatural and inner inveterate foe of all Angelinia. Hundreds of thousands of fresh Angelinian troops hastened to the scene of action, and one wing of the rebels still coming on and having surprised and captured a portion of the christian works were destroyed by the guns on shore and from the ships.

The time for immediate action had now come. While the roar of battle shook the air with redoubled fury as the rebels were storming the christian lines with evident success and carrying all before them and threatening to capture Carbondaler the Angelinian generals who could do so met once more and it was resolved to take up the cause of those fighting near Carbondaler, and on motion of one of the general appointed general James Wood commander of the troops near Carbondaler.

General Wood was one of the many delegates present, he was already known throughout the nation as a successful military man, he had been fifteen years a member of the Government and had been once a member of the ring where he had made a great impression by his old information and sound sense itself. He was fifty three years of age and in the prime of his powers. On his acceptance of the position of commander of these battling troops he refused to receive any pay for his services, through reserving the full right to be paid for his many expenses. At first thought it may indeed seem strange that the rebel troops should again attempt to recapture Carbondaler now one of the most strongest fortified western christian points of the seige in the world. But it appeared to the enemy that general Mansions main christian line was far away, and that it would take a long time for troops to cross the many streams and all the troops and most of the supplies would have to be brought from the extreme right at great expense of heavy losses, time and money. Other Glandelinian armies outside of yivian wickey were for a time of little use to the besieged for they were separated from yivian wickey by a perfect forest of scouting cavalry forces of christians and infantry and smaller armies over a territory a hundred miles wide and nearly much longer, and which for rebel troops were almost impassable without certain destruction.

Besides this the Angelinian armies themselves if you wish to know it were made up of very intelligent men, fighting for a good principal, for their homes and country, and for the freedom of the child slaves. They were moreover fighting on the offensive and under such circumstances the enemy though fewer men were needed, as an invading army of christians must not only attack, but also must hold the country it may conquer. The invaders also have to look out for their supplies, and it is seldom safe to rely upon the enemy's country itself for the support of their troops.

Before general Wood could reach the scene of Carbondaler there had been indeed some hard fighting since the christian onslaught itself had been repulsed. After the retreat of the badly beaten christian troops toward Carbondaler and the pursuit, general Artemus warden the commander of Abyssinkill's troops had learned of the distant disaster and ordering the ships to open fire on the attacking rebels, and the batteries to let go sent a large division of troops under general Orescott to occupy the main christian trenches and relieve those being assaulted by the rebels. General Breeds right wing had already been destroyed by the gunboat and battery fire of the christians in possession of the river shore, and this gave the christians some chance to repel the main force of the assault.

General Gagesent of the enemy had thrown forward nearly six hundred thousand troops in a desperate effort to dislodge the Angelinians and drive them on toward Carbondaler. Along two points the rebel onslaught being six miles long was repulsed with destruction of men and horses combined officers falling like flies, but nevertheless the main line of assault was successful, the ammunition of the artillery men of the position had run out, and the infantry unsupported by their artillery were compelled to retreat. The loss on this day on each side was exceedingly heavy indeed. Among the killed on the christian side was general Warden one of the ablest generals of the country. The first day of the battle confirmed the Angelinians in the course they had taken. General Wood arrived at the headquarters of the beaten army at Cambridge Junction on the evening of the struggle, and assumed the main command. His difficulties were very great. There was hardly any ammunition for his artillery and other troops, the main divisions were too far to the rear to resume the engagement before morning, sorely needed were too far to the rear to resume the engagement before morning, of the men unused to such a staggering defeat were becoming weary of fighting and of the hardships they had to endure, they did not like the strict discipline that came camps, and many were so badly wounded or exhausted from their exertions that they could not hardly stand up and their losses in killed wounded and missing was simply dreadful and Carbondaler was filled with their wounded to almost overflowing. General Wood found the christian army on account of its losses one third smaller than it had been. In spite of these difficulties, though the enemy pressed the assault once more that late evening he was desperate means maintained the second line of positions, and at the same time encouraged and provisioned the troops. Then toward early morning he thought it time to make a counter attack, so he seized aided by main force, all the positions lost that day before and fortified them even amid a hammering storm of shot and shell, and did everything possible which the enemy made frantic efforts to prevent and the carnage was horrible. The rebels then fearing to resume the attack so early and especially fearing to attack these fortified trenches even at the location and Carbondaler was once more free of rebel troops though it cost a third desperate battle to do it.

In the hope of getting more child slaves from the rebels general mansion in the meantime during the fourth day of January sent a large expedition up the Normans gun toward Ivian wicky wickey to capture some of the glandelinian strongholds fronting Andrian in particular, and violet and her sisters then being back in the christian lines they formally went with the expedition to see the sights if possible and spy for the christian cause if necessary. The armies were successful in taking general Montreals positions and a number of cannon, but the desperate attack upon general Quebecks lines was a total disastrous failure, and for thirty miles the Angelinians were driven back with great loss, and for four times during the three days retreat violet and her sisters were slightly wounded in the being captured by the foe and one of the little girls was slain. The failure of this expedition was from three regional reasons I mean. First the assaulting parties were too small. Second the assault upon general quebecks army and its positions was made in a different form than planned and it plundered, and third, the region was separated from the christians by many roving glandelinian savarly and infantry making by their raids and demonstrations the region almost impenetrable.

Meanwhile general Hanson Ivian and even Consentinian Aronburg had refused to hear, or even to receive, the petitions sent to him by certain rebel generals by true bearers, and had many times already issued a strong proclamation against rebellion and sedition and child slavery in general. All of the Angelinian governments supported general Hanson. Ivian and his brother by authorizing him to send more forces to conduct the siege of Ivian wicky, and to hire troops from Abyssinkill and Abbeennia. Trade with glandelinia by her allies was forbidden. Many rebel war ships and transports having been already seized they were used to increase the blockade of all glandelinia seaports, slave trade was forbidden, and everything was done to make the rebellion as short as possible. There was hope of Ivian wicky being captured before the next year was half out for the encouragement was brought on by the recent capture of the section called Anna Aronburg.

On the foist of J n Jamray during a raid by an Angelinian squadron a rebel flag had been captured from a color bearer during a skir skir skirmish, which had in addition to the glandelinian Union, eighty four alternate stripes of eighty four different colors. There was now presented a curious spectacle of indeed a wicked glandelinian Congress in Ivian wicky, fighting against the armies of Our Lord and executing many of the powers of the Devil himself, and yet protesting that

On the foist of J n Jamray during a raid by an Angelinian squadron a rebel flag had been captured from a color bearer during a skir skir skirmish, which had in addition to the glandelinian Union, eighty four alternate stripes of eighty four different colors. There was now presented a curious spectacle of indeed a wicked glandelinian Congress in Vivian wiskey, fighting against the armies of Our Lord and executing many of the powers of the Devil himself, and yet protesting that the rebellion for the maintenance of child slavery was nothing else, and no rebellion Against God as was claimed. by Angelinian generals. he acts of the glandelinians however in allowing all their glandelinian generals to form their own governments in Vivian wiskey, authorizing Angelinian warships or transports to be captured, trying by force to open the courts ports of Vivian wiskey to all wicked Nations, forbidding the child slaves to communicate with christian authorities, and appointing the terrr terrible. eneral yis-Hollaster general to be the ge head leader who was yis-Hollaster, Johnson and others to maintain intercourse with the friends of the glandelinian governments and to stir up all the Galverinians to share in the rebellion and elsewhere seemed to lead to nothing else but the most wicked war ever waged. Thus to go back a little ways again it must be said that in October 1912 the Authorities of Vivian wiskey applied to the glandelinian Continental Congress to be allowed to set up glandelinian governments of their own for each section of Vivian wiskey itself, and in November and December all the glandelinian generals were advised to establish such a form of government as in their judgement will best promote the means to keep child slaves from being seized and taken from th by the nationals and to prevent the happiness of these children, and most effectually prevent the Angelinians from restoring order in other Galverinian Provinces. Both Vivian wiskey, and Andrew received similar advice. Rhode Section by act of its legislature relieved her soldiers from the fortresses and placed fresh troops there and allowed the former garrisons to rest for the time being. In Norma Catherine and other sections, secret Angelinian spies on account of being discovered fled. Now one after another the many sections of Vivian wiskey in possession of the glandelinians either by advice of the glandelinian Congress or by their own action set up governments of their own.

It needed little change to turn all the glandelinian governments into rulers of hell little more in fact than to try and take from God the choice of his children and give their souls to the demons, but in Julio Callo no change was needed except to cease the horrible reign of terror for the present time. One of the earliest formal declarations against the rebellion and the actions of the glandelinians in July in Norma Catherine took place at Charlotte Junction not far from eastern Jennie Vivian. On December 31st the committee of christian generals during a lull in hostilities met and passed a serious resolution it being the most important which declared that all glandelinian soldiers guilty of murder especially of killing children should be treated not as soldiers or prisoners of war but as murderers and assassins, that all the glandelinian Provincial Congresses in Vivian wiskey should be destroyed if possible. Also a set of rules was immediately drawn up to be followed until the christian generals should provide further laws. In Jennie Vivian simultaneously a hot convention in trusted the Angelinian peligates of that section of the army to propose to that respective body to declare anew the Declaration of Freedom for child slaves and so to enforce it.

On Thursday in Jamray the first week general Lee Henry Richardson of Mansions army introduced a resolution in a great meeting of generals all hooded and robed reciting "that all the child slaves and their followers and all children in the possession of the glandelinians of right and a lawful cause ought to be free and independent of all labor and slavery and toil, that they should be and shall be absolved from all the sufferings of slavery, and that all connection between them and glandelinians should be under any conditions whatever totally dissolved.

This was seconded by general Adams Johnstonia Henry. Other Resolutions looking toward foreign alliances, and toward a plan of enforcement were also introduced. As one hot debate, the consideration of the first resolution was postponed for a day. This gave time for the delegates and other Meetings to find out the views of their constituents, and for the whole besieging armies and the National governments to give expression to their wishes.

By the middle of Jamray two of the armies had in one way or another given votes for the wish of the Childrens adoption into families throughout all of Abbeennia and Angelinia. On the first of Feb. the hot debate was begun, and on the second after some more debate the resolution was carried, and on the fifth the Declaration was adopted by the Angelinian generals and signed. It was a curious coincidence that many bells were rung on that day in celebration of the measure "Proclaiming liberty throughout all of the land unto all the inhabitants thereof, for all child slaves held in co possession by the Ange Angelinian rebels".

To a committee of five conventions of which general Linia Sweede, and general Double Day Federal were members was intrusted the duty of preparing a statement of the childrens grievous grievances, and of the resolutions of the Conventions. The well known Angelinian document adopted indeed with but slight alteration was largely the work of general Hanson Vivian himself. The action of the conventions and the reading of the new declaration were received with universal rejoicing. In most cases the soldiers had gone faster than the men of the conventions which simply had been compelled to record the popular desires when they issued the declarations.

The original ep copo copies of the declarations was signed by general Hanson Vivian the President of the Conventions, and by general Robert Robert Vivian. The parchments were also signed by all of the members on the same day, though others signed still later, one of the signers not being a member when the oaths were taken. While the signing was going on general Hanson said: "We must be completely unanimous; there must be no pulling different ways during this war, we must in this siege work together." "Yes," said his brother general Robert Lyman. "We must all work together, for to work separately will mean disaster and the abandonment of the siege on entirely."

CHAPTER XXV.

HANSON PLANS A FIERCE EFFORT TO CAPTURE ANDREAN.

The Angelinians had left Carbondale in the possession of strong troops, Anna Aronburg was also strongly garrisoned and all the important points in the Red Riding Hood Woods and along the gunbeam Creek was also in their possession, and they now had no intentions whatever of giving it up. General Lyman knowing that general Hanson was preparing an advance upon Aurandocille though while he would operate against that point it would be a good point in the middle sections of the siege, Andean a more promising field for attack with his own troops. If he could capture Andean he would soon have the besieged surely at his mercy. All of the surviving inhabitants of Andean who had fled for shelter from that terrible conflagration were eager to side with the glandelinians, than were the loyal glandelinians of other sections, and much might be hoped from the loyalists both in the way of great influence, and of direct secret aid. If Andean could be secured a way could be found to cut off the enemy's full water supply and probably disconnect the tunnels as well as her sisters had declared one was in Andean.

By this action also the besieged could be fully divided, and has the enemy had their navy elsewhere just now it might be more effectual in separating the northern and southern sections of Lyman. Key from the rest. Moreover north of Lyman Key the Norma Run river for a long distance was the main route to Calverine and was a full dividing line between Lyman Key, and Calverine, and the rest of the Calverinian country in the hands of the rebellious Angelinians. So in the month of December or January I mean general Hanson sent general James Wood and Linia Sweede from Halifax, and Nova Scotian and these troops started on the drive against Andean as soon as possible.

Lyman-Hollister Johnston of the enemy had discovered this conspiracy and his troops having moved as soon as it was known had already occupied with other armies the city of Andean and its outer limits and all the works outside the city and forts were more strongly garrisoned and possessed. He had about twenty five million troops, but it seemed as if they were going to be ill prepared to meet the Angelinian regulars, their ammunition was slightly exhausted, many of the soldiers were still disabled from wounds, their rifles were poor, and many were ill-informed inhabitants of Lyman Key who were glandelinians and being only in the army a month knew only a little of real war or of even military aid and drill.

General James Wood and Linia Sweede was soon a reinforced by the arrival of general Great Heart and Dare Not Lie, and a fleet of Angelinian gunboats, battleships, and Merrimacs. Before beginning hostilities in general the Angelinians again issued a proclamation offering protection to all child slaves that would try and desert the enemy and come over to the Christian lines when they saw the opportunity. The Christian generals were also instructed to do all in their power to keep the loyal Calverinians at peace if possible, but it was hard for them to know with whom to treat. They could not approach the glandelinian Congress for they did not recognize that wicked body and tribunal. They had tried once to open communication with the inhabitants through wireless but general Lyman-Hollister Johnston discovered all the wireless messages and nothing came of these attempts so far. Meantime the Christian forces had been receiving strong additions until their forces amounted to over thirty million men. General Lyman-Hollister Johnston had been fortifying his positions as thoroughly as possible. He held also Island No. nine and from the heights of Angelina commanded the whole city of Andean. The division of the glandelinian army was which under general Inner Myllete held this important post was attacked by a strong force of Christians thrown forward by Linia Sweede. The battle was considerably heavy, many hundreds of cannons were used on both sides, and firing was incessant. The battle raged all day and Inner Myllete was defeated, and half his army destroyed or captured. With great skill general Lyman-Hollister Johnston opened his own line into bloody action and thus covered the retreat of Inner Myllete and then with great skill brought his main troops over to the main land, but the whole right of the war had to be completely evacuated. At the same time general Wood held a formal conference with general Lyman-Hollister Johnston, but nothing was accomplished. The battle must go on. After the complete evacuation of Island No. nine general Lyman-Hollister Johnston held the highlands north of the city cutting off all communications with a all of General Wood's army. In order to be ready to defend other sections of Andean, he crossed a portion of the army at night over the river, leaving a large garrison in Fort G. Caldwell on the east banks of the river. This fort he had the no more of the Garrison of seeing surrendered to the Angelinians, though after a brave defense.

General Wallis corner one of general Woods aids at the same time cross the river on pontoons to attack the glandelinians and Lyman-Hollister Johnston who now had lost nearly three million men in prisoners and killed and wounded and missing, was compelled to withdraw slowly before the advancing Christians one of his divisions and even to see them he was compelled to cross the river and be driven from their works. This was late however in the night. The glandelinian Congress in Andean in the general gloom had given general Lyman-Hollister Johnston greater powers and hastily leaving Andean had gone to Norma Catherine. Everywhere the roar of battle was heard resounding terrifically loud, as other rebel divisions refused to yield their ground, and many child slaves had already been rescued and were placed under the protection of the Angelinians.

After crossing the Norma Run, the small force of glandelinians was increased to about sixty five million. The immense forces of Christians followed general Lyman-Hollister Johnston, gained possession of all the territory within sight of Andean, and would have crossed to the west bank banks of the river had not general Lyman-Hollister Johnston so secured all the boats for miles above and below Norma's Bridge and destroyed all the small bridges and secured possession of all the pontoons. General Lyman-Hollister Johnston now was compelled upon a bold stroke to stop the advance of the Christians. With two million five hundred thousand men, on Christmas night, he recrossed the Norma Run by means of Norma's Bridge, marched ten miles through a heavy snowstorm to Jennie Gauderburg, surprised the rear of the immense Christian force under general Wood, captured many prisoners and drove the main line back upon the river in great confusion. For three hours he had regained and retained the location he had captured but being threatened by general Greatheart, he gave some resistance and then was forced to retreat to the supporting column under general Princeton. The first the Angelinians knew then of this movement was the sound of great numbers of cannon in the distance and the roar of exploding of shell and heavy firing. General Greatheart was forced to follow, to protect his main stores and to avoid losing communication with Jennie Lyman. He therefore on the following morning made a desperate assault upon the whole of Lyman-Hollister Johnston's lines and during the sanguinary fray captured general Philadelphia's army of ninth corps but the main assault was repulsed with terrible loss as Lyman-Hollister Johnston's main position appeared to be too strong to be attacked with evident success. Nevertheless should the Angelinians make a detour and advance toward Andean Section by the north or west it would be at the risk of a dangerous flank movement on the part of Lyman-Hollister Johnston. The Angelinians however were not idle, for during the early morning after the bloody repulse a great number of surrounding expeditions were sent out from Jennie Lyman and elsewhere into the surrounding country, and much damage was done within an hour.

They captured Newporters brigade of gunnermen and held that position thus secured through the remainder of the siege. Much of the tremendous misfortune of the glandelinians in the early part of the battle seemed to have been due to two causes:

1. The first the interference of the Angelinian generals with the plans of Lyman-Hollister Johnston, second the treachery of one of the rebel generals, who was to have been next to Lyman-Hollister Johnston in rank, and exceedingly jealous of him. Early that same morning general Marquis came up the river with a strong fleet of the rebel navy to offer aid to Lyman-Hollister Johnston and help him prevent the capture of Andean. He came in a flag ship fitted out at his own expense, and followed by transports loaded with soldiers and military stores for the glandelinians themselves. Meanwhile during the progress of the battle two hours later when it had become more general all along the lines and the rebel fleets lined in with their big guns making a tremendous din, stirring events were taken place south of Andean. The Angelinians in carrying out their plans sent also two strong expeditions from Jennie Lyman, one under general Richardson Hindernine to open communications with the Christian lines and Andean, for the glandelinians still held possession of the Norma Run river above Andean, the other under general Hindler St. Claire to central Andean, to reduce that part of the rebel territory to submission at all costs and then to unite with Hindernine. Hindernine's force consisted of about 10,000,000 men of whom seven million were regular troops, and the rest Calverinians and Abyssinkillians. He was successful in making an assault in which he took fortress Rosemary a new rebel fort just constructed before December. He then amid the dreadful resistance he met continued to advance toward the Norma Run with the purpose of joining an army which general Greatheart was to send up the Norma Run to meet him. He expected in this way to get the rebel forces defending Andean between two immense armies, and either cause their capture or completely annihilate them. The glandelinian forces under general Hindernine only about four million strong, after strong opposition of about two hours were forced to retreat, but they destroyed all the bridges, cut down scores of hundreds of thousands of trees by blasting and other work, and obstructed all the roads by abatis.

General Hindernine trusting in God and confident of success, sent a detachment against general Vermonite who held a long line of works protected by abatis of big trees and cotton looms and bayonets and everything else to make a formidable obstruction, in the hope of gaining that part of the rebel line so as to cut off communication of the rebels with the main line. But this assault as well as that of Hindernine was a complete and bloody failure. Two great assaults were made upon the abatis and the assault were repulsed and the abatis clogged with the fallen. Hindernine was losing great numbers of men in these assaults, and the militia was swelling the rebel troops confronting him in that fiery fray. So force was the firing of both sides that the abatis was hacked and torn and the brush fairly stripped off in many places by canister bullets and shells, and the smoke was as thick as if there had been a forest fire. The battle of Andean was far from their being stubbornly contested. The Angelinians under Hindernine were far from their main base of supplies, and could hear nothing of general Greathart. To arrive back the ferocious Angelinians seemed the most feasible plan, but in the attempt to carry it out general Hindernine was checked in two desperate charges made by the Angelinians under general S. Saratoga. Men on both sides fell in thousands per volley, but nevertheless the Christian armies could not be dislodged though one division under general Foster with about six million men was almost captured a part forced to surrender either for saving their lives or from cowardice to general Gatters whom the Angelinian authorities had put most unfairly in the place of general Ferer. The credit to the organization the opposition to Hindernine's advance was due to general Mic-Hollester Johnston himself. The blunder of general Great heart in not advancing to meet general Hindernine, had a very serious consequence for the cause of the struggle. It led to the surrender of one of the Christian brigades and their general, and it was not until eight days had elapsed till the reason of general Greathart's action was explained. General Lee Charlsson had been surprised and captured by the Angelinians during the time of one of the fierce onslaughts upon Mic-Hollester Johnston's main line. Though a of one of the fierce onslaughts upon Mic-Hollester Johnston's main line. Though a Angelinian he secretly afterward tendered his services fully to the Christians, and advised general Greathart to take Andean, the rebel capital of Vivian valley, which would possibly destroy the whole rebel go Congress and governments in which would possibly destroy the whole rebel go Congress and governments in Vivian valley, and also to send an expedition up the Norma gun and other Vivian and Winkey rivers and delthas to prevent other rebel garrisons from Nor-a Catherine and other sections of the city from sending aid. This traitor general not having a high opinion of general Mic-Hollester Johnston's generalship believed this could have been done without much direct difficulty. Greathart however he thought would be more than a match for the whole Angelinian army. General Greathart whether by the traitors' advice or not, did not and could not go to meet and hold general Hindernine that day. Mic-Hollester Johnston however had chosen his position so skillfully, that though general Greathart to cover the retreat of general Woods flanked columns dared attacked, and made great efforts to prevent the rebels from taking him in the rear.

The struggle raged all that horrible morning with dreadful fury but the skillful generalship of Mic-Hollester Johnston was never more clearly shown than at this critical time. At this point general Mic-Hollester Johnston only had in his front only eleven million men against general Greathart's eighteen million thrown forward in the morning assaults, but seeing it was necessary to make an effort to defend Andean he had chosen his position and placed his forces with great skill and in the terrific conflict which raged from seven o'clock until noon without ceasing over a ten mile front general Greathart's right wing was crushed and driven back with heavy loss but in retreated retreated in such good order that it was four hours later before the rebels could enter the abandoned Christian works. General Greathart was wounded slightly in this part of the terrible struggle where he greatly distinguished himself by his skill and bravery though six horses were shot under him. The first general action of the battle of Andean was of great service to the Angelinian army for though a defeat for temporal time it proved that the Angelinian regulars could stand against any storming fire of the rebel lines. But on account of the disaster to the right wing however there was nothing to encourage the Angelinians, and to outward appearances the cause of the struggling armies seemed hopeless. Early in the afternoon about two o'clock general Greathart made a desperate attempt to recover the lost ground on his right, possibly influenced by the traitors' advice, and so he brought up his new divisions and attacked general Delaware John. His troops on sweeping forward to the assault could not pass the rebel obstructions along the works and so while the main force laid down and opened a general fire, the rest recoiled to the rear and reaching Sunbeam Creek, went up that stream's banks as far as Jennie Vivian then pushed on northward and started for the rear of the rebel lines.

When general Mic-Hollester Johnston learned of this he broke up the encampments on his rear, and sent forces to protect general Delaware John while other troops hurried to intercept the Christian army before it could reach Delaware's rear.

The plan was came up at the very moment and made an attack upon the foe in that quarter. Though well planned the attempt was a failure, and the battle was so severe that the smoke was like a heavy fog, and then the two divisions of troops which had been sent to intercept the Christians fell upon them on flank and front simultaneously throwing the attacking forces into the wildest confusion. The flankiers could do little more and retreated all the way to Jennie Vivian where the rebels dared not follow. Delaware and his troops though repelling another assault still remained in the captured works on Greathart's right though by the assault, and losses the rebel army was much decimated and annoyed. The condition of the battling Angelinian troops was deplorable and shut in on the south and west by assaulting columns of the greatest strength and lying open to the attacks of Greathart and suffering. The soldiers thus cut off became a synonym for slaughter sorrow and annihilation and so many men became unfit for duty on account of wounds received that they laid down to die in the deep cold snow, and many were barefooted and otherwise naked but still they fought on.

It was a disgraceful punishment to the rebels that this suffering was occasioned not by lack of means itself but due to the interference of the Christian generals to prevent them from obtaining supplies. Even Mic-Hollester Johnston's correspondents showed how often during the battle he was hampered and his well laid plans brought to naught by the Christian action. Members of the Angelinian congress itself sponsored general Delaware for not doing which the Christians themselves kept him from attacking Andean off his main lines. That general Mic-Hollester Johnston

POSITION FIRST WAS SHOWN AND THEN RETURN FIRE WAS GALLING THE SHIPS AND FAIRLY TEARING AND DAMAGING THE REBELS. AS IT WAS DECIDED TO MOVE FURTHER OFF AND ATTACK GENERAL NEWPORTS REBEL SAILED ON SHORE WHICH WAS ALSO HELD BY THE ENEMY. BUT OWING TO A PERFECT STORM OF SHELLS AND SHOT AND HIGH EXPLOSIVES AND ATTACKED BY REBEL FLEETS AND SUBMARINES, was the firing of both sides that the abatis was hacked and torn and the breaches fairly stripped off in many places by canister bullets and shells, and the smoke was as thick as if there had been a forest fire. The battle of Andean was certainly the most stubbornly contested. The Angelinians under Windermere were far from their duty on account of wounds received that they laid down to die in the deep woods and many were barefooted and otherwise naked but still they fought on. It was a disgraceful punishment to the rebels that this suffering was occasioned not by lack of means itself but due to the interference of the christian generals to prevent them from obtaining supplies. Even Mic-Hollester Johnstone corresponded showed how often during the battle he was hampered and his well laid plans brought to naught by the christian action. Members of the glandelinian congress itself answered general Delaware for not doing which the christians themselves kept him from doing, though cutting off his gull supplies, that general Mic-Hollester Johnstone was attempting to furnish no readily. General Washington Benjamin declared;

"The northern armies of glandelinians under general Mic-Hollester Johnstone have shown us all what Glandelinian armies are capable of doing with general Mic-Hollester Johnstone at their head. The spirit of the southern armies of Vivian Wickkey is no in no way inferior to the spirit of Mic-Hollester Johnstone. Another general like Mic-Hollester Johnstone, or a Manley would in a very few days render all of the besieged an irresistible body of men that would in the shortest time possible render the siege of Vivian Wickkey a total failure and drive off the christian dogs."

However general Greatheart was a seeming and ambitious man. He had succeeded in pushing so far, he now tried to thrash general Delaware. All through the afternoon many attempts were made upon Delaware. A prominent actor in one of these plots was an officer named general Gannon an American Irish man who had volunteered in the Angelinian army. It would have probably succeeded immediately but through the general being severely wounded during one of the frays the effort though desperate, wild in fury, and most dogged and determined failed most ignominiously, and most of those officers and leaders who were concerned in this most desperate movement of the whole war so far were either killed or wounded and the christian losses something dreadful now. The second stage of the bloody battle was now reached.

GENERAL FRANCE SUPPORTS GENERAL GREATHEART.

HE RELIEVES GREATHEART TO GO AND DRESS HIS WOUNDS.
THE PROGRESS OF THE BATTLE OF ANDREAN.

UP TO THIS TIME THE CONFLICT had been between general Mic-Hollester Johnstone and general Greatheart, other divisions and brigades were now drawn in, and the struggle became very furious and losses occurred by the wholesale. And if the surrender of a brigade of christian troops had cheered the hearts of the despised glandelinians, it had brought dismay and ferocity to the Angelinians and they were fighting with ferocity to revenge this blow. Indeed this long battle of Andean as it was called had been considered as one of the most decisive battles of not only the war but of the whole world, because for either one side or the other it proved to be the turning point of the issue at Andean. General Greatheart who had been wounded had long wished to revenge himself for the loss of his positions on his right wing, he though being relieved for a while had been sending more and more troops, and on the news of the surrender of one of his brigades he had listened to the advice of general Gannon and so sent a strong christian fleet and another army of four million men. General Maurice Costello soon came up with his divisions and joined Greatheart's successor and in an hour another half hour general Holland came up with his divisions and then the concentration upon the enemy was surely becoming heavy and the battles fury something horrible in ferocity and wild nature. Among the Angelinians the immediate effect of the arrival of the reinforcements was the inspiring of the f the disheartened defeated christian troops on Greatheart's right with more renewed courage, and make them rally. It also led to the evacuation of one of the works on Greatheart's right by the rebels for the glandelinians fearing that the approaching christian fleets would steam up the river and storm their rear with shells and high explosives, general Mic-Hollester Johnstone ordered that section of the army back to the former positions which was of more value to them than the works they had taken. The pushing of new christian troops also divided the attention of general Delaware and kept him from increasing his troops in numbers upon his assailants. It also greatly helped the other situation of the battle. After the complete evacuation of the works on Greatheart's right wing at about four o'clock general Mic-Hollester Johnstone to cover his withdrawal that is the withdrawal of Delaware fell upon the advancing christians under general Gannon. Had it not been for the death of general Charles Insurboe the glandelinians would in this most desperate of charges gained a complete victory. But on account of such a tragedy the attacking column fell back into confusion and was broken to pieces by the terrific christian artillery and musketry fire until half of the column of rebels was mowed down all the way to their own works a fearful slaughter indeed. During the time the rebels retreated, general Hanson and Maurice Costello took up his old position on the right of Greatheart's army their line extending along the highlands as far as Morris's army of Abyssinians. The Angelinians though winning their own ground back again and gained nothing nevertheless as far as their plans were concerned, the rebels had ravaged their lines most horribly, and treated the christian prisoners brutally. At this time the fleet of ships arrived and the four million men. The expedition of ships came to the rear of the foe position first and shelled the rebel cannons and fairly tearing and damaging the whole fleet return fire was calling the ships and fairly tearing and damaging the whole fleet as it were it was decided to move further off and attack general Newport's rebel fleet on shore which was also held by the enemy. But owing to a perfect storm of shells and shot and high explosives and attacked by rebel fleets and submarines, the attempt exceedingly bloody was a failure and the Angelinian commander of the fleet on str. steamed to better shelter. During the same time elsewhere there were thousands of plundering expeditions and many experiences of the horrors of the extensive battle of Misran. A force of glandelinians and Mic-Hollsterians under the leadership of general Jerry putleron and prantier came from the distant fortress of Lucillie. He sent pickets and attacked a portion of general Mauro Maurice Costelloes troops and butchered many children they had captured during the confusion of the assault and would have laid waste to the whole christian encampment of barracks and tents had not the assault been repulsed. The same time another of the rebel generals destroyed the christian encampment near Cherry run and drove the christians back in confusion. There were other attacks upon Maurice Costelloes lines which resulted in massacres of rebel troops from the christian fire only less horrible, because fewer soldiers assaulted. All the assaults met disastrous repulses.

War demands retaliation and so at five o'clock in the evening or late afternoon general Maurice Costello sent general Sullivan with a force of Abyssinkilians against the attackers. The object of this counter assault was in Maurice Costelloes own words: "To carry the fighting shot the very heart of the enemy's position, to cut off their encampments, destroy all their tents barracks and all supplies, and to do every other mischievous thing that circumstances will permit. The enemy's positions and encampments was not to be merely run over but destroyed. The counter attack at that had completed the entire destruction of that rebel encampment and driven all the rebel troops with the loss of all the child a slave captives from the region. The Angelinians in this struggle which was desperate in the extreme and which took five charges to accomplish the work rescued nearly twenty thousand child slaves boys and girls from five to ten years old. Elsewhere however the rebel raba ravages had continued and spread to a greater degree. In this engagement general Mic-Hollster Johnston was accused of bringing on the Angelinian troops the merciless Gargolinn Infantry whose known rule of warfare against christians was an undistinguished destruction or enslavement of all children of all ages and conditions. It was also a complaint that all became the glandelinian Congresses at Vivian Wickey, wicked and blood thirsty criminals released from all glandelinian prisoners had been inducted as 'glandelinian minutemen and also the rebel Congress had resolved that it was highly expedient to engage all released criminals in the service of the united glandelinian armies in the effort to carry on the bloody rebellion. So before this battle even had raged months before the thousands of criminals wherever they would had been authorized to employ hundreds of thousands of criminals wherever they would be most useful, and also to offer them a reward of one hundred dollars for every commissioned officer captured and thirty dollars for every private soldier of the Angelinian troops that they would take as prisoners into Vivian Wickey, and four hundred dollars for every child slain or taken as a slave.

CHAPTER TWELVE.

THE ANDREAN NAVAL ENGAGEMENT.

The glandelinians for the time being had sent very few ships to support general Mic-Hollster Johnston in repelling Greathearts attacks but on the afternoon of the first general engagement of the battle the rebel Congress began to commission many of the rebel ships that could be spared from Vivian Wickey. The most successful commander of any of these fleets was Admiral Aluman who however was a regularly commissioned officer in the glandelinian navy entirely. During his fighting down the river to help Mic-Hollster Johnston he took any opposing christian ships, and even attacked christian dreadnaughts with evident success. In this terrible conflict on the river in the rear of the attack christian lines, he engaged a whole christian fleet of two thousand dreadnaughts, two hundred Merrimac's and a hundred gunboats. Two two fleets came so close to gether that every side was shot broadside to broadside and in the desperate fighting the christian fleet was repulsed but not before the glandelinian admiral had lost three thousand out of his three thousand one hundred and one men. Even his flag ship had been so injured that it was sinking and he had to transfer everything including his wounded men to one of his good ships. As many as five hundred Angelinian ships were fairly destroyed. The damage done to the christian fleet can be imagined from the fact that the christian admiral condemned eight hundred and eighteen of his surviving ships. It had been estimated that on the christian fleet over seventy thousand men were engaged in this naval battle and the largest number of his wounded and killed was about forty one thousand to forty seven thousand, of which thirty seven thousand were the wounded, and the others killed, while the average number of those who were normally in the service in the other christian fleet that did not have the chance to join in the struggle was a out thirty two thousand. The christian armies had many hairbreadth escapes during this engagements, and one admiral and his whole crew was captured but afterwards time by another christian warship was rescued with the capture of their captor. During the slow retreat the fleet was often that day attacked by rebel batteries on shore but escaped. The noise of this conflict had been simply dreadful and could not be described.

The loud thunder of so many thousands of guns fairly shook the water so that all fishes were killed, all window windows in houses of houses that survived the one hundred million dollar fire were shattered, Noran Catherine also suffered losses.

THE ATTACK IN THE SOUTH.

all day of hard fighting at the risk of enormous losses christian lines retreated in some but the child slaves had not been retaken though the christians retreated in some disorder through the passage ways and fought every inch of the way of retreat. The streets was paved with dead and wounded city rebels and sympathizers.

the attempt exceedingly bloody was a failure and the Angelinian commander of the fleet on straggled to better shelter. During the same time elsewhere there were thousands of plundering expeditions and many experiences of the horrors of the but after some time by another christian warship was rescued with the capture of their captor. During the slow retreat the fleet was often that day attacked by rebel batteries on shore but unengaged. The noise of this conflict had been simply dreadful and could not be described.

The loud thunder of so many thousands of guns fairly shook the water so that all fishes were killed, all window panes in houses that survived the one hundred million dollar fire were shattered, Norm gathering also suffered losses and trees were shattered of their branches.

During the evening of that terrible day many more terrible christian attacks came upon certain portions of the Angelinian positions, and so many fell that the rebels were getting discouraged, but nevertheless general Mic-Hollester Johnston maintained his position in the face of difficulties which all men and best ones at that would have thought completely insurmountable. On one occasion a portion of his troops was driven in confusion across a flooded part of the country when during the battle the Angelinians burst a levee, the water being bitterly cold, but while his men were in water small floating ice cakes often up to their necks, general Mic-Hollester Johnston dashed in among them, and enduring hardships almost innumerable that awful evening succeeded in rallying the trop troops and brought them back, and through his skill and perseverance, drove the christian back after a horrible conflict in which he himself narrowly escaped being shot.

One of the greatest difficulties before the rebel Angelinian Continental Congress was that of bringing forward sufficient troops necessary for reinforcing general Mic-Hollester Johnston and supplying paper money for their services. It was quite likely that had the great Angelinian Congress attempted at that time to bring up much artillery and machine guns for the support of Mic-Hollester Johnston the battle would have probably been more successful than it was, but this attempt had not been immediately made. Yet the plan already familiar to the Angelinian generals who had lost so heavily in the struggle was followed, of issuing as many troops as only called for at times only, promises of supplies on demand after a certain hour. Accordingly the more discouraging the prospect and prospect the less willing would soldiers want to fight especially when at such heavy loss. Already since July it is probable in this story that on the rebel side alone nearly twenty millions had either fallen or were taken prisoners or deserted. It was useless for general Mic-Hollester Stanok to allow soldiers to go home when they pleased for it was perilous to the city, and now with the loss of gunnery it did seem as if the resistance against the siege was worthless. If Andren fell all was lost. The whole country or city of Andren was flooded with Angelinian wounded and dying soldiers from wounds was common. Soon after the beginning of hostilities at Andren the Angelinian Congress had tried to draw troops from Mic-Hollester Stanok, particularly from Purgatorian, and Purgatorian, but these generals being shell shocked of their positions and forts and harassed by christian batteries too countantly to release any amount of troops were slow to lend men for the defense of Andren, troops could be only sent on very necessary conditions and could not have been secured at all without the personal aid of such generals as Isner, Myletze and Adams Johnson. Much of the aid given by Mic-Hollester Stanok was given with the purpose of injuring general Hanson. For general Mic-Hollester Johnston this was poor security indeed, but partly through christian opposition and a desire to see him humbled general Mic-Hollester Stanok petitioned about eleven million unengaged men which was of great help to general Mic-Hollester Johnston, indeed had it not been for this, Andren would have fallen easily and Mic-Hollester Johnston and his whole army would have been forced to surrender. On that second day of this most tremendous conflict the outlook for general Mic-Hollester's army had been for a time most gloomy indeed. Just toward the evening after the second day of the contest general Mic-Hollester Johnston had wrote to general Mic-Hollester Stanok:

"I must have about 10,000,000 more men or a large number of my wounded soldiers will have to go to fight. The situation is desperate and Greatheart has retaken his positions on the right and repulsed and punished me everywhere."

This was one of Mic-Hollester Johnston's perseverance and success. Had it not been for his relieving the needed reinforcements on time that 1st bloody afternoon been for his relieving the needed reinforcements on time that 1st bloody afternoon it was hard to see how the battle could have succeeded so far that day. So fierce had been some of the christian attacks during that day and so many rebel soldiers had fallen every hour or even minute that it seemed as if Andren was about to be lost that day itself and just in time the needed reinforcements had come. Even early that fearful evening the rebel militia had been captured and forces of christians even had broke into Andren itself through one of the secret passages discovered and had started to march through the streets to compel the Angelinian Congress there to surrender the city, and on the march seizing all child slaves they had found hiding in the ruins of burned blackened buildings. The rebel Congress had sent Gendarmes and cavalry to meet them and even child slave masters had come out to reject the invaders. The movement was repulsed after the soldiers had driven the christians from street to street, and from one ruin after another after all day of hard fighting at the risk of enormous losses a unbelievable number but the child slaves had not been retaken though the christians retreated in some disorder through the passage ways and fought every inch of the way of retreat. The streets was paved with dead and wounded city rebels and sympathizers.

This instance was but among many that day. All through this period the patience of general Mic-Hollester Johnston was marvelous. After the second day of the frightful conflict both the christian and the rebel armies had remained during the night comparatively quiet, only a few skirmishes every now and then taking place. Below Andean Point there was a fortress called Andean Madwell, the rebels had taken it on the capture of Andean. That same evening general Myner Antonio of the christian side stormed and retook it at the point of the bayonet. A large number of rebel prisoners were taken and a great quantity of military stores but as the Angelinians were not able to hold the place it was destroyed by fire and shell explosion. The enemy positions were blown up by mines. Even in that very same day general Mic-Hollester Johnston barely escaped a great disaster.

General Ah Amilewad who had shown himself one of the bravest of the Glandelinian commanders was wounded in the leg during the afternoon of the struggle, and unfitted for service in the field. General Mic-Hollester Johnston who had a most high opinion of Ah Amilewad's ability, seeing him unable to serve in the field on account of his wound appointed him to the command of Andean and the loyal inhabitants in the city section after its evacuation by the recently attacking christians. Despite his ability general Ah An is said to have been unfortunate in getting into serious quarrels with the many child slave masters who had been less cruel to children, and because he tried to have the child slaves crushed down into bondage he made many enemies among the more better overseers. The Glandelinian congress hearing of the trouble that occurred then ill will to appoint Ju Junior men over the overseers and this caused them ill will.

He had also learned that most of the overseers lived extravagantly on the money made from the child slaves instead of saving it and using it for the support of the rebels resisting the siege, and that also one of the overseers by the name of Mic-Hollester (the same one as Violet and her sisters had encountered) had associated with christian commissioners in secret, and had married an Angelinian officer's daughter. He was also accused by the city government of dishonesty to the cause by being too easy with the little Vivian girl girls who through his fault they escaped during the conflagration which swept two thirds of the city, and of many indiscretions. He was at that time finally acquitted of the serious charges one week before the battle began but was as a man sentenced to be reprimanded for the others by Mic-Hollester Johnston.

MIC-HOLLESTER'S TREASON.

The day of the battle itself was one of the first darkest periods of the great Lucilla's sixteen years and this man and overseer Mic-Hollester Jensen as his full name was realized that through another year or more the struggle against the siege would surely be hopeless. Though at the time holding tens of thousands of child slaves in his possession he was not in favor of the rebellion, and there seemed little doubt that he applied for the overseeing of nearly thirty thousand child slaves all girls only with the intention of betraying general Mic-Hollester's battered army to the Abbiearmians. In order to complete the plans for giving up the section and Andean, the christian general through Violet and her sisters advising him sent major general Andean Hanson to treat with Mic-Hollester. Hanson visited Mic-Hollester after getting into the foe's lines that night and the plans were completed. Through a series of mishaps one of Hanson's companions was captured by a squad of Gergolians, and the treasonable plan fully discovered.

Mic-Hollester and Hanson heard of the full failure in time to fight their way through the enemy line and escape but the one captured christian soldier was tried by a Glandelinian court-marshal, found guilty of being a spy's assistance, and sentenced to be sent to the Blengilgo Blengilgomen Islands for fifteen years imprisonment. No incident in the siege caused more comment than this; the opinion expressed by a recent christian officer himself giving the commonly received judgement of the present day: "The justice of his sentence was severely denied. He was treated by the Glandelinian Court Marshal as a criminal and not a spy."

CHAPTER THIRTEEN.

THE ATTACK IN THE SOUTH.

The failure of the christians in the middle sections of Mic-Hollester's army made general Mu Maurice Costello turn to the south Mic-Hollester's left wing or right wing I mean, here was much for a time to encourage them there. Ann Aronbury was their theirs, the southern section was thinly garrisoned, and could not make much resistance, the child slaves were more numerous and likely to be a great hindrance to their owners and rebel soldiers in case of active hostilities. The southern part of the rebel line had suffered little from the battle since the attack on general Charles Lines early in the morning which only lasted an hour. From this territory general Mic-Hollester Johnston had drawn many supplies and troops to repel the christian attack on the centre center, and more over it was believed that most of the surviving Andean inhabitants were very inward toward the child slave cause as there was without question a large number of christian and Angelinian Calvinists among them. So late in the night the Angelinians sent from Jennie Vivian a short expedition against general Savannah troops and soon captured a portion of his works. In the early morning beginning the third day of the contest the Angelinians succeeded in shutting up general Savannah the rebel commander and he was forced to surrender after an hours desperate fight before sunrise. General Clintonia the main christian commander of this expedition himself took part in the attack on the southern wing. Leaving general Fredrick Vance in charge of those forces, general Cio Clintonia returned to Maurice Costello's command to DIFFICULTIES EVERYWHERE ON ACCOUNT OF THE WAR, AND THE SLICE OF VIVIAN RICKY.

The bloody battle to an immediate close and end in the capture of Andean.

This instance was but among many that day. All through this period the patience of general Mic-Hollester Johnston was marvelous. After the second day of the frightful conflict both the christian and the rebel armies had remained during the night comparatively quiet, only a few skirmishes every now and then taking place. Below Androm Point there was a fortress called Androm Madrell, the rebels had taken it on the capture of Vivian Wickay. That even evening general Sawyer Antonides of the christian side stormed and retaken it at the point of the bayonet. A large number of rebel prisoners were taken and a great quantity of military stores but as the Angelinians were not able to hold the place it was destroyed by fire and shell explosives.

There was no doubt the child gave cause as there was without question a large number of christian and Angelinian Silverlinians among them. So late in the night the Angelinians sent from Jamie Vivian a short expedition against general savannah troops and soon captured a portion of his works. In the early morning beginning the third day of the contest the Angelinians succeeded in shutting up general Savannah the rebel commander and he was forced to surrender after an hours desperate fight before sunrise. General Clinton the main christian commander of this expedition himself took part in the attack on the southern wing. Leaving general Fredrick Hanco in charge of these forces, general Cio Clinton returned to Maurice postello's command to give him aid in case he resumed the attack upon the centre. The Angelinians now had complete control of the region in front of the rebels south wing and many marauding expeditions from both sides went up and down the region pillaging and destroying and fighting before daybreak there was successes and defeats on both sides during that early morning.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN.

DE LA WARRERS PATIANG. GENERAL HICKADEE POWARD.

In the meantime general Delewarer who still had possession of some of the christian works again offered serious resistance on the morning of the third day and received reinforcements under general gandon. Here though he had fully twice as many men as the christian troops he was badly defeated and he himself mortally wounded. A large force of his troops were captured militia however and though they fought desperately they could not hold the works and before the irresistible christian onslaught fled after firing their last volleys at the nationalists. General Delewarer was compelled to leave a company of his men to join the fugitives by his generals, and these rebel armies hardly paused in their rapid flight until some seven miles distant from this place fierce and disastrous scenes of battle, their whole region was early in the morning was now in full possession of christian control, there was no organized army large enough to oppose the christian advance just then in either of the location and even before the retreat was fully stopped by Mic-Hollester Johnston general Delewarer died of his wounds.

General Hickadee Poward by the advice of Johnston was sent to take the place of the dead general. Immediately the change of armies was soon felt in the conduct of the diversion. General Poward immediately set to work to reorganize the state stricken troops and rally them as quickly as possible. In the meantime the rebels had been successful in surprising and capturing a christian force at King's plantation junction near Androm, and another force under general Cowpens was also attacked and badly beaten. As for the first hour receiving no reinforcements general Poward was too weak to attack general Grouthearts right wing under Maurice postello and so was compelled to retreat still further but resisted the christian force successfully. General Maurice postello's right wing followed, as general Poward had hoped. General Clifford Green arrived in time to reinforce general Poward and so they stopped the retreat but after half an hour's sharp conflict, the rebels again had to retreat, leaving general Maurice postello in possession of the newly contested field, but now the christian loss on the right wing was so terrible, heavy that general Maurice postello could not continue to pursue the gandalinians who had withdrawn in good order. Though nominally defeated general Poward had succeeded in his purpose. He had drawn the christian right wing far from his lines of supplies. General Maurice postello had made a movement to unite with the other christian force now under general Willington with the determination to open communication with the christian fleet and notify general Mansion of the proceedings.

It was the dispatch of Maurice postello to the Angelinian government secretary Gendin announcing this victory that also general Hanson Vivian declared:

"Another such victory ought to destroy the whole rebel army at Androm."

General Poward in the meanwhile retreated rapidly to general Grouthearts and though he was defeated in making several stands that morning over a retreat of twenty miles his movements were so skillful and the christian losses so severe that by the morning the Angelinians only held the rebel works under general Charles savannah. General Maurice postello thinking that the other christian troops would hold general Poward in check determined to march on toward Androm and unite his right wing with the forces of Abraham Williams and Angelinians from the centre, to surround the rebel left wing and keep it from rallying again. One of these bodies of Angelinian troops was under general Arnold Benedict Angia who captured picketmaster St Clair but already had sent to general Mic-Hollester Johnston to watch affairs on his left wing where he could be near the scene of conflict and had been very successful. A general Maurice postello who had spent much time in this long attack and defence and counter advancing in order to prevent general St Clair from being reinforced now received orders to push on and seize some rebel post where there would be more easier communication with the river and main christian lines and to fortify it as soon as possible. Maurice postello accordingly took the works under general Grouthearts and proceeded to carry out his instruction while he depended on his other wings and armies to do their amount of success depended upon to bring the bloody battle to an immediate close and end in the capture of Androm.

On the third day of the morning in particular the main rebel army under general Mic-Hollister, Johnston had been unable to do anything for the rebel left wing, whatever. But at about ten o'clock - o'clock general Rochester reached Newport with a brigade of turnerandans with six million five hundred troops though the projected after were ordered to the north gun to join Mic-Hollister Johnston the commander was general attack on the christian center. general Johnston the commander was now much alarmed for what he had learned that the

The letters which had been passed between the envoys and the governments of the nations thru interviews were published by the glandelinian printing concern. These papers and reports of the envoys had the effect of uniting all the glandelinian people against christianity entirely, and in accordance with the popular feeling, the glandelinian congress prepared orders not to allow any ships of any nation approach christian harbors and those who did would be attacked and either sunk or captured by submarines and gunboats. The treaties with these christian nations were declared revoked, glandelinian declared herself at war with the christian world in particular, and orders were made to increase the army and navy, naval off vessels not at yivinn iskey were ordered to capture vessels of all christian nations approaching christian shores, and under this order many ships throughout the war counted by many thousands were either taken or sunk with all on board.

In Calverinia and Angelinia itself orders came that every alien who sided with glandelinia should be considered as dangerous alien enemies and should be ordered out of the country, and should any such refuse to go he was upon conviction to be imprisoned. The laws also provided that any one who during the war should combine or conspire against the Angelinian governments, armies or generals, or who should utter or publish anything false, scandalous or malicious against them or the Abbeianian authorities should be imprisoned as spies or war enemies.

During the time of the battle of Andean there had been much trouble with the christian shipping, their vessels were engaged in so many terrible raids on the enemy up and down the river that to the enemy they became worse than the most horrible piracy, rebel shipping were attacked, ships by hundreds in a few days had been seized, the vessels were either destroyed or taken, and the crews made prisoners. Throughout the whole siege this kind of work had dragged on a full terror to the rebel ship owners and once when the rebel government sent a large fleet against the raiders the fleet was repulsed by christian guns on shore.

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

SOME MORE EFFECTS OF THE BLOCKADE OF YIVINN WICKET. HANSON YIVINN THE ANGELINIAN BULLDOG.

In the meantime also during the time the battle of Andean had been raging on its third day general Hanson Yivinn had already been advancing some of his troops moving off from his old positions in front of Evangelinia grania and advancing for Aurandecillo while stretching another army toward the St Damian fortifications, and it was evident that the activities of the siege and its battles was to be carried on more spirited than ever. For a time though cut off from most of her allies glandelinia had nevertheless profited by child slavery and the war itself, for her ships for a time before the blockade had been trading with nations siding with her. In this way much of the carrying on of the world trade fell into her hands bringing wealth to the whole nation.

General Hanson Yivinn from his grim determination had been called "The Angelinian Bulldog", learned of this through the Geminian Spies under General Darger and so in order to weaken the power of the rebellion resolved to put a stop to even this mutual trade with glandelinia, so he had issued a proclamation declaring that all the glandelinian seaports, south, east, west or any other section as well as in Calverinia, and all the ports south of Yivinn iskey between Aronburg and Federal and the south of the Norm gun river were closed or blockaded, and warning all vessels not to attempt to enter them. He even declared all the ports of the Blangiglocean and Boyking Islands to be in a state of blockade, forbade any nation whatever under pain of offense and sharing in the rebellion to trade with the enemy of god, and ordered the full confiscation of all glandelinian merchandise. Also he declared all ports in Angelinia blockaded in which all Angelinian ships or flags were shut out and forbade all vessels to even either enter the Angelinian harbors on either side who were glandelinia's ally.

This further limited christian commerce with Angelinia for as he stated before glandelinia had blockaded all ports against christian commerce. On account of this the commerce of all nations suffered greatly. If any vessel which was a christian property of a nation went to Calverinia even without touching at a Calverinian or Angelinian seaport and paying dues or taxes on her cargo she ran the risk of being either taken by a rebel warship or by the rebel submarines, or being sunk with all on board whether children or not, and if the ship followed on the another course they might be seized by the rebel government revenue officers should she attempt to enter any Calverinian port. glandelinia even claimed the full right to stop all vessels no matter what nation they came from in order to find out if munitions and provisions were being sent to Angelinia secretly or if they had glandelinian persons on board, if any such were found the whole ship with all on board was seized, the prisoners taken on board the rebel ships, and made prisoners on the charge of harboring a christian enemy of glandelinia. Such seizures and even imprisonments were frequent by the glandelinians and the rebel officers were more and more overbearing.

Once to show the nerve of the rebels the glandelinian flagship called the given stopped an yormomian frigate glaser off Vicky Hat Bay, and by force compelled her commander who was in no condition to fight to give up ship and all the men declared by the rebel officer to be glandelinian seamen. This gross indignity was resented by all the yormomians and so yormomia though it did not actually go into the war gave all the aid she possibly could to Abbeiania.

Hanson, ivian on account of this had ordered and warned all christian nations not to attempt to send their vessels into Calverinian and Angelinian harbors on this condition and during the time called a session of one general to decide what should be done to frustrate the rebels intentions. Also he had forbidden the departure of any vessel for any foreign port, foreign vessels were advised and forbidden for safety to their ships not to try and unload or received goods in Calverinian and Angelinian ports on the charge that should enemy ships commit untold of damage the Angelinians would not be held responsible for what was done. He also claimed that this law should be strictly attended to and that vessels of all kinds in the ordinary coasting trades were to be required to give bond that they would not attempt to trade outside the region of glandelinian blockades. Indeed this terrible attempt to trade outside the region of glandelinian blockades. Indeed this terrible blockade by the enemy of ivian wickey and western and eastern seaports was surely disastrous not only to Calverinia but to the whole world itself. All shipping of scores of christian nations ceased to exist, yoromunian and Abissinian and Protestantian and even Angelinian commerce was completely annihilated, this causing the recent christians sorrow, all seamen were forced to seek employment in factories still operating, and rebel ships war and all other kinds watching for other christian ships alone occupied the coastlines of the yic-Whirthian, Angelinian, and Calverinian seas.

The whole world saw their chief means of support almost destroyed at a single blow and after vain attempts to get this proclamation repealed, many seamen had to turn their attention to other pursuits. Hardly any manufacturing could even be accomplished, many mills were shut down and all those who had been working in foundries, factories, mills, and other companies had to seek employment on farms.

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN.

THE FOURTH DAY OF THE BATTLE OF ANDREAN.

The same afternoon of the third day of the battle a rebel force of nearly two hundred thousand men in the absence of their commander made a desperate counter attack upon general Grant Eh Hearts right wing but was totally defeated by general whiter John Harrison. Indeed the entire army of christian besiegers were eager for the pressing of the siege of ivian wickey to a close by the speedy capture of andrea sect ion. General Hanson ivian through the advice of his own generals had in a general message set forth the grievances of the whole christian civilization. These were, the unjust sinking of thousands of neutral ships of other nations, the destruction of the lives of an unusual number of innocent children, the forceful lure imprisonment of seamen of all christian nations by the glandelinian spies, violation of the full neutral rights on all coasts of other christian nations by rebel cruisers and warships, and inciting great massacres against calverinian and angelinian women and children as extensive as one of the glandelinian oppressments that at one time the names of six hundred thousand persons who had been thus seized by the glandelinian warships were on file in the Angelinian government authorities of Calverinia itself. The extent done to the injury of the commerce of christian nations who had unhesitated the Rebel embargo act was shown by the official statement that between May 1912 and July of the same year on various pretenses, more than nine thousand vessels mortally transports or steamers had either been captured by the glandelinian submarines or sunk with all on board, and worse than that the enemy had seen to it that no one was saved or saved themselves, even if they were women and children on board the sunken ships. The struggling persons in the water were ruthlessly fired upon.

On the early morning of the fourth day most of general yic-Hollester Johnstons army having suffered great losses in the three days engagements, and not having received reinforcements that was promised was very ill prepared for resumption of the battle especially with general Maurice Costelloes army of Abissinians and Angelinians, whose supporting navy numbered about one thousand five hundred big dreadnaughts and nearly 10,000 gunboats and one hundred warships. The rebel navy defending yic-Hollester Johnstons badly crippled army consisted only of twenty large dreadnaughts two of which were christian ships captured by the enemy and some almost useless gunboats. The main navy which was promised to help general yic-Hollester Johnston had not arrived. His land forces so badly handled in the three days battles, with the loss of many officers were now ridiculously inadequate, miserably equipped, and officered by very incompetent men. If yic-Hollester Johnston had not been in command there could be no telling how things would have resulted that horrible fourth day. Though the supporting fleet of yic-Hollester Johnstons on the river was small the dreadnaughts were the best of the rebel class afloat, and were well armed like the Angelinian warships themselves, while the rebel officers and men were very skilful and well trained by experienced in other naval conflicts in and outside of ivian wickey. These two reasons are probably enough to explain the rebel successes on the water and the christian successes on the land. Indeed the rebel forces there had rashly plunged into the wildest battle which like most battles of the war resulted in little better than drawn battles or indecisive victories.

Nevertheless despite his condition general yic-Hollester Johnston authorized preparations for action early on the morning. The plan of operation was to attack general Gandas divisions and recover the lost ground on his left, and to defend the rest of the main line should the Nationals make another headlong attack like the days before. General Dearborn Henryson an officer of the enemy also was made senior major general. A general William Galey the governor of Andrea section, another veteran of the first battle of the war was entrusted the conduct of the well planned attack upon general Gandas rear. He however soon surrendered Troiter Bridge to the Nationals without a blow in its defense and with it the whole line of glandelinian intrenchment which fell into the hands of the Angelinians. For this act the general immediately after the very day was tried by courtmartial in Norma Catharins for this act, sent to the rebel Tribunal for sentence, found guilty of cowardice and was condemned to be shot. He however was not shot.

like the days before. General Dearburner Henryson an officer of the enemy also was made senior major general. To General William Staley the governor of Andean section, another veteran of the first battle of the war was intrusted the conduct of the

An attempt to strike general gandabner flunk a blow was made by or using the gorge un river by way of goras bridge but it was a failure. general Garbner Haysen also simultaneously led a assault against general Yorkers division of Abyssinians forces but after destroying some supplies and unwisely burning ten christian encampments and six headqu of six christian generals, he retired his assault having been repulsed, and for this was forced soon after to resign his position as general. Agal in the western division of W. division of whom had been given the command of the western grand division tried to recover the works and positions surrendered by general Staley, but was unsuccessful.

An hour later, general Perry Oliver Thatcher who had come up in time with an extra fleet of rebel ships completely defeated the Anglinian naval fleet under Admiral Sanduskey thus opening the way for general Staley's army to advance again in a titanic charge upon the lost positions surrendered by general Staley, capture it and make another attempt to flank general Gaudere's rear. Soon after an hour the forces under this rebel general met the combined Anglinian and Abyssinikilian forces near the very Trotter bridge and after fierce and sanguinary fighting routed them and drove them toward the works. In this action general Teunus Ter of the christian side was killed, his success restored a portion of the rebel army, the rebel navy was increased, and the excellent Anglinian and Abyssinikilian seamen and vessels were as manifested elsewhere as on the river. Learning that one morning the Anglinians themselves were greatly surprised at the number of rebel naval victories.

The success of the "landslings" on the water was almost made up that day for the disaster on land. In this instance the success of the warships and dreadnaughts were in favor of the "landslings" their success was due mainly to their superior seamanship and discipline. The "landslings" generals were greatly elated over these victories on water and during the terrific conflict within the rear of the christian lines on water with a Angelinian fleet a rebel flagship under Admiral "Louise" came captured the Angelinian dreadnaught St Lawrence with a deckload full of dead and dying, and five minutes later the Angelinian Marston St Peter was sunk by the same flagship a flagship of the rebels, and in the following hour the Marstoner, the plangio, mean, and the Gertrude other Angelinian warships had to yield to her. In this naval engagement with the whole two fleets the loss of life was dreadful nearly ten thousand killed alone.

life was dreadful nearby ten thousand killed a day. Enraged however on account of the failures in recapturing the main towns surrounded by the Chinese and incited by the influence of booze and opium and whiskey, the fierce Hordes of Gargolian Gavarly and Kurdish, landlineans all on horseback led by General Weatherford Jemina surprised in a dashing charge the fortified works and encampments of the christians under general planes near the junction of the andrea and gondina railroads which passed through this region. the resistance of the christians was terrific, half of the gargolian forces was mowed down in a few minutes but so precipitate was the onslaught of the survivors that the Angelinians could not hold, and being assaulted in rear also broke into confusion and fled before the horsemen. The whole encampment of tents was set on fire, and many women and children who had not been able to be saved by the Angelinians in all over four thousand were captured, and would have been put cruelly to death if a new body of christians had not promptly counter charged in which the counter surprised Gargolians were conquered, the Angelinians in their rage over the treatment of the child captives retained by the christians, showing no quarter, and seemingly trying to surpass the gangelinians in meanness. Nearly all of the Gargolian squadron was killed and the survi survivors had to flee for dear life, taking the danger of being shot down as they knew they could receive no quarters. General Weller Jemina was the commander of the Angelinians who brought up the reinforcements against the Gargolians and his success in this effort to regain the children gave him a high reputation for military skill. A terrifying in meanness were Gargolians called the Hooded 'Ku Klux Klan of the landlineans' that in an engagement with them any time the Angelinians if capturing prisoners seldom ever gave these rebels a quarter on account of the horrible meanness of many children, priests, and nuns and women committed by it them.

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

Taught by their severe reverses, the rebel commanders set about to reorganize their armies and under the instruction of young and newer officers, Scottier and Winfield and others the rallied troops were greatly improved in condition, discipline, confidence and strength. Not despite all results of this training, and despite the fact that the glandelinians received well needed reinforcements, more provisions and artillery, and even stronger bodies of cavalry, and two strong glandelinian fleets to hammer the christian rear constantly the Angelinians continued to win advantages in the desperate struggle. Several whipsaw, Lundyton, and Kristor on the rebel side in leading three desperate assaults fell mortally wounded, the assaults of these three divisions were repulsed with exceedingly heavy losses and the rebel troops were compelled to retreat in a panic across the river for shelter behind their own earthworks and fortresses.

At the same time at another point of general Maurice Costelloes right a desperate attack of long duration was made by the glandelinians but the rebel assault was repulsed with the loss of one quarter of their number of men, and a simultaneous naval attack was likewise repulsed with great loss of ships and men.

The success of the christian forces allied against general Napoleon Lundy was also repulsed when repelled successfully by a vast rebel force in six hours fierce contest along the main christian left where thirty divisions of rebels were held against them general Napoleon was killed and the Angelinians then relieving more men and artillery were able to tear up to pieces the remaining assaulting glandelinian columns and drive the survivors back pell-mell. So many ships had stemmed up to the defense of Andean that the water route to Andean was blocked and from Norma Catherine to Andean, and all christian merchant ships finding it a hard matter to get out of the trap fought incessantly and within six hours that day nearly forty thousand ships were engaged in a contest of a distance of thirty miles and many were sunk disabled or captured and set on fire, and the roar of a hundred thousand cannon shook down many ruins in Andean from the concussion and the battle smoke over the whole region hung like a thick fog.

The rebels also had countless submarines and other warships at sea around Vivian Wickey Bay and elsewhere and most of the rebel naval operations to prevent more christian fleets reaching Vivian Wickey to increase the christian blockade were carried on by not only warships of iron and steel, but also by many steamers and privateers, gunboats, merrimans and torpedo boat chasers and also big war launchers. These as said, before were very heart hurtful to worldly commerce and during the whole siege of Vivian Wickey it was estimated that over twenty five hundred Angelinian ships alone were captured.

The plans of the Angelinians concerning Andean and Andean had been to attack the main rebel armies under Mic-Hollester from three points, on the northern bend of the rebel army, on the main river coast, and on the southern bend. The attack from the north however though lasting all day in series of assaults had been so far a failure. A part of the Angelinian plan was to also make attacks at various places on the Norma River coast near Andean in order to keep the rebel troops in a state of continual fear and uncertainty and to have batteries placed to protect their rear from rebel fleets shelling them from Gunbeam Creek or river. In carrying out these schemes the battle that day became exceedingly fierce, the firing all over on both sides was general and fearful, and general Stonnington, Lewis, Frank Delawareton, Havre, Stoner, and Marylander Gracedelinia on the christian side were wounded and their big brigades reduced to regiments from their terrible losses, general Maine Stoner was seized as his troops were routed with great loss. The chief part of this bloody attack was made upon general Mic-Hollester centre late that afternoon and confirmed to be six or seven desperate assaults or sorties in that one afternoon of unspeakable horror and confusion. A strong christian fleet also accompanied by an army of about four million men under general Pennington appeared to the rear of the rebel fleet during the height of the afternoon battle and routed it after a terrific conflict on the water in which the thunder of cannon was fairly wild and deafening. Forces of new christian troops were simultaneously landed at St Benedict Junction near the mouth of the Gunbeam Creek, and marched toward the main wing of general Mic-Hollester Johnston's army. The rebels kept up a running fight and resisted the christian army successful advance until general Plan Gladensburgers troops coming up stopped the retreat. He had a force of six million ursermannins consisting of large numbers of regular troops and marines with the militia and the whole force was hastily drawn up to defend the works. The conflict was so terrible that men fell in dreadful numbers, all the officers and generals were almost annihilated and this part of the battle speedily ended in a rout. The Angelinian forces in this direction (south) entered the main rebel encampments, burned general Mic-Hollester Johnston's main headquarters, from which he was driven and most of the rebel barracks and other army siege buildings besides the Y.M.C.A and other structures making a great conflagration.

So hasty was the flight of this line of rebels that Mic-Hollester

Johnston himself with a number of his child slaves and two other officers and his own wife gathered up some of the precious documents in the building as he and they fled from the headquarters building, and that same time the Angelinians ate up the very same dinner and drank the wine prepared for the generals for the coming evening. The loss to Mic-Hollester Johnston from a money point of view was large, but it was nothing in comparison with the loss of glandelinian public records and other documents, which it was impossible to replace. In his flight general Mic-Hollester Johnston had two horses shot under him, his orderly was

Jo Johnston himself with a number of his child slaves and two other officers and his own wife gathered up some of the precious documents in the building as he and they fled from the headquarters building, and that same time the Angelinians ate up the very same dinner and drank the wine prepared for the generals for the coming evening. The loss to Gic-Hollister Johnston from a money point of view was large, but it was nothing in comparison with the loss of Glandelinian public records and other documents, which it was impossible to replace. In his flight general Gic-Hollister Johnston lost two horses shot under him, his orderly was killed, and two of the child slaves were wounded by stray bullets. A shell exploded near his third horse and wounded it, and he had to abandon it and get another in which he continued his flight to the main left wing of the rebel army where he received help and managed to drive back his pursued with terrific slaughter though in the close fray he lost his other horse and securing another lost that also until he saw it useless to use horses during the fray. All his general's statements that so many horses were shot that they lay almost as thick as the men themselves. The fury of the battle of Andean that day was horrible. An attack on general Salisworsian Glandelinian troops was a failure lasting only ten minutes in which the Christian losses resembled that at the battle of Easter Starring and a bombardment of the outer fortifications of Andean making a splendid din and sight was also a failure.

The other attempt of the day of the Christians was upon the last division of the rebel left wing. The Angelinians in a successful charge had occupied general Fenna Gola poroto works but the rebel troops in counter charging had driven them from it pell mell. The rebels here showed the greatest skill and energy and forethought in their preparation for this part of the defense, they had built barricades of abatis, cotton bolls, bales, and earthworks of great height, and had lined them all with cannon of many sizes per line and another attack of the Christians bringing the battle once more that day to general fury was repulsed with heavier loss. The general in command was killed, five others were mortally wounded, and two million five hundred thousand men were reported killed wounded or missing, and on the rebel side eight generals were killed, and thirty mortally wounded, thirteen disabled and seventy one other officers of different rank killed or wounded. The Angelinian survivors spat out at such a dreadful slaughter abandoned further attacks that day. This sort of advantage at Andean restored confidence in the rebels and had a marked effect in raising their military reputation in the whole world.

CHAPTER NINETEENTH.

ACTS OF MEDIATORS.

The fourth day of the battle of Andean did not in any way effect the enemy in the least though really in this story it had raged or began two weeks before Christmas. We even go back a little before continuing with this titanic struggle before Andean we will have to state that ten times during the war already many nations had offered to act as mediators between the rebel states of Glandelinia and the National states of Angelinia itself the offer was every time repeated without avail. General Hanson, his aid and his orderlies, had been consulted by letter but he refused to receive any mediators declaring in his statement:

"The war cannot be over unless Glandelinia and her rebels rebellion against Christianity is overthrown. The enemy have forced horrors of child slavery throughout a region of two thousand five hundred miles in Galverinia alone besides the territory of slavery in her own country, the Glandelomenean and other islands and as she wishes under any conditions to maintain the child slavery and is fully able to do so nothing can be done until child slavery is completely wiped out. I have refused mediators from Glandelinia and Glandelinia once before at the outbreak of the war and will not have no further negotiations either. The war must go on until the enemies of god and humanity in general is crushed and put into her place and the Glandelinian states brought back to the union of Abbieannia by force. We have started the fight and I will finish it."

Early in August while the horrors of Ivian Wickey was manifesting itself at its height in Gorma gathering during the "Reign of Terror" the Protestantian King himself had appointed ten commissioners to go to Angelinia for the purpose of treating with Angelinia but after their perilous arrival the prospects of peace were gloomy and not only that but on account of the dangers of foe ships they were unable to return by way of the Gic-Whirthean seas from Angelinia western coast and had to go east by train to the coast there and take ship for their country by route of the stormy Angelinian seas and thence to the Gic-Whirthean seas. The success of the Angelinian armies in crushing Glandelinia's invasion of northern and southern Angelinia simultaneously, the rigid rigorous and maintained siege of Ivian Wickey, Browley and Federal, the capture of Anna Aronburg, the defeats of the foe elsewhere and the addition of one captured rebel general while releasing many armies of troops which could be sent to Galverinia at the same time took away any chances for mediators to bring peace. Nevertheless with the exception of rival glory in Ivian Wickey and elsewhere for her defense the besieged Glandelinians had already really gained little or nothing except maintain their strong holding out, they had lost hundreds of millions of dollars in a few months in Ivian Wickey alone in military expenses the utter ransacking of Glandelinian commerce, the great fires in all sections of Ivian Wickey and outside, and countless lives had been sacrificed in men and generals. There is little doubt that if the disloyal Galverinian governments had been watched closely and their treason discovered in time Ivian Wickey would be never have been captured by the

...supplies of all kinds were glad 18 lands Indians and all this horror could have been avoided. The many defeats, the destruction of worldly trade of all nations, and the apparent hopelessness of the conflict was making many a discouragement all over by now.

All through the night after the fourth day's horror there was almost incessant long range firing of infantry and artillery and general Maurio Gostello in his instructions from Hanson was allowed to pursue a flying enemy across the river should it be repulsed after a petty sortie during the night, but he was not to attempt to take any rebel stronghold in any night assault without direct orders from general Hanson. In the conduct of these actions throughout the night however he did not without regard to orders. During the time he repulsed several small rebel attacks he counter charged and made attempts to seize rebel positions and received severe repulses with great loss. However two rebel officers were seized, tried at night by court martial, and promptly hanged though the evidence against them about being guilty of massacring a hundred girl child slaves was of a doubtful character. Thus in one night general Maurice Gostello had defied the rules of international laws and at night brought the two opposing armies almost to the verge of continual general activity at once.

So now for the state of the terrible conflict in front and to the north and south of Andean had already dragged on for four days with great loss of life on both sides, it was marked with many incidents of greater horror and cruelty than is usual even in such warfare. The sergeant Vivian Wickey had already cost the Angolians about thirty billions of dollars.

MEXICANIAN GAP CAMPAIGN. VIA ANDREAN. DREADFUL CONFLICTS IN ONE DAY.

On the fifth morning the struggle was again renewed and this time by the enemy. Their plans embraced four projects: Another fierce attack upon the christian right wing directly from the north, this was entrusted to general Zachary Andrew Gump (2), a main attack upon the whole christian line following this movement this was to be led by general Gertrude Chester Phin Phumster (3) an attack upon the main christian rear under general Maurice Gostello, including what was known as Jennie Riches gun section of the christian line, this was to be made under the direction of general Kerney Stephen Turner, an attack upon all other portions of the christian lines by ten glandelinian fleets of warships, gunboats, and merrimacs which was already being on its way in anticipation of general battle with the main christian lines.

General Andrew Gump against most heavy odds so far as numbers were concerned defeated the main christian divisions under general Henry Darger Monterey and also those under general Yistna purma, but the other sections of the christian line he failed to force and as so many of his men fell that they lay in the field like swarms of flies on a million tanglefoot papers he was forced from horror of the situation to cease operations, and then for backing out was compelled to resign his command.

Simultaneously the expedition or long distanced onslaught against general Mexicanian's long line of christian artillery and infantry supported by double lines of cavalry was completely successful but after tremendous sacrifices of lives of men and officers. It had been a terrific and horrible inferno of battle along this part of the line and it took six hours for the success to be accomplished and at a dearly bought cost. Elsewhere the region of the positions of captured christian works was controlled by the rebel troops and general Kerney Turner leaving large forces of his troops to retain it set off for the region of Mexicanian junction, but before he could accomplish any success it was already in the possession of other rebel troops and a fleet was shelling a portion of the christian rear, through the cooperation of Commodore Storterton, and Landerton who had captured almost without a struggle, the rear positions of Monterey's, Jennie's Francisco, and Anselmo's pursuers christian trenches a possession of works of almost incalculable value to the rebel cause, a great force of maurice Gostello's army had pushed around by another route and suddenly came upon these apparently victorious rebel forces and after most sanguinary fighting along a front of nearly forty miles badly defeated the rebels and retook all the positions but with great loss.

It being positively clear to the rebel generals that Maurice Gostello would be exceedingly difficult to over come it was that afternoon determined to attack the christian lines with infantry, artillery and the flanking fire of the glandelinian fleets as well. A large naval force of nearly twelve thousand men had been annihilated in meeting the fire of christian guns on shore however, and after a fierce bombardment of four hours general Gutzler Verre caught in the ground was compelled to surrender to the Angolians. He orthodox general Miv-golleston (known by his discipline, skill and intelligence, and the excellence of his troops proved for a while even very much superior to much larger numbers, and got great advantage of the leading Angolians. The only last serious resistance of that day that the glandelinian's really met was in the attack upon general Corretor, a doctor's army and here after a short sharp conflict the Angolians with the death of general Amator Santa glaus was driven back for two miles and the victorious glandelinians continued the advance and after several more sharp conflicts the main force of christians arrived to the scene and finally the attack was repulsed but the Angolians did not press on long enough to regain their lost positions.

One was it can hoped by the many christian generals conducting or directing the mighty Gostello's attack might acquire some territory which would be open to still more christian armies and more strong batteries of cannon.

CHAPTER TWENTY.

OTHER CONDITIONS CAUSED BY THE BRICE OF VIVIAN WICKY, AND ALL CALVENIAN SEAPORTS.....

One of the terrible artillery storms at Andean seemed to unite the armies attacking Andean. When general Maurice Gostello issued his call for one hundred and seventy five thousand men to go forward to attack the rebel lines the answer was prompt. More men than were called for volunteered for the preparation of the desperate assault, and provisions, ammunition and supplies of all kinds were land islands and all this horror could have been averted. The many deaths, the destruction of worldly trade of all nations, and the apparent hopelessness of the conflict was making many a discouragement all over the world. All through the night after the fourth day's horror there was incessant long range firing of infantry and artillery and general Maurice Costello Anatolia in his fortification.

One was it was hoped by the many christian generals conducting or directing the night Lucille Jackson's army into Acapulco was territory which would be open to still more christian armies and more strong battering of cannons. For this purpose the islands of the planglounn and boyking offered great attractions, in them all the horrors of child slavery still existed in all its grandeur, the islands were also well fertile and well adapted to the cultivation of all kinds of crops usually raised by child slaves for labor and it was they were in possession of also by the planglounn who might be forced into disposing of them to a powerful christian army. At first many expeditions throughout the whole beginning of the night had tried to seize these islands causing many sea battles in a few months but these attacks probably hundreds were completely unsuccessful, many Angellians were captured and were promptly executed by the rebel governments in any one of these islands. During great raids upon these islands by those making the expeditions many thousands of men were shot killed or wounded, public buildings, houses and wooden forts and even whole villages of rebel encampments were destroyed by the attackers. The Angellians themselves in some successes retaliated with a severity perhaps quite equal to that to which they themselves experienced.

During the late evening of the fifth day of the battle of Andean the whole rebel army was startled by what seemed to be an attempt of christian spies to enter the rebel lines in disguise and make attempts to incite the older child slaves to make an insurrection. General Browner had been prominent in the past days of conflict and was filled with a desire to liberate all the child slaves confined within Poverty power. Andean, supposing indeed that some opportunity and a number of leaders were all that was necessary to arouse and encourage the child slaves to with a force of about twenty five thousand men carrying concealed weapons for children who in any case the attempt went into the rebel lines. Of course unfortunately he and his followers after a bloody conflict within the very rebel lines were overpowered and nearly five thousand of his followers in including three of his leaders were killed or wounded. He himself badly wounded, was taken prisoner with most of his surviving band. Browner was tried by the Tribunal in Porto Catherine two days later, condemned as spies and on the charge of inciting insurrection and executed. Among the planglounn authorities of this desperate attempt to liberate the child slaves was regarded as a proof that many Angellian generals and other officers and sympathizers wished to incite insurrection among all the child slaves, while among many christian authorities surprise was indeed mingled with pity and great admiration for the self sacrifice and courage of the leader and his men, though the majority of christian officers had wholly disapproved of his action and looked upon him and his followers as reckless fanatics. In the meantime fortress Andean Tearbell in the harbor of Andean on the river was garrisoned by a large body of planglounn troops under the command of general Henderson, anticipating a general storming of the christian armies very soon he determined to remove his little and larger forces to Lucille Jackson itself, which had already offered to him strong rebel garrisons a complete chance of successful defense. So on the evening of the fifth day of the struggle he began to transfer his troops and supplies. At the same time general MacAllister Stank sent a large number of merchant steamers to the action of Andean with supplies and provisions for the battle. Planglounn armies under general MacAllister Stank, but seventeen batteries of christian cannons which the Angellian authorities had thrown up all along the line on every shore of every different river near Andean fired upon the fleet of steamers, and they were forced to retreat without landing the supplies. Already since the beginning of the siege all the outer forts around Andean were far as from Norma Catherine, hence to Anna Aronburg, and toward Andean except the main Gederline, Lucille Jackson, and Stank, and Lucille Jackson fortifications and also other main ones had to be surrendered to the christian armies and if it was believed that if any force were used to compel these other fortifications to give in the worse battle the world ever observed would break out. The views of the soldiers everywhere within the main christian lines were unknown and yet the conflict raging at Andean had lasted five days and the christian were no near capturing Andean than when they started the attacks. Such was the condition of affairs and the prospects was very discouraging.

Big Fort Seward near Andean still held out against the christians. Toward the early morning of the sixth day of December general MacAllister Stank made an official notification that the fortress Seward would be provisioned by force and this news reaching the christian generals and their armies in front of Andean startled all. The rebels had given order that a strong fleet from Andean could be sent thither but before this rebel fleet reached its destination the Angellians from all batteries had fired upon Fort Seward and the whole rebel encampments further beyond and also by batteries which had been built along the shore of the river and to this the rebels in the fortifications and along the works quickly replied. A steady fire was kept up for more than twenty four hours that day, the barracks of the forts were on fire, explosions tore everything to pieces and many infantry charges were made. It was a terrible conflict indeed that sixth day of the battle.

The effects of the fall of Fort Seward however was very marvellous. Up to this time few in our part had believed that even the beleaguered planglounn were really in earnest, except for the many few who sympathized with planglounn the news of the terrible artillery storm on Andean seemed to unite the armies attack attacking Andean. When general Maurice Costello issued his call for one hundred and seventy five thousand men to go forward to attack the rebel lines the answer was prompt, more men than were called for volunteered for the preparation of the desperate assault, and provisions, ammunition and supplies of all kinds were

The slight successes of the Angelinian troops in the w early part of the battle gave an undue con confidence to the Angelinian armies, even general Hannon said that the battle would be ended in another ninety hours. the result of the pressure to advance was the fierce struggle along these many points already mentioned almost simultane- ously great armies moving forward in six double lines of charges supported by many batteries of christian cannon. contrary to the general opinion at the time it appeared to have been on the part of the christians a well planned, well executed action until the arrival of mandelincian reinforcements at the moment opportune for their cause gave them the advantage and the christians were severely repulsed at a all points when the christian defeat so n became a rout and Maurice o tollis had all he could do to prevent a disaster entirely, so severely had the rebel victors suffered that they did not attempt to follow up their slight advantage. the mandelincian forces were more disorganized by their victory than the christian forces but t the defeat.

The importance of this part of the struggle was threefold if it has any folds, first in its effects upon the christians themselves, second on the wicked lamdelinians and their generals and their aur authorities and third in its effects later upon the whole world. The armies in the christians had first surprised and dismayed reeobg recognised that the conflict at and was to be no childa play, or even a ninety hours battle and prepared with added earnestness for three more days of fighting, the glandelinians became completely overconfident. The governments of other nations believed that the battle of ndran and the whole resistance to the seigs itself indicated superiority in generals htp and fighting qualities of the glandelinians and that ultimate victory wt would be with them and the horrors of a sorrowful christmas day to come. General Maurice gostellio who had gained prominence in the top up campaigns elsewhere in the sea- was at this time called to general gansons headqut heady headquarters with the concurrence of general Scotter who had been disabled to command what had become the army of Ablesham. General Maurice gostellio a firm Ableshamian had been educated at Angelina and had seen service in other battles of the war in Angelina and glandinia but above all had been successful in bring his armies to the sup port of the seigs through all difficulties so Good Mide curty as the soldiers called him was belid by the Angelinian armies to be on the one man who could bring succours to the christians seigs immediately. In the west under generals J. B. Lyons, Fremont and Heller the Angelinian forces drove the christians from christian o works the rebels had still retained.

After that terrible repulse of the three hours action it was clear to general Maurice Gottlieb and his advisers that in order to insure success it would be necessary to hold the line together more firmly along the east side of the river, and if possible to take fortress Seward or reduce it, to open the way to run through even Ivisak to the sea, and maintain a close blockade of the seaports of northern, thus cutting off from the Greenlanders any supplies from Ivisak and Waduk, the many christian cruisers, merra marionnes, warships, frigates and gunboats and torpedos boat destroyers and armed merchant steamers and other craft and even armed rafts had done what they could to make an effective blockade proclaimed by general Hanson Ivisak but they were frequently almost incessantly opposed by ships of the enemy and the fire of the Greenlanders forts on key seaport and river delta, and despite the rigi rigor of the blockade enemy vessels flying the Argentinian flags would steal in and out running the blockade. Ivisak it were for god's sake only possible to capture some of the ports of Ivisak it would make the blockade of Ivisak more effective, and less difficult.

opportunities as for running the blockades.

On the same day of the struggle one of the most important incident probably not of the seige itself but of the whole war also took place on the afternoon of December sixth 1912: it was completely essential for the success of the landelinian Confederacy that the landelinian governments at vivilian wikey should obtain supplies not only from Galverinia but from agra abroad as well and in order to do this to be able to maintain the seige more successfully the recognition of the landelinian Confederacy as an Independent nation from all christianity by galverinian loyal governments to landelinia would be of very incalculable assistance. Accordingly seventeen envoys were sent to Galverinia by way of the gin-whirlin seas to thence go the route to southern landelinia and take course on the Angelinian seas east of Angelinia and land on the eastern coast of Galverinia. During the blockade they managed to reach one of the glenglomenian islands and then took passage on a rebel warship for vivilian wikey in hope of getting there but finding blockade running impossible there tried a course down the mouth of the Erwinia pun river through Abissindania disguised as an Angelinian warship disguised as Angelinians on an investigation.

but for the arrival of general Walter Jennings with reinforcements Maurice Costello's light have been totally defeated and in this two hours struggle the firing on both sides in cannons and machine guns had been unusually severe and heavy, the glandelinians remained finally retired with the loss of their two generals, while over one hundred and ten thousand men were killed wounded or taken prisoner. 84

OTHER GREAT ADVANTAGES OF THE BATTLE OF THE SIXTH DAY

DURATION.

During the afternoon in the meanwhile General Maurice Costello had continued to make efforts to capture the plantelino and positions at Andean. After much fighting all morning till toward two o'clock General Maurice Costello moved his left wing down the gorge run to approach the plantelino works and positions from the south.

seventeen ex envoys were sent to Uvalde, Texas, and take course on the Angelinian thence go the route to southern Greenland, and land on the eastern coast of Uvalde. So far it was only in the western section of Andean that the advantage had been decidedly in favor of the national forces of Abbaquma.

CHAPTER TWENTY ONE

The navy yards once belonging to the Angolians near Irian yskay had during the victory of the rebels been captured by the glandelians. They had captured many wooden ships and transferred the Atlantic steamers into still more gigantic iron clads called Merrimacs. These like the "Confederate Merrimac in the civil war" had been fitted with a bank to run into an enemy's vessel but were armed with one hundred big guns. They were added to the other glandelian warships, gunboats and merimacs and much submarines and so the rebels during the afternoon of 5 December the sixth prepared the whole fleet of merimacs defense for a desperate trial and so sailed down the norma un and northward down the gunboat creek with the intention to shell the christianian rear and land troops to assault by land. In norma a gun could near by were four or five of the best christianian fleets of the Angolanian Navy. The score of thousands of seamensters in fray color and flying the lamellianian flag for which they seemed to be attacked the christianian fleet and shore batteries. All along the river coast at the same time, but though they rained shot and high explosives on them they could not make an impression on the christianian batteries which answered with a roar beyond describing and whose missiles torn and riddled many ships so badly that they were sunk. One of the Merrimacs ran into the Angolanian warship with her bow with the purpose of sinking her but was disabled by a volley which put out of commission thirty five guns and tore the sloping roof all to pieces and killed and wounded two hundred and fifty men. The others would have met a similar fate had not the christian fleet began a slow retreat southward opening a general fire as they started and flashing wireless signals to general jansson at the same time. The news of this titanic conflict on water still going on with redoubled fury spread dismay in the christianian lines. Should the rebel fleet succeed general jansson's fleet would have to withdraw and all hopes of capturing merimacs would be lost. There however seemed nothing to prevent the terrible lamellianian warships gunboats, submarines and torpedos and other crafts from going even to Jennie Irian and Caran, a harbor on the christianian fortified water fronts which would be utterly at their mercy. The christianian fleet had started the slow retreat christianian batteries from Mandana a great battery. From general jansson vivanna batteries and also gunboats and submarines started a tremendous hammering beyond endurance and after a fight of four hours duration the Angolanian fleet slowing down in its retreat began to reverse direction and the firing of so many cannons became terrific and sounded as if the end of the world was fast approaching. The rebel attack was thus repelled in four hours and was compelled to retreat back to merimacs. The joy of the christians at the result of this tremendous naval engagement on the sixth of December was proportional to its previous dismay.

At simultaneously Angellian fleets on the southern coast of Gjovik Run had such success that all the good ports of Andruan, such as Aspt Andruan, Fair, Charlestown, and Wilkerson were a lost to the glandallians. On the morning of December sixth an expedition commanded by general Benjamin F. Schlieder and Commodore David Porter steamed down the Norman Run river to take Andruan by river. A whole day was spent in fierce combatting in the vain endeavor to capture the Andruan fortifications which had been during the last occupation of the city section erected to defend the approach to Andruan by the river and men, then failing he was determined to burn them. There was a most desperate conflict but he remained to succeed but he could not control the city or form to surround and so the expedition had to be given up. The fleet went up the Norman Run.

In the afternoon in the meanwhile General Maurice Costello had continued to make efforts to capture the glancielindan land positions at Mureau. After much fighting all morning till toward two o'clock General Maurice Costello moved his left wing down the Norma run to approach the glancielindan works and positions from the south.

This really was attempted on November eight but on the day of December sixth while at Andean the conflict was raging in greater fury than preceding days of the battle. Admiral Jacques Wilkerson commanding three Abbeonnan warships stopped the disguised Glandelinian warship ten miles from the river mouth, and seized the Glandelinian envoys with their secretaries and the whole crew and warship and brought them to Pandora Abbeonnan, where they were confined in Fortress Angulus. On receipt of this startling news, both Glandelinia and Abbeonnan were thrown into the greatest excitement, knowing things that would happen from this seizure and that Glandelinia demanded very bluntly for the envoys to be given up to the Abbeonnan fleet. In all Glandelinia, the Abbeonnan Admiral Wilkerson was loudly and enthusiastically applauded, the Abbeonnan King passed a resolution declaring the thanks of the whole world were due to him and that he deserved a gold medal and a higher commission for his conduct. Later during the siege the prisoners were accordingly given up to the Angelinian governments for trials, were found guilty on the most dangerous spies the Glandelinians had ever commissioned. Many authorities however had felt that the court-martial had been unnecessarily firm and for a while much hard feeling had been felt. By the close of the morning after that three hours struggle had ended with a Christian defeat it was evident that the struggle was going to be long and very severe. While the Glandelinians had been generally successful in this actual conflict their operations had been little more than defensive; they had failed to retain the foothold on the Christian right wing, or seriously threaten general Maurice's position rear. Glandelinia's whole coast on all sides east west, south and Galvernia also had been fairly well blockaded, and at least three or four important sea points of Galvernia,iskey besides Anna Aronburg had been captured. All along their northern border of Galvernia,iskey large armies of Christian armies well experienced were ready to resist any rebel counter attacks anywhere, and were threatening a general attack upon all parts of the besieged city as soon as they were sufficiently supplied and prepared for this tremendous effort, without commerce, and almost without a manufacturer as in Galvernia, with scores of hundreds of thousands of child slaves already wrested away from them to freedom and all rebel property in Galvernia ruined it did appear as if the Glandelinians were not in a good condition to sustain a very long siege. Skillful officers, the bravest armies, and a united people also were not the only essentials to success in resisting such a bearing like siege.

On the other hand as to say the Angelinian states except Galvernia were having little experience of actual war warfare, everything with Abbeonnan, and Angelinia and northern Abyssinilla was going on as usual, manufactures were perhaps even more active than formerly but unfortunately she dared not start commerce on account of the roving Glandelinian submarines along the coast east and west watching for just such ships. Many large armies and navies had been raised even before the war without much difficulty. The Glandelinian country was almost surround surrounded by titanic fleets and armies, and the Angelinians who were besieging Galvernia,iskey instead of being disheartened by want of success in carrying the siege to a close were only nursing themselves for greater efforts, and profiting by their mist mistakes.

The Glandelinian Congress at Galvernia,iskey in which the Glandelinian war party had an overwhelming majority by now vote voted more men and money without hesititation and throughout all of Galvernia the writ of Habeas Corpus had been suspended and scores of thousands of arrests per week of men and women suspected of aiding and abetting the wicked Glandelinian confederacy were incessantly made as this indeed was to everyone, it was believed to be a complete military necessity, for throughout many portions of western Galvernia the Glandelinians had many friends among the Galverinians who did their level best to send supplies and information across the lines. Any Glandelinian sympathizers were even in Pandora city, and many of the Galverinian government and even Angelinian and Abbeonnan government employees furnished secret information of great value to the wicked Glandelinian cause if you please to know.

The next second stage of the morning's fighting was in the western section of Andean, the Glandelinians during the time they captured Andean had built two great fortresses in the northwestern section of Andean to protect the city from invasion, Fort Zangustopolis on the Gunbeam, and Fortress Brignabo on the Gorne River. To reduce these places general Maurice Costello who had already shown military ability was planning to cooperate with Gompore Foster Brarker who was ascending the river with a fleet of gunboat, marine and warships and some submarines, before the Christian land expedition could reach Fortress Zangustopolis the rebel fleet had revealed the Christian fleet with success and the combined rebel forces were proceeding against the rear of the Christian line. After three hours of fierce fighting a force of Christians through the cowardliness of one of their generals was compelled to surrender and about fifteen thousand prisoners and a large quantity of arms fell into the hands of the wicked Glandelinian army. His during the siege so far was the first real great victory on the side of the Glandelinians, and an important one for with that victory of general Thomas Cleveland near Gunbeam Springs it compelled the Angelinians to abandon that a portion of the positions on Gunbeam Creek, and leave for a while a large part of the Red Riding Hood Woods once again in the control of the Glandelinian troops but only for a day. Two hours later general Maurice Costello was fiercely and most desperately attacked with dogged determination by the Glandelinian forces under general Shilio and by forces of rebels also under general Johnston Sidney Albert, there was a most severe two hours fight all along the line in which General Walter Jennings was left near Redriding Hood Woods and Oostown to protect the main line from a surprise from rear or front and a force of troops under general Gresham was stationed in the Andean Valley. The whole rebel army opposing the Christian line in front of Andean was still under general Mio-Holleser attacking here Costello moved his army to the mouth of the Gunbeam Creek and proceeded to attack to capture this Glandelinian position, and meanwhile Johnston was waiting ready to re-attack upon him. Glandelinian army, after taking various positions general Lee Corbin pushed on and succeeded in setting within a few miles of Andean in answer but swollen by floods caused by the enemy divided his forces, general Mio-Holleser Johnston at once attacked the left wing of the Christian force, general Lee Corbin and though Mio-Holleser Johnston received a small wound on the arm in the terrific conflict which followed and forced to retire he had succeeded in driving in delaying general Corbin advance. Meanwhile the Glandelinians under general Huelum yio-wi-Mio-Whirther drove general Walter Jennings down the Christian general that the other Christian army so frightening the other to defend the rear, general Mio-Whirther having disposed of Jennings and the other Christian commander being held back to protect the Christian rear, general Mio-Whirther Johnston at twelve thirty o'clock and who had been joined by Huelum yio-whirther forces attacked general Lee Corbin in general ferocity and after seven dreadful losses, were following another desperate encounter that sometime general Huelum yio-Whirther was severely wounded and his forces severely repulsed, but general Lee Corbin however rallied his troops and was a complete failure, making another charge and led by general Porter was repulsed. By evening at this section of the will Andean battlefield the two forces occupied about the same positions as when the struggle here started.

At another part of this section however the Glandelinians as early as one o'clock thought it a good time to cross the river and strike general Gresham's severe blow. A general Fletcher crossed the Gunbeam Creek above Gresham's works, took Fredericks position after sharp fighting and prepared to move on toward general Baltimore. General Mio-Gellener followed crossing the Glandelinian to turn back outwards. Meanwhile general Huelum yio-whirther was also captured with eleven thousand five hundred men, after a struggle and a position and artillery fell into the hands of the Glandelinians. The armies met in a first and also collision when general Huelum yio-whirther divisions closed upon the enemy rear of the advancing force and after an unusually severe conflict of an hour's duration general Corbin was forced to retreat still further. General Corbin had been much disappointed in meeting with such slight success however, general Fletcher did not persevere the retreating Christian army and force in into a general struggle as quick as he had been ordered on account of being wounded early in that last charge and on he was that very afternoon removed from command, and found himself not able to be assigned to any further active duty during the war. The command of the rebel troops was now given to general Caldwell Ambrose.

If general Fletcher was overconfident general Ambrose was completely rash and foolish. Attempting to reach the Christian rear by making a violent attack upon the strong Christian positions under general Fredericksburg and Free burrow his army was driven back with a terrible loss of life and officers and he himself killed. With the appointment of general Joseph Warren the most unfortunate Glandelinian army at this section toward evening received a new commander again.

In the northwest the Christian forces had been gradually advancing though the Glandelinians had made a number of most serious attacks the result of the days fighting there was decidedly against them. General Braggard Braxtonia the Glandelinian general was defeated in making a violent and extremely furious assault upon the whole of general Fergus line. Not long after he made another desperate attack of three hours duration resulting again in his defeat after a heavy loss on both sides. At this time a large number of fugitive child slaves came into the camp of general Jacob Baldwin at Fortress St. Jane. He refused to give them up to the Glandelinians who was the commander of the rebel forces near by and who asked by a flag of truce that they should be returned to him and other commanders under the fugitive child slave law. General Baldwin replied that all child slaves were contrabands of war as they could be used by the Angelinians with full pay and full clothing and provisions and materials could be used in working in or on fortifications for Christian works near and in other ways and that they would not be given up to the rebels. They were afterwards known as ex-child slaves and were placed in Abyssinilla for adoption. In the evening of that same day general Jacob Baldwin commanding a portion of the Christian armies on the right issued a proclamation declaring that all Galverinian citizens who should either side with the Glandelinians or be their sympathizers or take up arms against the Angelinians and Abbeonnan governments, or assist its enemies in any way whatever should whether rich or poor have their property confiscated and their women and children interned throughout Angelinia as exiles, and the child slaves if any they have in their possession would hereafter be declared to be free boys and girls.

That evening another christian general in a military order could "child slavery and a civil law of the glandelinians in a free country like Angelina and Abbeville are altogether incompatible and wicked. All persons whether glandelinians or not who are known to be holding self children as slaves are therefore declared enemies of god whether they are Angelinians or not. He had in freedom many child slaves by force snatched the older boys and girls into a regiment of boy and girl scouts. The feeling throughout the whole of Angelina against child slavery was rapidly growing so this was as stated before the cause of general Hanson. After a debate in a convention of generals to issue a general Proclamation stating that all children held as slaves within any glandelinian state, or Calverlinian state itself, or designated part of any glandelinian state where the people shall be or are in rebellion against all Christian and shall be thenceforth and forever free and should be set free by main force if necessary.

Of course by the glandelinians as we can readily expect no notice whatsoever was taken of this Preliminary Proclamation by the Angelinians generally by the rebel districts raised and so general Hanson indicated the proclamation of which he had given one hundred hours notice to all Calverlinians loyal to glandelinia holding slaves to free them or otherwise have their property confiscated and their women and children parted from them and they the slaves shot. In this he declared; women and children parted from them and they the slaves shot. In this he declared;

"equal though the proclamation seems it is for the sake of the freedom of innocent children a grave necessity, one third of the Calverlinian population are sharing in the rebellion or holding child slaves unlawfully, when for each child slave held they commit a mortal sin grievous beyond nature in its effects, and as the governor general of Angelina, and ruler of whole Angelina and Abbeville as well, and acting as commanding general in chief of the army and justice of the Angelinian States it is a fit and necessary war measure and I will have it enforced if I die a black death for it...."

At As declared before this proclamation was the first official official blow struck at child slavery and henceforth not only made the war a struggle to maintain the union of the Abbeville states, but also one to set free all the child slaves and to treat glandelinia not as a state of Abbeville any more but as a conquered province. Perhaps the greatest effects of this blow was abroad for the long and most brave resistance of the glandelinians everywhere, even at Ivyan, Ikey, and also at Crowley and the siege of Francis Atlanta had begun to make many christian nations think sadly within themselves that the wicked glandelinians might succeed after all and that the recognition of her independence to do with child slaves as she fit see fits might be officially extended to her. The most important and immediate results was the putting of boys and girls of older age especially all child slave fugitives and those rescued of any size who knew how to do it well whether young or not into the ranks of the Angelinians as boy and girl scouts. Many who had been rescued before had been already employed by the Angelinians even as helping the soldiers in throwing up trenches and for other purposes but not working as slaves for they got all they needed for their services and little money besides and all the liberties with the soldiers and in the encampments they wished. The faithfulness of the rescue child slaves to their soldier friends and even officers particularly in the boy and girl scout business was scarcely paralleled in the war or Angelinian history, and was worthy of greatest admiration indeed.

The in enlistment of little boy and girl scouts nearly all of them really by the Angelinians was fiercely resented by the glandelinians and led immediately to a complete cessation of the exchange of prisoners, as far as the glandelinian authorities on account of this naturally refused under any conditions to exchange any prisoners captured in battle, the Angelinian governments refused to exchange at all, feeling bound to protect equally all who had entered its service. Within only seven months at least it may be said that about one hundred and eighty thousand child slaves in various christian armies entered the ranks of the christians during the war as boyscouts and girl scouts, or as boy and even girl drummers and their their record was a very creditable one indeed. And also of the main evils of the war in any point of the country the confinement and ill treatment of prisoners whether soldiers or even child captives was not the least, and when the exchange of prisoners was not practiced or such restricted the evils were greatly increased. This true was unusual about the war was sorrowfully true for this story of the glandelinian war. Seldom seldom if ever in this world, or in any war have such heart rending sufferings especially among child slave captives been endured, and Ivyan, Ikey, Calverlin and other places in the hands of the rebels had become synonyms for terrible miseries of children who were held as slaves. These were for the children places of horror beyond any ones descriptions.

To add to the difficulties of the Angelinian armies a certain number of Calverlinians who were loyal to the glandelinians inside the city rose up against the christian population within falling upon women and child children and murdering them. Nevertheless by the end of December sixth there were facing andean four great christian armies one under general Greathart, in the vicinity of Fortress Seward, one under general B. Bankers and Louisiana, one under general Walter Jennings and one under general Gindor. The main purpose that late evening of the first three was to forcibly open the Norma River through andean and thus divide the glandelinian confederacy in andean and outside of her. The object part of the latter army was Sunbeam Creek on the west. General Vagabond and pseudonia knowing that the works he faced were held by the glandelinians under Mic-Holleston Johnston in particular and were very strong points. Leaving general Gindor general Greathart with the cooperation of gunboats, warships, merchanes and transports, tried operation after operation and plan after plan of the most desperate kind in order under general Billie and by forces of rebels also under general Johnston Sidney Albert, there was a most severe two hours fight all along the line in which to defeat the strong glandelinian forces and to reduce their works and fortified positions again and again and still again his efforts were unsuccessful. He sent ten large forces around the country opposite the rear of the enemy works and made ten ineffectual assaults upon the fortifications itself. He was repulsed with the main army came to his support. In the end of the siege and fighting of andean general Walter Jennings that evening had been successful in reorganizing the army of troops driven into confusion by an enemy assault. He determined to approach general Caldwell Lee Jenner from the gunbeam river. He met the rebel forces at six o'clock under general Hancock and in one charge was defeated with a loss of about one hundred and seventeen men thousand men. On the rebel side the loss in numbers of men was not so heavy but their great soldier general Mic-Holleston Johnston was shot by a glandelinian snapper scout by party of boy and girl scouts in the dusk of the evening and his death was instant. General Lee Gorbin of the christian side having been driven back as stated before had in the meantime received heavy reinforcements and resolved on a second effort to force the enemy back a movement practically forced upon him by public opinion of Angelinian soldiers. His division of forces of about one million eight hundred and seventy three thousand five hundred well armed troops thus at seven o'clock moved across the gunbeam Creek. General pseudonia Mic-Holleston Johnston under general Hooper kept his divisions between Central and Mic-Holleston Johnston.

General Lee Gorbin crossed the gunbeam Creek general Hooper followed his movements by means of scouts. Lee entered the fortified woods and after spirited fighting captured general Chambersburg works and the general and his whole command. A part of his force also fighting his way through through reached yourkens trenches, while his cavalry within sight of general Chambersburg works and a tremendous charge carrying all before them and clearing the roads of the rebels. The glandelinians were now thoroughly alarmed and with good reason indeed.

All the glandelinian divisions were hastily called out and hurried forward to protect the forces driven from the woods, and to reinforce the rebel army. Now the one of the glandelinian generals in command of the retreating forces was annoyed by the orders of the rebel general Mic-Holleston Johnston by wireless and asked to be relieved of his command. This glandelinian general whose name was not given was on the evening later after the forces were being rallied succeeded by general George Chambersburg. He however was a steady officer and general who would run only a few risks and he conducted the rally of the glandelinian troops in his own way.

Finally this action became general and general Gettys of the christian side led a dreadful charge upon the rebel positions. The conflict was terrible and exceedingly exceedingly dreadful and lasted all that evening and night. At this part of andean little no part of the field ever was more stubbornly contested, but general Lee Gorbin was again forced to retreat. The loss of each division was great about four hundred and forty four thousand men killed or wounded on the rebel side and about one third of those engaged in the christian forces engaged in the night tidal tidal conflict were killed wounded or missing. Gettys charge the greatest charge of the battle was generally regarded for the enemy for the turning point of the battle. Lee Gorbin retreated once more across the gunbeam Creek and without aid from andean did not intend to make any more assaults upon the enemy. It was indeed impossible, all that general Lee could do was to resist fierce glandelinian attacks and prolong the struggle.

OTHER GREAT ADVANTAGES OF THE BATTLE OF THE SIXTH DAY DURAI DURATION.

General Meander followed Lees retreating christian army and slowly until both armies were not far from the point from which they had started. At Four O'clock general Chambersburg glandelinians surrendered to general Greathart and one hundred and thirty two thousand prisoners fell into his possession. A few hours later general pseudonia f works surrendered to general B. Bankerton and the gunbeam Creek was now completely open to its mouth for fair. The glandelinians still held the works at andean on general Maurice Costelloes main center which commanded Eastern andean and the entrance to the city. General Maurice Costello was forced or able to force general B. Bankerton and George to retire from a point of the line, but later general Baldwin Braggard George receiving reinforcements from Mic-Holleston Johnston attacked Maurice Costello in most general fury early in the afternoon routing a terrific conflict along. In whole center for all the afternoon, and defeated him where it had not been for the steadiness of general Walter Jennings and his army the defeat would have been a rout and his forces would have been driven from the siege entirely. As it was each army lost more than six million six hundred and sixteen thousand men that afternoon on the center. General Braggard had gained a treacherous victory but he did not get the christian works as he had intended, to though he shut up the christian forces in their works.

However general Gresham by some of his grand successes had become one of general Maurice Costello's best generals and now a little western army besieging the Andean section were put under his orders. He came to see Gorbun and Maurice Costello help bringing reinforcements and a number of officers and generals who had served under him in his previous conflicts with the enemy, the siege of general Maurice Costello's central works was raised early in the morning after fighting of very savage character in which the losses on both sides was exceedingly heavy once a more general Braggard still held strong positions on the hill portion of the positions in front of Andean, and from these general Gresham determined if possible to drive him. In this he was even of the night the fight of Hill No. Ten. It looked like an inferno of volcanoes that dark morning so much was the bright flashes of firing of muskets and cannon and the thick smoke but general Braggard was compelled to retreat toward general Dalton's works where again serious resistance was offered and which would have been successful if he had not been wounded. Here he was unable to command further and general Johnston must have taken his command.

During the sixth day of the struggle one of the most striking incidents was the raid of general Morgannia Mexicana Maxi milli n, the glandelinian cavalry general. Starting from Jennie's gun ten miles south of Andean, he passed in a desperate assault through ten christian encampments in a fiery inferno of firing, his force being increased by reinforcements and all its supplies on the way. Capturing one or two other christian encampments and all its supplies on the way, he reached the Sunbea river, and seizing two fleets of a steamer and christian transports crossed into the vicinity of the christian lines near Jennie Andean, he then turned toward Cardonaler and crossed the southern part of the region all the time fighting his way through though suffering great losses and going by night through the very outskirts of the main christian lines under general Gonsentinian Aronburg. Everywhere he went he not only fought his way onward but plundered and destroyed the encampments that he captured. His daring raid and charge caused the greatest alarm indeed and after starting to retreat general Gonsentinian Aronburg with a troop of cavalry and dragons pursued him not only with cavalry and regular troops but also with the aid of everyone in that part of the country of siege capable of bearing arms. Finding that the whole christian army was aroused, he made for the sunbea river on the bank of which his force was almost annihilated after sanguinary fighting and he himself captured. He was passed for two hours in confinement but through the help of secret spies within the christian lines managed to escape and get again within the glandelinian armies.

Meanwhile the blockade was maintained with the same vigor and it had become more and more difficult for the many thousands of blockade runner as such vessels were generally called to slip into any ports which were not held by the Angelinian fleets and forces. On the sixth day an attempt by a christian vala naval force to take fortress Seward by sea water was a failure. Later in the same day a combined naval and military force under general Gillsmore made a desperate attack battered fortress Seward in the rear to pieces with a rain of shells and explosives at a rate of a hundred per minute and took fortress Att Atlanta one of the outer harbor defenses. Hells by an enormous number were thrown into the city of Andean itself but the city was not taken. The Angelinians had also during the beginning of the siege built an immense ram six hundred feet long in the Norma river but on its way to the sea it encountered a whole rebel fleet and was captured half disabled and in a sinking condition after a short but fierce action. From the first the glandelinians had expected foreign governments who sided with her cause to interfere for the sake of getting supplies of all kinds, if for nothing else at least. They had hoped also to secure a large navy to patrol around the coast coasts and help their help their sun submarines but the close blockade maintained by the Abbissanian authorities prevented with every exception any more vessels built in the Angelinian ports or elsewhere from getting to sea. In the country of Gonsencia agents of the Confederate government of Glandelinia succeeded in having many thousands of vessels built and manned.

Francis Smither the Angelinian Prime Minister in Gonsencia warned that foreign government of the nature of the vessels and their destination at least, but for some reason the Gonsentinians though believed to be an ally to Angelina did not stop the building of these glandelinian warships in her own harbors. They were even allowed to put to sea and the result was that during the time up to December many vessels of all christian nations entering or trying to enter the region of submarine siege were captured or sunk with all on board and all nations shipping was driven from the ocean, owners of vessels putting their ships under glandelinian flags in order to prevent the glandelinian ships from capturing them or submarines from sinking them. Hundreds of horrible tragedies shocking to relate occurred on account of this, for instance of women and children being on ships sunk and thousands of them drowned or burned in the conflagrations started in steamers by attacking glandelinian ships. The glandelinian ship the most noted glandelinian cruiser was the Vanity Fair followed by others known as Andean, Vivian Wickey, and the Anna Aronburg. Most of these war ships were purposely built for cruise cruising around to prevent foreign ships from entering christian harbors of Angelina and Galverinia. One of these ships the Anna Aronburg alone took sixty five transport steamers belonging to Protestantia, and sunk ten others loaded with women and children passengers on the charge they were transports bringing provisions to the enemies of Glandelinia.

CHAPTER TWENTY TWO.

In the meanwhile while all these things were happening and the siege of Vivian Wickey was in full progress and the battles along sunbea creek were all raging besides Evangelina Grania and Jennie Andean the novelty of the war for glandelinian subjects in Glandelinia had worn off for the cause of the child slaves and enlistments for the army were increasing rapidly but nevertheless it was deemed necessary to resort to conscription by the glandelinian governments or a draft. There was no objection to the draft as was expected but especially in the city of Vanio Vanity Fair where the christians had fought before there was a serious riot not on account of the conscription but because so many were put out of the draft because of slight physical defects and the mlb had a control for nearly three weeks of December 1912. During this time about five hundred and fifty buildings were destroyed or burned, over two hundred and fifty million dollars worth of property destroyed and a terrible number of lives sacrificed. The mob had a special hatred of children who were foreigners in particular or slaves and many were brutally murdered because their parents had refused to become glandelinian citizens or allow their children to do so. Among the buildings burned was a child slaves confinement house, fortunately there was time for the many thousands of frightened children to escape by back doors and windows before the fiercer fiercer rioters gained entrance to the front. The riot was finally put down by the police aided by the militia who were hurried from the National Home guards for the purpose. It was estimated that over twelve thousand five hundred of the rioters were killed throughout the three week insurrection. The draft however was very successful, and it even tended to greatly increase the volunteering and so far answered the purpose and all men between the ages of eighteen and forty five years except those who were mentally or physically unfit for service were subject to military service and all men between those ages were enrolled. For various reasons in Glandelinia there were many exemptions that caused many more riots. The rioters threatening to gain power and cause a general rebellion in Glandelinia made the exemptions become much fewer and the law of draft was rigorously enforced. There were no substitutes for every able bodied man was himself a conscript.

In Angelina no draft was made and there was no one except Major Galverinians who had conscientious scruples against fighting and those among the Galverinians who had suffered very much for conscience sake.

Though on account of the siege of Vivian Wickey and the blockades the advance in prices was great in Angelina and Abbissania and Galverinia it was still in comparison with that of the other far away christian nations. Early in December the following were some of the prices quoted in national money in every country: shoes two hundred and twenty five dollars per pair, flour and vegetables, three hundred and seventy five dollars per barrel, bacon ninety five dollars per pound, potatoes ninety five dollars per bushel, butter twenty five dollars per pound. Many other things which were considered the necessities of life were absolutely unobtainable so close was the blockade of ports and Vivian Wickey. The suffering in those nations for want of those articles was exceedingly great but it fell more heavily upon women and children who had suffered the sad, giftless Christmas day. In the armies in this war itself the lack of quinine and other drugs and main medicines was also severely felt.

And it was evident on the sixth day of the battle of Andean that final success was to be on the side of the Angelinian forces whether they captured Andean or not. In spite of the bravery and endurance of the glandelinians they had steadily lost almost everywhere except in main sections of Vivian Wickey.

The battle of Andean had now been going on for six days and one night. General Hic-jollyster Johnston's army cut off from the rest of Vivian Wickey and her section sections was rapidly using up his resources and was suffering from lack of men supplies and officers. But there was not a few in the christian armies under Maurice Costello who failed to see this, they were getting tired of this terrible continuous fighting indeed, and no one did not hesitate to say so. Moreover it was getting near the time for general Hanson well planned movement against the rebel armies under Man ay at Norma Gonsinia and unless there should soon be some signal success with the capture of Andean the war parties feared that general Vivian might not be successful at Norma Gonsinia and Evangelina Grania and also that a compromise might be made with the rebels by some one to end the war in favor of their side. It was also evident that a single head for all the besieging armies in the field before Vivian Wickey was needed in case general Hanson would withdraw his own command, for general Hanson himself had no intention to stay there himself or allow his generals to stay there. He intended only to bring the armies he first commanded, force his way in a certain distance so as to reinforce Hanson and then leave his commands behind to go elsewhere to command new armies but he wished to have a general to be appointed to take command at Vivian Wickey in his place—a man whom who so should be responsible, for the whole plan of operations everywhere around Vivian Wickey.

Accordingly General Hanson Vivian had held a convention on December fourth during the battle of Andean was raging far to the north and general Hanson felt it might certain he would have to revive the rank of lieutenant general in chief, which had been previously been held by himself and general Robert Vivian his brother. In the convention many declared that Concentinian Aronburg would be the man surely needed but though Hanson knew it was a wise plan yet Concentinian Aronburg was needed by him as he was to move Aronburg to another command as early as June the next year if the war was still raging, place him in command of a vast army already being mobilized and move it in full force upon Galverine and elsewhere in Galverinia. He wished also the capture of Francis Atlanta, Big Girlknool and other places and new forces to be commanded by Bonlign to defend Angelina Agathia (Angelina) the main goal of the rebels. Concentinian Aronburg at once bestowed it upon the man whom public opinion as well as military judgement pointed out as surely fitted to relieve it and for whom the rank was really created; general Ulysses S. G. Manso the one who had started the seige of Vivian's key. The wisdom of the step was soon to be made manifest.

In the meantime on the morning of the seventh day of the battle of Andean a plan of connected action against Mic-Hollister Johnston was immediately arranged. General Maurice Costelloe making his headquarters that night with his main army had general Great Heart to carry out his most desperate orders. In the western line of battle the most important movements were intrusted to general Jacob Baldwin.

CHAPTER TWENTY THREE.

MAURICE COSTELLOE'S MAIN PLAN OF ATTACK.....

General Maurice Costelloe's main plan was that the main armies under his command should attack Andean in general army and that general Herman Raymond Equal should move southward from Jennie Vivian toward the rear of Andean and storm the rebel positions there thus penetrating the heart of the wicked Glandelinian Confederacy. By engaging the Glandelinian forces in that part of the country he would and could prevent the sending of reinforcements and supplies to Mic-Hollister Johnston. That latter part of the rebel positions to be assaulted was believed to be entirely free from the actual presence of very large armies. It was now indeed experienced in a marked degree many of the hardest of war measures during this tremendous battle. General Maurice Costelloe and Greatheart were convinced that at Andean the whole Glandelinian confederacy was a mere shell and that vigorous and relentless measures would make it easily collapse so that the capture of Andean would be certain.

The march and assaults were begun simultaneously by Great Heart and Maurice Costelloe. And they had the ablest generals of the Glandelinians to contend with, general Mic-Hollister Johnston and Meldonia. General Maurice Costelloe with an army of 11,200,000 men nearly double that of Mic-Hollister Johnston started at once that morning to attempt what had been the ruin of many brave men and generals before him, a general battle for Andean. The Christian forces in long tremendous battle lines entered the very rough country near the Red Hiding Hood woods near the Sunbeam Creek, known as the Sunbeam Region where general Mic-Hollister Johnston's sixty two million men were quite a match for general Costelloe's larger number. For the beginning of two hours and a half there was a most terrible struggle with fighting of the most savage character and a fearful loss of life beyond estimating indeed. Gradually by combined assaults covered by artillery and cavalry charges general Mic-Hollister Johnston's army torn up badly was forced to move back his thinned lines until general Maurice Costelloe reached Meldonia Harbor Junction about eight miles from Red Hiding Hood Woods. This occurred until ten o'clock in the morning. A brave and fruitless assault numbering ten alto together was then made upon Mic-Hollister Johnston's works in which six million men were shot down in half an hour and lasted all day convinced general Costelloe that it was useless to attempt to take Andean from the north, north or south. Altogether he had lost in the seven days conflict nearly sixty million men in killed, wounded and prisoners and his wicked antagonist about half as many. General Maurice Costelloe that afternoon despite his losses determined to cross the Sunbeam river and attack from the south and west simultaneously hoping to seize all the railroads in the possession of the foe and the fortified works also which brought supplies from Galverine to Mic-Hollister's army and Vivian's key. General Johnston now resolved to try an offensive movement of desperation and so sent general Do Convention down the Sunbeam Valley. The authorities at Jennie Vivian were greatly alarmed, and justly so. At Monocary Creek near Jennie Vivian general convention defeated in a severe conflict general Frank Wallace's division of Abyssinians, who courageously faced certain defeat and disaster in order to delay Convention, a matter of the highest importance.

General Convention then hurried on toward Jennie Vivian and appeared before the defenses on the north side of the town and tried to get the other foe forces there to join him in an attack but not receiving help and fearing to attack them alone he retreated but carrying with him much booty. One incident of this raid was the taking of a line of Christian works held by general Chamberlanger's detachment of his forces. On the refusal of the Angelinians to yield the works a bitter hard fighting fighting.

MAURICE COSTELLOE'S PLAN OF ATTACK.

LOSSES FROM THE SEVEN DAYS CONFLICTS OUTSIDE OF ANDEAN.

Thompsonia would take care of himself did not follow though he sent reinforcements to aid him. Hoodwinked meantime, pressed on toward general Nashville's divisions of Christian forces and after a severe fight of four hours duration with four divisions of the Christian armies under generals Schofield, Butterly, and Franklin Piaroor tried to besiege the whole Christian army under these leaders. But he immediately sallied forth and fiercely attacked Hoodwinked army cutting it all to pieces and routed it completely. So thoroughly was this done that this section of the wicked

Accordingly general Hanson Vivian had held a convention on December fourth during the time the battle of Jordan was raging far to the north and general Hanson felt it mighty certain he would have to revive the rank of lieutenant general in chief, which had been previously been held by himself and general Robert Vivian his brother. In the convention many declared that Generalissimo Aronburg would be the man surely needed but though Hanson knew it was a wise plan yet Generalissimo Aronburg was needed by him as he was led to move Aronburg to another command as early as June the next year if the war was still raging, place him in command of the vast army of the north.

who courageously faced certain defeat and disaster in order to delay Convention, a matter of the highest importance.

General Convention then hurried on toward Jennie Vivian and appeared before the defenses on the north side of the town and tried to get the other foe forces there to join him in an attack but not receiving help and fearing to attack them alone he retreated but carrying with him such booty. One incident of this raid was the taking of a line of christian works held by general Chamberburger by detachment of his forces. On the refusal of the Angelinians to yield the works he after hard fighting retreated after setting fire to a great part of the encampment while the seventh day battle of Jordan was in progress general Mic-Hollister Johnston had reported to general Mic-Aillister Stencki;

"At last the christian armies before us have a head. If I receive no reinforcements before to night Jordan is lost as I will have to abandon her." General Mic-Hollister was right. General Castellio though he warned Hanson of conventions raid sent reinforcements to Jennie Vivian, but nevertheless such raid he sent general Sheridan into the gunbeam valley and put him in command.

This general forty four years old had shown great ability throughout his services of the siege of Jordan and was perhaps the best of all christian officers at that time. It was apparent that this beautiful and war itself. General Castellio's orders were that nothing whatv whatv ever should be left to invite the enemy to return in that location. Take all provisions whether take and take all the stock wanted for the use of your cow and. Such as cannot be consumed or used destroy or blow up. Burn everything that can be burned. Make a clean sweep.

The order was indeed thoroughly carried out. Sheridan had destroyed over 10,000 barns filled with wheat, hay, and all kinds of farming implements, over seventy five big mills with flour and wheat making the bigger grain elevators ever seen, and had driven in front of the advancing army over forty two thousand six hundred head of cows alone and thousands of other stock, and had killed and issued to the troops not less than a score of thousands of rebel sheep. Many houses and other places were burned railroad belonging or in possession of the enemy destroyed and all trees that could burn set on fire. Bridges blown up or burned and the rivers dammed to make floods. General Sheridan's tactics proved to be unanswerable general than any of his predecessors and Convention was so completely worsted that there were no more valley raids during the siege of Jordan. The glandelinians could not spare men to make another attempt and the country around was so thoroughly ravaged that there was little to invite invasion of the christian lines by the rebels.

Maurice Castellio's movements brought him in front of Jordan fair. He succeeded in cutting two of the railroads supplying general Johnston. He was thus greatly inconvenienced. General Mic-Hollister Johnston had such a long line of trains elements that he was unable to send reinforcements to other parts of the battling rebel line the resources of the glandelinians had been hourly growing less and less, and it was impossible for Johnston to receive reinforcements to fill his badly battered ranks. The courage and energy shown by general Mic-Hollister Johnston and his army in thus fighting a slowly losing game were more wonderful than can ever be conceived. General Greathart in the meanwhile was slowly forcing general Franklin Atlanta division of Mic-Hollister and the worse fighting glandelinians there are. General Johnston was however only waiting until he could get general Greathart far enough from his base of supplies to offer more general battle under great circumstances which would be completely unfavorable to the whole christian army under Greathart's Greatharts single supplies were brought by ten wagon trains, which his immense cavalry forces had to continually defend in sharp fighting with rebel cavalry and thus the further he advanced against the stubbornly contesting rebel lines the weaker was his force indeed. Just at this time general Franklin Johnston was wounded severely as the conflict grew in fury and Mic-Hollister Johnston had to put general Hoodwinked in his place before the army without a leader would become demoralized. This glandelinian general with his Mic-Hollisterians was one of the hardest fighters in the glandelinian armies but nevertheless general Greathart succeeded in taking general Atlanta works destroying everything which would be likely to aid an enemy of our Dear Lord, such as iron foundries, manufacturing, and Grain Elevators.

In the hope of checking general Greatharts further advance and success the glandelinian main general now ordered general Atlanta and Hoodwinked to leave his torn and broken positions from which he was being forced and marched around toward general Nashville's flank of general Greatharts rear which general Thomason of the rear army was covering in general Greatharts movements. It was hoped that by this movement that general Greathart would be compelled to follow general Hoodwinked and that two things would be immediately brought about, the destruction of Greatharts christian forces, and the removal of the seat of fighting again to Jennie Vivian or Red Riding Hood Woods. put general Greathart believing that general Thomason would take care of himself did not follow though he sent reinforcements to aid him. Hoodwinked meantime, pressed on toward general Nashville's divisions of christian forces and after a severe fight of four hours duration with four divisions of the christian armies under generals Schuffield Butterfly, and Franklin piercer tried to besiege the whole christian army under these leaders. put he immediately sallied forth and fiercely attacked Hoodwinked army cutting it all to pieces and routed it completely. so thoroughly was this done that this section of the wicked glandelinian army was never reorganized. . . . The loss to the the glandelinians was irretrievable. . . . General Greathart after resuming his fierce advance found himself with no glandelinian army of any strength between him and the sea near Andean, nor indeed between him and Mic-Holleston John Johnston. He could march through the Georgian region to the old abandoned positions of general gannun's there thence to the rear of Mic-Holleston John's army closest to Andean, which thus attacked front and rear, would be either compelled to surrender or forced to retreat from Andean itself. In order to move with the region of the country through success general Greathart resolved to live off the region of the country. He which he might advance around to the rear of Johnston's vast glandelinian army. He took his vast wagon trains with only ten days provisions, and left behind everything which possibly could be spared. On the hour of eleven o'clock he left the captured positions formerly held by general Atlanta with sixty million troops to begin his march to the rear of the rebel army under Johnston. To prevent the enemy learning his abrupt intentions he cut all the telegraph wires to the north tore up immense lines of railroad tracks within half an hour if you will believe it and burned thirty small bridges and ten big ones so that no intelligence of his movements or means of approach would be left for general Howe Hoodwinked or Johnston in case general Thomson's would be defeated. . . . or nearly six hours nothing was heard of general Greathart's army from other christian division divisions. General Greathart's route was southeast, the orders were to advance wherever possible and practicable by all roads and fields, over lanes and meadows and through woods, as nearly parallel as possible. During the swift advance the army foraged in the country in that region of Andean most mercilessly, and to this end each brigadier commander organized a good and sufficient foraging parties, who gathered forage of any kind took many child slaves, ruined houses and farm buildings, took meat and provisions of any kind vegetables, cornmeal, or whatever was needed by the command, shipping all the time to keep in the wagon trains at least ten or eleven days provisions. Orders were even ordered to enter dwellings, or commit any trespass of any kind in order to secure child slaves and set them free, to gather any thing necessary, turnets potatoes or other vegetables and to drive in all stocks in sight of their camps. . . . all the other vegetable and to drive in all stocks in sight of their camps. . . . Here corps commanders alone they had issued orders to destroy mills, houses, cotton gins, child slave plantations, child slave mills and other war works etc. . . . Here was permitted, but as guerrillas and bushwhackers collected the christian advance and no loyal Galverinian burned bridges and obstructed roads and lanes and meadows, and showed signs of local hostilities, the army commanders ordered and enforced a devastation more or less relentless accordingly to the measure of such hostility.

As for horses, mules, wagons, railroad trains etc. . . . printed to the glandelinian Galverinians the cavalry and artillery as a repro printed freely and without limit, discriminating however between the rich, who were usually more hostile and the poor and industrious who were usually neutral and most friendly, or sided with christians. In a all the foraging parties engaged endeavored to leave with each family who proved to be loyal to an Angelinian's cause a reasonable portion for maintenance. . . . These raids and instructions were carried out as far as practicable, but war is indeed war or war is "Hell" as Sherman said, and the path of the advancing christian army sixty miles long and ten miles wide advancing and pressing forward was as the track of a tornado, an array of floods, and a gigantic conflagration combined. Railroads operated by the glandelinians were rendered useless by the men and soldiers tearing up the rails, heating and twisting each one so that it could not be of any further use as a rail, bridges over where across every small or large stream were burned or blown up, buildings were demolished and in short everything which might be of use from a military point of view was taken, rendered useless or destroyed. During this six hours advance there was comparatively severe fighting, besides cavalry engagements by the score and on the evening late the rebel forces evacuated that portion of the rebel line and the christian troops marched in. General Greathart had already communicated with the main line of Angelinian gunboats warships, and numerous on the rivers. This was the first real news that had been heard of Greathart's army since it had pressed on from the captured works under general Atlanta. Meanwhile the blockade was being maintained more closely than ever. . . . in desperate and unsuccessful attempt was made by gunboats, warships, and shore batteries and floating batteries on the rivers combined to shell and captured port towns Aurandocillo which guarded the main entrance to Andean, a great resort for blockade runners. Simultaneously general B. Bankers Mic-Fern was sent with a large land force supported by a long line of gunboats and warships, and other warcraft up the Sunbeam river to attack Shreveport's army of artillery defending Aurandocillo and desperate a rebel army and cavalry in that part of the region. These expeditions were all bloody failures, general Mic-Fern being defeated with the loss of his under generals Sabin Mic-gunner, and Pleasant Horner who were wounded. . . . the sun fire over a length of ten miles all day at that. The blockade blockade which had been frequently evaded while the Junction of Andean was now shelled but without success. A hitherto successful christian cruisers and armed transports and warships had been fairly successful in blockading the entrance to Winkley Bay but a few vessels from time to time had slipped in or out. It was determined to storm the forts which defended the entrance. This enterprise was trusted to admiral Thomas who with fourteen thousand armed transports, a thousand warships, and fourteen hundred gunboats and eighty big warships, and four hundred and forty four monitors were to force their way past the fortifications of Gertrude Angelina and Cedernine and the obstructions in the channel into the bay where the rebel iron clad rams were stationed protecting the main glandelinian fleet of warships. The uproar of this conflict thus staged at this part of the siege was beyond describing, all flames in the bay were killed, and great jets of ice along the shore was shattered to bits by the concussion of so many guns. Explosions occurred by the thousands, and all the forts in particular Gertrude Angelina demolished many ships, tearing them to pieces, and filling the bay with floating wreckage. The slaughter on board all ships was horrible the flagship went down and many other ships and the sky over the fleet was fairly covered with burning shells and high explosions and the smoke was as thick as if it was a canopy of atoms clouds. The rebel fortress was commanded by general Buchamer Grutizer who had been commander of the Lucille Jackson fortifications earlier during the siege and who had been transferred to Gertrude Gertrude Angelina. In order to get a clearer view of the fierce and sanguinary operations admiral Thomas stationed himself in one of the shrouds of his own warship to which one of the officers insisted on fastening him immediately in case a sudden shock from a volley of shells exploding high in the air, or from firing guns should throw him off or being wounded he should fall into the cold ice water. Admiral Thomas had the aid of the land forces also to whom he expected the forts would soon surrender.

The frightful engagement also lasting here for a whole day was a total failure and during the struggle the Angelinians met with most severe losses themselves.

To oppose admiral Thomas' intention to run the gauntlet of fortifications the rebel warships swarmed against the fleet, submarines got busy and the rebel warships joined in amid the crash of hell and the fighting was redoubled and the noise also.

The rebel flagship the Calwell Wilkerson, and another ship the Janet meeting side by side with one single Angelinian warship was rased and scattered and sunk with all on board. During the engagement also an Angelinian and glandelinian warship went down fighting together, another rebel ship was captured with nothing but dead or wounded men on board lying amid the wreckage of guns and timbers and obstructions another called Portugalier was also captured in the same collision and the glandelinian was also, and the ship following it the Marler was captured floating alongside and two other rebel ships were completely destroyed by means of a christian torpedo and the portine was captured with decks strewn with killed and wounded. The Bahia was sunk with forty followers, and the Braziller surrendered.

The peculiar sight of the results was astonishing. The water was smeared in wreckage, dead bodies and floating smokestacks, half submerged gun turrets and broken fragments of ships, shattered timbers, spars, signal towers, big boxes, large beams and all things imaginable in a conglomeration of mass.

Notwithstanding the successes and slight failures of the christian armies and the continued non-intervention of foreign nations siding with glandelinia there was a party of considerable size in the Galverinian country which was clamoring for the siege to be pressed quickly to a termination. The siege and war had been prolonged for nearly a year with out any certain signs of an end, taxes were too high to be borne, the expenses for keeping up the military and naval establishments were terribly enormous, countless hundreds of families had lost one or more members by death on the field, or in the hospital, or in rebel prisons. The fact that over a hundred million more men had been called for during the past months led many to believe as even among christian nations that the christian armies either at Vivian Wickey or elsewhere had not been so successful as reported and that ultimate triumph was hope a hopeless.

Nevertheless the Angelinians were not thinking at all of ever giving up, such an idea was out of the question and not only that but the grim determination of the Angelinian and Abbeismian governments not to compromise with rebels and enemies of Our Blessed Lord or to offer then any terms of peace, except such as may be based upon a complete and unconditional surrender of their wicked hostility, and a return to their just allegiance to the Abbeismian country and laws and to return back to God and all that they should.

Many had also declared that after ten months or less already of failure to restore the Abbeismian and Angelinian Union by the experiment of bloody war—justice, humanity, and the public welfare demand that immediate efforts be made for the capture of Vivian Wickey and Galverina with a view to an ultimate convention of the remaining Angelinian states of Abbeismian, and various acts of the treacherous Galverinian disloyal governments which had been responsible for the capture of Vivian Wickey were declared to be a most shameful violation of the Angelinian nation and it was clanged among many other things that such usurpation of extraordinary and dangerous powers in helping the rebels should be crushed like a snake under a steamroller. If others thought there had not been enough gained to make the recapture of Vivian Wickey likely, the destruction of so many christian ships in desperate attacks on water, the success of the rebels in northern Andean, the successful holding of Evangelin's Granin, and Lieghburg Landing by the glandelinian glandelinians, the capture of Norma's Bridge only a day or two after the world had renounced the rebels resistance to the siege a failure, the arrangements by which Mic-Allister made to prevent the capture of Andean and Norma Gathierine—the withdrawal of Hudson's army from Norma's river and St. Dominian fortifications, the conviction of many that it was a very bad policy to change to leaders while the horrors of the siege was in progress and a growing recognition of the greatness of Mic-Allister Stanck and so on gave the whole world christian or not the full impression that Vivian Wickey would never be recaptured.

In the meantime general Greathart left St. Atlanta's works and owing to the numerous little fortified streams and swamps along the region of gulches River he struck directly for Col. Golub Golubator. A little later he entered this portion of the rebel works and a large part of the rebel army was totally burned. Whether the fires were started by the glandelinian troops as they went out of the rebel trenches or by the Angolinian troops as they came in as they had been shown at all, each side charged the other with the action. But he had never been shown at all, each side charged the other with the action. But he had never been shown at all, each side charged the other with the action. But he had never been shown at all, each side charged the other with the action.

By the time Greathart approached general Goldsboro's line general Bragg felt able to risk an attack, which was made with great vigor, he was however repelled fiercely and Greathart carried his positions where he received reinforcements under general Wilmington. Both armies at this section not halted waiting for further developments in the issue of Mic-Holleston's line of battle elsewhere.

during this same day there had been several attempts of both the glandelinians and Angolinians to bring about the conflict when general Alexander Sternerton of the rebels with two companions and a party of officers met general Hanson, Ivian and his brother Robert Ivian by previous arrangement on board an Abbeannian battleship on the Morris gun River, and indeed had a full intelligent and amicable discussion of the state of affairs. But as general Hanson Ivian refused to negotiate except upon the basis of the complete disbandment of the glandelinian forces, the restoration of the Angolinian National authority in Calvernia and the unconditional surrender of Ivian, Ivian and the main glandelinian generals, the leaving of rebel armies from Calvernia, the ending of child slavery and the acknowledgement of the abolition of the massacres of innocent victims of war, the conference came to nothing. During the conversation a general Alexe Alexander attempted to show that general Hanson Ivian would be justified in making terms with "Rebels" by referring to the case of Abbeannian in Eighteen fourteen One eighteen forty one. To this general Hanson Ivian replied:

"I'm not strong of Abbeannian history or any descriptions about that rebellion and its results. I depend mainly on general Robert Ivian my brother for that. All I remember is that the world the whole world had a hard time from wiping out the rebel provinces all together during the siege of the city of glandelinia in eighteen fifty.

On the afternoon of the seventh day of the battle of Andean general Wilmington's works had been taken and the rebel armies were almost completely without their works. At the same time general Greathart at the head of his infantry and cavalry made another raid down the Unbean Valley if you please as far as to Andean cutting the railroads rivers and bridges and other points upon which general Mic-Holleston Johnston largely depended for his supplies. Then after joining Maurice Costello general Greathart was sent to the southeast of Andean. Sharp conflicts were fought in the evening and the Angolinian troops were again victorious. General Amickson found unable to hold his own works sent a telegraph message to general Mic-Holleston at Ivian Wickey announcing that it was completely necessary for general Mic-Holleston Johnston's army to evacuate the whole line of works outside of Andean and take refuge in the fortifications around Andean at once. The message reached general Mic-Holleston Johnston on the late evening of the seventh of December when he was in his own headquarters holding a convention with his glandelinian generals. The preparations for the evacuation of the works told the glandelinian armies and the loyal inhabitants of Andean what was coming and everywhere there was indescribable confusion.

By the Christians a hundred glandelinian glandelinian naval rams and batteries were captured just when rebel troops were in the act of placing explosives with the purpose of blowing the up, rebel warehouses were set on fire, hundreds of thousands of barrels of liquor were knocked in the head and their contents poured into the gutters or into the rivers as a precaution. Some rebel soldiers getting drunk from the whiskey and brandy and scoop up began to pillage their own comrades in their craze. Early at night general Wheeler learning that the rebels soldiers under general Mic-Holleston Johnston were evacuating the main glandelinian works advanced under general fire from all the rebel guns of the fortifications and despite difficulties and horrors of losses entered them with his troops and held them. At last after seven days fearful conflict almost every night also the main rebel works in front of Andean had been taken and the glandelinians had been forced to retreat to a little long lines of fortifications.

Six hours after this early the next morning general Vl Felixator of the rebels being surrounded by Greathart's army was compelled to surrender his division at the Andean Courthouse seven miles north of Andean whether he had retreated after Johnston evacuated the main works. The prisoners thus taken were held and their horses and arms and ammunition taken from them. The surrender was an Unconditional one. Those among the rebels who were not guilty of any murders and assassinations of children or other helpless persons or who had not been guilty in holding child slaves were allowed to keep their horses and return to their homes on the agreement not to fight further against the Christian nation.

The surrender of general Felixator was recognized to be the final issue of the struggle at Andean. general Maurice Costello himself visited the captured rebel works and arrangements the first hour after the capture, and walked through all the company streets and paraded at the scores of thousands of wooden barracks of the rebel army. The rejoicing of the Angolinians however had not ended when the whole Christian army at Ivian Wickey, and the whole country and world itself was horrified by the news of the accepted assassination of general Hanson Ivian by a rebel spy on the evening of December sixteenth. He attempted crimes seemed to have been the plans of a Calvernian rebel sympathizer or filled with probably a half crazy idea of vengeance against all Christianity joined with a desire with of great notoriety. general Maurice Costello was attacked by another rebel spy conspirator but he was not wounded.

CHAPTER TWENTY FOUR.

A GRAPHIC DESCRIPTION OF THE TERRIFIC FIRE AT ANDEAN, WRITTEN, IN WHICH VIOLET AND HER SISTERS HAD THEIR EXPERIENCE IN THE CITY, AS TOLD IN PREVIOUS CHAPTERS PAST.

44 Vol 7 Part 1.

In the meantime general Greenheart left St. Atlanta works and owing to the numerous little fortified strongholds and camps along the region of gunpowder River he struck directly for Col. Columbus. A little later he entered this portion of the rebel works and a large part of the rebel encampment was totally burned. Whether the fires were started by the gladiolus troops or they went out of the rebel trenches or by the Angellian troops as they came in had never been shown at all, each side charged the other with the action. Simultaneously with the taking of these rebel encampments, other works were being evacuated by the gladiolus after sharp fighting and the christian troops took possession. Other gladiolus brigades followed the example and the troops thus gathered together with the remnant of the rebel army were in answer to the public demand of the Allister Stank placed under the leadership of general Bragg. Bragg's Greenheart to lead through this region to gain the Hollister. The four was in reality much more hazardous than his march through the other portions of the country and each was difficult to travel through for supplies were less in sure and resistance was more severe than usual. Above all there was an opposing general who if not strong enough to risk an open fight was not a strong enough ditional one. Those among the rebels who were not guilty of any murders and assassinations of children or other helpless persons or who had not been guilty in holding child slaves were allowed to keep their horses and return to their homes on the agreement not to fight further against the christian nations.

The surrender of general Hollister was recognized to be the final issue of the struggle at Andromeda. General Maurice Costello himself visited the captured rebel works and encampments the first hour after the capture, and walked through all the company streets and traveled at the scores of thousands of wooden barracks of the rebel army. The reloading of the Angellians however had not ended when the whole christian army at Vivian Wickley and the whole country and world itself was horrified by the news of the attempted assassination of general Hanson. Vivian Wickley was the scene of the execution of December sixteenth. He attempted crimes seemed to have been the plans of a Calverinian rebel sympathizer or filled with probably a half crazy idea of vengeance against all christianity joined with a desire with of great notoriety. General Hanson was attacked with a desire with of great conspiracy but he was not wounded. It was not until after the attempt to kill general Hanson and the whole country itself north and south except gladiolus realized how much they loved and honored and respected this man christian commander in authority and though strict in military discipline no vindictiveness had been apparent in his word words or actions and the Calverinians were furious over the attempt to kill the Allister. For they felt they had been in danger of losing one who would have been their total friend and who was at the same time a believer and on the early morning of December eight the day of the Immaculate Conception general Davis Jefferson of the rebels was captured and shortly afterwards two more rebels, rebel armies surrendered, one after another laying down their arms. General Hollister, Johnston still had a strong force and was now sheltered behind the strong fortifications of Andromeda. A column of gladiolus soldiers captured if lined up in squads could be over thirty miles long and would have been a sight indeed. In all that morning about one million had surrendered and were sent to the rear for transport transferring to the internment camps and never before during the siege had such large forces been taken prisoners in one single hour.

LOSSES FROM THE SEVEN DAYS CONFLICTS OUTSIDE OF ANDROMEDA.

If the losses which can be estimated during the battle itself the total was appalling. A loss of life in battle, far from mortal wounds was thought to have been nearly equal on both sides and was as unestimated while the number of christian prisoners captured by the rebels amounted to six hundred thousand and in all, the losses resulting from the facts that countless hundreds of thousands of men were permanently disabled, killed up a vast debt to interest and principal of which would be a heavy burden for many years to come being about 9,458,999,656 Dollars in those seven months of the siege probably alone. The cost of the Angellians to maintain the siege of the child slaves rescued to be transferred to other states for adoption at a cost estimated to be about two and a half billion five hundred million dollars, the property destroyed, the besieged rebel armies during fierce conflicts at all the Angellian governments. All southern notes and bonds of Angellians were a total loss as well as the states, counties, and city loans issued in aid of the christian armies besieging Vivian Wickley. Altogether while the cost of the war written here cannot never be correctly estimated or calculated the total cost of the two years of siege of Vivian Wickley was over eighty nine billion dollars alone. The debt reached its highest point just a few weeks before the fall of Vivian Wickley when it amounted to $89,830,786,423,124... This included the greenbacks on which no interest was paid. Nearly eight hundred billion of money had also been spent or expended and the cities towns counties states had also spent much in cash besides incurring debts. The payment for pensions was also a vast sum, enormous. Soon after the beginning of the war and the siege of the war the terrible accounts of the sufferings of the wounded and the needs of the soldiers on the fields and in hospitals, and also the needs of rescued child slaves, wounded and maimed children, frightened refugees and the sick from disease driven in now from horror and fear led to the establishment among the Angellian countries of the Sanitary and the Christian Catholic commissions, the former but the corps of officers, doctors, physicians, nurses, and students, whose duty was to look after the many millions of suffering, the countless maimed and the needy. It had countless hospitals, hospital cars and trains, and digital boats and ships, and hospital encampments. Its litter and countless ambulances were on the field before the battle were over to care for the many wounded who needed help. Through it were distributed vast amounts of clothing, medicines, stores and various other comforts which had been prepared in the Angellian hop homes. Hundreds of millions of dollars to carry on this work of mercy

It was indeed one of the first most terrible disasters which had been known so early in the siege and the column of water which had been nearly two miles wide, scores of miles long and forty to fifty feet high swept from the river from the bursted levees with amazing rapidity having traveled a distance of twenty miles in fifteen minutes. Without scarcely a moment's warning whole encampments by the scores and many cities of army barracks on the christian side were carried away, even express trains and freight trains and other cars were unable to get away from the flood, and was overtaken with complete destruction. The flood swept on toward Jennie, Vivian even which was almost completely inundated with many buildings destroyed. About thirty two thousand two hundred and fifty christian soldiers were thought to have lost their lives, millions of tents were swept away and in some instances whole encampments of wooden army barracks were swept away and the flood was smashed in the wreckage of the buildings and the substance hurled up by the explosion, within the christian lines army property valued at ten million dollars was destroyed or rendered worthless.

So also on account of the explosion one of the long and beautiful suspension bridges in Angelina or Calvernia I mean stretched over the wide Norma River which was more than three miles in length and supported by wire cables, steel cables more than two feet thick, and which was one hundred and thirty three six feet above the water was shaken down by the concussion and totally wrecked.

Such is the horrors of war.

During this time also there were many serious disturbances which were especially frequent in the month of December the worse of which took place near Lucille's picket fortifications. The terrible disturbances culminated on December fourth when a immense crowd of glandelinians was addressed by a number of generals who acted as speakers who urged the most violent methods of gaining their ends against the christian besiegers. While the Angelinians were moving forward to disperse this tremendous concentration of rebel troops an immense mine was exploded under the christian lines two miles from Mansions headquarters killing and wounding so many that the loss was not to be estimated. In return the Angelinians charged down in terrible fury upon the one concentrated troops of rebels and fired upon the glandelinians with cannons and musketry with equally fatal effect and drove them back to their own fortifications in terrible confusion. Many glandelinian officers and the ringleaders of the explosions cause were taken prisoner, and brought to trial as murderers, forty four hundred were hanged, and all the others imprisoned.

It was a relief however to the Angelinians to find that all the ringleaders who caused the two immense explosions but one were Pure glandelinians and not Calvernian rebels as it had been suspected, and were of that class of glandelinian war anarchists whose purpose was to overthrow all christian governments and to do away with the rights of christian property in order to force the christian armies to raise the siege of Vivian Wick.

Again at the same time one of the chief generals of the christian army was shot and killed by glandelinian spies or assassins believed to be treasonable Calvernians siding with the glandelinians. A good number of these glandelinians were trailed by the powerful Angelinian civilian spy society and captured and tried for the murder, or abetting it. On the trial six were acquitted and in the case of others a mistrial was entered. It was therefore universally believed that the Angelinian jury had been bribed and popular feeling was greatly stirred in regard to the matter. So a mob of christian soldiers broke into the guard house and lynched seventeen of the glandelinians confined there, including those who had been on trial as well as ten who had been acquitted by direction of the court-marshal. The Calvernian government on the ground that that the murderers or hanged men were Calvernian subjects not in favor of the glandelinian rebellion, protested at once, though its minister at Pandora demanded reparation or otherwise otherwise they would compel all of Calvernia to make secession and side with the wicked rebellion. The Angelinian authorities were obliged to reply that while the Angelinian governments regretted the occurrence the punishment of the offenders or the mob of lynchmen rested with the authorities under general Hanson Vivian and that therefore without his consent the Angelinian governments could not grant an indemnity. On this the Calvernian minister took his departure and it seemed for a time as if the Loyal Calvernian governments would declare the whole state out of the Abbeonnan authority and also that the whole of Calvernia would side with glandelinia, but the affair was settled by the order of general Hanson Vivian who found the persons hanged not guilty of the offense that the real assassins had escaped and were glandelinians of the worse kind and so the lynchmen were disassociated from the army in disgrace and other members of the mob put on probation for two months. Shortly after diplomatic relations were resumed by both sides and more Calvernians then ever broke away from glandelinia and sided with Angelina.

Again if you please at the same time other trouble occurred. Some sailors from a Calvernian war vessel believed to be glandelinians were attacked by the rebels on the charge of being traitors and two were killed, others roughly handled taken prisoner and shot. The government of both the Angelinians and all of Calvernia fiercely demanded reparation. Glandelinia refused and now there was serious danger of the loyal Calvernians from becoming disloyal and breaking relations with glandelinia. The wholesale slaughter of many child slaves who were found to be unfit for further service threatened to exterminate these poor unfortunates in a short time, and the Angelinian government determined to interfere claiming that under the privileges which were acquired from Abbeonnan the Angelinian and Calvernian governments had the right to consider all child slaves under their own control so far as they were concerned.

General Hanson even sent a message to general McAllister Stanek that all such massacres of children should cease or all glandelinian prisoners would be shot and no quarter given to the besieged hereafter at all. Even vessels loaded with child slaves were seized and the children found on them sent to Abyssinilla. Other ships like these were immediately fired upon by christian fleets whether loaded with children or not, as they approached Vivian Wick and forced to surrender. So great was the disturbance over child slavery that the rebel governors of Vivian Wick were obliged to call out the whole militia of the city to preserve order and stop these christian raids upon child slaves if possible. The seizure was also in neighboring rivers and places within Vivian.

THE BLENDOLOMMEAN AND BOYKING ISLAND QUESTION..... ("1444")
THE FIRST BATTLE OF THE BLENDOLOMMEAN AND BOY KING ISLANDS AND ITS RESULTS. GREAT AND BRAVE EXPERIENCES, OF BRAVE MEN DURING THE SIEGE OF VIVIAN WICK ON THE SIDE OF THE CHRISTIANS. ONE GREAT BATTLE...

THE EXPERIENCE OF GENERAL BRUCE ROBERTSONIA DURING THE LONG AND BLOODY BATTLE OF RED RIDING HOOD WOODS, OR SUREKAM JUNCTION, AS IT WAS PROPERLY CALLED. FURTHER ADVENTURES OF THE CHRISTIAN GENERAL ROBERTSONIA..... THE PANIC CAUSED BY REBEL SPIES..... BATTLES OF BADAONIA, AND GASTEPFORT..... AN EXPERIENCE A CHRISTIAN PRISONER, AND SERVANTS DURING THE SHORT HORRIBLE SIEGE OF CARONDALE, TOLD IN PAST CHAPTERS, BUT RELATED HERE ONCE MORE.....

to obtain food and provisions captain... of this order was that no christian troops who had secured the island were to collect all the child slaves even slaves of any district near the towns and villages or place where christian troops were stationed, and in this way have them under close guard until they could be transferred to the christian warships. In carrying out this order many innocent children all slaves were taken from the slave houses and plantations, their masters, farmers and other men who owned them being driven from their homes while the children were collected in or around the towns. Their houses were burned and their mills and plantations laid waste. It was estimated that by the end of the month three hundred thousand child slaves were thus here huddled within the towns or in their immediate neighborhood, and even the Angelinians admitted that more than one half of these would have perished if the children had not been taken to the ships sooner, for they were in the same pickle as christian soldiers, constantly under fire, without sufficient food and shelter and thousands of them could have easily died of hunger and skin sickness and diss disease if the Angelinians had not taken measures to prevent it.

"This treatment of child slaves taken from the enemy by the enemy, is not civilized warfare," said the christian admiral. "It is cruel extermination of helpless innocent child slaves."

It was thought and also believed that in all over two hundred and fifty child slaves in all the islands had perished during the early part of the siege at the hands of the glandelinians as a result of the rebels rather slaying them or compelling them to die by torture than allow them to be rescued and set free. The distress in any of the plengiglosenean islands was not by any means only caused by this barbarous action. It must be remembered that the smallest island was larger than Cuba itself and that many plantations on them had been laid waste by the war and siege and that all the rebel industries of the islands were prostrated. The devastation was mostly the work of the besiegers and not the insurgents.

The whole world itself had been deeply interested in the affairs of the besieged city of Vivian Jockey and its up starting plengiglosenean and Boy King Islands. Lying at the mouth of the Norma Run River but further out in the bay and only a few miles from Federal City the island punchkin could be made an enemy base for attack in time of war as all plengiglosenean and boy king islands were strongly fortified. In time of peace their productions would naturally seek a market in the whole christian world and many toys, picture books, story books, playthings and every delight children love naturally were manufactured in these islands as well as in Calverinia and it was believed the Wizard of Oz once resided in the biggest of the islands punchkin which was now held by the worse devils in human form that ever was known. From time to time even during the time Vivian Jockey was besieged and the islands under close guard from christian warships the full annexation of the islands had been proposed, and more than one ruler of the world itself had thought well of it pussy in the well.

President Furtherton of Mericinia had offered glandelinia in 1886 a sum of one hundred million five hundred thousand dollars for the punchkin island alone with its famous places and Emerald city but the offer was promptly rejected. Filibustering expeditions from Abbeinnia were attempted during the war and these were stopped by the rebels. While the siege was on there were many times when the petitions of the whole christian world were sorely tried on account of the giftless christmas day and by the injury to their trade, and by the fearful atrocities committed in the city of Vivian Jockey and its supporting islands. In October at night on Halowen the Mormonian steamer sailing under the Angelinian flag was captured by an Angelinian war ship and taken into the harbor of Anna Aronburg.

Here fifty three of her passengers and crew were shot as glandelinian spies using a foreign ship to carry out their purposes and flying the Angelinian flag in the bargain. The excitement throughout the whole christian world over this occurrence was exceedingly great. A protest having been made by the King of Mormonia Angelinia gave up the ship and paid a large sum for the benefit of the men who may have been Mormonians when shot as spies. The Angelinians and even the whole world had before the war invested large sums of money in sugar plantations and other farms and profits in these islands of Calverinia's coast and as a result of the glandelinian-Angelinian war, and the siege of Vivian Jockey and the policy of destruction followed by both sides, a vast amount of property belonging to Angelinians and many other nations had been destroyed and the profitable trade with the many islands and Calverinia ruined. Popul t feeling in the whole christian world was deeply moved by the stories of cruelty in the islands and in Vivian Jockey.

In accordance with this feeling the president of Mericinia, Protestantia, Blawlinia, Hine Hiskanelle, Mormonia and other christian nations offered to mediate between glandelinia and Abbeinnia, but their offer was declined by the glandelinians themselves and so the rebellion had to go on.

A few days later the glandelinian Prime Minister was assassinated at Vivian Jockey fair by a unknown person and a new rebel dynasty came into power. Upon the protests of the whole world which at that time feared the approach of such a gloomy kind of a christmas general pashberry was ordered to leave the islands but he would not yield. One whole fleet of christian ships had been lying in the harbor of punchkin island for about two days waiting for the foe ports when at about ten o'clock in the morning of November on Thanksgiving day the whole fleet was destroyed by mysterious explosions which occurred simultaneously. Two hundred officers and nearly fifty thousand men crews, and marines and sailor sailors perished either killed or drowned. An intense excitement prevailed in the whole Angelinian country and the world itself and the cry;

"Own with glandelinia" was heard everywhere. General Hannon Vivian ordered the Calverinian government to appoint men of the navy as a board of inquiry. After making a very careful examination they reported, on the last day of November that the ships had been literally blown up by mines placed under each ship and set to explode simultaneously and that the evidence to who was responsible for the disease disaster were the glandelinian authorities of Vivian Jockey. The Calverinian congress governments claimed that the explosions had taken place also inside of the vessels as well and proposed that a convention be held on the matter and to bring the ones guilty to justice. To this general Hannon Vivian at the time made no reply. Meantime affairs in Vivian Jockey and the plengiglosenean islands had not improved. General Hannon Vivian and many of his officers spoke of them as "completely intolerable." There seemed no reason to expect any improvement whatever unless the city of Vivian Jockey and the islands and all the strong fortifications were captured during the time the battle of ndrean had been raging general Hannon Vivian sent a special message to the Angelinian and Calverinian governments in which he said;

"It is plain that the besieged city of Vivian Jockey and her fortresses and fortified islands cannot be captured by present methods. In the name of god and humanity, for the sake of the Sacred Heart of Jesus and his blessed Mother, in the name of humanity tenfold, in the name of civilization, in the name of the endangered interests of the world which gives us the right and duty to speak and act, the horrors in Mormonia Catherine and elsewhere in Vivian Jockey and her islands must stop under any conditions. General Hannon also passed a series of resolutions declaring;

"That as declared before all child slaves are and of right ought to be free and independent and have homes and parents as they should. That it is the duty of not Angelinia alone but the whole christian world itself in behalf of coming Christmas to demand that glandelinia should give up the islands and Vivian Jockey and withdraw its forces from the city and the whole of Calverinia altogether and cease the rebellion. That the Calverinian and Angelinian governments are empowered to use all the forces of the national states thus mobilized and to call out all military militia even by draft and conscription if necessary to carry out these enforceful resolutions. That for many children rescued from slavery that Angelinia and her loyal states disclaim any intention of control of said child slaves except for their freedom therefore and to the fact of obtaining men and women to adopt them and give them good homes and better times, and assert the determination when the time is accomplished to leave the government and control of Calverinia to Abbeinnia."

These resolutions were cabled to the Angelinian government who were directed to give an answer as soon as possible. On the first day of December general Hannon Vivian declared a proclamation that a main and vigorous attempt must be made to try and capture the plengiglosenean islands and the Boy King as well. Public opinion in the christian army had been divided in regard to the plengiglosenean and boy king island difficulties. Many persons felt that while a tremendous naval engagement in that location was sure to come at last, wisdom required delay; the army and navy for that part of the expedition were not believed to be ready and others believed that a deliberate attack upon those islands so filled with many defenseless child slaves who may be exposed to the fire of the ships as well as the enemy believed that the general attack would be completely unjustified, but the division was in no sense sectional. When the news of the bombardment of punchkin island broke out, from all parts of the besieging army men volunteered to go and join the expedition for the islands and all stood side by side in the support of this campaign.

THE FIRST BATTLE OF THE BOY KING AND PLENGIGLOSENEAN ISLANDS AND ITS RESULT...

It was clear indeed that most of the fighting of this expedition would take place outside of Vivian Jockey and that the Angelinian Navy would take a most important part. The main christian general Hannon Angelia Vivian issued a proclamation declaring anew the blockade of all Calverinia seaports to be resumed with greater strictness. The carrying out of this order was given to Admiral Whilliam Gamptonia Ureumanna. And in anticipation upon of an attack upon the Angelinian coast a squadron of many war vessels under Admiral Thompson was stationed at Angeline. Meanwhile the swiftest vessels in the Navy protecting the Angelinian coast from attack patrolled the whole Angelinian western ocean coast to give warning of the coming of any glandelinian warships. Very harbor from Grovelly to Calverinia was laid with a submarine mines to be used in case of attack, many submarines and torpedo boat destroyers were also there and old fortifications of every Angelinian seaport were armed, guns and batteries placed into position and a watch was kept indeed for the approach of the rebel enemy. When the expedition to the plengiglosenean islands was declared to be in actual session Commodore Newton and Admiral Saunderton was in command of one of the immense fleets blockading one of the harbors of Vivian Jockey and was then lying within sight of the fortress Gertrude Angelina. He was ordered and by telegraph to proceed at once to the plengiglosenean and boy king islands and capture and destroy the glandelinian fleets which was there, and cooperate with the fleets besieging the islands. Also the other fleets were to remain to keep up the blockade.

All such sections of this enormous city were divided from each other by ten deltas of the river upon which the city had been erected in early days. Gallic and German settlements being divided by the wide river of the city. In the city there were many narrow bridges and thus no doubt the city deserved the name of "the city of Bridges". The bridges were all steel ones some ranging from a hundred to a mile long. You can see therefore that given victory was divided into many sections all fortified inside and outside. Though not the largest, there was Norton Catherine and Julio Gallic which was the richest and best parts of the city and which mostly had been inhabited only by Angelinian non-combatants. Then there was Andrean partly buried up guarded by great fortresses, by fortified hills, and great streams, and difficult and dangerous passages, wild heaths, and great morasses. This part of the city was mostly inhabited by people men and women and children who sympathized with the cause of glandelinians and which section held a great number of child slaves, or children reserved to be murdered to a certain number every day. And there was Anna Aronburg already in the possession of the christians, also protected by a wild and hilly country fortified by christian positions, whether many of the non-combatants escaping from the enemy had fled to obtain safety from the glandelinians. The glandelinians here had defended their positions in front of Anna Aronburg for a long time and lived under their own government and laws, yet the Angelinians by their perseverance and good work and brave got possession of it at last. put on account of opposition from its other section called Federal they were not yet able to become masters of Anna Aronburg, though they tried it frequently and those in possession of Anna Aronburg were under fire constantly from the rebels still in possession of Federal. These two sections therefore were in possession of opposing sides who fought together very often and very desperately, and thus you see that Anna Aronburg and Federal were enemies of each other. In one section called Aronburg flew the Angelinian flag, in Federal the rebel flag, and from both sides firing ensued from house windows, roofs, and doors, and attacks from street to street were frequent. Oh bloody ivian wickey what has thou come to at last!

THE EXPERIENCES OF GENERAL BRUCE ROBERTSONIA DURING THE LONG AND BLOODY BATTLE OF RED RIDING HOOD WOODS OR SUNBEAM JUNCTION AS IT WAS PROPERLY CALLED.....!!

I hope that my dear readers have not forgotten that all the cruel battles around ivian wickey, either on land or on the water, sea or rivers arose out of the debate between the great glandelinian lords and generals who claimed that ivian wickey would not fall within ten years if all heaven and earth was arrayed against it after general Francis Burners death which induced many glandelinian generals and nobility to rashly submit the decision of the matter to general Six Mic-Allister Stanek and thus opened the way to his endra endeavoring to secure the whole Calverinian country and have it rise in rebellion with him and the glandelinians themselves. You recollect also that general Purgatorian had discharged one of his generals from command on account of his attempting to declare that child slavery was the cause of all the woes of ivian wickey and for attempting despite being a rebel general to restore the independence of the child slaves and that when severely rebuked by Purgatorian he had threatened to resign his commission immediately and thus his resignation was accepted. This general therefore was very little respected among the glandelinians, he on account of the opposition of the rebel generals against him had renounced the glandelinian authorities and preached again the rebellion, and had been absent from the glandelinian army for fifteen weeks during the great part of the time of which he remained at home in Calverinia in the east preaching against the rebels and calling all Calverinians to traitors who would thus favor the wicked glandelinian cause or at least side with it. It was therefore natural that such of the millions of people of Calverinia as were still determined to fight for the deliverance of their dear country from the enemy and for the freedom of child slaves and their friends should look around for more troops and generals under whom they might unite themselves to combat the power of the rebellion of glandelinians. The feeling indeed was universal in Calverinia among those favoring Angelinians that they would no longer be under any conditions whatever endure the glandelinian governments and Congresses, and there therefore such Calverinian nobles and generals as believed they had the right to lead armies began to think of standing forward to claim the freedom of all child slaves.

Amongst these the principal candidates were two powerful christian soldiers Calverinians by birth who had enlisted in the army and were now helping in the operations of the siege of ivian wickey. The first was general Bruce Robertsonia, the son of general Robertsonia. He other was general Joseph Mic-Gantler usually called the "christian cyclone" so named from his daring expeditions, charges and so forth. These two great and powerful christian generals had taken part with Maudion and other famous christian generals in the siege of ivian wickey. In one of the numerous battles and skirmishes, which took place at the time between the glandelinians and the Abbeannians near Jemina ivian and Carbondaler on the one side and the insurgents on the other general Robertsonia was present and assisted the christian besiegers to gain the tremendous victory which brought the capture of Carbondaler.

After that frightful battle had been over and the rebel general and his remaining army had surrendered he sat down to supper with some of his Angelinian generals and other officers in the private mess hall without washing his hands having forgotten to do this on which there still remained spots of enemy blood which he had shed during the action. Some of the other christian generals observing this whispered to each other:

Look at general Robertsonia who is eating the blood of the enemy. Higher authorities ought to be notified of this."

Robertsonia had heard what they said and began to reflect that the blood upon his hands might indeed be called the enemy's sin as it was that of the rebel country men who were fighting for the maintenance of child slavery and the rebel horrors. He was so much shocked and disgusted that he arose from the table and washing his hands went into a neighboring chapel. shed many tears, and asking help of God to repel the crime glandelinia was guilty of, and made a solemn vow that he would help atone for all the misery of child slaves by doing all in his power to deliver child slaves from the glandelinian authorities. Accordingly he left the army under general Maudion and remained watching for an opportunity to join the continentian Aronburg army itself for the restoration for the freedom of so many innocent children. Now this great christian general was a remarkably and most brave man very strong, and there was no man among the glandelinians or among the Angelinians couched that was thought a match for him excepting Maudion. Robertsonia was also very wise and most prudent, and a most excellent general, he knew full well how to conduct the biggest forces and armies alone and place them in order for battle as well or better than any other great man of his time. He was very generous too, greatly religious and very courteous by nature, a tremendous lover of children of all kinds pretty or not and never could resist taking them in his arms and holding them in a tight embrace no matter if they were even bad covered, but he had some faults which perhaps belonged as much to the fierce period in which he lived as to his own character. He was rash and passionate, and in his passion he was sometimes when in a rage sometimes relentless and cruel to the rebel prisoners he had in his camps.

General Robertsonia had fixed his purpose as I told you to attempt himself at the outbreak of the battle of gunbeams junction to drive the rebel armies out of the Red Riding Hood Woods and he desired to prevail upon general Mic-Gantler who was his rival in ways of leading armies but great friends nevertheless to join him in expelling the rebel Angelinian enemies by their common efforts to help the main christian generals. With this purpose general Robertsonia with his generals and other high officers following him rode down to Mic-Gantlers headquarters and requested an interview with the great general. They met in the generals headquarters in the generals council room. That passed between them was not known with certainty as all was a secret as possible and all wore black hoods and regalia but something went wrong with all the plans, for a spy had been in their midst hiding under the table and being discovered had attempted to shoot down the generals in his effort to escape and while his shots went wild the general Bruce Robertsonia struck the spy a blow with his sabre. The spy however was mortally wounded but he still fought shooting out of a side door and officers and having done this rash deed he instantly ran out of the bushes for him in called for his horse which two secret aids had hidden in the bushes for him in called for him when discovered. Two of the Angelinian generals general Robertsonia and Kirkpatricker Fran Francis both brothers friends of general Robertsonia were in attendance on him when the spy showed his ferocity in attempting to escape when discovered. seeing the spy escaping with some important papers each escape when discovered. seeing the spy escaping with some important papers though mortally wounded as he was, and seeing the pale generals all assembled in confusion they eagerly set out after the spy and called for troops to pursue.

"I doubt," said general Mic-Gantler "that the spy can be captured."

"No you leave such a matter in doubt!" said general Kirkpatricker. "I for one will be certain that the spy does not escape."

Accordingly he and his companion and several other officers having the matter certain with a vengeance by dispatching of the wounded spy by a storm of volleys from the pers using cavalry. Two of the spies followers in firing upon the pursuers were slain at the same time. This slaughter of the spy and his followers seemed a cruel and rash action but it seemed necessary as a spy pursued is a deadly enemy who will never give up no matter how any are after him and to capture him you will have to outcapture him dead. It was probably in that the glandelinians however incurred the displeasure of heaven for in expeditions and attempts or successes re no glandelinian soldier or officer ever went through more misfortunes than rebel spies and glandelinians who frequently pursued and ill treated the ivian girls known as violet and her sisters. After the spy and his aids were dispatched of the Angelinians might be called desperate.

Nevertheless general Mic-Allister Stanek in Vivian -iskey, Manley and other high generals of authority in Vivian -iskey and woman Catherine as written in previous chapters had committed an action which was sure to bring down upon them the vengeance of all christian slaves, the resentment of the whole world, the dis like displeasure of all churches of all religions on account of having committed many outrages to Catholic churches, for the murders of children, for the horrors of child slaves, and for forcing battles on consecrated ground. One of the shocking things done in the middle of July was that rebel soldiers to defy general Mansion had committed a horrible deed. Fifty boys and girls were assembled together mostly child slaves not able to stand the hardships of slavery much longer.

They were stripped naked, tied hand and foot, and then tight instruments were placed around their throats which such wise like grip that death was almost instant and with this they were packed in boxes sealed shut sent to cold storage, thence from there to a place where they were dim dismembered, cut up open with entrails and everything inside of their bodies taken out and placed in separate articles and thusly sent to general Mansion with the note:

"This is done to all child slaves who are unable to work any more. What can you a christian dog do about it huh?" General Mansion was furious and disgusted over what he received and so were his generals. The boxes with all the contents were immediately buried out of sight in a bog and general Mansion wrote back in answer:

"Sent me any more such things like that and all prisoners within my command no matter whether they are private or the highest generals will be shot before your very eyes."

General Mansion.

P.S. I may be a christian dog all right, but one of those kind that bites more than licks, as mad dog that causes hydrophobia when he bites so beware."

After receiving such a sight and after disposing of it and sending back an answer he drew his generals together summoned to meet him and declared that he would do all in his power to prevent further massacres of children and so warned general Mic-Allister Stanek that if massacres of children still continued no hope would be held for rebel prisoners within the christian lines and that the defenders of the city would receive no quarter.

Indeed generals Obertsonia and Mic-Cantler were dreadfully incensed when they heard that after all the pains the main generals had taken to prevent the recurrence of the horrors and Julio Callio Reign of Terror and all the innocent blood which had been spilled, the rebels should sent such boxes with such contents to general Mansion. They had seen them also with their protruding tongues, and the small rounded straps which had been placed around the necks of the children were too tight to be removed by the tight strongest man and had to be severed. He and Mic-Cantler vowed that they would take ample vengeance upon all the rebels if they did not discontinue this horrible practice.

This horrible occurrence occurred before he and Mic-Cantler went to join Aronburgs army at Red Riding Hood Woods.

When this tremendous battle begun he marched his divisions against the rebels accordingly at the head of his powerful army and Mic-Cantler did his part. The commencement of Obertsonia undertaking against the rebels was most disastrous.

In making a desperate charge upon the rebel positions in the woods which broke out like an inferno he was soon completely defeated near Juneham junction by the rebels under general Pemberton. Obertsonia's horse was killed under him in the bloody atelo nation, and he for a moment was a prisoner. But he had fallen into the power of a rebel soldier who somewhat favored Angelina's cause and who had been conscripted into the Landelinian army much against his will and so though serving in the rebel army did not choose to be the instrument of putting Obertsonia into the hands of the other rebels and taking advantage of the almost sea like expanse of smoke caused by the terrific firing of cannons, musketry, and explosions of shells, allowed him to escape. The Landelinians who won this advantage executed their prisoners with their usual cruelty those especially who were wounded. Among those were some gallant young Angelinian officers who were mercilessly put to death because they were wounded. The Landelinians here seldom took wounded men as prisoners though in other parts of the war they slackened up on the cruelty a little but not on the children.

General Obertsonia with a few brave officers among whom was colonel poglusa Fairbanks who afterwards became a general retired into the deepest recesses of the woods where becoming lost they were chased from one place of refuge to another, were under fire constantly, and were often in the greatest danger and suffering many hardships. Some faithful child slaves who had been rescued by him during the battle accompanied him and his followers during their wanderings and refused to leave them. There was no other way of providing for them during those three days of being fugitives than by hunting and of finishing in the streams of the woods.

It was a remarkable that colonel Doglue was the most active and successful in procuring for the unfortunate child slaves all girls such supplies as his dexterity in fishing or killing some game could furnish to them. Driven from one place in the woods to another, almost shot out of some districts and forced by the opposition of rebel Calverinians giving them opposition, general Obertsonia attempted to force his way through the woods to find his way back to the distant christian lines but he found rebel enemies everywhere seeking his life, and the lives of his friends and child slaves. General Mic-Douglass had a powerful detachment not far away toward which the fugitives were pushing their way and hearing of the superior approach of the fugitives sent men and cavalry to intercept them as soon as the fugitives entered their territory. The leader of the pursuers colonel Corner Johnston hated general Obertsonia on account of his being responsible for the rescue by christian soldiers of so many child slaves and christian prisoners. The fugitives seeing the rebels coming gave some little resistance after placing the children in safety but were again defeated by the rebels under the cavalry leader who pursued them most relentlessly the rebels being in force of numbers while the fugitives contesting from behind trees and rocks continued to retreat more swiftly, but he showed against his misfortunes the greatness of his strength and courage. He directed his men to retreat through a large lane or pass and placing himself and several men the last of the party and with the four beautiful child slave girls in front of them, they fought desperately with and slew much of the Angelinian rebels as attempted to press hard on them. Three Calverinian officers who were followers of the Landelinians all very strong men when they saw Obertsonia thus protecting the retreat of his followers and covering the children made a vow that they would either kill this redoubled christian dog climber or make him prisoner and recapture the children. The whole tree with blasphemies and curses rushed at the Calverinian general at once. General Obertsonia was on horseback with a little girl in front of him with one arm around her protecting her rushing through the straight pass we have described betwix a precipitous wall of rocks bordered with trees on top and on the other side a deep river. He struck the first man who came up a blustering Calverinian officer (and seized his horses reign) such a blow with his sabre as cut off his right hand and freed the bridle. He was bid to death, the other officer leaping up on horseback was struck down on the ground by a blow of the sabre but he recovered and racing after him with an oath managed to catch up with his horse before he sent in full gallop and demanding him to surrender grasped general Obertsonia in the meantime by the leg and was attempting to throw him from the horse. The general then setting spurs on his horse while the little girl screamed in fright at the scene of fight and confusion made the animal sudden suddenly popping forward so that the rebel Calverinian fell under or was thrown thrown under the horses feet, and as he was endeavoring to rise again and draw a pistol, Obertsonia clift his head in two with his sabre. The other officer seeing his two comrades slain flew desperately at the general riding his horse like mad and grasped him by the mantle so close to his body that he could not have room to wield his sabre. But with the heavy pommel of that weapon the general struck his third assailant so dreadful a blow that he dashed out his brains. Still however the rebel kept his grasp or dying grasp on the general's mantle, so that to be free of the dead body, the Calverinian general was obliged to undo the brooch, or clasp by which it was fastened and leave that and the mantle itself with the dead body behind him. He finally with his comrades and the children escaped the remainder of the pursuers who captured however the brooch and preserved it as a memorial that the celebrated christian general once narrowly escaped falling into the hands of the rebel Calverinians. General Obertsonia greatly resented this attack upon him. General Obertsonia met with many such encounters amidst his dangerous and dismal wanderings with the child slaves with him, yet though almost always defeated by the superior numbers of the rebels and of the Calverinians as aided with them, he and his followers still kept his own spirits.

At last dangers of all kinds increased so much around the brave christian general and his fugitive companions that he was obliged to do something desperate, and he fled to separate himself from his faithful children he had rescued from was also obliged to face the full fury of winter coming on it would be impossible for the little girls to endure this wandering sort of life even for a few days when the deep snow and frost should set in, and calaverita in the northern parts usually has fearful snowstorms and severe cold waves. So General Roy Robertson left the child slaves with some soldiers and others in a small walled fortress which he had actually secured after a small but sharp fight of two minutes duration and which was situated at the head of the river. The general slipped away before the soldiers could attack him and he returned alone to defend the small fort against the "landolinians" who were determined to take possession of the solitary islands in the river where he and the remainder of his men decided to erect a fort and pass the winter after coming for those left behind and bring them across. But in the meantime ill luck seemed to pursue all his friends for the small fort was taken by the rebels and the soldiers and the girl children were taken prisoners & the soldiers being cruelly put to death by the victors.
The little girls were thrown into strict confinement and treated with the utmost severity..... These child slaves had given the landolinians it appeared great offense for thus allowing the Angolan soldiers to rescue them and were therefore not placed in child slave houses or plantations as expected but instead imprisoned within the fortress of Lucille Ricken in a large cage used for wild animals. This cage was hung over the walls of the fortress one used for the poor children like a parrot cage out of a window in summer time to shoot and apprehend fire from the besieging christian guns. This cage was indeed a strong and one made of iron and wood mostly of framework. There were many such old cages in most of the fortresses to which early in the war only wild animals had been confinement with peculiar vigor if you please to mention.

JAMES EARL RAY

a combined with peculiar vigor if you please to mention.
The news of the taking of this small fort, the renewed activity of the poor unfortunate child slaves themselves, and the execution of the hiding in the miserable tent reached general Robertson's while he was residing in the hiding in the miserable dwelling on that lonely island and almost reduced him to the point of utter despair. It was also about this time while far away he could hear the continual roar of battle for days that an incident took place which altogether it rests only on tradition was rendered probably by the summer of the time. After receiving the last unpleasant intelligence from spies general Robertson was lying one cold morning on his wet wretched back listening to the howl howling of countless cannon and other battle sounds deliberating with himself whether he had better resign all thoughts of again recovering the stolen child slaves from him, and dismissing his followers, transport himself and his other friends into Abyssinika and spend the rest of his time or his life fighting the rebels trying to cross the Galverlinian border, by which he thought he might perhaps succeed in gaining some honor and fame. But then on the other hand he thought it would be both criminal and most unwomanly to give up his attempts to restore freedom to the child slaves while there remained the least chance of his being successful in an undertaking, which really seemed to him to be much more his duty than to help drive the infernals from rightfully his own land and Galverlinian boundary line. While indeed he was divided between these reflections and doubtful what he should do, and while listening to the far off wild sound of battle which he knew was in the Red Riding Hood Woods general Robertson was looking upward to the roof of the small fort or fortress above the bed in which he lay, and his eye was at once attracted by a huge green spider which hanging at the end of a very long thread of web of its own spinning was endeavoring to work its way to another for the purpose of fixing the line on which it meant desperately to stretch its web. The insect made the attempt again and again struggling and working furiously but without success however, and at last general Robertson continued or at least counted that the poor spider had tried to accomplish he was unable to do so. times and had not succeeded in carrying its point having at last himself caught six

It then came into the narrator's head that he had himself fought six skin fishes and battles against "the glambellious rebels and their other statements, and that the poor perservening epider was exactly in the same situation with himself, having made as many friends indeed and been as often disappointed in what it was aiming at. Getthour hat."

"Now thought general Robertson in trying to divert his attention from the distant roar of battle! As I had no means of knowing what is best to be done to rescue those poor little girls again and probably other children also I shall be guided by the luck which shall attend this poisonous spider, not to keep myself from being bitten I will not mind this, the insect shall make another single effort to fix its long thread, and shall be successful, I will venture a seventh time to try my luck. In rescuing the children and others also, but if the spider shall fall I will go to the state of war on the Abyssinians border or frontier, and never return to my own native state no more unless the rebellion of the gladiolus is crushed...""

When General Robertson was forming this resolution the brave and toilsome spider had made another great exertion with all the force it could muster, and after a still further desperate attempt finally succeeded in fastening its thread to the beam which it had so often tried in vain to reach.

General Robertson, seeing that the final success of the spider resolved to try his own lot fortune, and he had not as yet before gained a victory in behalf of the child. He knew no one, he never afterwards sustained any considerable or decisive check or defeat; being determined to try a game in efforts to obtain possession of the same. The little girl he had lost on his quest notwithstanding the smallness of the means removed himself and his followers from the little island fortress to another island at a little closer to the shore which unknown to him lay near the first delta of the young gun river. The general landed and inquired of the first person he met if there were rebels or Angol Indians. He returned for answer that there had arrived there very lately a body of armed strangers in red uniforms, who had defeated a Calvinian rebel officer and took him prisoner. He also captured the governor of the island, gave him and captured his men and most of his men and were now passing themselves with hunting and roaming about the island. The general himself to be added to the words which these strangers most frequented, there blew his horn repeatedly..... or at least his bugle. Now the chief of the strangers or Angol Indians who had taken the island from the rebels on it, was a colonel James G. H. Graham and General Bolger and he was accompanied by some of the bravest of the land of abolition soldiers. When he heard general Robertson's horn, he knew the sound well, and cried out to his men that General Robertson's general, he knew by his manner of blowing, go he and his companions hastened to meet General Robertson, and there was great joy on both sides, while at the same time these brave Angol Indian soldiers and officers could not help weeping when they considered their own forlorn condition, and the great loss that had taken place among their friends since they had last parted, and also the loss of the poor little girls whom they had rescued. But they were about heartened and looking forward to freeing the children once more into the hands of all that had not abandoned.

The general was now in sight of the far distant and yet for fortifications and the enemy encampments, the mighty Lucille Jensen and not distant also from his own possession which he might best renew their efforts to form plans with general Douglas Turner who had abandoned. He began immediately and interprise against the rebels, and also plan against some way to gain access to the fortress and secure the children. General Douglas Turner was to go disguised to the main christian mission through the enemy territory and bring a force in order to begin their interprise by taking revenge on a landwilder general called general Clifford turnerton upon whom general lucille-jensen had given command, and who had taken up his headquarters not far from the outer encampments of Lucille Jensen fortress.

General Robertson on his part opened a communication with the opposite coast of vormo run river by means of his followers under colonel guthrie Johnston, pretending they were slaveholders wishing the information as to the lay of the distant christian tribes seen especially their main rear. This person also had directions that if he should find the rebels suspicious of them and disposed to move against them he should make a signal with a flag, but if the rebels were not suspicious of the ruse, he was to make at night a great fire on a small headland, or lofty cape near the river opposite to the island he had just left.

The appearance of a fire on this place was to be a signal for general rebellion to put to the water with such men as he had - who were not more than one thousand three hundred in number if you please for the purpose of landing at Carrick's Oak Ford and on pretension of being rebels join the insurgents with the effort to get in the fortress if possible and secure the children.

General Robertson and his men were watching until night fell, lights from the distance, but for some time it was in vain for no signal fire appeared. At length a fire on the headland became visible, and flared up brightly, and the general and his followers warily betook themselves to their ship concluding their Cornwick friends who were all in arms and ready to join with them. They landed on the beach at midnight where they found they saw colonel Gutherbert alone in waiting for them with, indeed very bad news. General Lucille Fin leaders was in the region he said with two or three hundred thousand Galverinian and Lancelinian rebels and had terrified the loyal Galverinians so much both by threats and actions that none of them dared to work in any scheme to cause the rescue of the children. and he also said that the rebels were wise as to his intentions.

"Traitor" said General Robertsonia "Why then did you make the fire signal and deceive us like this?"

"'Ain't Alan,'" replied the spy "the fire indeed was not made by me, but by some other person, for what purpose I do not know, but as soon 's I knew it burning I knew that you and your men would come over as quickly as possible, thinking it was my signal and therefore I came down to wait for you on the beach, to tell you how the matter stood. The rebels are wise as to your plans and are watching that you do not approach Lucille Jackson without caution."'

General Robertson's first idea was to return to the island after this sad disappointment, but his followers refused to go back. He was also his followers however men of daring, even to rashness.

"I will not leave my native land." Said one of them "Now that I am so unexpectedly in it once more. I will give freedom to the same little girls and other child slaves or leave my cara carcass on the surface of the Holy Angelina land which was my birth. No rebel can daunt me..."

General Robertson after some hesitation determined that since he had been thus brought across the river to the other side he would remain there, and take

So he stood and listened, and by and by the cry of the hounds came nearer and still nearer and then very close by he began to hear the trampling and trampling of horses, and the voices of men speaking in Latin, and the ringing and clatter of accoutrements, and then he was sure the rebels in search of him were coming to the river side at last. Then the general thought of himself:

"If I go back to give up men the alarm these Glendalians eagerly men will get through the ford without any opposition; and that would be a pity since it is a place so advantageous to make good defense again at them."

So general Robertsonia looked again at the steep path most carefully and at the deep river and he thought that they gave him so much advantage that he himself could defend the small and narrow passage with his own hand until some of his men came to assist him. He found so many objects of protection that he had no fear of bullets and therefore the combat was not so very unequal as it must have otherwise been. He therefore sent his followers to arrange a men and order them to open a cross fire at the ford, and remained alone by the bank of the river. In the mean while the loud noise and the trampling of horses increased, and the moon became more brighter as it rose higher in the sky general Robertsonia beheld the glancing sabre arms of about two hundred and fifty rebel soldiers and a smaller squadron of Glendalians and Gergolians in the rear who had come down to the opposite bank of the river. He rebels under colonial Galilio on their mark, saw one solitary figure guarding the ford, and though the main body held back for the time being suspicious the foremost of them were sent forward to capture him.

The ford itself was large enough to admit of eight men in a rank but no more and as they could pass the ford only in this manner general Robertsonia who stood high above them on the bank where they were to land saw his followers as they raised his men who started firing at the main column of the rebels across the river and received a return fire. A score of rebels fell within a few minutes and the flashes of hundreds of rifles made a startling scene. In the meantime while this firing on both sides was going on general Robertsonia called the foremost man with a thrust from his long sabre and with a second thrust stabbed the horse, which fell down kicking and plunging in its agonies, and then killed and wounded two other men with well aimed shots until all on the narrow path the ford was quite blocked by struggling horses and men which prevented the others which started to follow from getting out of the river. The general had thus a good opportunity to deal blows right and left among him, to fire into the crowd and shoot and out many down while the rebels could not have the chance to strike at him one blow. The others fired at him but he was protected by a barricade of rocks and only one shot took away his hat and cut a lock of hair from his head but did not hit him. In the frightful confusion of struggling men and horses in the river fifteen or sixteen of the enemy were killed by his hand alone and others having been borne down the stream mortally wounded or disabled were drowned in the river. The rest were terrified not only by his way of fighting but from the terrific fire from the Christians on the opposite side which was picking them off like flies. The survivors for the moment drew back to the other side of the shore and started a general fusillade which kept on for two hours before anything more was decided upon. When general Galilio looked again and saw that that were opposed only by a mere handful of men and only by one soldier in the pass they therefore being so many and better armed and being better marksmen, they cried out to their officer that their honor would surely be lost forever if they did not force their way despite all odds odds, and encouraged each other with loud cries to plunge through in a body and assault them on the opposite bank.

By this time the general's soldiers came to his assistance, and yet despite the terrific rush they made the rebels received a fire that mowed down fifty men at once. Scrambling however from rocks to rocks, they finally carried this small position and general Robertsonia and his men and the little child were forced out of their little stronghold and retreated thus showing the desperation of the rebels who on some occasions will not give up an assault even at the cost of extra re-examination. However their losses were so heavy that though they won the victory after four hours of such fighting they were compelled to give up the enterprise. General Robertsonia lost sixty men in killed and mortally wounded, while three hundred rebels out of four hundred and fifty men were shot down dead not a one surviving or wounded.

The adventures of this general and his followers are as curious and entertaining as those others which men invent in story books. About the next morning colonial Galilio had retraced his steps and gathered among the other rebels a larger force than ever. Colonel Galilio had among one of his score of faithful bloodhounds one with him which it was said had formerly belonged to one of the beautiful little Irish girls themselves, who had on one occasion sold him to general Robertsonia for fifty three dollars to spend on the cause of securing a child slave for ransom and thus having been fed by the general's own hands, it had become attached to him, and would follow his footsteps anywhere he went as dogs are kind known to trace their masters' footsteps, even if they are bloodhounds or other kinds of dogs. By means of this house to be chosen as the leader of the other nineteen colonial Galilio thought he should now certainly find out general Robertsonia and take revenge on him for the massacre of so many of his men the night before.

When this large rebel force advanced upon general Robertsonia he at first thought of fighting desperately with the Glendalians officer, but becoming aware that lieutenant John Lorton was moving around with another large body of rebels eagerly to attack him in the rear, he resolved to avoid fighting this time lest he should be oppressed and overcome by mere numbers.!!!

For this purpose the general divided all the men and soldiers he had with him into four bodies, and commanded them to retreat by four different ways; for by this plan he thought the enemy would not know which party to pursue. He did not know that the rebels had the bloodhound he once possessed himself and whom they had once stolen on his during a raid. He had also appointed a place at which the men were to assemble again if possible, but when his lieutenant John Lorton came to the place where the small army of Robertsonia had been thus divided, the leading bloodhound took his course after one of these divisions, neglecting the other three, and then the lieutenant realized that the Christian general thus argued must be in that party, so he also made no pursuit after the other three divisions of Christians or Angolians but followed that which the leading dog pointed out, with all his men. The general to his disgust and surprise saw again that he was followed by a large body, and being determined to escape from the place if possible he rode the Angolians soldiers who were with him disperse themselves in as many different ways as possible, thinking that thus the enemy must lose track of him at last. He kept only one man along with him and had sent the boy with the other squadron of men who were dispersing. When the rebel lieutenant came to the place where general Robertsonia had disappeared the rebels in six different ways, the leading bloodhound after it had snuffed up and down for a while, quitted the footsteps of all the other fugitives, and ran barking up the track of the two soldiers out of the whole number followed by some of the dogs. When the rebel lieutenant knew that one of these must be general Robertsonia and accordingly he surrounded seven of his men that were speedy of horsesmen to chase after him, and either make him prisoner or slay him; the rebels started off accordingly and their horses dashed forward so fast that they gained sight of Robertsonia and his companion. The general asked his companion what help he could give to him in case of necessity, and the soldier answered that he was ready to do his best. So these two turned on the seven horsemen and after a shooting down three killed the other four after a fierce fight. It was supposed they were better armed than the rebels were, as well as stronger and much more desperate. By this time the general and his companion were much fatigued, and yet they dared not sit down and take any rest, for whenever they stopped for an instant they heard the cry of the bloodhounds behind them and knew by that that their enemies were coming fast upon them. The horses of the seven rebels they had slain had been disabled during the short conflict and were useless so that the general and his companion had to kill the all. At length after being closely pressed and fired upon constantly by their nearest pursuers they came to a wood through which ran the upper part of the river. When general Robertsonia said to his companion:

"Let us wade down this stream for a great while, instead of going straight across and so these unhappy hounds will lose the scent; for if we were once clear of him, I should be afraid of getting away from, I should not be afraid of getting away from the pursuing rebels."

Accordingly the general and his attendant walked a great way down the stream, indeed taking care to keep their feet in the deep water; until neither of them came no altogether so that the dogs could not retain any scent whatever wherever they had stepped. When they finally after swimming a for nearly half an hour and half hauled were from the cold and tormented by the floating ice cakes came ashore on the further side from the rebel army, and went deep into the woods before they stopped to rest themselves and built a huge bonfire in a ravine to them out their frozen clothes and also dry themselves and keep themselves warm. In the meantime the bloodhound led by lieutenant John Lorton went straight to the place where the general and his men went into the water, but there the dog began to be puzzled not knowing where to go next for my readers are well aware that the running deep water could not retain the scent of a man's foot, like that which remains on turf or even snow. So the rebel lieutenant seeing that the dog was at fault as it was called, that he had lost the track of that which he pursued, gave up the chase not even seeing any glow from the bonfire as it was too far away in the woods and well hidden in the deep ravine; they therefore reluctantly gave up the chase and returned and joined the other squadron.

FURTHER ADVENTURES OF THE CHRISTIAN GENERAL ROBERTSONIA.!!!

But all general Robertsonia's adventures were not as yet ended, his companion and he himself had rested by the gigantic bonfire in the ravine in the woods but they had not yet food and were becoming extremely hungry but did not dare to venture outside in the daytime and so had to wait until night time before they could venture forth again. However when night time came they walked on with their clothes still matted damp but in the hopes of coming to some habitation in which they could find the slaves and dry their uniforms were fully at length in the midst of the forest, they met with six strange men who looked like Glendalians or ruffian slaves. They were well armed and one of them bore a sheep on his back which it seemed that they had taken from somewhere in a raid. Whether they were loyal to the Glendalians or the Angolians he could not tell.

However they saluted the general and his companions very civilly, and he replying to their salutation, asked them where they were going, who answered they were seeking for one called Prince Robertson, for that they were Calverinians loyal to the Angelinians and intended to help him and his companions. The general answered that if they would go with him he would conduct them where they could sooner or later find the Angelinian general and his squadron of men.

When the men who had spoken opened their mouths and the Calverinian general Robertson who looked sharply at him began to suspect that the Calverinians guessed who he was and thought he was not sure he feared that the Calverinians were to rebel sympathizers and that he and his companions any day for the reason of loyalty to their own cause some designs against his person in order to gain the reward which had been offered for his life...

So he said to them: "My good friends as we are not well acquainted with each other you must go before us, and we will follow near to you." "You have no occasion to suspect any harm from us whatever," answered the men.

"Neither do I suspect any of you," said general Robertson, "but this is the way I always choose to travel."

The men did as he was commanded and thus they traveled through the woods with revolvers drawn till they came together to a vast and ruinous barn, where the men proposed to dress some part of the sheep with which their companions had been or was still carrying. The general was glad to hear of food, but he insisted that there should be two fires kindled, one for himself, one for his companions at one end of the stable barn, the other at the other end for their three companions. The men fell as he desired. They finally broiled a quarter of mutton for themselves, and gave the other to the general and his attendants. They were obliged to eat it without brand or even a drop of salt, but as they had been very hungry, they were glad to get food in any shape, and partook of it very heartily.

When so he saw a drowsiness fell on general Robertson that for all the danger and excitement he and his companions were in he could not resist an inclination to sleep. At first he desired his companion to watch while he slept, for he had great suspicions of their new acquaintances. He did not like their looks and so had feared they were traitors. His companion promised to keep watch if possible, and did his best to keep his word. But the Calverinian general had not been asleep a long while as his foster brother or at least his companion fell into a deep slumber also for he had undergone so much fatigue as the general had himself.

The three men had also fallen asleep and friends. Then the three men characters themselves being loyal Calverinians and friends. Then the three men fell asleep also the door opened slowly and carefully and six men entered the room, each armed with a sword and a pistol with the purpose of killing all in the room. The other three men who had accompanied the king had left the house and just then returned and saw what had happened and killed three of the intruders in the back causing some confusion.

The noise of the confusion and of two shots being fired aroused the general who was only a light sleeper and as little noise as the rebels had made in entering he was awakened by the confusion of the sudden conflict inside the barn and starting up, he drew his sabre and went to meet the rebellious rebels.

At the same time he pushed his companion's foot to awaken him and he also got on his feet to help before he was killed. He was pleased to see what was about to happen one of the ruffians that was advancing to slay the general and the others, killed the man with a stroke of his sabre. The general however was not alone, but nevertheless the six Calverinians were against seven loyal Calverinians, but the rebels had been carrying in strength and very good at the sword and in the desperate conflict that ensued the general and his friends were in great peril of their lives for six thousand were almost wasted in the sabre duels, but finally they killed all of the six Calverinians and seeing others appearing in squad jumped out of the nearest back door and then left the region with his loyal friends the Calverinians very sorrowful for the death of his faithful companion and took his direction toward the place where he had appointed his little force to rendezvous a number of miles after their dispersion. There was now night once more and the place of meeting proved to be an old abandoned farm house, and believing it meant to wait boldly into it where to his utmost amazement he was confronted by a little girl of dazzling and most amazing beauty with six others, and two girl companions all in the uniform of girl scouts.

"By the Planned Sacred Heart of Jesus if it is not the virgin child and their companions Gertrude Angelina and Jamie," answered the general, "what are you little girls doing here?"

"You seeing the general enter she at first did not recognize him, and would have asked him who he was if she or her sisters had not recognized his voice. They now knew it was general Robertson and so he is here for she is answered."

"I was coming on the same way and so I am here," answered the general, "I thought you a Calverinian officer from your dress and seeing you heading for this house had an intention to surprise you as you entered and take you prisoners, but what are you doing here as far from the National Guard?"

The general answered that he was traveling for his health, meaning that he had been laid in the woods and was recovered night and day by the rebels.

"I am not at all surprised," answered the general, "and you are welcome to us for the sake of our little friend Gertrude."

the firing that day along the whole christian line had been unmistakably terrific the rebels yelling their fierce "devil yell" coming on like a whirlwind of men rushing on like the last but fiercest wave of a tornado or tempest blast.

On one the whirlwind of men though came there torn in their lines, steel plumes of shell flashes broke and flared like sheet lightning through the rolling smoke, the fury of the battle being naked anew.

Three thousand three hundred cannon along the christian line roared aloud and from their throats with flash of sheet of flame and clouds of smoke threw their showers of grape and shell and other iron missiles dealing dreadful havoc.

Beneath their fire in full career, rushed on the ponderous landelinian, columns, the lancers charged among the guns and hurrying on to seize havoc, their flags for a few minutes flew over the christian works and in one dark roaring screaming torrent broad and strong the advancing onset rolled along through the inferno and the rebels by fierce volleys shot from the shroud of smoke flame and explosions perished wildly when the "devil rebel yell" was nevertheless on the hearts of the angelinus everywhere on account of the bravery of their officers the columns of the christian force were completely lost, for not an eye the terrific storm that viewed showed its proud plumes of fury and fortitude, nor was one forward footstep was stayed as dropped the multitudes of dead and dying gasping as their dissolving ranks thundered, yelled and roared nearer, the thunders rose, fast as the rebels razed each line and square, and on the mountains of wounded and slain, closed their finished files, till from their torn and jagged lines three hundred feet away emerging from the smoke they saw the angelinus helmets, and plumes and panoply then waved their own uproar of firing at once each muskettar muskettar revolving knell opened up and as fast as men fell as we when they practice they practiced to display their discipline on fatal days. One went line after line of men, down were the rebel files sent torn and jagged rage of what had been banners, corselets were seized and persons sent rushing, and to argument the desperate fray, wheeled full against their staggering flanks the foaming ranks of angelinus horsemen forced their resistless way and the confusion was terrible. Then to the musket knell succeeded, the clank of swords, the ring of steel on steel, the roar of pistol and a musket shot face to face, the death wail of steeds as plied the death his clanging trade, against all rebel cavalry and christian horsemen rang the opposing blades, and while amid their most closest array the well served angelinus cannon were raining their way carrying all before them with shot and shell. Amid the scattered rebel bands raged the fierce riders of angelinus like a mighty bloody strand while the rebels recoiled in common rout and fear, horsemen and footmen in mingled host their leaders fallen and their standards lost retreating in utmost confusion and panic back to their own lines with christian soldiers in full pursuit.....

THE PANIC GUN CAUSED BY REBEL SPIES..

At all at once during the month of November itself to go back a little once more all sorts of uncomfortable rumors got afloat within many sections of the christian lines banishing ivan wiskey. There had been many robberies or thefts caused by invading spies and men from the robberies men had been up before the army magistrates and committed for trial very frequently, and that made many women and child refugees within the christian lines awfully afraid of being visited by the spies, the children stolen or murdered and also of the women being robbed or assaulted and for a long time women in some of the headquarters of the christian generals used to make a regular tour all round the rooms, kitchens, and cellars every day and night, sometimes a soldier leading by the way, he armed with a gun armed with a bayonet, the women following with a poker, hearth brush, and others carry the shovel and fire iron with which to sound the alarm if any spy spies were seen, and sometimes by the accidentally hitting together of them the women often frightened each other so much that they bolted from the rooms and ran into the back kitchens to lock themselves in, or even storerooms, or what wherever they happened to go till when their fright was over, that they recollected themselves and set out as fresh with double valiance. Day after day officers and soldiers and refugee women and children had heard many strange stories from the outer christian encampments of cars that went about in the dead of night, drawn by horses and with felt, and guarded by men in dark velveting or uniforms going their rounds of the company street streets no doubt to search for some unwanted christian general headquarters or some unfashioned door. One of the women who was a army red cross called Mrs Antonio Gorris who had effected the greatest bravery herself on the ivan wiskey battlefields was the principal person to collect and preserve these reports so as to make them indeed assume their most fearful aspect, but nevertheless many others and even christian officers had discovered that she had heard general Benson ivan to loan her a hat to hang up in a general's lobby and many had their doubts as to whether she would really enjoy the little advent adventure of having her room broken into as she often protested she should.

Another Red Cross nurse made no secret of a being an errand woman when it came to prowling spies but she went regularly through her housekeeping duties of inspection, only the hour for this generally became earlier and earlier until at last many following her example made the rounds at half past six and all adjourned to their beds soon after seven. In order to get the horrible night over sooner.

One afternoon by five o'clock while the distant roar of the in general Benson ivan headquarters was on they were startled when one of the little girls to run and tell the Red Cross nurse that on no and she armed herself with a footstool to drop down on the head of the strange visitor in case he should show a face covered with a mask or black black crepe as he looked up in answer to her inquiry as to who was there? But it was no one but Gertrude Ameling and Jennie Urner returning from a scouting tour with her carrying some important papers in a little hand basket, yet she was evidently in a state of great agitation and excitement.

"Take care of that," she said to one of the women as she offered to relieve the child of the basket. "It's some important papers I secured from some rebels who chased me just two hours before. I am sure there is a plan for the year's hospitality, Miss Matthews. Jennie is going to sleep in general Benson's headquarters. I can sit up here all night, if you will allow me to, but my quarters is so far from any of the other army barracks that I don't believe any of you could be heard if we screamed ever so hard."

"But Gertrude," said Miss Matthews, "what has alarmed you so much who are usually such a bright and brave little girl. I have you seen any suspicious men lurking about your room house?"

"Oh yes," answered Gertrude, "Seven had looking ill dressed men have gone past the house three or four times until ordered by sentinels to be on their way, they having some past very slowly and an Abbotinian woman refugee came not half an hour ago and all but for of herself in past Jennie Urner saying her children were in danger from three strange men, and she must speak to the general and obtain protection. You see she said general Benson" though there was a strange hat hanging up in the wall of the hall that did not resemble a nurse and it would have been more natural to have said spy. But Jennie shut the door in her face and came up to me, till they saw most of the soldiers going to their encampments, when we called to some of them and asked them to take care of us into our ride into the main christian line."

Many of the soldiers might have triumphed over poor Gertrude Ameling who had professed such bravery, but they were glad to see that she shared in the weakness of humanity, and the Red Cross nurse gave up her room to her very willingly and shared another bed for the night. But before retiring the woman and little girl rummaged up out of the recesses of their memory such horrible stories of spies deeds and the results, and of their robbery of general headquarters and of murder of women and children that many quite quaked in their shoes. Gertrude was evidently anxious to prove that such terrible events had already occurred within her experiences during the war through which she was serving as a girl scout, that she was justified in her sudden panic, declaring she feared no battle or any enemy spies, or soldiers but such rascals as these profligate Ugh, and neither did any of the other women like to be outdone and capped every stone with one yet more horrible. till it reminded one of the woman oddly enough of an old story she had read some where of spies murdering and scouring spies, and of spies being captured and if not shot down brought to trial found guilty and hanged. One of the stories that had a haunted Gertrude a long time since her early entry into the war was of a little girl slave who was left in charge of a house full of younger slaves, when all the plantinian masters all went off to the army parties.

The main general was away on his duty and a man as a peddler came by and asked to leave his large and heavy and very strange looking sack in the millroom saying he would call for it again at night, and the little girl running about in search of amusement during her leisure hour chance to hit upon a small run hanging bag hanging up on the wall in her masters room, and took it down to examine it and look at the opening, and it went off through the open millroom door, hit the sack or sack and a slow dark thread of blood came oozing out. The child terrified ran out of the room and her master coming home finding a dead child body in the sack gave it up to the authorities. The murderer was never found, now Gertrude Ameling enjoyed this part of the story dwelling on each word as if she fairly loved it. She rather hurried over the further account of the little girl's bravery, and she had but a considerable idea that somehow she baffled the murderer with some human from heated red hot, and then restored to blackness by dipping in grease. They finally parted for the night with an awe struck wonder as to what they should hear off in the morning--and on her part Gertrude with a vehement desire for the night to be over and gone, and she was so afraid lest the spies or suspicious looking men should have seen from some dark-luk lurking place, that she had on tried off her important papers and thus have a double motive for attacking the house.

And both sides fought all the rest of the day long till most of all the rebel and christian soldiers lay upon the ground dead and wounded before the enemy victorious forced a retirement of the christian forces for the distance of one mile.

Then the glandelinian general looked about him and saw of all of his host that were left alive but two soldiers, 1. lieutenant Juan and colonel Redivere and they were full some wounded. The Angelinian general himself saw where the rebel leader leaned upon his sword among a great heap of dead men.

"Now give me my sabre which I have dropped," said the christian general to one of his surviving men. "For yonder I spy the rebel traitor that had wrought all this tragedy and woe."

"Sir please let him be," said one of his men. "For if you pass this and and most unhappy day you will soon be rightly revenged upon him. Please leave off now for you have won the bloody field and if you leave off now, this evil day of destiny will be passed."

"It'll be a life, beside me death," said the Angelinian general. "He shall not now escape from my hands."

When the christian general took his sabre in his right hand and ran toward the rebel general crying:

"Traitor now is thy death this day come upon you!"

And the general smote the rebel general with a thrust of his sabre through the body. The rebel general at the same time had with the might he had smote the christian general with his own sword on the left side of the head the sword piercing the helmet and the brainpan and then the rebel general fell stark dead upon the earth. And the noble christian general fell into a swoon. One of his surviving men raised him up and two men led him gently between the selves to the christian encampment not far from the river side. They were on their way to the rear of the christian lines when they heard a far fierce cry in the distance and the man going to resume the attack upon other portions of the large forces of rebel advancing to resume the attack upon other portions of the christian line. And he returned and said to the wounded general pleadingly:

"I believe it is best that we should bring you to some town where the christian line is stationed."

"I would that it be so," answered the general. And when he tried to go he fainted from loss of blood. Then colonel Lucanada took up the general on one part and another officer on the other part and in the lifting Lucanada himself fell swooning to the earth from his own wounds for he had been previously wounded; and then the noble soldiers heart burst, and when the general again awakened to senselessness he beheld colonel Lucanada how he lay foaming at the mouth and speechless.

"Alas alas," said the poor general. "This is to me to day a full heavy sight to see this noble officer so die for my sake for that he who would have helped me had more need of help than I, and he would never complain, his heart was so set to help me."

When the other soldier wept.

"Leave this foolish mourning and weeping," said the christian general. "For wilt thou well if I may live myself the death of Lucanada would grieve me evermore, but my own time is coming fast. Therefore take thou my sword and men and go with it to yonder riverside, and when you reach it I charge thee to defend and see if any craft loaded with persons or of good provisions approaches and tell me what thou see."

"Your excellency," said the soldier. "Your commandment shall be immediately done."

So the officer departed and by the way he beheld his own noble sword that the pommel and the hilt were all of precious stones he nevertheless drew it and watched as hidden. But soon he came unto the wounded general.

"What did you see there?" asked the general.

"Sir," answered the lieutenant. "I saw nothing whatever but empty craft." "Alas the rebels are trying to deceive me," said the general wistfully. "Go though lightly again please and as though love me spare not to try and see if they come."

Then the lieutenant went again and stood by the waters edge but soon returned and told the general that he had done his commandment that no one was yet coming whom he was seeking.

"What did you see there now?" asked the general.

"Sir answer," answered the soldier. "I saw nothing but the ice floes in the water and the waves lashed beach."

"As thou has been unsuccessful twice," said the poor general. But now go again and do again as I bid thee for the one carrying putter me in jeopardy of my life. Then the soldier did as he was bidden and now riding on the icy water a little large with seven fair girl children in it and among them was a pet beautiful child and all had purple clothing on and they wept and shrieked when they saw the wounded general.

And all adjourned to their beds soon after seven. In order to get the horrible night over sooner.

"Now it is in the morn'g early," said the general. "The soldier did as he was told and there received him three beautiful little girls with great mourning and in one of their laps the general laid his head. And one of the little girls said:

"Ah dear brother Jirrie why have you tarried so long? And this wound on your head had caught over a feverish cold as it is exposed to the winter air."

And under cover of the darkness they rowed from the shore and the lieutenant beheld the go from him.

"Then he cried: 'Oh general, general will you leave me here alone among the enemies of the Lord.'"

"Comfort thyself," said the general. "For in a is no further help, for I will go to the hospital camp to have my grievous wounds healed."

As soon as the lieutenant had lost sight of the girls he wept and wailed then he took to the forest and went all that day and night.

AN EXPERIENCE OF A CHRISTIAN PRI PRISONER AND SERVANTS DURING THE SHORT HORRIBLE SEIGE OF CARBONDALIER TOLD IN PAST CHAPTERS BUT RELATED HERE (ONCE MORE)...

During the time when the siege and battle of Carbondalier had started, and when the rebel soldiers in possession of the town were resisting furiously at every point the desperate christian attacks on every side death had stared the non-combatants which whether christian or not in the face. It seemed as if no human skill could avert it any more, longer. The inhabitants began to see the moment when they must bid farewell to earth, yet without feeling that unutterable horror which much have been experienced by other victims at the battle of Julio Gallo in July and August.

The christian inhabitants were even resolved to die rather than to yield to the rebels and were fully persuaded that in twenty hours more all would surely be over at least if the besieging christians did not win the struggle.

Many glandelinian generals declared so that if the besiegers were wanted all christian inhabitants would be slaughtered for the loss of men caused by the attacks of the Angelinians, so all knew the worst. All the women and children even strove to encourage one another amid the ruin of shot and shell in the streets the burning of houses, and to perform the light duties that had been assigned to them, such as convey conveying orders to the christians by secret series and supplying the necessaries secretly with provisions and information, and especially gave numbers of the rebel troops inside the city itself.

This was dangerous work and if discovered meant sure death right on the spot. One of the bravest of the Glandelinian women loyal to Angelina's cause had gone outside to try to make herself useful in company with many other women and one woman who was the wife of one of the leaders directing the assault upon the rebels in the town. Many of the poor women had been in a restless state of excitement and horror all through the siege and had fallen away visibly within the whole night. A constant fever of horror and dread consumed her, and her mind was wandering. A constant fever of horror and dread consumed her, and her mind was wandering. A constant fever of horror and dread consumed her, and her mind was wandering.

At last overcome with fatigue, she lay down literally on the snow covered ground, wrapped in some heavy blanket, the other women to console her on her side or around her, promising to awaken her when the Angelinians would at last burst into the city. She fell at a length into a profound slumber motionless and apparently breathless, her head resting in the lap of one of the women. One of the others themselves even children everywhere could no longer resist the inclination to sleep, in spite of the continual roar of cannons, the explosion of shells by the hundreds, the roar of blasted houses and falling wreckage, the crash of artillery, the yelling of rebel troops and the loud hoarse confused commands of many of their officers and the screams of many women and children as they saw shells hurtling toward them and trying to dodge them. It was a surely a wild and horrible night. The flashes of shells studded the winter darkness like lightning in a thunderstorm but more frequent and equally as bright and the continual roar of artillery shook the city itself. Suddenly the women who had fallen asleep were suddenly awakened by a wild unearthly scream or screech close to them, and awakening saw their companion who was standing upright beside them, and her head bent forward in the attitude of listening. A look of intense delight broke over her countenance as a regular burst of firing broke out greater than before, attended by a typhoon of yelling and commands, and curses among the rebels, she grasped the hand of one of her lady friends, drew her toward her and exclaimed excitedly: "The city is saved!"

"Don't you hear it? Don't you hear it? Yes and I'm not dreaming at all. It's the slogan of the Angelinians themselves, we are saved, we are saved, they are hurrying through into the city on all sides!"

Then thinking herself on her knees, she thanked God with the most passionate fervor. The other women and even children felt utterly bewildered by the new and louder sound of excitement and firing and confusion, their ears could only hear still the roar of rebel artillery though somewhat slackened, and her friends thought the poor girl was still insane, but she dared to the window of her prison house and she cried excitedly to the prisoners within, women and children:

"Pourage, courage. Hark to the Angelinian slogan—to the new roar of battle, the president of these all. Here's help at last! The Angelinians are in possession of the city!"

Indeed the effects of these words upon the prisoners within would be impossible, noticing that the rebel artillery itself had ceased firing for a moment every soul listened with intense anxiety for new sounds. Though they heard a wilder and more ominous tumult of conflict, they as yet heard nothing else, and gradually however there arose a murmur of bitter disappointment, and the wife of one of the women and children who flocked to the window burst out when she saw one woman shook her head, they could hear nothing but the increased roar of the artillery, wilder yet of the enemy and sterner and more excited commands of the officers, and only noticed that shells stopped dropping into the city in their quarter and this made them believe the enemy was being victorious and had drove back the Angelinians. A few moments more of this death like suspense, of the agonizing suspense of the Angelinians, and there was a sudden backward pressure of the Angelinian troops in the streets, fire of musketry and a great burst out from house windows and doorway doorways and house tops, and into the streets streamed a line of soldiers wearing different uniforms who mingled with the rebel troops in the streets and a demonstration broke loose, the poor excited girl who had come to the ground, spring to her feet and cried in a voice as clear and ringing that it was heard all along the whole line:

"Will you believe it now? The firing of cannon had ceased indeed, but the Angelinians are coming into the streets; go you hear! go you hear!"

At that moment all did hear a the Voice of God, when a roar of voices pitiable in the streets brought them into their prison with a crash of battered doors, armed soldiers in purple and red smoke came in and fierce who took the women and children out, while out in the streets the rebels had retreated back further and further and firing in their locality had ceased as the Angelinians were in possession of the houses. And the still, restraining a ceaseless sound, which rose above all other sounds, could come neither from the retreating enemy, nor from the bounding of artillery or rattle of musketry. No. It was indeed the yell of victorious Angelinian soldiers pressing victoriously through the streets, mingled with the blare of their own musical bands, now shrill and harsh, as threatening vengeance on the rebel foe, then in more softer tones seemingly to promise succor to their friends in need and-----

Daylight had broken into noon time, and never was a sight more grand than in the streets of the city of Carbondale partly burning yet, to witness two many long lines of unarmed prayants, formed up with the Christians also drawn up in lines and their general receiving the surrender of the Angelinian commander who was almost weeping. Never surely was there ever such a scene as followed the surrender of Carbondale; but a heart young the Christian non-combatants of the town but bowed itself before God. And by one simultaneous impulse, fell upon their knees, and nothing was heard but the murmur of sobe, and the murmured voice of prayer, the crying of children since now the suspense was released and the noise of commands of Christian officers on the long divisions of prisoners were being marched out of the city with their Christian troops on and also as some of the prisoners were ready to be released as yet, when all the women and children arose and there ran from scores of thousands of lips a shout about about of joy, which resounded far and wide, and lent new vigor to the prayers of God and His Blessed Mother.

To their Ours Ours "Glory God to The Father, and The Son, and the Holy Ghost, they ran with all their strains that move every soul. On the Catholic to tears. The Catholic Hymn of Thanksgiving. After that that no nothing else made an impression upon many of the recent terrible scene and children. Many of the heroic women and children or nearly all of them received were presented to saintal Hannon Anfe. Angelina given himself on his entrance into the city of Carbondale, and at the grand banquet of the many generals. Their health was drunk by all present, while musicians marched around the table playing once more the familiar air of Angelinian National Hymns.

CHAPTER TWENTY

SIXTY-ONE (1912)

TO MAKE MATTERS MORE RELIABLE, I MUST SAY AS MANY OTHERS DO SAY, THAT INDEED WAR IS ONE OF THE MOST AWFUL THINGS THAT CAN EVER HAPPEN TO MAN, AND EXCEPT IN THE DEFENSE OF LIBERTY, OR OF RIGHT, OR SUCH CAUSES AS THE CHRISTIAN SIDE HAVE HERE IN THIS REPELLED REBELLION, WAR IS ONE OF THE MOST WICKED, AND YET ONE OF THE WORSE SCOURGES OF HUMANITY ENTIRELY, AS IT HAS SUCH MORE DISASTEROUS CONSEQUENCES THAN EVEN CYCLONIC STORMS, EARTHQUAKES, AND SO ON, AND FILLED WITH COUNTLESS THEATRICALITIES.

THE INDEED MEN HAVE BEEN CALLED HEROES WHO WERE MERELY BUTLERS, OR NUMEROUS SCOURGES, SOLELY BECAUSE THEY FOUGHT WELL, BUT I WILL SAY THAT INDEED
SOMETIME WILL COME, AND COME PROMPTLY WHEN THE WORLD WILL FEEL THE TRUTH OF THE WORDS OF JERUSALEM: BLESSED ARE THE PEACEMAKERS: AND THE MEN OF PEACE WHO HAVE HELPED OTHERS TO LIVE BETTER, WILL BE MORE HONORED THAN THOSE WHO HAVE CAUSED MANY UNNECESSARY
DEATHS. MANY WARS, REBELLIONS, AND OTHER STRUGGLES WHICH HAD BEEN THOUGHT GLORIOUS AT ONE TIME, ARE NOW TO HAVE BEEN BOTH FOOLISH AND WICKED, AND MANY MEN WHOSE LIVES MIGHT HAVE BEEN USEFUL, HAVE BEEN KILLED IN THESE WARS BECAUSE OF SOME ONES FOOLISH FANCY, AND THOSE WHO SURVIVED AND RETURNED HOME FOUND NOTHING BUT DEVIATION, THEIR CHILDREN GONE OR RENDERED HOMELESS AND WITHOUT SHELTER!
GOOD COUNTRYSIDES DESOLATED AND EVERYTHING KNOWN AS WAR DESOLATION. THIS IN THIS STATEMENT I WISH TO REMIND THE READER THAT THIS WAR I'M WRITING WAS ON THE SIDE OF THE ENEMY THE MOST WICKEDST WARS EVER KNOWN OF WHICH IF IT PROBABLY WOULD HAVE REALLY HAPPENED WOULD HAVE BROUGHT THE WORLD ITSELF AGAINST CALIFORNIA ALONE.

SO TO LEAVE OFF BATTLES I'M GOING TO GIVE DESCRIPTIONS OF EXPERIENCES THAT HAD BEEN MADE BY MANY DURING THE SEVER OF THE MONTHS OF DECEMBER AND JANUARY, AND ESPECIALLY THE ONES THE VIVIAN GIRLS WENT THROUGH AFTER LEAVING ANDRAN A LETTER BEFORE CHRISTMAS, NOT ON WITH THE WAR!!

December 13th 1912, was indeed a sad harrowing day that will long be remembered with horror and apprehension and feeling of vengeance by the surviving soldiers of General Hamilton. Christian army in the beautiful valley of the gunbana Creek.
On that date occurred one of the most terrible disasters I already told in previous chapters which was known later to the whole imaginary world and will be named in this story as the "Fennie Vivian Flood".

For many days previous to that terrible date it had grown cold and it had been continually snowing very hard with occasional hurricanes along with it, and the rain at times mixed with the snow, and though reports of great floods of water was extending over a vast region of the country on account of the rebels flowing up leaving levees of the Norma Run River in the region of Carbondale, Jello Gallo and the other districts of Vivian.

Wicked great rescues had been accomplished and no loss of lives had yet been occurring. Never before had there been any winter such a fall of snow in western Calaverita within the memory of the oldest Calaveritan inhabitant and it was appearing to be one of the coldest winters ever known yet, the waters of the partly frozen river and creeks of the beautiful Sunbeam Valley being filled with the floods coming from the broken levees of Norma Run began to rise rapidly despite the cold and snowstorms and overflowed their banks forming thick slush among the deep snow, while the Angelinos not thinking of any great disaster coming on looked on in wonder and interest and only constructed pontoons over the flood believing that on account of the intense cold it would in due time freeze over and do no harm and so await the enemy's passage of nature itself.

When one day there appeared to the wondering gaze of many Christian soldiers gathered in a group while returning from a scouting trip, a great horse black in color galloping at breakneck speed and bearing a rider a Calaveritan officer who waved his hands to them and cried:

"Rebels are going to flow up the great Lake Angeline Dues. Urge your troops to abandon the enemy's camp to the higher ground for your lives. It is too late to stop the rebels from their intention."

The officers were immediately alarmed and they ordered the troops to the high ground and General Hamilton rushed to live the command to their officers and the troops. For to the distance in the direction of the lake there was a terrible noise as if the earth itself were roaring and thunder and a smoke cloud rose high into the air and there was a scene as if a volcanic eruption had just broken out. On dashed the rider to men still others of the burning horses and alarm given him but alas he himself and the horse was dashed to death when great rocks falling down which had been buried up by the explosion fell falling everywhere like great hailstones and demolished the bridge.

Of course I wrote again a description of the flood but only a graphic account which I should and will write are the many acts of heroism which were performed by many brave men and women and even children themselves, 9-year-girls and little boys, boyscents and girl scouts in rescuing victims of the floods. So many of these rescues occurred that it would take me all my life time to write them.

As the train reached the nearest portion of the flood at Jennie's town itself, they all observed to their surprise and consternation a large frame house pitching down the mad rushing tide of the black waters, a tremendous whirling eddy floated it in, near to the slowly moving train so close that the wailing of children could be heard piercing their way through the roar. A woman, a stout, stout and her sisters and many of the boys sacrifice their lives in order to survive in the surging waters of the flood. One of no matter who was Violet and her sisters were resolved on one of the boys suddenly cut the bell cords from the oars, and securing also some strong rope, managed to find it fast to his body, and asking the vivian girls to hold tight, he managed to rope went out into the swirling gulf. After desperate struggles, he reached the house, secured one of the children who happened to be a boy two years old and th returning through one of the maddened waters with the rescued child in his arms handed it to the men passing on the train through one of the windows of the coach.

delight. As the lad had entered the door however she had a sudden change of mind and never returned bravely again for the two little girls and found one of the unconscious on the floor, and the water was fast flowing in at the door.

One of many travelers and war correspondents who had many times approached the scenes of the terrible rebellion related the following experience with fierce Mandanlinas covetous as during the night the flood was at its height. From the very explosion and the breaking of the dam the whole country of the Southern Yungay was subjected to the sudden flood produced by the water bursting from the ruined dam which had already as described caused many human beings and many beasts to be drowned or they could make their escape to the higher ground.

The snowy season began and as the snow had broken levees the creeks and smaller rivers had received floods from the Norman gun yet a small flood had begun in the region of the gumboes Grank region but as yet did not threaten the interior and as it was so cold and so much snow falling during early December the interior of the small flood quickly froze over and no damage was done. On the morning near the region of Tataria the traveler and his friends and even his wife and children noticed that the distant hilly ridge in the region of Highburg Landing and even the plains before it, and elsewhere were covered with heavy wreaths of white or gray smoke and there was a peculiar noise in that direction which to them sounded like the noise of an approaching thunderstorm only that the booming was a thousand times more frequent. so snow that day was falling, though the sun was shining through a thick wreath of cloud but nevertheless they noticed many animals, wolves, and steers or reindeers and other creatures snout out of the wooded region in that location, hide for a few moments among snow drifts and then looking hastily back toward the wreath of smoke make for high ground. the traveler thought maybe despite snow on the ground it was a forest fire, so long look the war correspondents after listening intently and to him a good long look through a field glass declared it was a battle raging near the rebel lines at Highburg Landing. The most curious thing however was all kinds of small scampers or in which crows, groundhogs, rats and even birds of all kinds came scampering or flying away from the threatening unseen danger. These latter came in such crowds toward their house that not only the fowls about the place but the crows and even the birds of all kinds began to swoop down them but kites and crows and other winter birds of all kinds and the noise of their in such numbers that the air was filled with their cries and the noise of their rushing wings. While watching the immense destruction of smaller animals they were startled by the outbreak of a tremendous roar high up on the ridge top in the direction of Highburg Landing but far above the peal of thunder from many canons could be heard another tremendous roar somewhere else further away to the north something like a tremendous explosion and a volume of smoke rose into the air and looked like a cloud issuing with great force from the crater of a volcano suddenly bursting into action.

Gaining the open country the scene was one of great desolation, but the sun came out so strong, so they turned round toward morning seeing that the flood was slowly going down with quieter portions beginning to freeze over and that by next nightfall they had gotten back to where their house of refuge stood. Every vestige of the pretty house had disappeared, with its lake and cattle though the fowls had managed to find a roost in the topmost branches of some pine trees, which alone remained to mark the spot. As the winter came upon the men and their soldiers coming down from distant villages like emigrants on higher hills, and embarking on rafts, canoes and boats and also coming on large rafts round the different hills shooting and layingnet the many animals that had swum there with the purpose or purpose of obtaining provisions for their comrade elsewhere the Christians would see them.

A BOYS ADVENTURE WITH A REBEL SPY.

"Yes," replied Sidney innocently. "A very fine one indeed. I paid a big price for it in Pandora, I can tell you."

for it in Pandora, I can tell you."

"Let me look at it please," replied the other with ill concealed eagerness. "I do admire a fine weapon."

giddy unlocked his saddle and produced the revolver, which he handed to the stranger without the slightest hesitation. The stranger handled it very carefully, he observed that all its chambers were well loaded, and he then loudly commented upon its beauty. He then rode a few steps in advance and he wheeled, the horse around suddenly, presented the weapon full at giddy, a loud and covering, violent and her sisters with another and he, called out in a loud commanding voice:

violate and her sisters with the exception of the night of 1941. His own countenance so changed so severely to be recognized, when Judy and Violet and her sisters knew what was before them, probably death at the hands of the man who was none other than the desecrated my leader himself. For a moment there was profound silence as the little girls and the soldier stood facing the spy, Judy and Violet and her sisters remembering with a pang that he was they; were traitors unworthy the little girls having not taken their vengeance along with him; could not resist them.

not hear them. "Well said the rebel officer at last "You are the poorest fool I ever saw in all my life. You are not worth a single one of your little girls can beat it and beat it quick, get back here and up your pockets and be quick about it, now, and take off that army belt too. Now you will find and heavy give was every thing you have in I declare I will drop you where you stand."

"I'm coming to your friends." He called out in a voice of thunder. "Till the all the time that the rebel spirit is, I'll assist a woman and as a spare man for the use of the rebel cause and if any of the Angellines venture to oppose him to do so at his own risk." "I've taken your reflections."

By on the rebel officer turned on his heel and strode away to the woods, leaving your platoon to return to his comrades with his dismal story. Over no Angolinos are ever killed by any rebels no matter how terrible he told it is need not be taken to know that the missing, in care or on credit that some day, he was not dead in a skirmish with the Angolinos proper. Here is the account of the revolt:

of the pursuit. However, the following dangerous adventure with the spy occurred while the Aviation Division on the small mountain Greek branch not far from the region of the terrible flood, while the pursuit was on by a large force of men a trap had been set by other Angelinos elsewhere with the intention if catching the spies it is way to either make them prisoners or dispatch them in the manner spies are dispatched. As the Angelinos were progressing in their pursuit one of the Angelino soldiers who was far in advance saw one of the spies and in the trap his feet having been caught, and taken away from the Angelinos looking man alone at a distance in a way such that he could not release him a fact which made it necessary for him to retreat behind a tree immediately as the spies if seeing him would all shoot at once and he would be killed.

He went from tree to tree until he had reached his other comrades and immediately raised the alarm and the officer drawing his dragon sabre lead the men to the scene where the soldier had discovered the rebels the other officer Colonel Frank Barker armed with a shotgun following along side the other officer and the others with fixed bayonets and loaded rifles, they proceeded direct to the rebels one of which was still in the trap his comrades having failed to release him. The American's slowly and cautiously proceeded forward one of them having a gun, with the intention of trying to capture one of the desperate spies alive.

It being a short time after dark, the object could not be very distinctly seen, but on approaching closer to the scene of action, a grunting among the snow and branches was heard, and other indications warned them of the close proximity of the other rebel spies. When within a few steps of the spot, a dark figure was seen standing by the trap, a growl was heard, and a rebel from an unseen location made a furious leap on one of the soldiers whose name was Jacob Turnerton - who was in advance catching him by the leg with his leveled bayonet. In the same tangle the infuriated Angelinian soldier inflicted a severe wound on his knee, upon which he drew him off a sword and defense defended himself with great coolness. Upon receiving several wounds from the sabre the rebel commenced to growl and curse and swear and yell in a frightful manner when other rebels came to the spot belonging to the rest of the spy gang rushed on the furious Angelinian Lieutenant Harrison and attacked him from behind and he was rescued. The other Angelinians coming on behind and with a trusty weapon with much energy and success, that the new rebel force and well as the rest of the rebel soldiers and deprived one of them of his hands by a lucky stroke, and completely disabled him, eventually by a death blow cut across the neck which divided the tendons and severed the spinal vertebrae. Having completed his bloody conquest, he had ample time to take the rebel who was caught in the trap prisoner, and also ample time to dispatch another rebel who assailed him to rein release the prisoner.

another rebel who snatched him to relief. Release the prisoners was morning this time a stirring and dangerous scene was occurring. War with the other rebels was starting and vigorous at eye at a very short distance the rebels having discharged his gun at some of the other rebels who had tried to shoot him down killed two rebels and mortally wounded others, but a rebel officer who he only slightly wounded sprang at him with a furious howl. He met met with a terrific blow from the butt end of the fowling piece. At the first stroke the Angelinian officer raised his blow and landed the gun against a tree and the stock flew in places, and the next the heavy barrel was hurled a distance of twenty or thirty feet from the des dexterous nature of the rebel officer. Drawing his entire power retreated a few feet by then leaving his back against a large hemlock tree followed the whole party by then rebel also will draw sword so outdistanced him and it was as if they were all together, but being again again acquainted with the nature of the rebel officer and his mode of attack, he drew a large knife from his belt after replacing his sword, and placing his arm coolly on his side awaited the close onset. The maddened rebel officer approached, shouting, swearing, and gnashing his teeth, and with a savage spring and using no impression, ensnared the body of the Angelinian officer in a iron grip and tried to throw him to the ground. There was a moment of wrest ling, and then the next moment the finishing blade of the knife tore his abdomen and his entrails rolled upon the ground as he fell dead. At this exciting crisis of the desperate struggle the other Angelinians accompanied by two Bloodhounds instantly. At that instant Andrus having learned that his brother was alone in a struggle with two rebel soldiers, and in great danger, ran up hastily to the bank above, in order to assist him. A number of Angelican soldiers followed him closely, and the rebel soldier seeing Andrus in the water & covered with blood and suffering rapidly from shore fired upon him, wounding him dangerously in the shoulder. Andrus turned out seeing his brother and five men within in called loudly to him to shoot the "Big rebel" on the shore. Andrus upon hearing was a sorry having just been disarmed, fortunately he pulled his disarmed "Big rebel" gun in firing the first shot that wounded Andrus & he had also an empty magazine. The second shot was fired first, the rebel officer put in his shell and fired and drawing his revolver out he shot at Andrus a third time and finally three times it into the river, and while he was to recover it, Andrus pulled out the advantage.

mere to quicker quicken their steps.
 But when was there general Ivan underneath his comrades indeed from respect to his great grief, had kindly suffered him to fall a knee down behind--and not he was once a glow and fear was on every face for they knew only too well the terrible risks of being netted in the forest with dangerous rebels and even prowling wolves around. Suddenly their words loud outcry--"shrill, agonized, yet choking yell"-----the cry of some man in a full need--the next moment all of the soldiers were rushing in the direction the cry speedily they found their brave general grappling with a great black monster whose eyes were glowing in the darkness. The soldiers were rushing and his terrible teeth baring, pummeling uniforms, the poor general had lincered far behind his comrades and had not heard the rustle of the stealthily throng of rebels and though he had succeeded in killing them, their blood hound which they had brandt with them had attacked the general with great fury. It had with a snarl shot out from the thicket and fallen upon him to revenge the death of its master then the general being overcome and brought down by the creature had uttered that cry of agony which brought his comrades to his aid-----and not a moment too soon. The general was completely exhausted, everything was swirling before his eyes, a million points came in his ears, and he had fallen to the ground and eight fatal bullets were buried in the sides of the blood bloodhound and his shoulders were battered by blows from more than one gun butt--the general though insensible at a picked up was scarcely even wounded, his thick shapskin uniform having saved him from the terrible man a fringe of his natural adversary,--perhaps the very dog who has been belonged to the rebel that had robbed him of his only daughter, they however had not found the object of their search and getting too near the rebel lines had to beat a hasty retreat.

Also on the Eve of Christmas near Worn Catherine during one of the vigorous bombardments of the christian anti-artillery an explosion occurred near a high tower of one of the fortresses of Auradencillo and an adventurous and defiant cat being in the way of the big explosion was by the shock and vibration hurled upward to a height of a hundred and thirty six feet into the air and then fell that high down again to the hard earth and even covered the ground below. In the descent which was watched closely by an immense crowd of Christian soldiers and officers and even women and children the cat spread itself out like a creature called a flying squirrel and alighted on all fours. After turning over on the ground a number of times completely dazed she prepared to leave the ground and had gotten almost beyond the scene of the explosion when a sharp shell landed quite near her, exploded and mangled her so badly that she died in a few minutes.....the poor cat was not in her best running trim after performing such an extraordinary feat and more so she had been foolish for as the shell fell such an extraordinary feat and more so she had to go up and sniff at it to see what it was. At this moment it had went off and she was killed. One of the Angolan soldiers procured the body of the dead cat even at the risk of his own life from burning shells and bombs smoothed out her silky coat as best as he could, and he turned the remains over to a representative of one of the Christian generals who mounted the skin and placed it under a glass case. The rebel on the case told this wonderful story in a few words:

"This cat on the evening of December 23th was blown up to the height of a hundred and thirty feet and would have yet lived if she had not been killed by a sharpshell shell after landing on the ground."

A general in Jemba Jivan who usually had his headquarters fairly overrun with rebel spies every now and then was now no longer troubled with them, and he did not use traps, nor dogs in driving them out. About the time the spies were so more numerous he purchased a tame wolf from one of his best friends. The wolf a big one was given the freedom of the whole building and became attached to sold soldiers and officers and in a short time after its arrival all spies who dared come into the building found it mighty convenient to depart as fast as possible, and very few of them who knew the dog was there seemed to believe it very expedient to return. The wolf did not only scare away rebel spies but caused the conviction of spies and raiders, and when not engaged, he was frequently seen following his masters about like a real well behaved behaved canine, to which he bears no little resemblance. He thought a big wolf had been captured when a small little puppy and had been brought up with a real puppy and in this way had become as tame as any other dog and went about the company streets of the Christian armies without being molested by the army dogs that roam around ready to attack any other animal of their own tribe.

Perhaps every one in the whole world who can read at least knows somet hing about "Trials by jury, or even perhaps about trials by dogs. But how many of them, we wonder know anything about trials by battle in the Christian armies it was generally believed and still believed as god and his blessed mother Mother was always on the side of right as against wrong, that therefore

In a case of contest, He would always give the victory to the side whose cause was just and righteousness among the very beginning Christian lines itself arose the custom of "Trial by battle, where the plaintiff and defendant were each armed with a weapon of some sort and required to determine their dispute by a duel, the right always being adjudged to rest with the victor. A very remarkable trial of this kind occurred during the arrival of general Hanson's army near Liechburg anding after his advance from Calverine where a great Dane dog was admitted as one of the parties to the trial. A rebel officer named Montidier Antonio who while entering a headquarters of some general found the general present with his Dane dog, and in effort to secure some important papers shot and wounded the dog and killed the general. It was sometime however before the dead was known but the murdered general's dog was always seen to go in and out of the house mourning and howling something fierce as if he was and, finally being suspicious a number of soldiers went into the building the following morning and the body of the murdered general was discovered. It was also noticed that since the murder of its master the dog had taken a great and fierce dislike to a certain stranger officer and man who pretended to be a guard named Macarrie turn a snoring upon him whenever it saw him, and on one occasion would have either choked him to death or torn him to pieces had it not been forcibly taken off. Suspicion was at last aroused as to the guilt of the stranger, and he was believed to have been the man who murdered the general, and he was taken prisoner, held for investigation and the summoned before general Hanson Jivan himself who required him to be brought face to face with the dane, when the rebel at once sprang furiously at his captian and howling loudly. The general then charged Macarrie turn with the murder and also of being a dangerous and treacherous spy, but the latter strenuously denied his guilt and protested that he was innocent of any share in the murder and spying work. The general however believed that the great Dane's actions were based upon his knowledge of the stranger's guilt, and he decided that the matter should be determined by a "trial by battle" between the man and the dog.....

The general and his entire staff assembled to witness the battle. The rebel prisoner was armed with a long sabre, but the dog succeeded in avoiding his blows, and with a sudden spring and snarl fastened on his throat with no firm a hold that the man could not free himself no matter how he struggled and finding that he was being strangled he cried out that he was guilty, and he allowed the dog to be taken off. With much difficulty the dog was made to let go his hold, when the any made a full confession of the spying work and of the crime and was taken away and executed. It was not the only case recorded where a rebel any was duly tried and convicted by a dog.

A ship called the Alexander commanded by Captain H.J. Davis sailed from Mormoni June the first, 1912. He intended to go to Galverinia with the intention of securing goods for the coming Christmas day of that year. Having taken about five hundred barrels of oil and other provisions and even dishes and many delicate articles he started on the cruise taking the route of the McWhirther as seen northeastward to the more placid Galverinian sea and fortunately reached the region of the Galverinian shores after four months of travel without mishaps from storms and other convulsions on the terrible seas. Finding many ports along the Galverinian shores blockaded by the Christian fleets, he proceeded on his voyage to the seaport of Galverine, but failing to land there on account of the enemy in possession of the city he went for Ivian whiskey.

Nothing of unusual interest occurred until when passing the region of the well known Devils plow hole he encountered a rebel gunboat suddenly and only by putting full steam did he manage to outdistance the craft which fired several shots but did not take effect. But during the excitement one of the men named Walker Jackson was lost overboard when a fragment of a shell exploding over the steamer killed him. Reaching the region of Wiskey Bay the captain intended to stop at one of the Boy King Islands and coming to Mookin Island from a rebel fleet in sight and dared not approach for fear of being pursued and captured. However the ship stopped at Valdivia Island not far from the Blanglowsen for fresh provisions, and on the thirty first of November, she called at Patia for the purpose if possible of learning condition at Ivian whiskey. He learned that the Christians had blockaded all the seaports of the city, but foolish man as he was he decided to make an attempt to run the blockade. The vessel proceeded on her way. On the twentieth of December the ship came within sight of the blockaded city and reached what is known as the inland part of the sea called Lake Mis-Hollesley in latitude five degrees, fifty minutes south, longitude one hundred and twenty degrees west. In the morning of that day in the thick haze of smoke from fires burning in the mean, yorms and pulio Gallo many peculiar looking and black warships of monstrous size were discovered in the neighborhood in the far distance and about noon in the same day they succeeded in passing a number and crept past one so close that if they were not discovered it was almost a miracle.

Two ships however unseen on account of the haze had gone after the blockade runner, one of them commanded by Commodore Deblois Francisanna, the other by a captain. The other ship which the ship had passed, was soon following. After running sometime a submarine was seen coming toward the boat, and two other ships were rushing after it with tremendous force. Thinking it an enemy ship and not knowing whether the black craft were Christian or Galverinian as no flag could be seen on account of the haze the captain on board the ship turned his ship so fully upon the torpedo boat before those on board had time to make a change of direction. There was a terrific collision and the big ship running down the submarine before it could discharge a torpedo actually crushed in into fragments as small as a common chair. One of the other warships and a dozen smaller craft then immediately struck for the scene of disaster, with the lowering of boats from other ships and succeeded against all expectation, in rescuing the whole of the crew of the submarine, ninety in number before it went down.

There was however nineteen men in the boat of the rescuers who had been injured during the collision, consisting of the captain of the submarine, the first mate and the other men of the torpedo boat. The frightful disaster had been witnessed from other ships, and other boats were lowered and sent to their relief. Taking advantage of the confusion the blockade runner succeeded on its way in full steam. The distance from the other ships was six miles. As soon as the boats arrived the crews were divided, and it was determined to pursue the blockade runner and signal the other ships as well by wireless, and make an attempt to run it down or capture and take possession of it. The Angelinians thought the blockade runner was a rebel ship trying to pass through with supplies for the besieged rebels. In a short time the first two war ships came within sight of the fugitive ships and seeing it was a steamer made an attempt to overrun it and make it give in without firing upon it as the lookout announced the ship which they pursued had women and children on board. ....

four feet of water, he however succeeded in procuring a chronometer, sextant and chart. Reaching the docks he first ordered the boats to be cleared away and to all pile on the boats women and children first as the ship was keeling over while the mate quickly drew up a flag of truce on the mast, while this was being done he again descended into the cabin but the water was rushing in so rapidly that he could procure nothing whatever. He then came upon decks, and seeing to it that all the women and children were in the boats, and finding still more boats ordered all hands in the remaining boats, and was the last to leaving the sinking and now fiercely burning ship. (The parts of the ship still burning where water had not yet reached it). The captain threw himself into the sea and swam to the nearest boat. The burning ship was now on her beam end, top gallant yards under the water. Then as another thick overtook everything they pushed off some distance from the ship expecting her to sink in a very short time. Upon examining the stores they had saved or been able to save, he discovered they were only twelve quarts of water, and not a mouthful of provisions of any kind. The boats contained eleven men each, as well as the women and children a whole crew of over eleven hundred being on the merciless waters, the boats scraped by shots from the burning ship during the attack on the ship were leaky, and night coming on the men were obliged to bail them to keep them from sinking while hoping the warships had lowered boats of their own and were coming to their rescue.

The haze for the time however had obscured them from the warships. They were afloat all night in danger of collisions with warships which could easily run them down, but by a miracle they were not harmed. Next day at daylight they saw the steamer still floating a perfect derelict the fog of smoke being no more intense so that the men on board of the warships perhaps did not see her, and the captain only went on boat with board with the intention to cut away the masts, and fearful the moment that the masts were cut away that the ship would go down. With a single hatchet the captain went aboard and cut away the mast when the ship righted. The other boats came up, and the men by the sole aid of spades and shovels cut away the chain cable from around the foremast which got the ship nearly on her keel. The men then tied ropes around their bodies, got into the water and cut a hole through the decks to get out provisions. They could succeed in getting nothing, but about five gallons of vinegar, some brandy, and twenty pounds of wet bread and biscuits.

They soon found out to their amazement and surprise that during the night they had literally rowed themselves past the ships out into the bay and ocean and that through some cause the derelict had followed after them. On the following afternoon some of the haze had lifted and they all had the indescribable joy of seeing a ship in the distance. They made signals and were soon answered, and in a short time they were reached by an Angellian transport ship heading for Wickey Bay who took the whole swarm of persons on board women and children, and instead of making prisoners of them as was expected extended to them the greatest possible hospitality.

In progressing toward the bay the captain of the transport on hearing the reason of them being in such a condition went to the wreck of the ill fated Alexander for the purpose of trying to secure something, but as the sea was somewhat rough and a blizzard was raging with all its fury, and the attempt considered dangerous, he abandoned the project. The ship then proceeded to the bay landed the provisions and took the rescued party to some port of Abyssinia where they were landed. In one of the boats were they were all received and hospitably entertained at Melasceby the Abyssinians and the women and children taken care of. But Captain Davis learning a lesson from his recent experience, thought of his foolishness and never made another attempt to run the blockade. The warship which had fired upon him he knew was not at fault for the crew on board did not know he had women and children on board, and after darning the ship the crew of many ships had made desperate attempts to reach the derelict and rescue those on board but were frustrated on account of the haze and lost their bearings and so were compelled to return to their ships.

A LITTLE FUGITIVE SAVED BY HIS FAITHFUL FRIENDS

CHAPTER TWENTY SEVEN.

Jennie Mulledonia was a little Abbeisannian girl and before the outbreak of the war she had been held in slavery in Anderson. Though a little girl she was very brave and yet meek and forbearing but as she could earn no money for her labors, and as she desired freedom she had planned many ways to make an attempt to run away and one day while the edge of Adrian Wickey was on she had finally succeeded in doing so by the aid of a little boy friend. He had learned that ten miles from the city of Adrian Wickey was the mighty christian armies and so he decided to make a break for freedom. There was a small tunnel way under the rebel lines out side of Adrian Wickey and so having gained confidence in the little girl and deciding to take her along he started out from the mill at night and after going through many perils and pursuits finally got to the tunnel and taking the little girl by the hand went in. It was a long while before he emerged beyond the glandelinian perils and pursued by the christian soldiers. It was from there only eight miles from the christian lines, but nevertheless that was a long walk for the boy and girl, and for his faithful friend he had picked up on the way a dog which had accompanied him. He was a large black coated dog, with a dark brown face, and soft sad brown eyes. After they had gotten through the tunnel they came to the dark and thick woods of Red riding Hood deep in snow and so first keeping an eye open for enemies they slowly and cautiously went through the forest, with its rows of straight pine and other trees standing a regularly as soldiers on a parade, and when the thickest of the trees were left behind they had to travel some three miles on a snow covered road, with tall outlined woods on each side.

Far to the distance they could see the immense fortresses of the rebels and realizing that they were far away from the foe lines gave them hope, and indeed the christian encampments would be a very welcome sight to the three little tired travelers. One afternoon after traveling for all the morning when the sun was still high though the weather was intensely cold they had by four o'clock reached the edge of the woods and saw far in the distance a long city of tents of purple and red color and further off sights which would tell them of the siege on in earnest. Besieging fortresses, fortified hills, great breastworks and all an active army were in a siege. At first they were almost afraid to go forward but after they had left the snow covered road, and were in the shade of a small log house the children thought it best they might rest a little, and once inside the cabin they started a little fire in the fire place while the place getting warm the dog lay down he was so cold and tired.

The boy himself had chosen a lovely place to halt, and the warmth of the room produced by the fire soon took away his tired feelings and he skipped and romped about with the little girl quite forgetting that he had still a three miles walk before him though only a short time with her the little girl was so pretty and good and gentle in manners that he had become quite attached with her and he amused himself jumping backwards and forwards and playing all kinds of games with the little girl. While he was thus playing with the little girl there was a moan outside and then a heavy pounding on the door of the cabin. At first fearing it was an enemy they were afraid to go near the door and so the boy going to the window looked out and saw a man half lying by the door in apparently a helpless condition.

Feeling sorry for him they finally opened the door and he crawled in. After he had rested himself he finally told them what his trouble was. "I had been pursued by Glandelinians who are rebels" He said and in my race for life had cleared a small ditch but my right foot got caught in a willow pussy willow which I did not see in time and I fell in the ditch which was six feet deep. I was hidden by the enemy as it from the enemy as it was dark but for the time as I tried to get up I found I could not do it, and even when I moved the pain was so great that I could not help crying out. I was also shot in the shoulder during the chase. Finally believing the rebels had gone away I called and yelled for help but could not get any response. So finally seeing a light in this cabin I managed to work myself here and you be your kindness you let me in."

The children however could see that his story was no falsehood for his sleeve and arm was bloody and he winced with pain. They were desoritized at his condition but the brave boy and girl managed to help him take off his coat and then the little girl too tore open his shirt by the shoulder and almost winced when she saw the bloody wound. Half crying and shivering with fear and excitement she asked the boy to secure some water in a small basin which was in the room and thus making it warm over the fire she carefully bathed his wound. While this operation was on the dog saw something was indeed amiss but he did not know what to do for the little girl and boy saw that by the same notions and the dog licking his hand that the dog belonged to the man, as for as he licked his masters hand with his rough tongue he looked the sorrow which he could not speak. "This is indeed unlucky for me" Said the man as the little girl carefully bandaged his wound. "And so far from the christian lines too, and such a lonely place, no one will pass by for hours, if then except probably enemies, but you will stay with me Jane he said pleadingly to the dog. "We have never been separated before like to day."

The poor dog, set down beside the wounded soldier, expecting the man to get up, and when he made no movement but groaned the little boy patted him gravely and the dog in turn patted the man gravely with his paw as if to warn him that he must return home to his comrades as it was getting late.

"I can't get up Jane I have hurt my foot, and I cannot stand," He said. "And my shoulder is wounded."

Again the gentle paw was raised and the dog rubbed his head against the soldiers hand while the boy and girl looked on in bewilderment.

"If we only could get there" Said the little girl pointing to the christian encampments. "We could bring you help. "But I'm afraid to go out there now as it is dark and we are alone."

"I'm afraid we will have to remain here all night," Said the wounded man as the dog continued to win. "And I don't know what you want Jane but unless something turns up we will have to stop here all night. You two children will not be afraid here with me would you?"

"No," They answered. "If the glandelinians do not come here, for in your condition you would not be able to defend us, and we dare not go out and leave you alone here. If only we could fire a gun we would not be afraid."

"I know what I will do," Suddenly said the man, placing his good arm around the little girl fondly. You two have proved yourselves heroes and I made up my mind we will not have to remain here all night. I will send Jane to the christian encampment with a note and a squad of soldiers will come here and rescue us."

The little girl herself wrote the note as he worded it and it was then given to the dog who gave the man a farewell paw and set off at a full trot in the direction of the christian lines. If the poor man shed some tears when the dog was gone it was not only from the pain in the shoulder and in the foot, the good dog realized he had some kind of a business to perform, and he was quite too full of it to heed anything else. The snow was deep and made heavy travel for him, and the poor dog was tired and hungry and thirsty, but he got over the remainder of the distance as quickly as his tired little feet would carry him.

By seven o'clock in the evening the dog was running through one of the company streets of the christian army. The dog went straight to one of the quartermasters tent and scratched loudly with his paws holding meanwhile the note in his mouth but he could not make himself heard by the soldiers within who were busy. The poor dog at last grew tired of watching the entrance of the tent which was closed tight to keep the cold of the December air out with his wistful eyes, and seeing a soldier pass him went to him and stood before him wagging his tail.

"Come on Jane and find you your master," Said the man playfully patting him on the head, and suddenly perceiving the note took it and read its contents. It was childish writing but he managed to make it out. He had wondered why it was when he had seen the dog standing dejectedly at the tent door and that was the reason he had come up to speak to the dog, and then patting the dog once more, who now looked delighted and licked his hands, he ordered the dog to follow him and went before general Hanson, Adrian W and presented the note. The note startled him or the note rather and Hanson said:

"I wondered where Francis Claus was all this time. And so the dog had come home without him and two little children are with him in the cabin. The colonel is hurt somewhere in the forest having been pursued by rebel when lost in the woods. I will immediately organize a strong cavalry squadron and have them follow the dog to the place. Surely the dog will guide them where the man and children are. He is as sensible as any man."

"I will lead the squadron," Said the soldier who was a captain. We will go and look for the man and children whether the dog comes or not but I will first gather a force of one thousand men in case of need. Those darn woods in that region are swarming with glandelinians."

the warship flew the flag of Angelinia. "He cried I mistook them for the glandelinians."

to counter-reiturn the most extreme and peculiar persecution. (You see the property on board of this steamer was given to me as a sort of trust to the Angelinians in the support of the city of Galvestine and it would not be right for me at all to give it up to the glandlinians. you can take anything else if you please to do so for I suppose I can't help myself now, but I was not blockade running.)

_____

"You appear indeed to be an honest man at any rate as I see you and your crew are Abhisindians," said the Angelinian officer, "but I don't trust any one no matter who they are who are suspected of trying to run the blockade. At least you appear to have tried to make them think they are glandelinian ships loaded with glandelinians. You see we use captured enemy ships to fool blockade runners and make them think they are glandelinian ships loaded with glandelinians. We fooled you this way. But just the same if you would live ten minutes longer, just tell me truthfully what you have got on board the ship beside much machinery and women and children, and exactly where it lays."

The sight of the cooked pistol brought the old captain to his senses, but the captain really had nothing else on board and so in a deprecating tone he muttered in reply:

"Don't kill me sir, don't but I told you that in all I have. The machinery is in worth forty thousand dollars and is stowed away just forward of the cabin but bulkhead but Mr. Pantha who sent it to Galverine did not suspect that the glandelinians were in possession of the city and so did not suspect that any glandelinians would seize us and would think of looking for it or anything else there. If you don't believe it go with your men and look for yourselves."

"Perhaps so I will," chuckled the Angelinian officer while his eyes sparkled with suspicion. "I still don't believe you but just the same I'll take a look and if I find anything else in your possession besides what you said to me, you and your whole crew will go to the prisons on the charge of attempting to run the blockade. And turning to his men he ordered all but three of the men to go down the hatchways and make an investigation. In a few moments the Angelinian had taken off the hatches and in their haste to make the search they forgot all else but not so with the officer in charge, he had his wits at work, and no sooner had the last of the soldiers disappeared below the hatchway than he turned to his three remaining men.

"Now boys keep the captain of this ship under your guard. Seth Spinner you slap your knife across the forehead and peak his halyards to prevent the crew from making an effort to climb the rigging to escape us, and you John Stanek cut the main. Be quick now and the moment you have done it, order the other men coming in the boats below in the water to jump aboard this ship. Andrew and Sam you cast off the anchor and other grapplings and then you jump down into the hatchway and help in the investigation. I have a number of men to watch the crew of the ship."

No sooner said than done. The fore and main halyards were out and the grapplings for the anchor cast off at the same instant and as the heavy gaffs came rattling down the other boats arrived under the ship and the men leaped aboard. Another Angelinian warship was now about a cable length to leeward to corner the steamer in case it would make a desperate attempt to escape sweeping gracefully forward but slowly while the crew and women and children watched the scene in amazement.

Halloa there," shouted the Angelinian officer down in the hatchway to which he had gone as the other crew crowded around the lee gangway of their prize. "When you boys find that machinery let me know. I have found nothing else yet."

After the investigation was thoroughly made pistol shots, about half a dozen in number announced that the search was over and the crowd of soldiers and marines came up again on decks and then explained all that had happened. The steamer now towed by the warship was cutting through the water like a dolphin and in a remarkably short space of time they were within sight of the immense fleet of Christian battle ships all black in color. The ship proved to be to the Angelinian officer an Abhisindian steamer surely bound for Galverine but had went into the port of Yivian Wiokey instead having all told three hundred and thirty men aboard besides one thousand two hundred men women and children passengers, boys and girls combined and now as all of the crews had jumped on board and officers offered their services the ship was completely interred. Before dark the steamer was conveyed among the fleet and in two days time after being confined for a time it was fully proved that the steamer captain had made no attempt of trying to run the blockade of Yivian Wiokey and so for having made him all the unnecessary trouble the Angelinian treated him with great respect, and while remaining on board the ship for those two days played with the troops and children and saw to it that everything was all right. In return for his trouble the loyal Galverine government gave the captain of the ship a sum of money sufficient for an independence during the remainder of his life as well as a very handsome medal from the government.

This however proves that no one no matter who he is he can run the blockade of Yivian Wiokey successfully. One ship a little after this had been also pursued by Angelinians when it attempted to run the blockade and this one proved really to be a ship in charge of a crew really attempting to run the blockade to give provisions to the enemy. Two warships pursued and also some gunboats and even opened fire but the steamer which was running the blockade was fully armed also with great cannons and there was quite an exciting combat before the ship was finally reduced to a half sinking condition and forced to halt or be destroyed altogether.

"Steamer boy," demanded the captain of the warships, "Will you blockade runners quickly surrender yourselves on pain of war if we come on board?" "Come and try to make us surrender," returned the captain of the blockade runner as he brandished his sword over his head in a very threatening manner. This really indicated that he was a very desperate man though really a Mormonian that and that if pursued he would really fight to the last. But this was his last moment for as the rebel leader was in the action of turning to his men the sharp roar of two guns burst forth there was an immense cloud of smoke as the weapon the blockade runner and the next moment an explosion occurred on deck of the ship badly mangled by the debris and fragments of flying implements caused by the blast.

"Now," shouted the admiral as more big guns were turned on the fugitive ship. "I'll just give you survivors just five minutes or less to make up your mind to surrender and if you don't you will receive no quarter and the guns of three of my ships will blow you into the air ship and all."

The death of their captain and withal the sight of the blockade runners to their senses immediately, and they threw down their weapons and one of them raised a flag of truce and gave themselves and the ship up.

On board the ship was found plenty of ammunition for the enemy besides provisions, and also some small number of women men and children passengers on board. The ship however with everyone on board was delivered into the hands of the civil authorities of the Angelinian, the crew of the ship were taken to Jamie Yivian as prisoners, and the men women and children transferred to another steamer bound for Abyssinkile....

THE FRIGHTFUL BATTLE OF EVA CRANIA, OR NORMA ROSSINIA, AND THE RESULT/

While Violet and her sisters were prisoners within the enemy's lines as stated in the last few chapters the battle of Evangelina Crania was on for fair. On the morning of Christmas day a great surge of Glandelinians swept over the Christian line though in a whole minute a whole score of regiments had melted away before the Christian fire. Hundreds of thousands of the survivors with a quick or scramble swarmed over the high banks of earthworks but they went down mangled and bleeding in tens of thousands. At the head of the main charging column galloped general Simon Legree, and he was at a loss what to do for the whole Christian line was storming with fire.

Despite the odds Simon Legree galloping ahead urged them on. The effects of the Christian fire was awful multitudes of Glandelinians laying dead or wounded, but portions of the right grand divisions of the foe were already forcing back the left grand division of the Christian forces, but at another point Legreesmen were being forced back, and only by dint of courage was he able to rally them and press them forward once more. As Legree's main line was going into action it seemed now that the fiercest conflict ever seen raged, and Legree launched three of his most powerful forces against the Christian lines. In the meantime general Hanson Vivian commanding the Christian center held his line of battle formation as he was fearing an attack. He could hear the roar of carnage along general Evans' line also but along his own lines there was still great silence like the calm before the storm. No shots were heard and neither were the sweet twitter of birds to break the lonely silence. An hour later a new and more tremendous roar of musketry came to his ears, and it sounded as if the very bowels of the earth was growling in anger.

"The enemy's attack has begun," he cried. "Forward to the help of Kindernine." His own veterans then pushed on and when they reached the scene of the conflict, they saw something of the fight which lay before them. Hundreds of thousands were lying outstretched on the ground in long streams and the fields and plains were lined with the Glandelinians who were attacking with indescribable fury, while Kindernine was forming the battle line and attempting with all his ability to hold the enemy back. General Jerome could not go into action here so these troops changed position. With a yell like an army of fiends the Angelinians under Bob dashed toward the works where the foe under James Bengier the brother of the other Bengier of Hedda Shoemannies army was attacking and all along the line the roar of the most terrible and the heaviest firing ever heard before if telling the truth told that the battle was on in general.

"Here general Nance. Your main forces are at general Kindernine's left, and are moving in a wrong direction," said Hanson Vivian riding up at this moment. "They are waiting for orders. I have placed them under Kindernine until you would appear. Get them into action at once. This conflict is not bad at present but it is likely to get bad in a very few minutes more for Shoemannies main line is now moving forward to the attack."

Hanson had barely given the order when the roar of musketry roared now like a million cannon mingled with the thousands of thunders from many heavy calibre and machine guns. Nance went at once to his command almost deafened by the din, and here indeed hell seemed to have broken out along the line. General Jack Dane himself had dashed ahead to where his own command was forming for action.

"Forward to the left!" was Benignus' sweeping order. With a sweeping dash they came up to the wide plains and stopping squarely in front of the advancing enemy, and then general Greatharts divisions also arrived to the scene.

"I'll try to hold this position," said Kindernine, as his artillery battalions answered his call.

"This is the riskiest place," was Hanson's answer. "Try to hold this position but be extremely careful that the foe do not surround you. I have sent general Nance to repel the enemy's right grand division which is attacking with all their fury, while general Love Child is repelling their left center. Love Child has a fearful time there for monstrous divisions of the foe are successively thrown against his lines with all the violence they can assume, and his lines are already smoking like a forest fire."

Kindernine knew well by the sound of incessant musketry and cannon which was louder than along his own lines that Love Child was having a most desperate fight. The first attacks had been made on general Kindernine's army and before the alarm was sent to general Hanson the conflict had become so fierce that general Kindernine, had been compelled to send a messenger to general Hanson for help, and Hanson had sent Nance divisions to support him until Nance himself should appear. Now he supported Kindernine himself with all his entire force, and even with every reserve and artillery battalions. Hanson galloped up as close to Love Child's army as possible and noticed that the Glandelinians all being half drunk Omerian Curdes were attacking with ten thousand furies, but also Love Child's men were standing their ground with such stubbornness that the losses along the enemy's smitten lines was simply terrific and beyond description.

Even now general Evans' divisions were rushing up in full force to support general Love Child, never halting until his lines were reached. General Jack Evans could see the enemy attacking all along the line, and so he sent a large force to defend an ungarrisoned stockwall, and as soon as the Angelinians reached it a pall of smoke all at once seemed to hide the foe, and there was such a terrific roaring as to drown out the thunders of a mighty eruption of a thousand volcanoes in hell, if there are any there to be seen.

Hanson left the spot he had been surveying and made his way rapidly to general Nance's command in the hope that he might discover if the foe were attacking in full force against his overwhelming numbers. If they once got a hold of Kindernine's position especially at the right under general Nance, Hanson knew that Kindernine's whole line would be rolled up in great confusion. From along the rolling plains a long line of the foe though torn and mangled were rushing forward with fixed bayonets and the first portion of the line were already close upon the position, and engaging Nance's lines in a hand to hand fight.

Instantly he drew rein for he had seen that the foe were leaping forward and that the pressure of the enemy's lines at close quarters was becoming too much for Nance's men. Indeed the enemy at this point was massed in great numbers, and had hurled themselves against the overwhelming Christian line and so turning back Hanson made his way to his artillery batteries and ordered them forward to the support of general Nance, while general Maurice Costello was also sent forward, and the struggle now became more fiercer, and as he dashed upon a bridge general Hanson had a narrow escape from being killed as it gave way under his horse and threw him headlong into the stream. He found his horse floundering in quicksand, now he himself got out he could not understand but the horse could not get free, and disappeared before he had a chance to look back. Even now a glance toward the eastern portion of the battle line showed him that general Pare-Not-Lies army was in danger of annihilation so persistent was the attack of the foe these Glandelinians being under Jennings and Simmermann, and so he had to send an order to have Pare-Not-Lies heavily reinforced before it was too late.

Hurrying on he reached a point half way down the bank of the Angeline Run river and halted just as a solid shot cleared over his head. Here a greater force of the enemy was attacking the Christians under Maurice Costello and Harold Stanley, and also the fierce Abyssinians under general Pickens Montrose. The enemy were attacking at this point with spasmodic violence, but he could not see anything that was going on here for everything seemed hidden in a sheen of smoke. Here indeed was the main danger, and here was the place for them to fight it out with all their might.

Reaching the southern banks of the same river he came upon general Powell Buster Johnson's army just coming on at double time, but the general just then was absent having not recovered from his latest wound last wound. So general Hanson ordered them to advance advance to the right of the Angeline river and to try and check the assailants under general Snyder Bassett, and to take the positions captured by Ruebaun McWhirther on the double quick. General McWhirther who was in command here was taken by surprise at this order for from the raft reflection of the gleaming bayonet through the pall of smoke which he saw to the left of general Montrose's position where he was having a worse fight than any before, that the Glandelinians would not have by this time advanced so near to success yet, but he realized that the enemy had come on like the approach of some great whirlwind which strikes without warning. It was the work of an hour for his infantry lines to place their batteries into position and to advance to the position, pointed out by general Hanson Vivian. He already noticed that the enemy's assault had grown worse in its pressure, and that the foe had increased in numbers. The enemy had fairly made their way through the long barricade of fallen trees, and it was now very difficult fighting to force the enemy back, and it seemed indeed as if the whole Christian line would soon be driven in despite the reinforcements steadily arriving. His infantry men were waiting impatiently for the order to commence firing, and it was with the greatest energy and zeal that they went to work, when finally McWhirther waved his sabre over his head, and ordered them to hammer away. With might and main the infantry men worked at their stream of musketry fire, and at the first discharge the very first line of the enemy withered away, while at the same time there was a yell behind the infantry!

Instantly Madison and Costello Benigan recognized the value of this suggestion, and soon had all their reserves and other reinforcements which had arrived in time thrown upon the point suggested, and now again the enemy's lines were being fairly torn to pieces. However the enemy had already made a splendid and brilliant advance and success, and were now coming on in great fury just as the christian guns let loose their storm of shells, and even canister by the hundred shot per minute. The uproar almost deafened the generals, but they ordered the firing along their entire line to increase.

"At then, men. We have got to check them screeching demons in gray uniforms before they come too near. Give it into their very faces, and show them that we cannot be beaten like Kindermine. Give them hell..."

At it the Angelinians went with a will. In a moment the air and earth seemed to abound in one terrific reverberating roar, there was a dense pall of powder smoke, and now the enemy though their main columns went to pieces, came in close quarters with the christians, and even in the fierce struggle large gaps were seen in Madison's lines, but these were closed up again and the Angelinians massed themselves upon the enemy, presenting a bloody tumult of bayonets, and bringing the glandelinians down as fast as stars would shine in the heavens. General Hanson pined, looked on in awe.

He watched this force of christian infantry men at their thrilling work without one word of criticism. They were fighting as he knew soldiers would. They had been through their primary training again and again, and had learned their lessons well. The pressure of the glandelinian attack was terrific, but nevertheless the Angelinians would not fall back, and soon the enemy unable to face such a bristling barrier were starting to waver, and at last came the loud thundering roar of Baldwin's batteries, and fresh gaps were torn in the enemy's line, gaps that could not be closed, as this artillery fire became annihilating, and soon the glandelinian columns even in the glen were recoiling in confusion, while general Kindermine's forces had been withdrawn, and general Cannon now poured his forces through the glens and again the enemy were on the retreat, and neither the commands of their leaders could stop their terrible disorder. From the rear of general Benigan's division came the roar of more cannon which were being trained upon the retreating glandelinians.

It was at this time when huge columns of fresh glandelinian infantry swarmed over swarmed forward at a rush to the rescue of their comrades already driven back, while every outlying stretch of woodland seemed hidden in a pall of smoke. In due time the retreating glandelinians were gradually rallied and now general Nance's divisions which were the first to receive the new attack were also almost surrounded, for there was only one breach in the field, where there was no furious glandelinians the river and the bridge, which the enemy had not seen in time to destroy.

The christians did not turn to see where the terrific tumult of bayonets and pikes came, did not turn to watch the enemy as they again pressed in their headlong drive from the rear, where a more terrible slaughter was going on, hand to hand with pikes, and all kinds of weapons at close quarters. Instead of being confused at being almost surrounded they stood their ground fighting fiercely, and with all their might, desperately, hopelessly, vainly trying to crush back the furious driving onslaught of the Omarians. Indeed it seemed as if it was of no avail, but they manfully fought hand to hand, for they would not surrender to the enemies of God.

"Fall back to the river, but keep up your furious resistance..."

Thus came Nance's orders as he saw the other columns were not ready to yield to the advancing enemy. Slowly the christians responded to the order, and now on one side they could see fresh columns of the enemy moving on in heavier numbers, and feared within themselves that the bloody battle was lost. Even the christian generals believed that nothing could check the fresh attack of the foe, and even Kindermine and Greathart applied directly along the other points of the christian line had been unable to check the straggling progress of the foe, and had only been driven back, with many of their regiments, and brigades annihilated.

"Stay as long as you can general" was Costello's advice to Nance, when he rode up to his lines to see how things were getting on. "Kindermine and Greathart's armies have been crushed, and if we fail to hold at this point all is lost..."

Then just as he said this poor Nance fell severely wounded. Hanson pined himself was dashed back and forth along the active christian lines, and now as he came riding up to a point where the christian fire was the fiercest, he espied Kindermine coming up with a new force and also with fresh artillery. Shells by the thousand were now exploding among the enemy's lines who seemed to have fallen back from the right of the christian position at that point. Then he saw general Greathart and Lovochild arriving also, and these soon advanced on the enemy, Kindermine saying with a scowl,

"Those damn glandelinians have desecrated my first grand division, and I kill me before they can drive me back again..."

The effect of the arrival of reinforcements of and of the steady resistance of the Angelinian columns was beginning to tell on the enemy who were again wavering at many points as their lines were so terribly thinned that they could no longer face the christian fire.

General Hanson exultant, taking advantage of the moment when the enemy began to fall back, had remained there for several minutes, and now he sent a messenger to order his main cavalry forces forward, saying that the enemy are falling back all along the line.

"Good for you general Kindermine. All the other divisions on account of your perseverance are now fighting the foe back. I believe we will be able to make a good impression on Rheemania's main line after a while. Keep it up. Pay no attention to these glandelinian columns at the extreme right, for my cavalry forces will attend to them, and help these other infantry lines to drive them back. Watch those main new columns, and let the cavalry take care of the other..."

Indeed Hanson was plainly happy over the turn of events. Then up came his torrent of cavalry, just as a fresh roar of artillery from a distant plain to the right had broken into action, the shells crashing through the trees and now among the christian line causing awful havoc.

"Go at them in those plains" Told Hanson to his cavalry forces who were waiting for his commands. "Dash at them full tilt. Go into them hard and show them they got to respect the flag of Angelinia!"

On the instant the storm of grape and canister from the christian cannon were pouring among the lines of the foe in the plains causing fearful destruction among them and sweeping them down in brigades, the christian cavalry dashed forward like a thunderous avalanche, and before the storming onslaught these glandelinians also began to retire.

Nance who had gotten out of the ring of glandelinians was also pressing forward with his command, advancing now at a fearful pace, and undaunted by the yelling of the foe; the soldiers pressed on, following the slightest advantages that were offered to them. Though severely wounded twice, Nance, for fear of his command suffering the same rout as Kindermine's first command would not leave his lines though urged by his officers many times, only saying:

"I'm going to stak it out to the last, and there is nothing that is going to daunt me now, not even the very devil himself, and should he appear and try to force me to leave I would not do so, and so leave me alone, and do not mention the matter again..."

General Hanson himself watched the enemy who were still advancing, watching the forward progress toward the river, and waited for the time when he would have to change tactics. In a few minutes that time came, and he was compelled to order Nance's division to fall back despite the protest of that commander. When suddenly came an explosion in the plains that threw a column of earth and rocks, and smoke for the height of a hundred feet."

"Fight the enemy back along the line of the river bank. We have got to hold this position at all hazards. Don't let the foe reach here. As long as we check them along this point, while the others of the christian columns are going forward now we will be able to help the other divisions which are still hard pressed, and we will then have a chance to fight the enemy back from his own positions..."

It was gratifying to Hanson to see that the plains where they had been battling the foe was now clear of the glandelinians. This seemed to presage good. It showed that the steady fire along that point had at least its effect, and so long as the fight was conducted down along the river banks there was a chance of winning a quick victory. It was only an hour after more stubborn fighting when the Angelinian columns having first moved forward were soon seen coming back in fragments.

"Call your men to fall back general Nance. Fall back to the other side of the river if you can, for the enemy are now again pressing the whole christian line back, and are advancing again successfully despite our overmen overwhelming force, and are again crushing everything before them..."

How Nance's heart sank at this. The enemy had tricked them. The Glandelinians formally retreating had met with heavy reinforcements, and the reinforcements had poured upon the advancing christians such a fire to as to shatter their whole main line of advance to fragments, while other columns of the enemy had found a way by getting onto the pontoon bridges where they had a fair chance of crossing unobserved, and forcing lines poured a destructive fire upon the christian flank.

"Send an aid to give Baldwin an order to cannonade the assailants and drive them off general" cried Hanson through a foghorn. "We have a full advantage here and are controlling the foe, and keeping them away from the river..."

The fury of the conflict now did look worse than ever before. The enemy had driven all the christians who had advanced into indescribable confusion, and there was only one line of christians who were still standing their ground, and trying to hold the assailants off. Here indeed seemed the place they must stay.

"Stay right here boys. Hold them back! We must fight the enemy off at any cost!" Said Nance.

Bravely the christians made their stand against the advancing glandelinians, watching every inch of the space between themselves and the enemy, watching every check that might be given to the foe. Undaunted though by the seemingly impossibility, Nance directed his men but the enemy had already passed through the same glen, where Hanson had seen Kindermine's confused masses pour through only a few hours before, and had made their way forward, and advancing along a way nearest the river point, and soon they were upon the christians and the struggle was fearful in the extreme.

The peculiar thing to general Hanson as he stood by directing them was that the large plains within his view and many of the fields were again swarming with the enemy, while at other points the enemy had also come but were now within close quarters with Kindernine's main line, and Hanson's flank which was also threatened, for the enemy had advanced past the orchards, and rushed for the flank of Hanson's divisions. Then he was wondering what was happening on the flank of the left of his own line. Telling Kindernine to hold his ground more stubbornly he galloped within sight of general Hanson's flank, finding that at the left, the enemy had not yet reached it. These woodlands were entirely clear, and now he started to view the right flank. Reaching it he found that the enemy were already swarming forward through the woods showing that they were already making a charge for the right flank, which was now on guard. On he galloped and within twenty minutes reached the rear of the infantry under general Hanson to find that there was not a sign of the foe, only those assaulting him in front, and not the glimmer of a musket could be seen. Galloping on to join his main forces he found that they were making little if any progress against the enemy, who had stopped advancing against the Christian fire, but they were not driven back, and they were returning just as fierce a storm of musketry all along their own line. Indeed they were at a standstill. In most cases this bodes good, but he knew that at other points the enemy were assaulting still, and going at it hammer and tongs, and he believed that the enemy were doing some kind of mysterious flint, which he could not make out, neither could the signal corps. Indeed a great mystery was to be solved here.

"How are you making it general?" Hanson asked as he galloped up to Kindernine and found his divisions also fighting at the same spot to where his first columns had been driven before.

"At a standstill your excellency," said Kindernine. "We are in hopes that the men under Greathart and Lovochild will hurl the foe from them, and hoping that Hanson succeeds in holding them from crossing the river. So long as we can keep the foe in check, we know that those Christian columns are safe. If they once get too near the river we will have to fall back."

"That sounds rather pessimistic," thought Hanson. "No chance of saving the river out of their hands?" He said.

"Not a bit general, but we will keep them here as long as we can. If we abandon the line here too soon it will be likely that the whole line will be jeopardized. The distance across the river is mighty short. If we use artillery here—"

"We will make the enemy all the madder, and too many cannon here would only hold us back from any regular action for the infantry lines, and also would tempt the foe there by making their fire so hot that we could not get near enough to fight without being wiped out of existence. Here we have a fair fighting chance of keeping the enemy checked enough so that they will have to keep up their fire where they are."

Hanson stood irresolute thinking over what general Kindernine had said. It seemed altogether probable that the Angolians could continue the fight against the foe not without any idea of driving back the glandelinians before they could reach the endangered lines, but with the view of causing the enemy to stay where they were and thus not produce such intense anger into the foe that they would advance again as to drive the Christians back too far.

Once the rest of the Christian divisions would come into action and sweep the enemy's lines through and through with their destructive fire, the enemy would probably give way. Across the River stood a Catholic Asylum usually for children, a building four stories in height, and now with the furious glandelinians so near it, it was in great danger of capture and destruction, and the Christians were attempting with all their might to keep the enemy from advancing across the river. Leaving the matter in the hands of Kindernine general Hanson again galloped to his own forces of veterans seeing little of the other infantry forces for he knew they were helping Lovochild's men as desperately as they knew how. Thousands of the half-drunken Zimarrundians and garrian Curdes were swarming against the Christian lines near the asylum, while the rest were pressing on at other points, and indeed it was terrific fighting they were doing, and general Hanson who was watani watching the fight saw that there was not hardly another thing which could be done now as his whole line was engaged, and he was forced to send an appeal to Jack Ambrose Evans for reinforcements, general Ambrose Evans having not arrived yet.

"How are you holding them general Kindernine?" Shouted general Greathart riding up.

"Holding our own general," answered Kindernine. "The enemy at the left of our forces is dragging up parks of artillery and my men are also trying to shoot down the artillery horses, drivers and the gunners."

The words came quite loudly and Greathart heard them plainly amid the din and uproar of the battle, and the scream and yells, and groans of the wounded and dying.

"It isn't a lost fight!" Thought general Hanson as he stood to one side with or on his stand, having dismounted and was watching the awful struggle, all excitement gone, a kind of apathy settling upon the whole fight. It was a second time in the war he seemed to have no interest in a battle. The enemy at this point were not advancing but they were holding their own against the Christian fire. Baldwin's batteries were making a fierce and grand volley of sound. Fortunately cannon of every description, which volleyed and thundered.

A REVOLTING IDROP, AND A BATTLE OF DAMNATION.

THE WHOLE COUNTRY WAS SHAKEN BY THE

The peculiar thing to general Hanson as he stood by directing them was that the large plains within his view and many of the fields were again swarming with the enemy, while at other points the enemy had also come but were now within close quarters with Kindermans main line, and Hancoes flank which was also threatened, for the enemy had advanced past the orchard, and rushed for the flank of Hancoes divisions.

The voice came quite loudly, and was heard clearly amid the din and uproar of the battle, and the scream and yell, and groans of the wounded and dying.

"It must be a lost fight!" Thought general Hanson as he stood to one side with or on his side, g having dismounted and was watching the awful struggle, all excitement gone, a kind of apathy settling upon the whole fight. It was a second time in the war he seemed to have no interest in a battle. The enemy at this point were not advancing but they were holding their own against the christian fire. Baldwin's batteries themselves were in general action making a fierce grand volley of sound. Fortunately however the enemy along general Hancoes front unable to make out any headway, against the fierce resistance of his troops, were now giving way abandoning also the attack on his flank, as the fire of Baldwin's batteries was becoming unbearable. Then came a simultaneous discharge of musketry along the rest of the enemy's lines, and the other glandelinian divisions began to give way.

"Hurrah!" Shouted many voices at once. "The foe are at last giving way." Crossing the section general Hanson glanced at the retreating foe, and saw how the enemy had captured the outer line of works near the orchard. They had charged in three directions from their main positions. The Angolinian generals had been unable to restrain the hundreds of thousands of christians who now pushed and jammed their way forward, and at last the remainder of the strong gray line parted under the terrific strain of the crushing number of Angolinians, who pressed upon them with fixed bayonets, and now there was a furious fight hand to hand. The trees almost fifty feet distant were hidden in the smoke of the firing that had been so fierce three minutes ago. The angry combatants fairly leaped at each other like tigers clashing fiercely, but nevertheless the glandelinians were forced to give way, but they were not in confusion, and the christians were suffering terrible losses in their advance against them. General Dane himself bended low to avoid a pistol shot aimed at him, and found that many christians were surrounding him to save him from the foe. Even many times bristling bayonets or pikes gleamed in his eyes, and the scores of thousands of combatants struggling like demons with merciless fury was an awful sight. The purple and gray lines were fighting most determinedly, there being a tremendous tumult of bayonets all around him, the enemy yelling and hooting so fiercely as they hurled themselves upon the opposing Angolinians. Thousands of more dead and wounded of both sides lay in heaps while hundreds were piled up around general Dane.

The hand to hand conflict had now become awful and men were falling in hundreds per minute everywhere. The crashing of musket butts on musket butts, the ring of steel on steel, and the cracking and snapping of pistols was becoming worse every moment, the Angolinians themselves gathering close, while many of the graycoats leaped at the christians guarding general Dane like fiends. However overwhelming numbers were thrown against the wavering lines in gray, and the glandelinians finally withdrew. Along the left wing of general Hanson main left wing the struggle was more terrible. The whole christian line was shaken by a volcano of flame and din, the roar of cannon and musketry seeming to rend the heavens, but screaming with rage the enemy pressed upon them, the two million glandelinians under general Anna Deldon charging against the christian line with impetuous fury, hurling themselves again and again upon the purple lines. Glandelinian divisions with their leader wounded were placed between two fires, and crushed and mangled were compelled to fall back, but the main line continued the onslaught and the ferocity of the conflict was insupportable, and at last a portion of the christian line was forced to give way, the glandelinians pressing on in the face of a fire from ten batteries of cannon from the rear where the gunners had brought their artillery into action just at this critical moment. The main portion of the christian line held firmly repelling the glandelinians furiously. For five hours this conflict had been raging along the left of general Hanson's line, and with such fury that the christian leaders declared that it was the worse conflict they had ever seen since the struggle at Saxton Run or Mc-Holleston Run, the concentrating onslaughts being fearful, the carnage awful, but for a while the situation did not turn out favorably for either side, though general Hentione had within nearly four hours managed to mass fifteen million against the christian line left, which had in mighty columns crashed against the christian line but now after two hours more of terrible and merciless fighting the onslaught was gradually repulsed and with such heavy loss that general Hentione's line crushed to fragments, and their surviving columns mangled beyond reforming were demoralized and panic stricken and began to fall back.

General Franciscalic had simultaneously struck against the christian line with nearly ten million, and here the struggle went on with such a fury that the commanders of either side were amazed at the bravery of the opposing forces. The conflict had become fiercer and fiercer, and millions of brave and desperate glandelinians had charged upon the christian line with crash and roar only to have their own lines ripped and torn up, and their survivors go down in tens of thousands all along the line.

Despite this awful carnage, and even when fresh batteries were brought into action the glandelinians continued the attack, Giacomo Gooso falling severely wounded his whole command decimated by the destructive drum fire of four thousand cannon of every description, which volleyed and thundered.

One column after another of the Landolinians rushed on furiously the field of battle being fairly strewn with a perfect sea of dead and wounded. Just as the main line of the assailants came within a few hundred yards of the Christian line the whole Christian line delivered a fearful fire followed by another and another dreadful volley and now the Landolinians went down in hundreds of thousands, and the surviving columns suffering exorbitant losses, were soon compelled to fall back, the Christians swarming forward as the Landolinians retired in confusion, and indeed it was an awful harvest for a Christmas Day. In this battle the Landolinians had lost in killed and wounded and prisoners and missing near to 10,000,000 and the Christians 18,500,000 in killed and wounded alone."

A REVOLTING HORROR, AND A BATTLE OF DAMNATION.

While all this had been going on there had been indeed a revolting horror between heaven and earth along general Viviana's lines thirty miles away from Hanson's. While during the battle of Norma Rossinia the Glandelinians had crushed their lines in their assaults against Hanson, general Vivian wishing to force the siege of Evangelina Grania had ordered a general attack to be made on Manley's lines. He feared that if he allowed the enemy to attack at this point his right would be rolled up. Gertrude Angeline had pleaded in vain to him not to make any slaughter on Christmas Day, but her pleading had been too late and only angered the general in the bargain as he knew his daughters were prisoners in the hands of the foe. Soon heavy firing by the Mc-Sterner Run creek gave warning that the Angolinian Angelinians were making their way to the banks. Ahead of the Christian columns loomed many wagons. They pulled up along side the river near the wreckage of the blown up bridges. The soldiers looking in the distance like busy ants at work were tearing their wagons to pieces and throwing the bits into the river. Other men picked up the bits and in what seemed an amazingly little time pontoon brig bridges began to grow in jerks across the river. The Glandelinian guns all this time seemed dead. Indeed the Glandelinian gunners were waiting all the time, and were getting their line on those pontoon bridges.

The first brigade of Angolinian soldiers crossing the bridges were just half way across swinging with the bridges, and had broken for a quaint slow waddling march into a run, when all the Glandelinian batteries let go. When the frightful roar stopped, the only part of the pontoon bridges left was about two feet of them on the side where the Angolinians were, and the surface of the river was alive with the Angolinian soldiers struggling horribly to free themselves from the thousands of dead and the shattered pontoons, and swim to the other side. However thousands of new ones had been made simultaneously on other parts of the river out of range of the enemy and now to respond to the enemy's first discharge of artillery, general Viviana's main line of batteries let go a general discharge that was continuous and within an hour and a half a hundred thousand shells had exploded everywhere for many scores of miles, and the cannon's carnage and destruction of whole woods and the furrowing up and smashing up of whole plains was terrific. The Landelinian batteries responded with all their fury, the balls booming and banging with the screaming maddening fury of hell. Army after army crossed the pontoon bridges under cover of their artillery fire, and reached the other side, and for hours and hours the noise of battle roared in a way to awaken the attention of the suffering souls in hell itself.

A large force of Landelinians extending their lines for twenty miles advanced to repel the attack, but after frightful slaughter were driven back to their trenches. The armies in purple not yet engaged with the enemy's lines were still marching across the plains looking beautiful and strong in the flashing sun. Hundreds of thousands of clamping horses were seen, millions of flaunting flags, and standards and guns. All of the Christian cannon were now concentrating upon Manley's center and as the cannons did roar, thousands of graycoats per minute were seen to stagger, fall, roll, convulse and die. General Pelhander did all in his power to rally his shattered infantry. Four other batteries were trained upon his lines alone, and horrible and shocking was the slaughter. Hundreds of his companion general officers fell, multitudes of privates go on going down mangled and bleeding, while hundreds of balls burst around general Pelhander, and he dropped mortally wounded, and so fierce was the storming fury of battle all along the line that fifteen small ridges were seeming to be enveloped in flame and smoke, and despite the distance which separated them from the battlefield ten days of steady travel the inhabitants of the city of Evangelina Grania could hear the rumbling of the two big battles as raging on that one day simultaneously plainly.

Kindernine, Lovechild, pure-Hot-Lie, and Benligan stormed Manley's center and the firing here roared steadily. So furious was the conflict at this point that the flashes worse than lightning seemed to play along the whole battle line, the heavens and earth seeming to split in twain, fire seemed to take the place of the earth and the very ridges seemed to whirl up in mighty shreds from gigantic avalanches. The earth seemed for miles and miles to be a vast sea of fire.

THE BATTLE OF MIC-CHANDLER.

One column after another of the "Landelinians" rushed on furiously the field of battle being fairly strewn with a perfect sea of dead and wounded. Just as the ruin line of the assailants came within a few hundred yards of the christian line the whole christian line delivered a fearful fire followed by another and another dreadful volley and now the Landelinians went down in hundreds of thousands, and the surviving Kindernine, Lovechild, Pare-Hot-Lie, and Benligan stormed Manley's center and the firing here roared steadily. So furious was the conflict at this point that the flashes were like lightning seemed to play along the whole battle line, the heavens and earth seeming to split in twain, fire seemed to take the place of the earth and sky the earth seemed for miles and miles, with woods and plains, plains and hills, hurdlle hurdle through the air and fire and volcano of flame and din, and everything seemed to be in a most maddening uproar all along the line! Kindernine's reeling columns being crushed to fragments, Pare-Hot-Lie was mangled, Lovechild's torn to pieces, and Benligan's cut up and thrown into confusion. Even amid the dreadful carnage every one of these leaders had fallen, every one being killed except Kindernine and Benligan. It had indeed been terrible and these surviving columns even being mangled and shattered further fell back leaving six million seven hundred thousand upon the field. Then for God's sake, Pyrobar called upon his men his monstrous columns. On they came under the same murderous fire of grape and canister from nine thousand gathling guns. The whole main line of Manley's army seemed to flash streams of undulating fire and smoke, and the whole avalanche of hell and damnation seemed to again tear the christian line to shreds, and though hundreds of thousands were mowed down, the millions of survivors after both sides seemed to dissolve into an inferno of smoke and flame and din, as poured and leaped across the works or outer line of breastworks and stone walls.

A horrible pandemonium such which is beyond description ensued. Millions on both sides poured in a murderous storming fire point blank, struck at each other, and howled and yelled and cursed in a deafening tumult, and out and bayoneted, and ran each other through with sabres, pikes, bayonets and daggers, while amid all this was an indescribable tumult of bayonets from the enemy's lines.

At last the Angelinian columns shattered and mangled anew began to waver, stagger, then broke and ran, but they were undaunted, and gathered again plunging into the mighty inferno of fire and smoke, but crushed and mangled with redoubled losses the Angelinians again wavered and fell back, but again they rallied and rushed to the assault. Manley's line again and again blazed like hell and its damnation. Again the brave Angelinians swarmed over the first line of works, only to go down in hundreds of thousands. Again and again and still the survivors rallied to the assault but were beaten back, again they rallied and swept to the assault, but the murderous canister and grape cut their multitudes down like grass.

They again reached the first line of works but Manley's whole line again stormed with fire all along his front with a roar that shook them off their feet, and the torn tottered and bleeding lines with their dead, dying and wounded piled in long windrows again withdrew, only to rally again and rush to the assault like a whirlwind. For twenty minutes they continued this new attack with frightful fury until they were almost withered and then again they withdrew. Again they rallied and like a whirlwind of flaming flesh and steel they swept within a hundred yards of the position as far as the second line of works. Over the dead bodies of their dead comrades they came. Here they met a withering roar of artillery and musketry that seemed to stun heaven and earth, and though ten million of them had made the attack which numbered really about twelve only two hundred thousand returned after seven hours of this horrible slaughter. Suddenly by two o'clock now managed to sweep forward with his men but as he reached the position he met an annihilating fire and his columns being cut to pieces within an hour fell back the general himself being severely wounded. General Mc-Glasne next took his turn. His men swept forward with most tremendous fury, six times they charged and six times they were repulsed with excruciating losses. General Crowley and Crafts divisions now rushed forward to try it, their whole line sweeping forward with fixed bayonets. Hundreds of thousands went down mangled and bleeding. Oh what a slaughter it was, and what sacrifice on that beautiful Christmas Day, for Peace on earth, good will toward men.

The onslaught was horrible and amid the almost preternatural carnage general Crowley and Crafts went down mangled and bleeding. More than twenty million Angelinians from the whole days battle strewn the hills and plains and among them lie fifteen million Landelinians. Hansonia now advanced his forces to the attack!

Poor Gertrude watched him go with brimming eyes. She made a beautiful angelic figure with her flowing hair and what cruelty it must have been to make her suffer such crushing sorrow, or that one so young should witness such a massacre of soldiers over a complete hopeless cause. She could hardly stand it any longer. "Oh how could he expect to win where the others had lost so disasterous disastrously!" She screamed. "Oh Hansonia, please, please, please come back. Oh please if you love me as you say do not go into that awful slaughter. You will not win and may make only further useless loss and go to your own death. Oh please come back, please come back."

But he was too far off to hear her frantic pleadings now, and throwing herself on the ground she wept as if her heart would break. Indeed his attack was fierce and terrific and again the whole scene was like a maddened hell and its damnation a hundred fold.

The roar of the conflict as when general Vivian joined in that is Robert Vivian, could be almost felt for five hundred miles, and three times while the heavens seemed to be on fire with hell fury, and while his lines were shattered again, and again, general Vivian was driven back, and though all the battles did more piercing than the screaming shells could be heard the dying sorrow of hundreds of thousands of shell raked bodies, and shrieks and groans of dying martyrs. Even for miles could be heard the groans of dying and wounded christians, and curses and blasphemies of the wounded glandelinians. Everywhere was the cry of agonized despair, the cry of death, the cry for water. Jesu Jesus Meroy, thousands did shout, crawling about blood stained, blinded, pain maddened, with arms or legs, or parts of heads shot off, or bodies ripped open or mangled beyond recognizing. Such revolting horrors filled Gertrude with unspeakable horror. For a long time she watched the scenes with horror, and her expression was like as if she was being choked to death. Soon she saw the christians make a backward flow, and frenzy stricken she begged God to end this slaughter of whole armies.....

CHAPTER TWENTY NINE.

THE BATTLE OF MO-WHIRTHER.

In the meantime attempts were made to capture the fortifications of Mo-whirther from the enemy. Admiral Zimmermanns expedition to the Boyking Islands was started on December 21th, and nearing the region of the glanglagonian lands the Dondobian fleet was repelled by a large squadron of glandelinian warships and torpedo destroyers. Every glandelinian ship poured in a stream of fire, but yet more awful was the fire of the Dondobian ships. One glandelinian ship after another was sunk or blown up, and the rest after an all days fight was put to flight. On December 24th the fleets reached the vicinity of the Boyking islands near Vivian Wikey Galverinda, and made preparations to bombard the Mo-whirtherian fortifications, the greatest stronghold in that Angolinian world. When night came the move was made cautiously but the Dondobian fleet unfortunately being in black color was discovered by one of the garrisons of the Mo-whirtherian fortifications, and the fortifications of cedernine, and Mo-hollister opened a terrific fire, every ship responding with stupendous broadsides. A good number of the Dondobian ships were raked fore and aft and torn in pieces but terrible was the pounding of the glandelinian fortifications. Soonward morning every battle fleet was involved in the frightful conflict and also the aeroplanes of both sides. Many glandelinian airships shelled the attacking fleets sinking many ships, but one after another they were brought down. For thirteen hours ninety three thousand cannon roared with unceasing fury upon many of the fortifications being badly damaged and set on fire. However the first attacks of the fleets were repulsed with the loss of many ships and thousands of men. Zimmermann was then attacked by all the glandelinian warships stationed there. Three glandelinian ships were sunk or disabled by the awful gun fire of the christian fleet and six hundred torpedoes, one thousand being captured and made in use for the christian ships. Late the next day the attack on the islands of the fortifications of Mo-whirther was resumed with redoubled violence. All the ships opened fire at once as they steamed past the glandelinian fortifications, which replied with the fury of hell and waging one of the fiercest and bloodiest battles ever seen on the water before. The flagship of the Abbeismian fleet with admiral Gallio on board blew up and all were hurled to their deaths. 17,000 perished with the fighting admiral. Seventeen other ships struck mines and were also destroyed. The Glandelinians concentrated their fierce fire on the Tripolygonian fleet also and admiral Hoban was killed when his ship went up into the air and every one on board perished. Many other ships were mined and the second attack had to be given up having raged fully forty eight hours, but in this second great engagement many fortifications along a new point had been badly damaged. The Glandelinian commander at Mo-whirther was general Thomas J. Phelan.

Though unsuccessful Zimmermann was not undaunted and so he began a blockade by sea making it sure that the glandelinians at the fortifications of Mo-whirther could get no aid by sea or land and he decided to wait also until he could get more fleets to add to his and then give the Glandelinians at Mo-whirther a more pleasant time. Terrible damage was committed by Angolinian airships which soared continually over the islands dropping shells and explosives by the many hundreds between the glandelinian and child slave plantations to prevent the success of the threat of the foe to butcher the children in case the bombardment of the fleets would come out successful. Terrible damage and carnage was committed by these airships and when a considerable number were brought down by gunners others came to take their places. The losses on both sides were so great that they were not accurately estimated.

Despite his bloody repulses, and of the crushing disaster to the expedition of Admiral Zimmermann the siege of gyan Grania did not cease. General Vivian and Jansson was only enraged over the repulse and decided to tighten the siege. He had received reinforcements during the day after the Eva Grania horror, and decided to tighten the siege by pushing his armies more forward and to extend the lines more than they were extended now. He decided to move his own armies in the location of Jennie Vivian, and to occupy the town of Jennie Vivian itself, and to concentrate his heaviest forces along the Sunbeam creek a very prettyspot in this portion of northern or southern Galverinda.

It was a great movement indeed, and which during the concentration caused for about six days and night without cessation one of the most tremendous artillery duels for two to one of any other artillery duel of the war up to that time. Fire was started by the explosions of shells which threw a glow soon for two hundred miles, and the crashing did was no loud that the soldiers were almost driven deaf. It had been Janssons intention to assault the enemy immediately in this vicinity, but it was not believed a good thing as great forces of the enemy in withdrawing back a little had concentrated upon the town of Harroosema, near the Harroosema fortifications, and so it was abandoned and the artillery firing only continued.

Jansson was warned several times by the Black Circle, and even their leaders that the enemy were planning to surprise his left wing which was concentrated along the banks of the Sunbeam creek, to and to guard against this Jansson threw general Concombinan A-cubange an army close to the town of Jennie Vivian, and also ordered general Vivian to move his armies a little more forward to tighten the siege.

"We must not allow the enemy to get any from us now by all means," said Jansson. "This Mo-whirther is causing a unspeakable sorrow for the whole world with its dreadful blockade by the enemy, and if we can only force the fortifications of gyan Grania, even by force if they do not be surrendered it will open a path for us to move direct upon Fort Cedernine and then carry all before us."

A part of Janssons army was besieging the great St Dondobian fortifications held by the glandelinians under Jeshum Mo-whirther, and the Angolinians under Hindacrine were concentration upon the enemy in possession of some line of works along the Eva Grania river, which was so closely lined up with batteries of cannon of both sides that it received the name of "Battery Line alive". The position of the enemy at many points was very strong, but here the positions of the enemy was considered almost impregnable, and after some debate over the situation it was believed that the most determined assaults of the war should be made upon these positions and to accomplish an assault along the whole line of the enemy simultaneously. During the long lull in the severe activity more heavy explosions tore the earth open in this section, and it was evident that the enemy was mining the ground all along the point of positions to make it as hard as possible for the christian armies to make any advance. The siege was closer however, and it was believed by many that the foe would soon be thrown down and be compelled to surrender. Jansson had learned also that general John Hanley, and his brother general Jeshum Hanley had had a parley over the telegram and decided to see what the trouble was now that brewed. He soon found out readily that his brother Jeshum Hanley was asked most earnestly to advance his armies forward, to his rescue and general Vivian detailed some scouts to seize the messenger and capture the note. The scouts went out in different directions and soon hearing the sound of horses feet hid in the dark shade of trees. Soon a large squadron of glandelinians came within view and one man guarded it nearest as he was not dressed in a uniform. Despite the fact that the messenger had an escort the soldiers decided to secure the note just the same and charged the glandelinians most furiously scattering them after a fierce conflict and capturing the plans though in the excitement the spy got away and was able to escape the watch he and his escort comrades had fallen into. The message was brought immediately to general Jansson, and it was detailed for the purpose of finding out if the spy had succeeded in doing as he had been commanded by general Hanley.

"Well," said general Vivian to his brother, "The enemy intend to frustrate us no doubt and have a large army attack us in the flank. Only general Jeshum Hanley's army can do that, but this we are to prevent. General Hanley directed Jeshum Hanley to move through the cities of Indgo Erma and Jennie Turner and come down upon our rear. We can prevent this by having Zimmermann place himself between the enemy and general Jeshum Hanley. If Hanley attacks Zimmermann he will only be crushed."

One of the most gigantic explosions recorded of the war's first and second year of the war altogether occurred on the 27th of December after the Eva Granda horror, between Jennie Vivian and the ammunition positions along the Sunbean Creek. After eight days of variable activity of other Christian forces around the St. Damienian fortifications before the assault upon the positions in front of Eva Granda, the siege had been continued with ever increasing violence, and during the artillery duel already described a series of violent explosions followed by more violent detonations began on the afternoon of the twenty-sixth of December, continued continuously throughout the whole night without a single cessation and subsided with the gigantic explosion on the morning of the 27th. The explosion was as disastrous in its consequences as a most destructive earthquake would have been in destroying the eighty Lisbon houses, and the flash of shooting fire during the explosion among the suddenly rising clouds of dust and smoke was reported to have been seen at Jennie Granda eighty miles away. Sunlight was excluded by the thick cloud for four hours and forty five minutes, so that midnight darkness continued throughout that time over an area of fifty miles, and the air was completely gloomy to a distance of a hundred miles. Thrown by the explosion were shattered by the dreadful concussion though seventy miles away, and Jennie Granda reported every house window broken, fallen steeples of churches and with her streets covered with dirt and mud which was said to have been blown that far by the force of the great explosion.

To accomplish this it was estimated that the blast blasted fragments of the debris of the explosion must have been projected not less than nearly ten miles up, even beyond most of the atmosphere, and that it did suddenly reach this great height was shown by the unexpected oscillations of the barometers all around the country of California and Angolia indicating a series of air waves that spread over at the rate of seven hundred miles an hour from the shock of the frightful explosion. The explosion was heard in southern Angolia, and elsewhere besides the whole of California over a circle of 1,800 miles in radius with Jennie Vivian which was leveled to the ground as a center. The fall of debris and houses, and other materials blown up into the air by the gigantic explosion was noted at points 915 miles north west, 1,800 miles southwest, and 1,080 miles southeast.

By the dreadful outbreak of the explosion a million tons of earth was hurled far into the air, and the falling fragments killed the Christian lines killing scores of thousands of soldiers, and leaving a hundred thousand others by 3 besides wrecking a portion of general Hancock's headquarters which was raised a enough as it were by the concussion of the blast. The explosion made such a noise as if millions of water had splashed with millions of tons of white hot lava in titan forces for that horrible instant moment. The finest dust thrown up by the explosion continued suspended in the upper atmosphere and was wafted over the entire globe causing a peculiar red glow at the time of sunrise, and sunset that was noticeable for nearly two years after wards.

Dreadful as was this great explosion it was a very mysterious one although believed to have been caused by the enemy through some means of their own which could not be known. It was very disastrous in its effects, and had killed more than a score of thousands of Christians also, and injured hundreds of thousands, but the Christians lay fully in the way of the terrible blast and suffered very severely also.

While thousands upon thousands of Christian soldiers killed for many hours seeking the dead and injured, trained investigators and even the general were trying in vain to determine whether the explosion had occurred from a great mine set by the enemy or that some wagon filled loaded with explosives had taken toll or whether a large fortification filled with war materials had taken fire and blew up on account of the severe artillery duel then going on.

General Franklin Francisco one of the most able investigators of these dreadful calamities declared after arriving on the scene that it was his opinion that not a great mine plot of the enemy, but a accidental explosion of ammunition works of some extensive fortifications on account of the artillery firing had been responsible for the most terrific blast. The Angolian federal investigators and General headed by General James Flynn, chief of the department of justice of war bureau of investigation, summoned from general Vivian's command, centered their attention on the wrecked provision train which had been destroyed also by the blast. Some of the higher General's members advanced the general theory, that the ammunition train had been struck by a volley of random shells, and general Hancock was asked immediately to find out whether any of his trains of ammunition wagons and so on had been in the vicinity at the time, this being done especially after construction engineers of the Angolian ninth corps had expressed belief that the wagon train was of the type used in delivering explosives to the artillery men. Other investigators sought diligently to run down reports that a great mine had been exploded in front of the main Christian position in the vicinity of Sunbean Creek. Assistant general Tally after visiting and investigating the scene announced his belief to general Vivian that the explosion could not have been due to an accident. He announced also that his staff would question all witnesses of the gigantic explosion declaring that one thing that led him to the reason that it was some conspiracy of the enemy, this he declaring been fixed by an army fortification at a creek which stopped at the time the explosion occurred.

"The facts that lead me to this belief," said general Tally, "are at the time of the explosion, which was at the time the clock stopped, was when probably the greatest damage was done, and the location of the explosion was midway between the positions of the opposing lines, along the Sunbean Creek called Second Battery line river or in the vicinity of Jennie Vivian."

Working on the conspiracy theory, the soldiers of Hancock's command picked up all the remnants and fragments of the wrecked provision and ammunition trains and wagons, even going so far as to remove the shoes of the thousands of dead horses in order to establish the identity of the vehicles and their drivers or owners. Some officers also picked up near the scene pieces of cast iron window weights swelling of powder. There were scores of thousands of these though where they came from no one could tell and the theory was advanced that they might have formed part of some infernal mine placed carefully under ground after the enemy had tunneled under the part between the opposing lines. All pieces of clothing, including shreds of cloths and battered guns and hats, and all kinds of wrecked substances like wheels, of cannons, muzzles of guns, broken gun caissons and hantons were collected by the soldiers. As far as it could be learned by the Christian officers the disaster did not take the lives of any of the Christian officers.

The most peculiar explosion ever witnessed within the region of war rivened windows from the city of Jennie Vivian though forty miles away from the scene, and leveled down the higher buildings, and within a short time thousands of soldiers, and all the reserve companies that could be assembled were placed to guard the region of disaster. Windows were shut so that were in the city of Angolia itself in buildings even as high as the twentieth floor, and soldiers established a dead line around all the buildings of high stature lest people passing through the streets be injured. Injured by glass which for days was dangling in jagged pieces in hundreds of thousands of houses. Many scores of thousands in that city were injured by glass, and many who were killed by glass had their bodies so badly mutilated that hopes of identifying them virtually had to be abandoned. At twenty six hospitals in the city of Angolia seven hundred miles away from the scene of the explosion from ten thousand to twenty thousand persons were admitted, and the internes stated that six hundred of those died from the pain from loss of blood. So crowded were many of the hospitals with injured persons persons victims of falling glass that the injured were laid on floors and in hallways.

The whole Christian army itself had been fairly thrown off its feet by the explosion. Vivian and her sisters had been in general Vivian's headquarters lying down on their beds and listening to the drum roll of the guns of the enemy cannons in action and also of the thunder salvoes of many scores of thousands of exploding shells, now near, now distant with new when the explosion on a scale. They stated afterwards that their beds seemed to jump a about a up to the ceiling, and that before they knew it they were digging themselves out of mounds of plaster which had come down from the ceiling from upon their beds. They had heard the noise which they stated sounded like the loudest crash of "St. Catherine's" or "St. John's" and had on rising outside seen the large cloud of smoke in the air, and the no shower of debris falling like clouds of rain in the distance, and then had to run back to their beds as all kinds of rubbish began to shower them. They wondered what had occurred, and were surprised to see that general Vivian's headquarters on the front side was completely razed by the concussion and they were surprised that no one was killed or injured and that their themselves had escaped so well wonderfully.

It was evident to general Hanson and his brother also that the enemy might take advantage of the gigantic explosion to make a desperate assault upon the christian lines and so the christian general had all precautions taken and all were on the watch that night. Hanson had decided to move forward at the very break of day and storm the enemy lines fiercely as the enemy were or had been during the bombardments making many strong demonstrations, and Hanson always feared that these demonstrations were sometimes something more than demonstrations, and that the war was fast assuming a fearful form and for a while had it is true the whole enemy force in a very tight fix and though it was a siege he knew very well nevertheless that he could never capture the whole glandelinian force. This was impossible. None of the glandelinians just now were even near to surrender. If only he could capture or destroy the fortifications of Harococillo and the others, and open a direct path to the fortifications of McWhirther was all he wished.

But the enemy were holding out so stubbornly that general Hanson did not know what to do. The battles had been extremely severe for their duration and his losses were exceedingly heavy despite the fact that he could replace them while the enemy could not. And general Hanley he knew was a most treacherous general. Hanley would do anything to gain his end, and to accomplish a victory for the cause of glandelinia no matter how wicked it was and so general Hanson decided to keep the enemy busy as much as possible and not give them much respite. He decided to force the main division of the enemy from the location of Jennie Vivian if possible, and not allow them to retake the place either.

He saw that it was best to send general Williamsburger Zimmerman to force his way through this section especially in order to be able to march his army to oppose piebaum Hanley's advance on Jennie Vivian. So Williamsburger Zimmerman was ordered to attack the enemy on the 11 following morning. Zimmerman prepared his forces and got all his artillery ready to start the fierce attack intended while general Vivian sent forward large forces of infantry to support him. On the morning the engagement of Jennie Vivian or Sunbeam creek began. For the two armies confronting each other here it was the most stubbornly contested battle of the whole siege so far. The enemy crushed back one of the christian charges, and woeful losses to themselves, and then counter attacked with all their might but as the enemy came on in a perfect storm of assault it seemed apparent that the christian armies would be worsted for the main chief leader who had led the whole christian army at this point called Henry Johnston had been killed and the whole christian line was thrown into confusion.

Both Zimmerman and Hanson sprang their forces to the rescue in that meeting inferno, and finally drove the enemy back after sustaining that day over fifteen hundred onslaughts made by the glandelinians themselves.

The enemy's losses were fearful and the losses of general Hanley greater. Hanley during the night directed a dreadful artillery duel with twenty thousand cannon, but the christian artillery replied as fiercely as he gave, and the scene was a perfect inferno of shell explosions, and it did seem evident as if the fortifications would be blasted into the air.

Once during the night general Hanley hurled upon the christians a tremendous onslaught which lasted four hours, but the whole line of attackers were literally torn to fragments, the remainder disorganized and forced to fall back badly separated and cut off from each division. It was a disastrous repulse for the enemy. Yet again they tried it and received another bloody repulse and the loss of three generals. Death took general Spooner of the glandelinians, and ten flag bearers fell in one minute one after another. Three times more the inferno of battle was repeated with the most redoubled fury under the cover of the heaviest artillery firing, but in vain the assaults were torn in pieces and the survivors compelled to recoil in the utmost panic. Thus ended the fray for that day.

It was evident to general Hanson and his brother also that the enemy might take advantage of the gigantic explosion to make a desperate assault upon the christian lines and so the christian general had all preparations taken and all were on the watch that night. HISTORICAL INCIDENTS ON THE CAUSE, AND THE SAVAGES OF THE GANDOLINIAN WAR WITH ANGOLINIA. HOW THE BATTLES WERE FIGHTED AND HOW THEY TURNED OUT. THE GREAT CAMPATONIST DEBATES AND EVERY THING KNOWN OF THE HORRORS OF WAR.

THE FIRST KNOWN TROUBLES WITH GANDOLINIA. WHAT SHE DID.

What was the first cause of the great glando-Angolinia was known as the frightful glorinia calamity of the year 1899. The enemy had seized the entire province of Galverinia jeopardised and crippled the country so terribly that both Angolinia and Angolinia had to use forceful means to try and crush the glandolinian authority and made preparations to drive the foe back to where they came from. The loss of killed and injured was never stated but in this storm of the galverinian rebellion the victorious glandolinians devastated over thirty six thousand cities and villages, wiping out hundreds of cities totally by fire with the amputation of the inhabitants. Angolinia junction at the time had been severely devastated by a great storm, and the rashly glandolinians had invaded the ruins murdering all who survived the cyclone.

The rebellion had lasted fully three years and that three quarters of the surviving inhabitants of one city alone had been slaughtered and five hundred cities wiped out. Glorinia was wiped out being the center of all the horrors.

For this deed Abbieanna and Angolinia demanded the glandolinian nation to pay a heavy fine of a billion dollars. The glandolinian nation pretended that she could not pay it and requested the loan from other allies of hers, but Abbieanna refused to accept it from any other countries, and then after secret service persons and the geminis good companies, and geologists were sent to investigate it was found out that glandolinia was making a treacherous movement, would not pay the fine, and only the mediators from the nations of Glorinia and Gaudencencia, by pleading to the governors of Angolinia averted a war right at that time. Angolinia had been fully aroused, and it was all that the two governors could do to appease her rage and feelings for revenge. War for the time being was averted by these mediators, but it almost brought the enmity of Angolinia against these two Catholic nations, and if it had not been for Abbieanna giving good advice Angolinia would have crashed into these two nations on the charge of harboring an enemy of god.

THE CHILD SLAVES REBELLION, AND WHAT IT RESULTED.

Having conquered the Galverinians the glandolinians used the country for the placing of child slaves, and by that time galverinia was a no-man's-land to Angolinia on account of these horrors and by the year of 1911 about three quarters of the number of children there who were made slaves by the glandolinians had grown up to rebellion. During the rebellion many thousands of children were massacred by the glandolinians. One of the most peculiar accounts of the scenes was of the yivian girls the daughters of the great christian general who had been several times seized by the glandolinians and cruelly treated. The child slave master Aronburg and another called Mc-Gollister was their special enemies, but one of the worse they had was a glandolinian called goobhead who had tried to assassinate the yivian girls by causing them to be boiled alive in the eruption of a geyser because they took the part of the child rebel leader Angolinia Aronburg. At this time the rebellion was spreading and growing worse, the rebels had set Andraan a large city on fire, and at other points wrecked scores of fact factories and child slave plantations and liberated many children still in slavery. The child rebels had set the city of Andraan on fire during the rebellion, and though the reports to the fact was confirmed nevertheless the two Angolinian governors Robert yivian, and his brother Hanson yivian kept to the statement that it was no child slaves who set the glandolinians factories in the city on fire, but that the glandolinians did it themselves to cause the destruction of the children, and many prisoners who were taken by the rebels and sent to the governors were treated as firebugs, and sent to prison in chains and in disgrace, while Hanson plotted to start a war on glandolinia without the mediators knowing of what was going on.

CHAPTER THIRTY ONE.

What

WHAT COMES OF THE BURNING OF ANDREAN.

Then he carried them to an automobile standing near and hastily prepared to run it as full speed, for one screaming wail of fire, was now nearly upon them. He never had he gotten about fifty yards away from the burning factory when it collapsed with an immense crash. The walls fell outward, but he and his car caught in its way. He had saved the children just in time, and another minute more they would have been hurled under the fallen walls. Seeing that there was no time to lose, GANNON ran the car full speed, and got far ahead of the advancing fire. By the time he reached the mountains he could see that the child rebels who had been taken, were well on the retreat, and their enemies were in full pursuit. He wished to reach the armies under governor Virian but it was over three days before he had learned of the governor's whereabouts. Four days after when over fifty miles from the city of Andrean GANNON believed it safe to bring the children to their father once more. Governor Virian and his aids were sitting in a tent conversing about the child slaves.

"The child rebels have lost the battle, but the child slaves, and my children where are they?"
"Maybe there's hope," said one of his aids gently. "They may be rescued, and if not, they will be in heaven."
"There's no hope for their rescue," remarked the governor. "And besides maybe they are dead already. Why did I let them go to spy around these child rebels? When I knew that it was dangerous: it's all my fault I should not have let them."

THE governor sat still, and quiet, now thinking sadly of poor Virian and her sisters. As he gazed longingly at the rising moon, thinking of his children, if not dead, threading the drear wild, a deep emotion seized him, and he buried his head in his hands. And wept like a heart-broken child. The soldiers themselves were looking on the moon from their tent doors, while the fragrance of beautiful flowers from some rose, the only odor of the mountains around, passed through the tent, but it did not cheer the poor governor, or seemed as if it never would. He was heart-broken indeed.

"Oh Dear God, my children are exiles from home, despite the splendid decision in the Calvinian's army. Oh please give them hearts too."

He could hear many birds singing gaily, and he was going to pray again, when a sentry came in, and paying no attention to the governor's surprise, saluted and said:

"There's an Abolitionist general within our lines, and he has six children. Five look like your daughters, but one is a stranger and she is dead, also that one looking like Gertrude. He wants to see you and says that his name is GANNON Præcia."

THE governor did not believe that it was really GANNON but some of the Glauconian child murderers, and rose to his feet folding his arms.

"What does these old Glauconians want here anyway?" He snapped. "I haven't got time to see any of them. Put them back in the guard house where they were."

"But he is not a Glauconian, nor a prisoner, and was not captured but entered our camp in a big white car," said the soldier. "He said he would not leave his standing post until you consent to see him."

"I may that I don't want to see him," said the governor in a voice that showed that he meant business. "I don't believe that he is GANNON but a Glauconian in an Abolitionist uniform. And I don't believe that they are my children. But bring the children anyway."

After saluting, the sentry left, but after five minutes, GANNON came to his tent, with six Abolitionist children, carrying the children who were not dead. Some of the governor's generals did not know GANNON, but the governor did recognize him and the poor little girls who were half naked. At the sight of Jennie with her hair soaked with blood, and with a bloody bandage around her head, the governor gave a start.

The children were laid on the grassy floor of the tent, while two of the soldiers summoned the doctor. When he came he examined Jennie's head closely. After it was done, soon afterward proceeded to nurse the wound caused by the blow.

"What is the matter with her head?" asked the governor fearing that she too was dead.

"She has been struck in the head by a piece of wood or something like that," answered the doctor. "But my close examination has shown me that the poor child has been seemingly hopelessly out of her mind."

"But of her mind?" asked the governor. "Well for God's sake I hope she is all right now!"

"She will be in her right mind, all right," said the doctor. "And the blow on her head, which caused that would will restore her reason. But she has to be kept entirely awake, and must recover herself, without any one bringing her to her senses, or she will surely die. Her wound is painful and very severe but will not be fatal if you prevent anybody from making her recover too soon."

For a moment the governor was dazed but when he recovered he flew into an indescribable rage.

"It's all the fault of the countess Glauconians," he stormed. "Oh if I only knew who done it to the poor children."

The doctor was pinning the bandage, and when he got through he stepped down and kissed Jennie's forehead. He had never seen prettier children before, and he kissed their foreheads. The doctor after taking one more look at the silent form, left the tent, telling the governor to let them recover at their own speed also for if he brought them to their senses himself the same result would be the same as Jennie's. The governor his wife the doctor good bye and turned to king GANNON: "Well GANNON I see it's you for facts," he said.

"Yes it is and you now recognize me," answered GANNON smiling. "There was no one else during the panic to rescue the poor children when the Glauconians set the districts on fire, and as I alone went and did it. I loved them; I have heard that you have the Calvinian governor in your hands I advise you not to let him go. You are a real if you do."

He handed the governor a note which several Angelians approached with four Glauconian prisoners, who had been by some of the child rebels and given up to the governor. GANNON recognized these Glauconians at once. He had been told by one of his officers who had spied on the Glauconians that these rebels had murdered many of the poor children, and also that governor Federal was at the bottom of all this. Taken with furious rage for a moment he drew his sword and threatened to strike the brutal Glauconians. The note the Angelian governor read told all; that thousands of the child slaves had suffered so far all this time, and what they suffered from the four Glauconians. THE Angelian governor fairly raved with uncontrollable rage.

"Governor Federal was the chief plotter of all these cruel deeds and murders," said GANNON. "And---" pointing at the four Glauconians he said: "They were the ones who did the cruel work."

"They did not," belied the governor. "But it is all right I don't think I know how to settle with such devils. They can break the stones in the worst stone quarry of that horrible Glauconian prison in the city of Angeline. As for Governor Federal he shall suffer yet more worse. Take them to the front, and put them in on the first train that comes, but bind them hand and foot with chains."

The Glauconians were taken away but when the governor saw them coming back with Federal among them, clanking in the rusty road, all in a row one behind another like some upon a short string being linked together by the neck to a huge iron chain, and mangled bodies. They were guarded by five heavily armed men with long rifles and six men clad with bayonets. Governor Federal was strangely loaded with iron a heavy chain clogged his leg and was so long, that he could have talked about his black skull and bones severed waist like a giraffe. He had a number of soldiers about his neck the one like the rest of the Anglian prisoners, and the other two of these iron ruffs from whose iron went down to his middle, and to their two hands were riveted a pair of of manacles that gripped him by the wrist and fists and were secured by a large padlock, so that he could neither lift his hands to his mouth or bend down his head toward his hands.

Jennie Virian fairly laughed when she saw how how the Calvinian governor, and the four Glauconians were chained.

"You ought to attach new chains to them!" He said laughing. "They must get through!"
 Even all the Angelinians who were there to witness the scene, laughed heartily. After looking at Cannon for a long time, the Angelinian governor held out his hand to him. Cannon first looked at him in surprise then took it and shook it heartily.
 Then the Angelinian governor said:

"You are the only Abissinian who would have the nerve to rescue the children from a burning city. This has made me your friend for life. You will have to punish me for I did not know or believe that it was really you. You did great bravery in rescuing my children; one of the bravest deeds I have ever known any man to do."

"It was my duty," answered Cannon. "I have not set against the Angelinians; I am fighting for them."
 The governor pushed aside the curtain of the tent and saw that Cannon had come. Cannon quickly dismounted and ran toward the tent the governor and Cannon meeting him. Cannon gave a start as he saw the Angelinian governor with a handsome looking Abissinian in his arms.

"Why if it is not King Cannon," Cannon exclaimed as he shook him by the hand. "And I know what has brought him here. Oh I know indeed what he is. He is the only Abissinian Cannon is. He was the only Abissinian Cannon is, that dared to risk the peril of a burning city to rescue the little darlings, Cannon is!" He said, turning to the king. "I'm your friend and Abissinian for ever!" And with this he put a golden badge on his uniform. Then Cannon turned to the string of chained prisoners, and laughed at all their slights. Smiling heartily, he turned to the governor of Angelina, and asked seriously:

"Why are they chained this way? Are they too strong for the ropes?"

The Angelinian governor handed the keys to Cannon telling him to lead it; Cannon did, and was shocked:

"I'm doing this to them for all they did to the poor children and the misery they caused these little daughters of mine." He said to the Angelinian governor sternly. "They are going to have a nice job of it. King Cannon at Angelina. They are going to be as fit there as this train!"

Cannon turned around and the look he gave the wicked Umdalians was appalling. As the train was already approaching the governor's palace hastily got ready to get on. The prisoners were hustled into a cattle car, guarded by twenty men. Tents were taken down blankets rolled up and the ammunition boxes were placed on the flat cars. Then having the cannon did not want to get on these trains saying that the artillery was too heavy a load, and would take so long to put on that it would delay in the governor. So it was agreed to take the last train behind the others. All the cavalry horses were gently and quickly led into all the cattle cars and the guns were placed on the flat cars. Governor Vivian and Cannon got off at Calverline and went in the direction of their headquarters there, and as he was happily and the governor's wife, and the aunt of Violet and her sisters. Governor Vivian, Cannon and the other officials entered the headquarters followed by the soldiers who were carrying the children.

"Hurry them up to the bad rooms!" Said the governor. "Jimmie you lead the way for them!"

The soldiers obeyed going up the steps with Jimmie at their head. "We must hurry in for there is a great storm approaching from the west!" Said Mrs. Vivian.

"It is as that we are in for a hurricane!" said the governor. "But we will be safe here inside if it does not turn out to be one of those railing typhoons. But I am afraid that the roaring and howling of the wind, will awaken Jimmie. Oh!"
 One thing that did awaken Violet's mother was the sight of Jimmie's bandaged head. But her husband told her to have no fear, and she told her what the doctor had said. Clouds in the west appeared in great purple masses, and then in a while a flash of lightning sent these clouds up the steps, while other began to pour in clouds.

"How long has it been since the last storm?" Asked the governor.

"Quite a long while!" answered his wife as they themselves bridged the stairs. "But how did you succeed in the child labor question?"
 "Not very good!" answered the governor as they reached the door at the top. Just then there was a blinding flash of lightning that illuminated all the place followed by a crash of thunder that almost shattered them.

At this moment they had reached the door of the bad rooms, and when the crash of the thunder occurred, she suddenly opened her eyes, then rose up in bed. A fearful sensation of strangulation took possession of her, which made her mouth open wide, her tongue protruded, and her eyes to bulge. Then she fell back like one dead.

"Oh my she is dead!" Wailed Mrs. Vivian, hastily running. "Oh, help, call up the doctor!"
 Who in the name of common sense brought her back to her senses?"

answered Governor Vivian.

"No one who had brought the children up. She came to herself just as you reached her bed side. The doctor must have done it."

"Well she is dead anyway!" Said the governor sadly.

"What good would it do to call up a doctor? Well I'll get one anyway!"

The governor called the doctor by telephone, and the same one came who had examined Jimmie before, and told the governor what would happen to her, if he or any one brought her to her senses.

A girl named as she had been must recover at her own peril when knocked by a beam or she will surely die!" He said to the governor as he entered.

"I told you so!" said the doctor.

Mrs. Vivian had bowed down by Jimmie's head and asked as if her heart would break. It was over four years since the death of her small little sister Catherine, and since that mournful period, the horrible child labor conditions had not affected the remembrance of poor Catherine's dying happy smile. It surely seemed to poor Mrs. Vivian as if the blessed sound of her well remembered bird like voice, was still ringing in her ears.

Of course this little Jimmie was no daughter of hers but she had indeed been her son. Now poor Jimmie was dead, and cherished it as if it had never spent any more, never smile upon her, neither her daughters, or her husband or any one, and when she touched Jimmie's hand that was protruding from the sheet it was as warm that it made her start. A feeling passed Mrs. Vivian that Jimmie might not be dead. The doctor approached and laying a soft gentle hand on Mrs. Vivian's shoulder, and told her that she had to get up, for he wanted to examine Jimmie, and saw if she was really dead or not. After uttering a short prayer, the weeping lady arose slowly, and staggered up against the wall. First the doctor examined Jimmie's pulse, and then after laying a gentle hand on Jimmie's chest he laughed.

"She is not dead at all, only unconscious, that is all!" He said easily.

"The only cause that was from sudden strangulation, caused by some suffocating, from an air in the tight place. This strangulation was only short, lasting until it rendered her unconscious. She will live. There is no danger."

"Oh doctor are you telling the truth?" asked Violet's mother and went together.

"Yes I'm telling the truth," answered the doctor. "There is no danger of bringing her to her senses, now, but as they had no rest off, and her friends also."

Mrs. Vivian knelt down by the bed side, and laid her head between her folded arms, uttering a long prayer of thanksgiving. Suddenly there came a sound as if Jimmie was coming to again, then she moved to lay on her side. But she still remained unconscious.

Seeing that the doctor was not feeling the woman were glad and fairly hugged him. The governor thanked the doctor, and offered him the pay.

"Why what is that money for?" asked the doctor in surprise.

"To pay for your services," answered the governor.

extending the hand that said the money.

"I don't want it!" said the doctor. "I don't do this for pay, only because I love children like you do."

The governor then went out into the sitting room, and he and Mrs. Vivian looked at each other. A piece of news paper was laying on the floor and stepping the soldier's out side the governor picked the paper up and glanced over its contents.

"It's only a severe gash, caused by the piece of wood, that fell on her head. She can be able to get up to-morrow, but I'll come every day to dress her wound."

The doctor then went out into the sitting room, and he and Mrs. Vivian "Up gracious girls!" He gasped. "Here is the whole story of the battle with the child rebels in Andromeda."

 The two women looked at him and then at each other in a moment.
 "Read it. Read it." cried Violet's mother. "We like to hear how the battle raged." The governor proceeded to read the battle. First he sat down on a beautiful couch, and when the others sat down, he read as follows:

The child rebel leaders Angelina Arenburg, and Lina Zimmermann were furious when they learned that the Glandelinians refused to comply with their demands, and made a series of furious assaults, on a long line of factories, which seemed impossible to carry. The conflicts were cruel and sanguinary, and raged for hours with indescribable fury. Charges were numbered by the hundred. And the factories were taken and retaken over and over again. Zimmermann took the factories she attacked, but suffered terrible loss, and in making six assaults on another main line of slave houses, in which both sides fought with indomitable courage, she was killed, her heavy losses having resulted in every one of the six assaults. Over Zimmermann's death, the assaults were repulsed, and the Glandelinians retook the factories. Zimmermann had recently captured. The line of factories first attacked made the stoutest resistance, though time and again Arenburg's rebels threw heavy assaults upon them, the rebel grenadiers bombarding the factories with seven hundred green grenades. For seven hours and a half, the whole region was made to tremble by the thunder of more than 1,700 grenades. The terrible destruction caused by the grenades was impossible to describe. The walls of the factories were broken and streams of grenades found their way inside the factories, killing many of the men and setting the buildings on fire. Time and again the child rebels swept on in fearful fearful charges in the face of a fearful fire of their enemies guns, and assaulted the factories with indescribable fury. The struggle was fearful and more fearful was the loss, but at last time for sunset the child rebels were terrified and discouraged by their terrible losses were driven back, at every point, all the factories not burned by the rebels were retaken, and the fiercest conflict, ever fought in the child labor rebellion was won by the Glandelinians. The combined losses on both sides in killed wounded and captured was about 365,000.

The greatest losses were among the children no over three hundred thousand (300,000) were engaged with the soldiers and child labor masters and other Glandelinians.

The Angelinian governor, and Hansen looked at each other.
 "I feared it would come to that," said Hansen. "But these children were indeed brave to dare such a kind of conflict with the Glandelinian soldiers."

"Well they must have their way," said the governor. "But how about these little angels in the cage? Won't they be surprised when they do recover and find where they are?"

"I should say they will," remarked Hansen looking at the clock.

"But it is time for us to go to bed, isn't it?"
 The Angelinian governor glanced at the clock and nodded. So they went to their bed rooms. In the meantime Violet and her sisters were having a horrible dream about all they had seen in the child labor factories just before the burning of Andromeda. But what a surprise was in store for them in the morning.

The cause of the burning of Andromeda was soon found out by Hansen's best detectives. The way had been laid by the Glandelinians, with the aim in attention to force the child rebels out but they had not very well succeeded, though they had won the victories on Zimmermann, and Arenburg. The result that came from the burning of Andromeda was this:
 58 "The Glandelinians who were found guilty of the deed were arrested on the charge of not only arson, but of murder, as more than 50,000 were killed and over 240,000 wounded while over 3,450,000 were rendered homeless. The number of houses destroyed were about 8,789,999 and the property losses were about to exceed $3,450,745.

The fire would have not burned the whole city if not stopped in time but would have not only whole forest regions on fire north of it. Heavy rains and wet snow tended to suppress the conflagration so far, that the fire departments were enabled to battle successfully with the flames, and prevent the flames from spreading northward, and threaten the best part of the city.

After a whole day of the hardest work, and as night came on Jennie and Violet who alone had not been rescued by Hansen, and who was now a child slave also slunk off to bed, but first Jennie fell on her knees and prayed thus:

"Please dear Jesus, please bring me back to papa and mama. I am so lonesome and sad. Please bring uncle or my papa to my rescue. Please do. Oh please." Then she added: "Not my will but thine be done. In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, Amen." She crossed herself, and scrambled into the poorly covered bed, and pulled the rough blanket over herself. The next morning when she awoke, it was very cold in the house, and she said her prayers, as she dressed herself as fast as she could. Then just as she was dressed as she was hurried into a factory again, out side the city limits of California, and made to work harder than the day before. This was an ammunition factory, and the Glandelinians in the gun rooms were singing and singing in an awfully loud voices as they worked, which tormented Jennie. It was snowing out side again and the sky was dull and gray. It was late in the morning when the Glandelinians had their breakfast. And when they did come they were very rude to the poor child slaves especially to poor Jennie. Jennie, who suffered terribly from their cruelty, and the more deader she became, the more crueler the Glandelinians were and said untruthful words that Jennie that had not made the rooms warm enough, when it was already too warm and needed airing. After the dishes were washed they set the foremen over the children who made them scrub the floors every night after the machinery shut down, except Sunday, which of course they tried to make them do, but as the children feared it was a sin in sin they refused, saying that the cruellest death is far better than losing their souls for ever. The boss was a great terror shaver, and always spat on the floor, and then always complained that the children did not scrub it clean, and would punish them and scold them every minute, nearly incessantly.

He would not let them have any fresh air, but they got it any way at night, and when he was on duty with the rest of the child labor forces. The poor child slaves could get bread and water to eat and and to drink, once a day. Many a time they suffered from thirst. The poor children were it weekly, and the men tried other means to make them sin, but it was of no use. One day as Jennie was praying all the harder, and the more faithfully, she suddenly found herself surrounded by tall angels with beautiful dazzling white wings, bigger than the biggest bird of the world has. Among the tall angels were some of the very children she had dreamed of at Andromeda, who had also been killed by the wicked Glandelinians but dressed in such beautifully white robes that the dazzling light from them almost blinded her.

"Save us, save us from the cruel Glandelinians, or take us with you, PLEASE PLEASE OH PLEASE!" screamed Jennie throwing out her arms toward the celestial ones.

"Within two weeks, thou wilt see your father and mother again," was the answer. "And for thy faith in your cruel suffering thou shalt never be captured, and enslaved again, and instead shalt thou be placed under the greatest happiness."

Then the celestial children flung their arms toward poor Jennie, and to say one who could have seen the vision, saw the celestial ones fade away by but Jennie was left lying on the floor while the room was filled with the perfume of a million flowers. The Glandelinians who she missed Jennie that morning went to her bed room and seeing her lying prostrate by the bed strove to arouse her by shaking her roughly but of no use. One of them lifted her up and placed her on the bed, and made an examination, finding that she was in some deep happy trance, which all their shaking and pummeling could not bring her out of. Though they could not do any thing with Jennie they treated the other children worse than they did before, which made the poor children more miserable than ever, and they wept piteously for a long while, and time and again threw their arms imploringly up toward the high ceiling, begging GOD to send them their freedom if he wilt and either return them to their own country, or call them by death, and bring them into heaven. But their imploring prayers did not seem to be answered, and as they tried to be cheerful, and let God have his will. Faithful children they were indeed and if all in this story was true how gladly we would have liked to see a glimpse of the poor child slaves, and the beautiful kind hearted loving Vivian girls who were fifty times more loving and grave in manners than little Eva in "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

"Well we are ready for them at any time," remarked one of the managers, whose name was Richard Sinter. "If they do come we will try to give them a very warm reception, warmer than they care to. ." Sputtered a major who was very impatient.

"Are they coming fast?" Asked the manager.

"Get ready for them men," said Dick Slater. "Manger Hoblin, take three more of your men, and go out beyond the edge of the wood, and wait for them, but do not show yourselves until you hear."

"Very good returned Boblin with a salute.

He rapidly selected sixty of the best men, and went out, concealing his party in the thick bushes. Then captain Mark was sent out with another party, a little to one side of Roblins party, but in plain sight, on fast steeds.

"We want them to know where we are," Explains Dick, "And in fact we would like them to follow us into the swamp of they will..." A number of the men built smoke, and fired fires not far from the edge of the weed and in plain sight of the road, and people going hidden at some distance, the way to it being hard to find, and difficult to follow. Dick and a considerable detachment of the Olandellian warriors remained in hiding back of Marks suppressed camp, Mark himself going on to meet the child rebels, and show them the way inn.

THE BATTLE OF SWAMP WOOD/

before long they heard the sound of the tramping of feet, and childish shouts, and soon on a tall gallop, he sat the revolutionists. At length the child rebels appeared, who set up a shout at seeing the wicked Glanleolinians, and dashed forward, firing a volley, and Mark and his band took a hasty retreat. Into the woods the Glanleolinians went, being in plain sight, and soon hurried forward to meet the child rebels. The child rebels supposed that they were all the Glanleolinians, and pushed on into the woods with a shout. When they were well in, the wicked Glanleolinians under Mark offered serious resistance. The revolutionists made attack after attack, despite their heavy losses, and was on the point of winning, when Boblin and his Glanleolinians suddenly appeared, coming up behind the child rebels, and opening withering fire, while from the woods came Disk Slater, and were thus the combined forces, under Boblin and Mark; and at once the child rebels realized that they had been led into a trap. However they fought with the fury of desperation, and held firmly for four hours against the three combined forces, and at last so great were their numbers, that they finally won, but they were so impaired in strength, from their frightful losses, that they did not care to press their advantage, as to capture the factories, and allowed the beaten glanleolinians to go on their way. However,

Several days after this battle both sides had claimed that their combined losses were 25,000 in killed wounded and prisoners. The Reichswehr lost 16,567 in prisoners, and 2,345 in killed, with the remainder were wounded, 1,000 fatally. The total loss in wounded was only 1,939.

The next day Jennie decided to try and sneak out, and by her companion slaves some good feed. She managed to do so, but had no sooner reached the shore, when she found herself grasped by a strong arm, and before she could utter a word, she was gagged, then blindfolded, and bound hand and foot. She prayed inwardly in fright as she found herself raised onto the back of a horse. The man held her on the saddle as he sprang up behind her, and then set spurs to the horse, and dashed down the street at full gallop. It was cloudy again that day, and began to snow heavily, and a strong wind was steadily rising. As they left this city they headed for a town in the far distance, but the hills in front of the town was not yet in view, on account of the pull the snow was making, but he turned the horse up a mountain path after leaving Galvernia, as it was the shortest way to on the of the main line of child slave factories. Then they suddenly rode into a yard, attached to the child slave factories which was on a land lane close to the hidden hills. At the hall of the Olanedalinian, a rough looking fellow appeared and Jennie having been taken out, and her legs and arms unwound was led up to the room on the top floor of the prison.

It had stopped snowing for a while, but a downpour was threatening and hence a big child labor camp filled up far away. It was even new Jennie looked out of the window, with left tears brimming in her eyes, and a war like spectacle was presented The innocent and beautiful little girl had read about such glorious battles in war stories, and though this was the first sight she had ever

the old sorrowful child then looked carefully around the room, and at the other room windows which were barred like those of a prison. When she flung herself wearily on a sofa, and sighed deeply, she heard the noise of the distant conflict increase. The Glandelinian boys did not appear for more than an hour and when he did appear, the rough fellow accompanied him bringing her bread and water.

"New kid." Said the Glandelinian who was an officer. "Here's your dinner, and that is all you'll get. I must lead my brave fellows against the revolutionists into action."

"Galden, I'll hold you responsible for the escape of this

"And I will hold the child get general," Answered the man called Delden: "Or kill her if she tries." -----

"Do not kill the child or I'll break your neck." Hastily interrupted
"It is better to let her live than to let her die."

The young officer then retired to mount his horse, and to dash away toward the hills. Jennie was a sensible creature, and though somewhat resolved to make the best of her position. She did not hesitate about and she said to herself;

"I may be rescued before long. For my guardian angel is always with me in any danger, and so I will bear the suffering until my release happens."

She said the grace before meals as the rough fellow retired, and then started eating. She could hear them belting the deer on the out side and having finished her meal and said her last grace, Jennie glanced out of the window again and saw that the Glandelinsians were changing their positions to repel the child's rebels in full force.

Jack Elden, which he learned loaned to Jack Evans, and the morning was well advanced as the brave child rebel leader rode away to the rescue of poor Jennie it being he who had been ambushed in the woods by Slater when on the way to the factories to rescue the peer children. He now had an idea where she was, though Jack saw could not perceive a single soldier of the Glendelins, as he rode on at a gallop. Jack often looked up the mountain side in quest of a strong shepherd, who may give him some information, but he could not even see a sheep grazing on the snowy sides of the slopes, as there was no grass. It was then getting cloudy, and Jack feared that it would snow, before many hours passed. Jack rose fearfully, until he reached the path, a landing up to the lime ore child labor factories, when he detected some fresh foot prints in the deep snow. The cunning child rebel dismounted to examine the prints carefully. Jack then mounted again, to ride up the sloping hill, keeping a careful watch ahead, as he muttered:

...the Vivian Girl to , and that to ride up the steeping hill, keeping a close watch on the situation. He muttered:

"There's one place, they could have taken the Vivian Girl to, and that is these child labor factories. They may be there."

He then took the horse back to the barn and, as he was about to lead him back to the top of the hill, he was thoroughly convinced, that he had made a great discovery. Not caring to show himself openly, the cunning boy rebelliously secured the horse to a tree back from the path, and he stole cautiously toward the line of factories, just as he began to fall again and increase. As he moved from bush to bush he kept his eyes well closed. Jack could not see a single person moving around the child labor factories, but yet he approached at an cautious distance. It was here that he was haunted by ghosts or witches. He succeeded in reaching a small stable, at the back of the factories, when he looked around carefully. He wanted to get a peep at the windows in the front. A high wall surrounded the factories and several trees grew at the back, and front. Jack stole around to the front, and climbed up into one of the trees, when he at once noticed the barred windows at the left corner of the child labor factories.

He was watching the windows, with eager eyes, when he was startled, by hearing rough voices below him.

"Come down you rascal," cried the voice. "Or I'll put a lead of shot into you."

The startled boy looked down, when he at once recognized the fellow known as Delden. Jack knew the man. The fellow was over seventy, but he was still active and muscular, and he had the reputation of being a perfect brute, when excited to anger. The man pointed a gun at Jack, until he reached the ground, when he seized the boy by the neck, and dragged him to the back of the factory. Jennie was reeling she hastened to the window in time to see Jack, her best friend, seized, and dragged away. Delden dragged the boy into a small kitchen, at the back of the factory, and the big fellow was searching for a piece of cord to strap the prisoner's arms, when he received a severe blow on the head. Jennie's attention was then attracted, to the road, and she covered fields below, where the child rebels were displaying out on the open grounds, below the range of hills, held by their enemies, who were about to give way before the desperate onslaughts of the child rebel armies. She could tell, some how, that the falling snow, had not reached the battle fields as yet, and she could see them plainly. In the meantime Delden was a little staggered by the first blow, but he warded off the second with his gun, and he struck back at Jack. Jack darted aside to escape the blow, and he then closed on the fellow to strike him with the heavy pistol again on the arm, when the gun fell from his grasp, and it exploded as it struck the hard floor. Delden, fell on the floor with blood streaming from his face, but he was not as badly hurt as he feared. Jennie was still eagerly watching the movements of the child rebels, who were pressing the enemy steadily back, when she heard the explosion of the pistol. She did not believe that Jack was shot, but she hoped not. She then listened eagerly, and soon heard footsteps ascending the stairs.

"Where are you Jennie dear?" cried Jack, as he reached the landing.

"Here we are, brave little soldier boy," Jennie answered, as she darted to the door and knelt on it. Jack drew back the bolts on the door and entered. They were standing inside the door of the room, and gave a start as they heard, the roar of the distant battle increase in resounding fury. They were about to go out.

"Don't you budge or I will pepper the two of you," cried Delden as he dashed up the stairs, with a pistol in each hand, and with the face covered with blood.

"Back in there with you children, and you Jack, shall be strung up tonight, you young puppy," Jennie was fearfully startled, when the rough blood stained keeper appeared before them, at the head of the stairway, with a pistol in each hand, and her first impulse, was to draw into the room. Then Jack hugged the door on his enemy, as he whispered to Jennie:

"He is mad enough now to my murder the two of us, and eat us without suit."

Delden the keeper sprang forward on the instant to secure the bolt on the cut side of the door, and he chuckled aloud, in a fiendish manner as he said:

"I've got the pair of you fast now, and I'll lash the life out of you Jack, before you are strung up on the gallows. T..."

The prisoner did not reply, as they did not care to invite the passionate rascal into assaulting them in their helpless condition. Tears mastled across Jennie's eyes, as she ran to the window to gaze on the making a thick pall so they could not see a great distance, but they could hear the noise of the conflict on each side, and they knew by the manner of the bullets roar, that the retreat had long begun, and that the enemy were now fleeing, closely pursued by the revolutionists. They saw perceived a small body of Glandelinians riding up the mountain side with general Gladlin dashing along in advance with his shoulder and hot white with snow. It was larger flakes again and coming heavier, than ever.

"I fear Jack," said Jennie. "I fear our enemy is coming to take us away from here. Oh would that you could escape, to inform papa, or my uncle or the child rebels where I am."

"I'll try it with my guardsmen angels help," responded Jack bravely, as he glanced out at the snow, and the Glandelinians.

"Anyway that means a rope for my neck, if I don't make off."

"Have you thought of a plan Jack?" asked Jennie.

"Not a one dear Jennie, but sure I'll trust in Almighty God, and the guardian angel, when the rascal comes. This pistol is heavy and it will give a good crack when I hit away with it." And the brave boy hid his weapon inside his coat pocket. The Glandelinians rode into the yard and they all dismounted to water their horses and to refresh themselves, in the kitchen. The snow was now falling in a regular blizzard, and the wind was blowing a gale whirling it in clouds.

Jack took a stand at the door and bent his head to listen eagerly and he whispered to Jennie:

"We will both try together, to make a dash when they come to open the door. I'll engage to slunk the regus of a keeper, with the crack of my pistol."

"I will try it Jack, but don't you keep back with me if fortune only favors you," said Jennie. "Then go and tell papa or the child rebels in whose power I am an in."

"I will do that dear little Jennie but we may get off together if we were once mounted on their steeds, and I had my eyes on the nags as they ride up."

"Try what you can do as you are in great peril here my brave boy friend, but don't halt for me if we fail. Oh they are coming now!" said Jennie.

"See that the rope is strong, Delden," cried general Gladlin, cut in the hallway. "And we will make short work of the young spy."

"It would hang an ex," was the brutal reply of the keeper, as he drew back the bolt. "And I premised the young spy that I would thrash him nearly to death before he was strung."

Jack took a position behind the door, as the brutal fellow opened it, and then out darted to the young hero, to strike the villain a crushing blow on the head with the heavy pistol. Even while striking the blow Jack was darting out the door, and he raised the weapon to strike general Gladlin. Then out darted Jennie, while Jack tried to seize the officer by the legs to make him fall, while he yelled in a frenzy, to the Glandelinians:

"Seize the child but slay the spy."

Jack gave the officer one sharp blow in the face, and he then darted to an open window, at the back of the factory crying:

"This way Jennie and jump for it."

Three of the Glandelinians were then ascending the stairs, and one of them fired a pistol shot at the daring boy. The bullet missed him and cut the flesh on Jennie's cheek, and out spurted the blood, while the brave boy darted out of the window, and landed on the soft ground beneath, as he called:

"Follow me Jennie if you can."

Jennie could not follow as general Gladlin had closed her arms as he yelled angrily:

"AFTER THAT YOUNG RASCAL! AND DON'T SPARK HIM..."

Jennie was trying to keep a handkerchief over the wound, but the Glandelinians would not let her. Jack dashed into the stable yard, and made straight for Gladlin's charger yelling:

"I'LL TAKE YOUR HORSE CRAZY GLADLIN, AND I'LL BE A GINNER IF YOU'LL YOU'OL EVER RIDE HIM AGAIN."

Leading the steed to the road he sprang on, turned him to the gate, while out from the kitchen rushed several Glandelinians. Drawing Jennie to the window, and still clasping her arms general Gladlin and the others looked out and yelled:

"AIM HIGH AT THE LITTLE CHARGER! AND DON'T HIT MY HORSE. MOUNT AND PURSUE THE FINDER! AND AIM HIGH AND WELL."

Several bullets whistled close to the little hero's head, as he dashed out of the yard and one of the bullets did hit him in the back. But it only hit his shirttail, and he would have surely been killed had it not been for them, though he did receive a painful wound.

Fourty of the Glandelinians sprang on their horses to give chase. Tivies Jack made straight for a pasture, as the crowd flies, paying no atony attention to the snow, which flew in his face, the boy forgetting in his excitement, that he was dashing toward a point of the hill, where there was an abrupt fall of one hundred eighty feet, to an open plain below. Giving Jennie in charge of one of the Glandelinians general Gladlin dashed down to mount a horse and to ride in pursuit as he yelled:

"WE HAVK THE LITTLE DEMON NOW! AND HE WILL DOON BE LUNG."

Jack did not notice the point on the mountain he was making for until he was well in an ugly trap.

Jack was so bristling with excitement, that he thought of only making straight for the pasture, and he was laughing at the pursuing Glandelinians, when he discovered that he was riding straight to the brow of the hill. Jack cast one glance back at his feet, who were almost hidden in the pall of snow and he then looked toward the battle field, as he muttered:

"To cause the rescue of the little girl I must get to the army of child rebels even if I have to fly there."

He drew forth the pistol and struck the spirited charger a smart blow on the side. As it was not loaded, he could not fire at his pursuing enemies, and on the edge of the steep fall dashed the daring boy yelling back defiance at his unarméd pursuers. Jack struck the spirited charger again, as they went on the bank of the steep fall, and he tightened his grip, on the bridle as he muttered a prayer for swift aid, and they plunged out into empty space, and went down, swiftly down down, down, went the gallant charger, and the fearless boy. The boy was still clinging to the splendid charger as the horses struck the soft surface of a deep snow drift, and here and rider, rolled over on the snow. Jack flung himself forward, and landed on his feet, when he turned to look at the struggling charger, and then up at the fall. The gallant charger struggled to his feet, and snorted and shook himself, as he moved on ward without difficulty. Then taking the reins of the bridle, he sprang on the good horse again, and urged him down the mountain side at full speed.

"FIRE AT THE IMP." Yelled general Gladlin from the half-girt slave. The Glandelinians blazed away with their muskets but the bullets missed him, and Jack only laughed at them, as he dashed down the steep, and rugged path from the plateau. After reaching the foot of the mountain, Jack drew up to rest the charger, and he looked around in vain, for some friendly horsemen who could dash back with him and rescue the little Vivian Girl.

Then on dashed the boy at full speed, swooping across the snow covered fields and into the road like a nap of death.

THE BATTLE OF VIRGINIA FORD.

Annie Arenburg, (not angelina, arenburg), was advancing with with a large force of boy rebels, all over eighteen years old and armed with bayonets, when she was startled by the loud clatter of her feet, and Jack to her utter amazement, dashed up to her, and said:

"The Glandelinians under general Gladlin are coming away with one of Governor Vivian's daughters, to the upper Via Virginia Ford, toward Galverinia. Go to her rescue Annie, for her sake. I tried to rescue her, but I got captured for the attempt, and had to break jail to get away."

"How many of them are there?" Asked Annie Arenburg.

"Not more than forty will tell. They had her in the old factory on the mountain."

"FORWARD." Was the command and Arenburg's force was seen dashing along by the river side, Jack riding on the charger, alone side of his superior Annie Arenburg who spurred on calling calling to her boys to hurry on and to her horsemen to put on their best speed. Jack told her of his adventures on the hill. It was over two miles to the ford, but the child rebel army fairly flew along, as if on wings. The snow was falling faster than ever now, as they drew near the ford which was shut out from Arenburg's view by a sharp bend in the river. Jack was still dashing ahead and he was the first to catch a glimpse of the ford which was almost obscured by the white pall of the falling snow.

"They are crossing, they are crossing, a good sized army of them." He cried to Annie Arenburg.

General Gladlin was then in advance of his men, with Jennie in his arms and followed by the rough keeper. The Glandelinian officer was close to the back of the child rebels dashed around a bar band of the road, and yelled back:

"Sur on Glandelinians, and make a dash for the wood. Delden look to the prisoner."

Jennie sent forth a cry of joy, as she saw the child rebels dash along the road, with Jack in the lead. The three foremost Glandelinian riders in the ford struck the bank far ahead of the others, and the new furious rebels were then over fifty yards away, and opened a withering fire upon the Glandelinian fugitives, and over seventy of the horsemen fell from their saddles to be swept along in the deep ice cold water. The others wheeled about as if panic stricken, and then dashed back toward the bank they had left, delivering a return fire.

"Dash after the Glandelinians, and cut them down." Cried Annie Arenburg to her soldiers. "And Jack and I will rescue the Vivian girl." The boys dashed into the ford, and Jack and Arenburg sprang on furiously after the prisoner. General Gladlin with Delden and the fair prisoner were then dashing toward the edge of the wood, and the Glandelinians turned to look back on being thus challenged. There was suddenly an irregular fire on every side which extended from one part of the ford to the woods, which soon faded away to the right and increased incessantly to the left wing, which gave evidence that a general engagement was on. Then suddenly an overwhelming force of 3,000 Glandelinians under Jenkin, known as Smash-In-The-Head, during in his services in the Glandelinian war, rode up yelling like demons and attacked the force under Arenburg with all the ferocity, they could assume, surrounding a lad called Bob with his entire force and taking him and then as prisoners. Arenburg having 6,789 boys with her by being reinforced by another girl leader stood her ground against the onslaughts of her enemies with great stubbornness, mowing down scores of the Glandelinians, while Jack with his cavalry force of girl rebels, after a bloody fight succeeded in escaping. A hundred and fifty nine of the Glandelinians pursued Jack and his dwindled force furiously, as he and his troop of girls made for the river, but they all recognized general Gladlin's favorite charger, and they did not wish a pistol shot at the brave boy, though they occasionally opened a heavy fire at his feet for fear of girls. Jack faced the charger into the ford, and spurred across across yelling at the top of his voice:

"Come back. Come back, boys and stand to your leader, for she is attacked by heavy numbers of the enemy. Hurry or it will be too late."

The boys were then pursuing the beaten and scattered Glandelinian horsemen, but some of them had seen the large force of Glandelinians dashing out of the wood, at their girl general, and signals were given for all to hasten back to the ford. Jack met them as he rode out of the river, and he cried:

"Load your guns and pistols boys, and prepare for hot work." Arenburg is heavily attacked, Bob is taken, and the result is getting serious."

"Bob is taken?" Gasped Brad. "Well it will be queer if we do not take him from the Glandelinians again no matter about the odds against us. Forward boys to the rescue."

Shouts of rage rent the air as the boys dashed to the river after Jack, followed by the soldier girls, but every boy and girl drew up on the bank to load their carbines and pistols. Jack could see them, could see that the Glandelinians under General Gladlin were retreating into the woods with their child prisoner, and that general Gladlin and the rough keeper were able to mount their horses again while the 3,000 Glandelinians drew up in long lines. Though out numbering the rebels over the river general Jenkin did not wish to give them battle or to wait to see the determination in their eyes when they crossed, but the rebels pursued ever so fast that the battle could not be avoided, but after a sanguinary conflict of four hours the Glandelinians were beaten with two thousand lost and routed with Bob retaken besides 800 prisoners.

On through the afternoon rode the flying routed force of Glandelinians with the snow falling in swirling clouds and after them swept the child rebels pouring in a continuous fire. General Jenkin drew up his ragged weary force on the outskirts of a village, and when the demoralized fugitives of the proud Glandelinian army were huddled in cottages and shed houses to escape the furious rebels and the terrible blizzard. The few prisoners were taken into a farm house near the road side, when General Jenkin glared fiercely at poor Jennie. Then he took a prayer book away from her, and flung them into the fire on the broad hearth. General Jenkin had seized a poker to press it into the blazing fire, when one of the boy prisoners made a dash at him, and gave him such a kick in the back, that he nearly hurt his feet, the angry rebel crying:

"TRAKHROUS BLODDHEDD. YOU YOU ARE W-W-W-WORSE T-T-T-T-TAN SATEN H-H-H-H-HINSKLE. T-T-T-T-TAXE (1) THAT FOR T-T-T-T-T YOUR LUCK." The force of the kick sent the general flat on the blazing hearth and the two Glandelinians guarding Jennie sprang forward to drag him out of the flames. But not until he had received some severe scratches on the face and hands. Other Glandelinians rushed into the kitchen on hearing the cry, and the boy prisoner was seized as he attempted to escape by dashing out of the window. The boy was dragged out in the pelting snow, Jennie protesting in vain with captain base, guardian angel against the cruel injustice of putting a prisoner to death in this way.

"General Jensen stood inside the doorway of the house nursing his burns, as he cried aloud:

"That big tree near the gate will do Dalden. You yourself or string him up and make a sure job of it."

The Glandelinians as it was getting dark from the heavy storm clouds held up lanterns to work by, and the hot sun had the men around his neck, with the loose end of the rope dangling over a strong limb of the large shade tree.

"Up with the scamp at once." Cried Jensen. "I'll see why the reason he will kick me and-----"

Crack, crack, crack, crack.

Crack, crack, crack, crack.

Crack, crack.

Crack, crack, crack, crack.

So sounded the volley of thirteen shots. Just as Dalden was about to pull on the rope, and a disorderly stampede occurred.

"The child rebels are on us. The child rebels are on us." Were the cries heard, as the terrified fellows fled from the village, their officers calling on them in vain to form, and resist in the enemy. Then alone the road dashed 100 of the boy rebels. The boy prisoner was standing under the shade tree with the ugly rope around his neck, and though surrounded by merciless enemies before he was now surrounded by his comrades, hundreds of others arriving and surrounding the farsha so attacking the Glandelinians who had stayed to resist the boys, several of the men who failed to escape, were themselves dragged out of the house and strung up in short order. As one of the boy leaders stepped at the door, an orderly addressed him with instructions to retreat at once, and to bring up and guard the rear of the flying fear foot soldiers, pushing out of the village, for manager Arenburg with his great force of Glandelinian soldiers and citizens were coming in forced marches to catch them and put a stop to the rebellion.

"I will obey the order," said the rebel leader. To his orderly and off they went.

General Gaddan though defeated twice still had Jennie with him and meeting Arenburg turned Jennie over to him. In the meantime Badmans with seventy of his caverly men determined to sneak over to a place where it was known that many younger children were kept by the rebels, and also see if the rebels were still guarding them. Putting on their uniforms they set out and started on their long way toward the once they wished to kidnap, and toward a certain bridge made out of boats crossing a creek. Crossing the creek, they quietly rode on toward the place of their intention. After three hours of traveling they snatched up to the place. They approached some sentries, and also saw some children who were playing and aside the line of sentries, and as no one else seemed about, they determined to kill the sentries and carry off all the children that was in the place.

"Dismount a score of the men." Said Badmans to his general aid called Gadden. "Force the place and seize every child you find I'll attack the line of sentries. Forward." He added to the rest of the men. Gadden quickly picked out a score of men, while Badmans taking the rest along hurried on to assail the sentries, which numbered about fifty. Gadden made a dash with his men and surrounded the house in a few moments. Then he made a rush for the front door, and sent it and a boy rebel flying, the rebel having attempted to belt it but not being quick enough for Gadden. Gadden rushed in followed by a half a dozen lively Glandelinians, and at the same moment the rest made their way in the rear and clubbed down the boy rebels with their bullet muskets. Two little boys were found in the place and promptly seized, and bound, while a couple of little girls tried to get into a big chest and were promptly hauled out, and strangled cruelly to death. The two boys were taken away along with some boy prisoners. Then Gadden rode after Badmans who had killed all the sentries and captured the rest of the children. The arrival of the Glandelinians created a diversion. He saw boy rebels were in the place, but there were numbers coming, attracted by the rapid firing, and Badmans mounted his cruel Glandelinian Glandelinians took his child prisoners, and hurried away having made a successful raid on the revolutionists, even if he did not care to keep it up.

"King Precille and King Saten forever." Shouted the cruel Glandelinian Glandelinians as they rode away at a gallop. "Down with the followers of Christ. We will come back as soon as we can and get more children." Roared Badmans, and all the Glandelinians laughed heartily.

CHAPTER THIRTY-FOUR

JENNIE IS STILL A CAPTIVE.

"Not a bad morning's work when?" Asked their leader as they all went dashing away at full full speed.

"Not at all." Answered one of the Glandelinians. "These other pig-headed child rebels who will be coming will likely remember it. I'll warrant."

"And they thought that they had the children well protected." Laughed Pedemanns. "I think that they will change their minds now." The Glandelinians rode on at a full speed, and at last came in sight of a railroad and a railroad station. THEY WAITED FOR A TRAIN, and when it pulled in they got on bringing the prisoners with them. After riding for an hour they reached Calvernia and when also the station was reached they got off, taking the prisoners with them. Then they took a trolley trolley that ran to the factory houses on the outskirts of Calvernia, near or within sight of the great Dell-Mell-Tell-Mell prison used for criminals by the Angelinians. The children were then cruelly slain, and Jennie was brought to the poverty row factories. Reaching the steps they went up taking Jennie with them, and when she was led away to be placed at hard labor the Glandelinians left grinning like fiends, who were happy over a lost soul. Though poor Jennie was beaten all that day without mercy and as the Glandelinians tried to force her to turn from God, they only became more righteous, and obstinate against the wicked commands of the Glandelinians, and though her she yearned for her parents, and for freedom. She did so, long to feel her father's arms around her once more. But as she was among the human demons, no one loved or pitied her now, and the wicked Glandelinians took no notice of any of the poor child slaves, and nearly every hour cuffed and teased them, while the Glandelinian foremen made them work harder than they had ever done before. Hundreds of the children were still very young, to have to be bearing this sorrow, so great, the grief of being kidnapped, and the near unbearable misery of being hated, always abused, and the parting from their dear parents. The poor children did try to please their cruel masters, in everything that was not wicked, to wait on them in every way, to be patient and winning, with all their enemies, and done everything they asked except sinful duties. Their dear innocent hearts went up in fervent prayer to God, and our Blessed Virgin Mary, but when the children were ever caught at prayer the Glandelinian masters, would be down upon them like a thunderbolt. One the first day she came there one of the foremen handed Jennie a heavy bucket and ordered her to get some thick tar from the vats, and threatened to punish her severely if she was long in getting it. Jennie ran forward hastily, and took the heavy bucket, as she gazed up into the face of the Glandelinian with so wistful a look that it could have touched hearts of stone.

When the poor little girl arrived at the vat it was really indeed a pathetic sight to see the brave little girl's hands made to draw the bucket out of the vat after she had put it in. Her curly golden hair was thrown back showing the pale face with its touching delicateness, of her hard and almost useless effort to do the fearful task, which was indeed really above her strength, though she was a strong child little as she was. It seemed as if the bucket would never be drawn up but at last with a painful struggle which sent a deep flush all over her angelic face, she managed to draw it out, and turned toward the machine room fairly staggered forward under her heavy burden which was really too much for her. She was thinking sadly of her dear parents and sisters, as she continued on her dangerously slippery tar and grease on the floor, and firmly holding the heavy bucket with both hands.

It was so heavy that she had to set it down, and rest a score of times, and when fifteen minutes passed, she was still a good way off from her destination. White scared and trembling in every limb, and eyes full of despair she soon got to the place, to face the blind fury of the cruel but handsome looking Glandelinian.

"You had good for nothing little christian girl." He very fairly screamed. "I told you not to be long in getting that tar, and of course you took twenty minutes in coming back with that light little bucket, you useless lazy little scamp, who cannot fetch some tar for me without taking all day about it. I shall should like to know what good you useless christian children are in this nice country of Calvernia, and what you will do ever do to escape the most cruellest suffering, I'll put you to."

"Oh please sir. Oh please forgive me." She cried clasping her small trembling hands in supplication. "I could not hurry with that heavy buck bucket, without slipping of the slippery floor, and spilling the tar. I could not help being slow, and I tried to hurry, but it was too heavy." She added with a sick shaking sob.

"Don't lie to me you little shrimp." Stomped the Glandelinian giving Jennie such a blow with the flat of his hand that she was sent sprawling against a table. "You can't make me believe that this bucket was too heavy, for you to carry, you lazy beggar. Go to the machine room this minute, and stay there until I call for you again to do something else. I'll make you suffer a cruel death for this within two days."

"Oh sir, please, please, oh please forgive me." Pleaded Jennie beseechingly, clinging to his gray uniform coat, but he pushed her away angrily, and with a breaking heart, and badly scared, and with her hand bleeding from a cut, which she got, when knocked against the table, she went sobbing upstairs, and with a piteous scream followed by a moan she flung herself down on the floor beside a machine in the bitterness of her despair, the Glandelinians forcing her to her feet, and compelling her to work, the Glandelinians laughing at her until tears came to their eyes.

"Oh/ Oh. Oh. Have none of you any pity for me at all." She moaned in a very look of sorrow in her eyes, which made her look awfully pathetic. "I surely did you Glandelinians no harm, and still you laugh at me. Surely surely Dear Jesus I know you would surely rescue me if you would. Oh then grant me, and deliver me from this prison by release or death. Come to me Dear Jesus, and comfort me in my distress. For an hour she enslaved there, having said the prayer silently the Glandelinians being delighted in their sorrow, and looked at her scornfully as she called longingly for her friends, and parents, relief from the Infant Jesus for help in her awful longings and loneliness. At last she heard a step and looking up as she raised her head from her arms saw a handsome boy approach her, the Glandelinians showing great respect for him. He was a spy of the child rebels and ordering the men out of the room he went over to her telling her not to speak over a whisper, as he did not want the Glandelinians to know what he would say to her. He felt sorry for the poor desolate little girl, gave her some nice lunch bound up her bleeding hand, with his clean handkerchief, and sat down by her to talk to her in whispers.

For an hour or two they sat together in conversation. The boy greatly averted at Jennie's innocence and goodness gave her an account of himself and inquired if he could be of any service whatever to her. Jennie shook her pretty golden head sadly, and made no reply. The good gentle boy was not however easily discouraged, and knowing from her name, that she belonged to the Angelinian governor he simply asked her in a kind way if she was an Angelinian catholic?

"I'm not an Angelinian, though I live in that country, but I'm a catholic." Was her sobbing reply, as the large tears rose to her eyes. "I am an Abbeisannian by birth, being born in Pandern Abbeisannia." "Oh I see." Answered her friend, who on hearing his name realized that he too was an Abbeisannian. "But my dear little girl." He continued, in a still gentler voice. "You seem so sad. Have you no friends, no christian friends here?" "Not one friend except you." Was the mournful reply. "Not a soul but you to care for me in this city."

"How do the glandelinians treat you?" "The Glandelinians are just as bad, and as bitter to me as ever, and they laugh at me in my distress. I wish the Abbeisannians would drive the Glandelinians out of Calvernia." The tears flowed more freely than before, and she could not keep from weeping again.

The next day a little girl became convulsed at one of the machines and fell to the floor in a terrible spasm. Jennie and Jack had sat listening to howling wind outside when suddenly they started to their feet aroused by a sound to which they knew well, the sound of the child who had fallen by the machines gasping from a sudden attack of cramp with which that poor child was frequently troubled with during the winter months, of the Calvernian country. Its always summer in the country of Angelinia and Abbeisannia.

"If we could only help her sobbed Jennie, with pity as she and the boy ran to the suffering child, and watched the terrible convulsions, and suddenly her wish seemed to be granted for the moment."

through the whole room far above even the deafening roar of the machinery, like some happy cry of an angel she fell back dead.

"Oh please sir. Oh please forgive me." She cried clasping her small trembling hands in supplication. "I could not hurry with that heavy buck basket, without slipping of the slippery floor, and spilling the tar. I could not help being slow and stupid as I was." She said.

consequently troubled with during the winter months, of the Glandelinian country. Its always summer in the country of Angelina and Abbeonina.

"If we could only help her sobbed Jennie, with pity as she and the boy ran to the suffering child, and watched the terrible convulsions, and suddenly her wish seemed to be granted for the spasms ceased, and raising herself convulsively from the hard floor, the dying child stretched her arms to Jennie and Jack, with a pleading look ever spreading her face which was also sweet, becoming very piteous, and beseeching. "What is it little girl?" Asked Jack bending eagerly toward her, to some of the Glandelinians hearing the convulsions approached then.

"I want to see God." She said with a yearning look that wooed Jennie.

"And you shall see him soon." Sobbed Jennie.

Although the dying child was a stranger, Jennie had as much pity as she would for her own sisters, if one of them were dying.

"Are you really sure?" Whispered the child in a faint whispered voice, gazing up into Jennie's face with a mere pleading look than ever.

"All baptized children see the face of God for ever and ever in heaven but I I'm not baptized. I was captured when I was a little baby and before my parents could have me baptized."

"Oh my God." Gasped both together. She is not baptized.

Go Jennie. The boy cried. "Fetch some water from the sink quick."

"But by Satana's name you will not baptize her, and you say is a spy."

Reared the leader of the Glandelinian foremen. "We don't want her to see heaven, righteousness or not, and truthfully we tell you, she shall not or I'll know the reason why. Baptize her and she will die in the most horrible torture ever meted out to humans."

"Oh Jack reberts, oh Jack," sobbed Jennie wringing her hands in passionate sorrow, the men ever yonder though I begged and begged, won't let us get any water. You see they are standing by the sink armed with their guns. If we risk our lives it would only make the child more helpless, and really lost. See. See the spasms are returning. Oh God of Mercy have pity."

The dying child was once more in fearful convulsions and her incessant suffering unbearable, and struggling to stop the strangulation was terrible to witness.

"Oh mother of Sorrows. Oh Mother of Divine Love. She will die unbaptized. Oh the poor dear dear little girl." Sobbed Jennie in an agony of pity. "Oh God Please pity her."

"I don't believe so." Said Jack suddenly drawing nearer to the suffering and strangling child as he remembered what was said about baptism. Then before the Glandelinians who dashed forward could prevent him he drew a small bottle of Holy Water, from his coat pocket, and took out the glass stopper. Then he bending over the little dying child Jack sprinkled the water on her forehead or brow, to the blinding rage of the approaching Glandelinians, pronouncing at the very same time, as Jennie made the sign of the cross on the child's forehead, and which won for her the fluttering soul eternal life.

"I baptize Thee, in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost."

As the Holy water touched the child's brow the convulsions ceased instantly, the shrieking which had also been unbearable, also ceased, and when the sign of the cross she had learned to love so well was imprinted there a smile of unutterable happiness lit up the child's face, while by her side but being invisible to Jennie and Jack, an angel of unutterable beauty, appeared suddenly. The angel who did not show itself, to Jennie or Jack on account of the presence of the Glandelinians here in his right hand a small white robe of dazzling brightness which he threw around the form of the dying little one who was now very happy, and saw the angel herself even if the others did not. In his left hand he carried a tiny harp, made of pure heavens gold, and a crown of dazzling white lilies. The child's dark blue eyes no more pleading but blissful as though she understood the greatness of the gift that had been bestowed upon her were raised upward. Then turning then, with a look of tender affection upon the patient devoted little Christian friends, weeping by her side she stretched out her arms and gaze gazing up into both faces of her friends with a look of unearthly joy. The resolute lips smiled as one, who never smiled before, and the dying voice, full of melody, almost sang the words:

"Oh little girl and boy, I am at last in heaven, and with a happy cry, that resounded through the whole room far above even the deafening roar of the machinery, like some happy cry of an angel she fell back dead.

But the smile on her face stayed and she was brilliantly transfigured. The little child was cradled in the arms of our lady, and in another moment she lay on the heart of Jesus. She did indeed see God, and her yearning was satisfied at last. But by the time the child had fallen back dead, heavy hands were laid on both shoulders of the two children, and instantly they were dragged out, of the room and outside. The boy however managed to escape, but Jennie was placed among other child prisoners, to be sent off to a frightful slave house, worse than the most frightful prison.

CHAPTER THIRTY THREE. GO ON A SPUR.

THE TYPHOON

As they trudged along, a slight rising wind, rattled the leafless branches of the big trees in a thick wood, near the sea which was close to Calverine. The snow from the same snowstorm, which was still raging, blew about in silvery strokes while a strange ominous sounding roar rear, like as if it was some volcanic eruption taking place sounded in the distance to the southwest. Suddenly the wind grew stronger, and swelled into a gale. A frightful gust shook the old oaks and bent the willows, and the snow fell heavier, while heavy masses of black clouds rose from the direction of the sea, toward the zenith, and darker and darker grew the horizon in the southwest. In another minute the storm broke in its regular fury. The giant oaks of the forest snapped like straws before the glass, and clouds of heavy snow whirled through the air. The storm increased with redoubled fury, the Glandelinians and prisoners being enveloped in impenetrable darkness, and in vain did the leaders shout to all to lie flat on the ground. The words or commands could not be heard in the tremendous din of the storm, the snow whirling about in clouds filling their mouths and eyes, and hurling them down sprawling. Houses in a town near by snow, tree trunks and earth were whirled around in an indescribable chaos. Wilder and wilder blew the storm, while another frightful cyclone cyclone more dangerous than the first one that caught the prisoners and Glandelinians in its path, quickly approached from an opposite direction, moving eastward, tearing up trees and rocks in its destructive course. In the path of this second apocalyptic typhoon, which had assumed the shape of a cone, reversed moved for a time in a diagonal course, rearing most frightfully, and advanced with great swiftness, toward thirty large wooden child labor factories. The peer al was heard the deafening cannonading roar of the funnels friction with the upper storm, but before all could save themselves by fleeing to the cellars, the storm struck with a noise that resembled the end of all mankind. The funnel being two miles wide had greater strength than the first storm which had left the prisoners far behind, and rounded the factories to pieces in the short space of time it takes to tell it, and all the children either those who did succeed in reaching the cellars were killed by the swirling clouds of wreckage, thousands being mangled beyond recognizing. The storm then passed on into the distance, followed by terrific clouds of snow which for a time fell two feet an hour. The Glandelinians and prisoners reached their own destination by crawling on their hands and knees, but over 500 of them were killed before they reached the places.

Several days after the storm one of the Glandelinian leaders made orders that that a sun kind of lotin that saves people from dying, but not from pain should be rubbed on Jennie's body, and to throw her into a furnace, for she was to suffer this pain for saving that unbaptized child. They told the man who was to do the punishing, that Jennie was to suffer this once every day. The torments had now passed off way out of sight, but the black under layer of clouds still remained unbroken, and the snow was falling in increasing thickness. Informed that Jennie was a Catholic, who had saved a child from everlasting darkness by baptism, and that she always refused to renounce or abandon her religion, he said angrily to Jennie: "Do you know that a law has been always subsisted throughout this whole country of Calverine, for every one even christian prisoners to be put to death when they refuse a religion that is against us?" Jennie said nothing just then and he continued: "You will be forced to kiss love and adore the beautiful gods we adore and all these who refuse will die!"

Jennie still said nothing, and the Glandelinians continued: "All these who refuse, no matter if they are hundreds looking or sweet, shall be put to the worst and most punishment and death. After one year of the hardest labor!"

"If Jennie then answered:

"I know that this is your wicked and devilish command, but Almighty God is your master as well as mine, and we are bound to obey his laws. It is his command that we worship and serve him only, him therefore I will obey, and nothing not even that suffering, and death to be unfaithful. And wouldn't it be my father hears of your cruelty to me you will get yours in the end. I'm telling you this as a fair warning and not a threat, as my father or any of the authorities of Angelina can't any means trail you down to your next secret lairs and make you suffer worse torture than you can ever put to me."

The Glandelinian flew into a bitter rage when he heard these words and said angrily:

"If you still refuse we will capture your sisters, and condemn them to a cruel death."

Fear Jennie's heart sunk within her when she heard this cruel sentence. She knew what would become of them if they got captured, and knew that the Glandelinians were worse than the very fiends, and would show her sisters though their father was dangerous to the Glandelinians as every and would inflict unutterable tortures upon them.

But she answered though she was badly scared:

"God made us all to love him in this world and if I and every body served him faithfully to the end of our lives he would take us all to heaven. Our suffering would be shorter, if he wills it, despite your powerful medicine, and if death follows, then happiness with God Almighty forever."

At these brave words tears flowed down a boy's cheeks, who stood besides her. He embraced her tenderly, and said despite the guards threats and fury:

"Your sisters are just as brave as you, and would fight bravely, and fear not to die, the cruellest death for his sakes. Even if we are put to a cruel death by these butchers, we shall soon meet again, in that beautiful kingdom of heaven, where forever more there is no separation at all."

Many of the child slaves had already been put to death, for not denying their God or doing the dearest of the goblins of Calverine.

The Glandelinians now told Jennie, that if she still remained stubborn, they would also put her sisters to death, when they caught them, with knives like a butcher would a cow, when preparing it for the meat market. Jennie felt this sorrow more than ever, but though death when cruel, scared them a little she feared more to lose her soul, so she tried to be brave, and would not give up.

"No my God," she exclaimed with a pleading look toward heaven, and clasping her hands:

"I love even my parents, and relations, and sisters dearly, but I love these still more, and willingly would I sacrifice myself or those rather than be unfaithful to them. Oh God as you guard my papa and uncle, are not afraid of these cruel Glandelinians, and neither are my sisters afraid of the short sufferings, which will procure for all true Christians eternal life and happiness. God will and does protect, and sustain us, and there, Oh ye Glandelinians our youth will guard my sisters too strongly, mine, and harm them we would not let. Oh God, you will only bring a curse upon him and your king."

Many children were taken before the noble governor Federal Johnston and commanded to worship Satan. Said the Glandelinian in a menacing manner but telling the truth, as it really did happen. "They were stubborn and refused." He went on, sternly and with gleaming eyes. "And as the governor ordered the soldiers to string them up, and slashed their bodies with their sabres until their bodies were spilled onto the ground. This was a good, and to the children are still hanging in the slaughter pen of Randome prison. So come a new and offer sacrifice to our beautiful free mason gods and wear Satan. Be no longer estimate, or stubborn, if you want to be free from these terrible place places and also escape death. If you still say you refuse I will take your best friend and have him hanged as the others. Besides I know you, the Glandelinian, will be put to death within two days for being long with the bar buckets."

and go to heaven he will give them more than what they have asked for. "You do not know the puns (punsishments) or had never experience ear seen t them, and if you did you would think and say a different. " Said the Glanadlinian: "If you have seen their punisments for their stubborn disobedience, you would yield. Now t you still keep an in your obstinac disobedience, you shall be put in the steam well of scalding hot water, after having that medicine rubbed on your body."

"God alone knows the grief which filled the hearts of the peer innocents, when they were taken away from their dear mothers to be slain." The bold boy remarked. "But they had the consolation of knowing that the ir death and asperation would really be but for a very short time, and that they would soon see such other again in paradise." And often the same punishments too yes impenitent young

The two prisoners along with the others, were then conducted inside the main factory, and there was a leak of triumph, on the 2 faces of the key and girl's as they were led through a hall/ which had filled machine noise on either side. With a victor. led with anger the Glendelians yelled to the shouting and screaming children inside the working rooms to keep the prisoners. Then after the glendelians tried every means to make his prisoners to turn from Usd, he found that threats and promises were alike unheeded.

 Dick gave a signal for the men within the house, to return, and then went back toward the house, and suddenly discovered the fugitives running down a road in an opposite direction.

"After them men! That's the chance!" he shouted.
 The children did not stay on the road when they discovered that they were being pursued; but ran across a cornfield, and then a field of wheat, and then a field of barley. He again detailed his men to surround them, which was still possible on account of the advantage their speedy horses had over them on foot. After a while however Dick lost track of the foot-fetters, in the deep snow, for they came to a wide but shallow track, which was frozen, and which which the children had evidently followed rather than crossed. When at length they recovered the trail, it was to find that the two children had found a pair of shoes. They followed on, and soon came to a thick growth of tangled undergrowth and this prevented the horses from going any farther. The horses were left in charge of five men, the rest of the band had been halted. Glandelinians following the trail on foot. It was a matter of patience and nerve to stick up the trail, for Jennie and Jack were covering their tracks. But Dick again went on thinking, and as he had had much experience with cleverer men, than the two little children. Just then they heard a shout from Dick, and they ran as quick as they could over the untraveled ground, to where it was standing and pointing to a foot print that showed clearly on the hard snow. A signal from the men brought some of the glandelinians to them and they spread out, examining every inch of the ground. On the way, Dick set on hands and knees, for the woods were dense and dark, going over quite a space before again coming to another footprint. In this way they went a considerable distance, but they felt sure that they were now tracking the children to their home, and would soon catch up with them. They soon heard a crackling of broken twigs, and glancing up in time to catch a fleeting glimpse of two flying creatures, who were a little girl and a thirteen year old boy.

"There they go!" shouted Sam.
 "Flee!" shouted Dick.
 Simultaneously came the crash of firearms but when the smoke cleared away, nothing was seen of the fugitives. It was evident however that the children were not even wounded or hit by the volley of bullets, and again they patiently sought the trail. They found it within a few minutes, much nearer than they expected. Near as bloodhounds on the scent, the glandelinians followed up the fugitives, and once were caught sight of them. This time they were in an almost opposite direction, for they had doubled on their tracks.

"Surrender or we fire!" shouted Dick.
 But for an answer Jack waved a derisive hand, and plunged deeper into the thicket followed by Jennie. At the same time three shots rang out in succession, and three glandelinians threw up their arms and dropped flat, their muskets being discharged as they struck the ground. The glandelinians were killed by the three shots fired by Jack Penna. Dick was in a rage and ordered his men to pursue quicker. It was some moments before they caught another glimpse of the children, and this time they had put considerable distance between themselves and their pursuers. As the glandelinians saw the children they fired a volley, and Jennie was seen to stagger and fall.

With a shout the glandelinians sprang up the hill after her but it was some little time before they could reach the spot owing to a deep ravine that separated the glandelinians from the fallen child. Half falling, half scrambling down the descent, they reached the bottom, only to begin the ascent on the other side. Climbing up was harder than climbing down. On a little eminence, lay a prostrate figure apparently that of the wounded perhaps dead child. The glandelinians approached their muskets aimed in order not to be taken by surprise. In case the child was only unconscious, there was neither sound or movement from the prostrate figure, so as to the extent of the injuries inflicted. A half were creak was the only thing visible and Dick roughly raised it not knowing but that he might see a face cold and fixed in death. Instead he saw a heap of hard dried snow that the coat had covered. While the glandelinians had been crossing the ravine, Jennie had probably crawled out from beneath the cloak, presumably unhurt for there was no sign of blood about. Now the two children although knot not knowing the vicinity could have made an easy get away, on account of the dense thicket, and by putting their faith in Dick.

 "They've fooled down the hillside." Was the quick answer.
 Down the slope went the determined glandelinians, jumping, sliding, and punning, and across an open space below, saw moving objects, and coming.

CHAPTER THIRTY THREE FOUR

THE DARING ESCAPE FROM FI FORTUNE WOULD BE THE BATTLE OF LAMDALE..... A TYPHOON.

144
 1801 Dick gave a signal for the men within the house, to return, and then went back toward the house, and suddenly discovered the fugitives had done a good job of opposite direction.

"After them men, then," the parents said in a shout.

The children did not move.

 "They've fooled down the hillside." Was the quick answer. Down the slope went the determined Mandelins, jumping, sliding, and running, and across an open space below, saw moving objects, and coming closer saw that it was the children themselves. There was a large tree in the middle of the clearing when the Mandelins had again caught sight of the children and to this they had fled, skimming up the trunk like a squirrel. It was a Christmas tree, and the foliage was so thick that the children were completely screened from view of the cruel Mandelins, who attempted to climb after them but were picked off by Jack's pistols, and they were at his mercy. Two of the wicked Mandelins had brought no axes with them in case the fugitives would climb a tree, and these two set to work at cutting the tree down. The Mandelins sprang out to catch the children when they would make a leap. As the tree came crashing to the ground, the branches knocked both Dick and Mark off their feet, so close had they been in their eagerness to recapture the two children. Others of the men sprang forward, and as the children came down with the tree, to get at a safe distance while they watched to see the place they would emerge.

But they were not to get them even then for as they saw the children, and made a dash forward, they felt something strike them, and in one instant were nearly blinded, for with a quick gesture, Jack had thrown some pepper into their faces, which got into their eyes, and started like fire on the sensitive eyeballs. Neither Dick or Mark had been hurt when knocked down by the tree, but before they had time to recover their feet Jack after blinding the Mandelins, who had come so near capturing him and Jennie, had broken away, and was standing on an eminence, waving his hand at them in a taunting farewell, while Jennie was standing by his side. Five of the Mandelins fired a volley, with great quickness, but the children dodged, and sprang lightly up the snow-covered slope, and once were disappeared. Again some Mandelins were hit as Jack returned the fire. All the Mandelins sprang up the bank, all except those, who were still nursing their eyes, and could not yet see. As Jack and Jennie continued on in their flight, they were suddenly surprised by a large party of Mandelins who at once dashed upon them, seizing the children before Jack could draw his pistol to use on them. As general Poppe met Dick, the latter said:

"You had quite a time with them I see. Who are the children any way?"

"They are escaped slaves, under the curse of Federal Johnson who is governor here. One of them the little girl, is the daughter of the Angelian governor, Robert Vivian."

"Oh, I see," said Poppe. "Well we will see that they don't escape this time. Forward boys to Pounce-Oo-Weelin."

The party of Mandelins who had beside Jack and Jennie a hundred other child prisoners were hurriedly marched across the line, the party travelling many miles before they finally halted. Here a train, composed of cattle cars, drew up at a station, and the child prisoners were sent on board, also Jack and Jennie who showed no fear, at first, until she heard where they were going. It was Jack who asked the question.

"Where are we going?" He asked of a guard at the end of a loaded car, as they started.

"Where are you going? You are going to Pounce-Oo-Weelin."

Was the harsh answer.

"Pounce-Oo-Weelin?" Gasped poor Jennie.

She had heard of the horrors of these child slave pens, now they were to experience them. This made her weep, for she could not help feel afraid.

THEY THEN thought, and by putting their faith in God.
 "There's nothing for us to do but go for them again," said Dick with great determination. "They've fooled us but we have got to get them and that's all there is to it."

High buildings inclosing several acres of ground, all open to the sky, platforms where the sentries walked, a certain distance from the factories on the inside, a line drawn on the ground, which it was death to pass, the whole line of buildings crowded with suffering child slaves, some under rude shelters, that had been made for them, others, with only the sky to shelter them, all ragged, dirty, and half starved. Such was the child slave pens at Pounce-Corr-Woolia. Two other child slaves sat shivering in front of a wretched shelter, made of pork barrels, and cracker boxes, and covered with a bit of ragged tent cloth, and both were ragged and showed plainly the lack of proper food, or feed of any kind, and for one weary day they had lived, in this horrible place, until hope had fled.

"Jack, I guess it's my turn to go after water." Said one of the slaves, wearing a ragged dress, and old broken shoes.

"And after that?"

"Get all you can Jennie." Said Jack who wore a faded red uniform, coat and trousers, rough shoes, and a battered cap, his curly hair long, and tangled while his face was besmeared with dirt, and his hands were nearly black from constant work at smelting.

"And Jack?"

"And Jennie." Continued Jack. "Be as long about it as you can, and find out when the guard changes."

"All right said Jennie, as she went away, carrying a patched and leaky water bucket with her.

"Do you think that we will have the strength to get away with all the slaves Jack?" Whispered one of the child slaves by him.

"We must my dear little boy, we must. The longer we stay here the more impossible becomes our chance of escape."

"And the tunnel?"

"I think we have already dug beyond the factories, and are within a very short distance of the top."

For a long time Jack and several other boy slaves had been engaged, in digging a tunnel, which led from under their wretched shelter, to a point beyond the factories. Their tools had consisted of the iron hoops, taken by stealth from the water bucket they had been given, their places being supplied with strips, torn from their shirts. They were not all in it at the same time, one always being on guard on the outside. They by the power of God had dug this tunnel in one single day. When Jennie returned with the water, for there was little of it, for the spring was almost frozen, he entered the tunnel, while some of the others remained out side.

"Can't tell when the guard is changed he said to Jennie, before he had entered the tunnel tunnel.

"They have got to doing it different every night now, as as we throw us, off the track."

"You had not better dig any more at present." Said Jennie, as Jack disappeared. Before long there was heard the roll of drums on outside the factories, and Jennie arose to see the gates open and a party of soldiers enter.

"Oh good night. Some new officers appointed to take charge of the place." Murmured one of the boy slaves. "That will mean a general inspection, I suppose."

"Call Jack." Whispered Jennie.

"No, No." Answered the little boy. "It would be dangerous to do so."

The gates closed and the child slaves saw that the newcomers were making the rounds of the enclosures. Fortunately some confusion arose in another part of the enclosure at that moment, and the inspector got generally hurried away to see what it meant.

"That was a narrow escape." Said Jennie.

"Yes said the little boy. "It was indeed God's mercy."

"We must make our escape to night for the sake of these poor children, who as I heard were to be slaughtered with us to-morrow."

In another hour the sky had become quite cloudy, and in another two hours it began to snow. There being every signs of a severe blizzard, the guards were changed early, and by ten o'clock, all was still, except for the gentle hiss of the snow on the ground, as it blew about.

Here and there burned a scanty fire, for the night had turned bitterly cold, and a high northwest wind was blowing making the trees shriek and scream like some legions of ghosts in a dark graveyard. It had been snowing for an hour, but so lightly was it falling that Jennie was disappointed, for she wanted it to be a blizzard, which would enable them to escape easily. It was about eleven o'clock, the snow abating somewhat. Jennie sorrow, when the little boy whispered to his companions and the rest that it was time to try and make their escape. Jennie wanted to give up because she was disappointed in the change of the stars, but the little boy said:

"You go first Jack, and take three little girls with you, while my companions will see to the other poor little girls and boys, and I will remain to cover your retreat. Jack and the three little girls dropped into the tunnel and made their way as rapidly as possible toward the end. And the little boy remained on guard at the opening until (Maybe this would surprise you) over six hundred children had passed through the tunnel. Then he dropped into the dark tunnel, with several more little girls who were not afraid either. He crawled on his hands and knees as rapidly as possible. In a short time all the rest of them reached Jack Jennie and other three little girls, who had reached the surface it still snowing very slightly though a few bigger flakes fell on Jennie's face. After all the other children got out, Jack crawled out, and soon all were standing on the outside free. They all crept on their hands and knees for several minutes for a considerable distance, as they were still too near the factories to run any risks. If it had been snowing as hard as Jennie had wanted it at the time they would not have to fear the guards who then could not see them on account of the thick fall it would make.

"Alls well." Presently rang out a voice of one of the sentries. The fugitives presently arose and hurried on through a little stretch of woods, when they were suddenly startled by hearing a number of clattering clattering volleys which rang in quick succession.

"Our escape is discovered." Gasped Jack "Keep me in sight or we will all be lost. These Glandelinians mean no feeling."

The volleys seemed to sound from all along the sentry lines, and the bugle calls were heard summoning the guard. It was now snowing faster again mixed with hard clattering hail, and the night was very dark, favoring escape. The six hundred and twenty fugitives, ran with all their speed, not daring to speak for fear of using their needed strength. Jack kept the lead Jennie being with him, while the rest followed close behind being guided by the sound of his footsteps, for it was now snowing as hard that they could not see anything for fifty yards. On and on they sped through the flying storm of snow, and the darkness, the sound of the volleys and the bugle call stirring them on.

"Halt who goes there?"

Never pausing for an instant, when he heard that startling summons, Jack dashed on headlong. There was a sudden collision, and the boy and man rolled over in the snow. As quick as a flash Jack clutched the throat of the Glandelinian sentry, who had hailed him.

"Not a word out of you, or you are a dead man." He hissed. As he tightened his grip.

"Quick some body search him for a handkerchief, or something to gag him with." Said Jack. "Loosen his belt. We must secure him."

Guided by the sense of touch alone, they found the man's handkerchief and gagged him with it, and taking his belt bound his arms tightly to his sides.

"I see a light ahead." Said Jack/ "It must come from a house, or a station of some sort."

The fugitives hurried forward toward the direction of the light, and soon came to a little station, within which shone a dim light. Entering cautiously about twenty they saw several boys lying upon benches fast asleep, and several little girls. Three buckets were stacked in a corner, and several coats hung upon pegs driven in the wall. Securing the guns and denning some of the clothes Jack woke the sleeping children who were escaped slaves like themselves, and bounding and gagging one of the guards who had appeared at that moment they then fell upon two other men who came in on the scene, who had children with them finely dressed, and Jack forced them to change clothes with some of the child slaves. Jack hastily donned a Glandelinian uniform, throwing his own rag in a cupboard. Jennie also put on some of the new clothes, and secured a funny looking hat which she put on her head. Four other Glandelinians were also forced to change clothes with four other slaves who put them on. The Glandelinians were forced to wear the ragged clothes of the child slaves though it was a tight fit for some of them.

Several of the Glandelinian children were also forced to wear the ragged clothes of some of the child slaves, and then the fugitives went out after binding and gagging them all and locking the door with the key they had seen sticking out of the key hole.

"Hark what's that!" As if Jack suddenly.

"Pursuers." Said one of the little boys. "I heard them before and feared that they would get here before we finished stripping them."

"Get back into the bushes." Said Jack. "Here we must get this fellow out of the way."

It was the work of a few moments to conceal their prisoners behind a clump of bushes, and a the rest of the child fugitives as well. Then Jack took the captured guards' musket, and began walking up and down the road, being half blinded by the clouds of snow which whirled in front of his face. The tramp of horses was now plainly heard, while all the children concealed themselves behind the bushes.

"Halt, and give to the countersign." Cried Jack in a few minutes.

"And who goes there?"

"Friends." Called a voice. "There has been an escape of over two hundred children. Have you seen any of them pass this way?"

"No." Truthfully answered Jack, as a twinkling of lights shone through the pall of snow. The party rode on past the station, without stopping, and disappeared in the darkness and pall of snow. Then the fugitives hurried away, and all night they had journeyed on through that blinding blizzard. It was now early morning, and they had been walking all night, through the whirling snow and were anxious to rest themselves before proceeding farther. At this moment they met a force of child rebels whom they turned the fugitives over to but Jack and Jennie continued on their way, and were coming out on an open ground, when they suddenly beheld a large body of soldiers wearing yellow uniforms, and had they not been carrying the national flag of Glandelinia Jack or Jennie would not have known who they were, and would have run into danger without knowing it. As the Abbeonians generally wore the yellow uniforms Jack and Jennie had at first thought that they were Abbeonians. The men were advancing upon the right, and were several hundred feet distant. They saw the fugitives and seemed to suspect they were escaping child slaves.

"We've got to run for it." Muttered Jack, taking the lead. "There is a river frozen over with thick ice." Gasped Jennie. "Let's make for that at all speed."

Toward it as toward a haven of refuge sped the fugitives in hot haste. Several shots were fired at them, but the bullets only passed over their heads. Then a dozen men started from the ranks in the hope of intercepting them. They had the long leg of the triangle while the fugitives had the short one. Suddenly the horse man was seen to leave the head of the column and dash forward. The soldiers set up a shout, and Jack turning his head quickly saw the Glandelinians dash toward them.

"Run, Jennie Run." He panted. "I will attend to this fellow."

Whipping out his revolver he hastily examined it, halted for an instant only, and fired at the soldier. The bullet missed, and struck the horse full in the breast, and he stumbled and fell, throwing his rider headlong. And he went sprawling on his back in the deep snow. In a few moments the Glandelinian half arose and shouted something to the others. Presently two more riders left the column and spurred their steeds at full speed toward the child fugitives. The latter were within a few hundred feet of the river, and it would be cruel to be overtaken now.

"You run on Jennie, and take your chances." Cried Jack. "I will look after these fellows."

Jack ran behind Jennie, for a few yards, and then stepped as the horse men came sweeping down upon them.

"Crack, bang."

Two shots rang out and the fugitive fell. He had fallen just as the shots were fired, and was not hurt, and lying flat on the ground he raised himself slightly, and fired to two shots which were almost simultaneous, and both took effect. One horse was struck in the breast, and the other in the head, and both fell sprawling, throwing their riders. In an instant Jack was on his feet and speeding toward the river. One of the fallen Glandelinians rose to his knees and fired the bullet carrying away Jack's hat. Jack was now at the river bank Jennie a few feet ahead. On came the foot soldiers, and then another horseman took up the chase.

Jack dashed on the firm ice and plowed through the deep snow covering it, and made for the other shore, and when the pursuers were within fifty feet Jack fired his remaining pistol shots, and then drew his other gun. The enemy being much more numerous than any of the fleeing children. Two Glandelinians fell, and the others uttering yells dashed forward. Jack looked back and saw that the horse man had urged his steed on over the ice.

"Look out for that man, don't let him get too near." Said Jennie.

"Crack, Crack. Crash-h-h-h-h. Ker-plunk. The horse from his weight caused the ice to give way, and both went crashing through into the icy water. A yell suddenly followed, and half a dozen shots were fired from the bank. Fortunately they dropped just before that, or they would have been hit. A bullet cut off a lock of Jennie's beautiful hair, as she let herself drop. One of the foot soldiers was nearer to the escaping child slaves than the others, and so Jack turned and fired. The bullet struck the man in the head, and he fell with a thud, his musket flying in the air, and when dropping on the hard ice was suddenly discharged the snow sent flying in Jack's face. Jack had one more shot left in his revolver, and he was about to fire when Jennie called out to him until they neared the bank. The whirling snow was nearly blinding them, for it was now snowing more fiercely than ever, but the fugitives were bent upon their escape. Jack now turned and fired at one of the leaders. It was a well aimed shot and every thing depended upon it. The ball struck the man in the middle of the forehead and he fell up sprawling in the deep snow. In another moment the two fugitives were on the bank. Clapping five cartridges into his pistols, almost all he had, he cried:

"Go back or I'll serve you the same as your leader."

"Won't do it." Was the answer.

"Gosh here comes a lot of Glandelinians." Cried Jack.

A party of men in gray were suddenly seen scampering across an open field, and seeing the five fugitives the Glandelinians at once fired at random, and giving voice to fierce yells they dashed forward. The fugitives made for a strip of woods not more than a hundred feet distant, and reached it quickly. In a few minutes they reached a half snow covered railroad track. It was a single line road and seemed very little traveled, and as dead grass had grown between the ties, and the rails were old and rusty. Shots whistled over their heads as they stood for an instant debating on which way to turn. At a venture, they turned to the right, and dashed on for a hundred feet or more. At that instant they saw standing on the track not fifty feet distant, a large band of hands.

It had evidently been left there for a short time.

"Ah we are saved." Cried Jack leaping forward. He placed Jennie on the platform and then sprang on it himself, and gave the crank a few whirles. In an instant the car came to a downgrade, the wheels beginning to revolve with great rapidity.

"Oh Jack we are lost." Cried Jennie. "See there are enemies on both sides of the road."

Suddenly from a clump of bushes along side the tracks there rose a party of men wearing gray uniforms. As the car came rushing down the line they threw their muskets to their shoulders, and aimed at the poor children. Jack let go of the crank, drew his revolver and fired several shots. The enemy returned the volleys and bullets whistled close to their heads and one struck Jennie's ribbon and carried it away. They had a certain advantage over the Glandelinians as they were in motion and the enemy were not. From both sides of the road a fire of bullets was poured upon the fugitives, but on the car and although shots flew all about them they were not struck. Before long they had passed out of range the car still speeding onward. Then they came to a level stretch, and the speed of the car began to slacken but Jack seized the crank again and they shot forward at the rate of twenty miles an hour. There were no enemies in sight now, and the snow was making a blinding pall. They had gone at least ten miles when suddenly as they flew across a little bridge several Glandelinians rushed out upon them, from the signal house and yelled throwing up his musket to his shoulder.

"Halt on there, you crazy christian children."

"Never." Said Jack whipping out his pistol. There was one bullet left in it. Two simultaneous reports rang out sounding as one.

The bridge tender fell in his tracks and Jack was unharmed save safe a for a slight scalp wound. The car continued on its way, and as they neared a town, and houses seen daily through the pall of snow became more frequent, they decided to abandon it.

Jack exerted all his strength to lift the hand car off the rails one wheel at a time and left it alongside the tracks. Then they started on feet toward the city. For a long time they were not questioned, although they met and were accosted by several Glandelinians. At last after entering the city they were approached by an officer in uniform who said:

"Look you here, where are you going?"

But he changed his mind, and made his apologies when he saw the disguises of the captured boy scouts uniform the fugitives had been on believing that they were Glandelinian boy scouts. But the fugitives were still in danger for even if they were not suspected of being escaped children, they would be forced into the Glandelinian service.

For some time no one paid any attention to them but at last when they were almost out of the city they were suddenly met by a large party led by an officer.

"Here where're you going?" Demanded the officer.

"No place but home." Said Jennie.

"I don't believe you." Said the officer.

"And we ain't lying." Said Jack.

"So you ain't lying. Well I don't know about saying that you are lying. Are you brother and sister?"

At first Jack and Jennie were caught by this question, and didn't know what to say, but Jack recovering himself answered:

"What do you expect we are going together for? As sweethearts?"

"You do not look as if you were brother and sister." Said the officer.

"I've a mind to place you under arrest."

"Aw the heck. Let them go." Said a fellow officer. "I believe that they are some of the children of Glandelinia. Can't you see how thr they are dressed?"

"Dressing doesn't matter." Said the other officer. "They may be in disguise. What gets me suspicious is that I've seen that little girl before somewhere. She is also too pretty to be some child of a Glandelinian parent."

"What's the difference, let them go any way." Said the other officer.

"He boy will know the difference. And we can get away with it. Come on we are waiting time."

But the officer could not be convinced and ordered the three of the soldiers to arrest Jennie and Jack.

"Aw shucks, if we are going to monkey with such nonsense as this, we will never get to where we are going." Said the other officer. "If they are escaped child slaves they will be taken up by some other party. Come on, don't bother with them or we will be late and miss our good time. Come on, for the love of Mike."

At the persuasion of his fellow officer he let the matter drop, and continued on their way, letting the two children go on their way.

For four hours the fugitives had journeyed on traveling by unfrequented roads, and after a while they came to another track and hearing that some trains run on it they waited until one came, though they were told by the man who sold the tickets that there were not many trains running on account of the snowstorm. They had to wait two hours for a train. Then as it drew up they got on and as they started out they remained silent. As mile after mile was left behind then Jennie began to have those thoughts of her home which she had thought she would never see again. Now and then the train stopped at a wayside station but for a short time only. Forty miles had been traveled, when the train suddenly at a little station in the woods almost hidden by a pull of snow.

Many of the passengers put their heads out of the windows to see what was the matter. The station agent, came hurriedly forward, with a piece of yellow paper in his hands.

"What you stop us for?" Asked the conductor.

"Because there is escaping Christians on your train."

"Is that so?"

"Yes and I have orders to stop the train and arrest em."

"Yes I have two of them, two soldiers in our national uniforms, and the rest are five women and seventeen children."

"All right, take em out."

Now there happened to be two Methodist ministers in Glandelinian uniforms and two of their wives and five children aboard, four boys and one girl. By this time there was a great deal of excitement, and the agent entered the first car, caught sight of the Methodist ministers and the wives and five children and said:

"These two men two women, and five children, are escaped Christians, these ministers with the two women and five children are wanted."

The ministers began to protest but no one would listen to them. A dozen men seized them and the Glandelinian women and children and huddled them out of the car in short order. The pursuers and the wives and children were bound and left in the station, the agent telegraphing to the chief guard at Penness-Gee-Wailla prison when that the prisoners had been retaken. The train now continued on its way no one suspecting that the ten real escaped prisoners were on board. On and on rushed the train until many miles had been placed between the fugitives and their pursuers. At last all of a sudden there was a shock a grinding crash, a terrible upheaval and an awful rocking and then rolling over upon its side down an embankment throwing its passengers hither and thither. A broken rail at a dangerous part of the road, where the snow was deeper had caused a wreck, and now the exploding of the boiler added a new horror to the calamity. Jack found himself lying at the bottom of an embankment unhurt but with his clothes badly besmeared with dirt and snow, and his nerves somewhat unstrung. Near him by the light of the burning debris for the steam clouds was making it dark as night now, the debris being set on fire by the explosion of the boiler, were two men stone dead. Jack soon discovered that Jennie was bruised and her dress was literally torn from her. Despite the fiercely pouring snow, the fire spread at an alarming rate and many poor creatures were burned in sight of those who would have rescued them, but were driven back by the fierce heat of the flames.

After Jack and Jennie had recovered from the shock, they discovered another handcar and after riding in it for several hours neared a railway station. Then they got off and walked along the tracks, watching in every direction like a chicken hawk and soon was on the station platform but as there was a blockade of trains on account of the wreck they left the station, and seeing two saddled horses they ran toward them leaped and set off at a gallop down a road leading toward the Pandemonium asylum. Looking back they discovered that they were being pursued, and Jack got his revolver ready to discharge at an instant's notice. It was quite late when they ducked their pursuers, and they at once hurried on although they were tired enough to drop down by the wayside and go to sleep. They were compelled to do so at last, hiding themselves in a thickly wooded barn, where they almost immediately went to sleep. They did not wake until late in the day, and then the sound of firing aroused them. They arose cautiously and crept on their hands and knees toward the door of the barn and peered out toward track. A train of cars was rushing toward them and from every car shells were exploding filling the air with fire and smoke. On dashed the train and presently it reached a weak bridge, when it crashed flat into the icy river carrying the frail structure with it. They were on the right side of the bridge having crossed it unobservedly the night before, just previous to their looking for a place to sleep. When the bridge went down the two children hurried forward, and presently saw a large body of child rebels, and soldiers also in the Angelinian, and Abbieannian uniforms. In a few minutes they reached the child rebels and the soldiers in purple uniforms, and joined them in their search for the surprise of poor little Jennie her sisters were with the child rebels and who can tell of the happiness of the reunion of the saintly children.

THE BATTLE OF LAWDALE

Violet and Jennie's sisters were delighted over Jennie's rescue and for many minutes were around Jack thanking him and proclaiming that they were his friends for ever. The child rebels who were led by a boy by the name of a Angelinie were on the advance in the blind, snowstorm when they still were to rescue some children held in a prison at Lawdale. The number of the rebels being boys and girls together were about five thousand six hundred, while five hundred soldiers were with them, besides two hundred Abbieannians. There were five hundred boys on horses and six six hundred and ninety five girls, being in fact a part of Jack's cavalry he in truth being the leader of the main army, and this being only a fragment the assistant leader telling him that "3333 23,333 of them had already reached the outskirts of the town of Lawdale."

The assistant leader of the child rebels looked very handsome in his dark purple uniform and his yellow sashers like a Mexican. Violet and her sisters had seen many a man of the officers of the enemy, but Jack's sabre was the longest and seemed the most splendid. So one of the biggest school boys who had seen in school, being captives and was sergeant in the child rebel army. Hearing the town of Lonsdale Jack saw immediate danger of an ambush, and that they were hearing it. He sooner had the child rebels formed into parallel lines, when suddenly a large party of Glandelinians came rushing forward armed to the teeth. They were Dick Slater and his band who had not given up the chase and were resolved to recapture Jack and Jennie at all costs. With a yell they rushed forward toward Jack and his force the first most leader snorting with anger. The nearest boys and girls opened fire at once while Jack drew his sabre raised it above his head, and struck it the Glandelinian a blow across his head that sent him reeling to the one who covered ground twelve dozen feet away. The Glandelinians were all also cut clean off and was also dying for his throat was also cut by the blow. The other Glandelinians were enraged, and as fifteen hundred joined them they fixed bayonets and made a headlong rush.

The whole line of rebels gave way before this desperate onslaught, but Jack seeing himself overwhelmed, he layed about him furiously and cut many down with his sabre, while other child rebels forces who were arriving on the scene rushed forward in time to repulse the assailants pouring a withering fire upon the Glandelinians. However smarting over the death of their leaders and one hundred others and the capture of seventeen others of their companions the surviving Glandelinians howling with rage redoubled the exertions of their attack making a frightful onslaught that increased with varying fortunes on both sides until the rebels seemed to be worsted having lasted over 1,000 in killed already while 2,345 were wounded. The Glandelinians were bent on capturing not only Jack and Jennie but Violet and her sisters also as the attack of the soldiers increased with great violence thousands of the men fell in that frightful onslaught.

"GUARD THE DEAR LITTLE GIRLS MORE THAN YOU WOULD YOUR LIFE." Shouted Jack amid the infernal din of the fiercest of child labor battles.

"We will get reinforcements soon." The child rebels under Zimmer's banner arrived with 10,000 boys armed with several cannons and the Glandelinians were moved down in hundreds. Jennie screamed at this frightful slaughter and her sisters were amazed at the activity of the child soldiers, who were rushing to defend a stone fence which their comrades were defending to the last against overwhelming numbers. The struggle for the fence was terrific but every attempt to scale it was met with horrible loss. Jack's comrade had fallen off his head which was exposed to the cold wintry winds, and his eyes glistened with a fire that were never known to have before as he shouted with all his might:

"HERE COME ALIENS ARMY WITH MORE GIRLS AND BOYS. HURRAH GO INTO THE RAGGALS HAIR HARD BOYS AND WE WILL BURNLY WIN!"

Slater's Glandelinians advancing with a rush made a fifth desperate attempt to cross the wall with shouts and exhortations that shook the air and see fierce because the onslaught and so great the pressure that the defenders were forced to give way, but in the meantime they had mined the fence and as soon as the Glandelinians had advanced over it the leaders exploded the mines and the Glandelinians were downed by the thousands in that single outburst. The survivors were panic stricken, but the main column were still pressing, hard behind and as the child rebels lost hopes of retaking the wall just then and the enemies' storm of fire increased, and was to these exposed to it. Bleared eyes and revengeful were the surviving leaders, and struck a deadly hammer blow against the remaining lines of rebels who had resisted them with greater violence. The Glandelinians poured in fearful volleys and tried to force Jack's position by a wooden fence with the means of battering rams but every attempt was repulsed the assailants leaving the ground strewn with their dead and wounded. The Glandelinians were infuriated by these bloody repulses, and after an attempt was made to scale the fence with ladders, without success the Glandelinians brought their own artillery forward and blew the fence into the air only to set a withering fire from the rebels who themselves charged in fearful numbers.

Above the discharge of cannon and musketry above the shouts of the combatants could be heard the cheering voice of Jack's leader arousing his forces to a pitch of enthusiasm. The onslaught of the child rebel army caused some of the Glandelinian forces to yield as Slater was badly wounded and had seventeen horses shot under him.

As the Glandelinians were about to repulse their assailants a force of boy savarly appeared having been aroused at seeing the battle and they did go into the Glandelinians as hard as they could spanning fire upon the enemy their headlong rush tearing huge gaps in the ranks of the Glandelinians. The savarly troop however were contending against overwhelming numbers and were soon forced to give way under a galling fire, their leader having been shot down. Just then Angelina Arenburg and Annie Arenburg arrived with a large detachment of artillery and infantry, and as the two Arenburgs were getting their artillery into position to fire upon the enemy the infantry was ordered to charge. The rebels with bayonets before them on a line with their breasts followed their gallant leader. The resistance of the Glandelinians was just as stubborn as the rebels but they had to give way as the hedge of bayonets were too much for them. They slowly retreated despite the efforts of their leaders to rally them.

"Forward you savards." cried the leader who had taken Slater's place.

"Forward and fight the enemy child rebels for your lives."

"Follow them boys." cried Angelina Arenburg as she urged her whole force to the attack. "Down with the brutes. Liberty forever."

The whole force of rebels now pressed forward against the main line of the Muscic lines who made a final stand without success, as the rebels were too great in numbers and artillery and they fell back panic stricken flying in every direction. At the summit of a hill the Glandelinians made their last stand and the child rebels coming on saw that to take the hill would cost them awful losses, but nevertheless they were determined and up they charged. The Glandelinians swept the ground with terrible carnage but the rebels though they fell in hundreds charged up the hill and in fifteen minutes carried it sending the survivors down the other side in a demoralized condition. They offered no further resistance but continued their retreat. Three of their leaders were dead and over fifteen were wounded. The child rebels went on but as they were halted as they could not go any further on account of a barrier of Glandelinians that were advancing to repel them. The enemy had lost 4,760, in killed and over 13,456 in wounded. The rebels lost: at over 8,899 in killed and over 34,569 in wounded and missing.

THE TYPOH

THE TYPOH

In the mountain Robert Vivian and his brother had heard of the great child labor battle and at once with a troop of his soldiers went to claim his daughters whom he got in short order yanking the rebels for protecting them and telling them if they saw help of any kind to send a note to him. The child Jennie who was nearly as sweet as Violet and her sisters had learned a sacred hymn and as the two governors wanted to hear it. So he asked Kindernine to assemble all the officers into the quarters. When all the Angelinian officers arrived he had her summoned before him. How sweet were the childish tones as she sang the beautiful hymn of "Can a boy forget his mother's prayer." All sat quiet and listened. How little did Hansen and his brother or any of the officers imagine that they were listening to Jennie's last hymn on their lands. Little did they or any of the Angelinian officers by the celestial ones really understand that Jennie would see death that very day. Never again would they hear that bird like voice, in the sweetest echoes sound that beautiful hymn in their ears unless by the great mercy of God God they hear it among the angels. Hansen's very soul was or seemed to be touched as he heard the words of dear little Jennie unconscious herself to earth, but when the dear little child reached the fifth every single word which fell on their sharp ears with distinctness that was awfully strange they were moved to tears.

When she finished she said:

"I have a strange feeling that I may see God very soon."

Hansen said that he hoped that she would, but neither she or the officer generals then hit of it by death. It was shortly before two o'clock and Hansen was writing a message in his headquarters, when he was startled by a strange frightful thunderous roaring sound and by a strange sudden black darkness. Violet and her sisters were playing outside in the slushy snow when they saw the blackness covering the sky and looking toward the horizon saw a light that made them scream with fright and dismay.

A hideously, leaking cloud funnel whirling around with the rear of a million cannon was advancing straight toward Calverline and screaming with terror they made a dash for shelter. Hanson startled as he was rushed to one of the windows and seeing the same thing called his brother to come and see what it was. The clouds seemed to be filled with roaring flames of horrible color the storm cloud resembling the glewy pillar cloud shooting out of Mt. Vesuvius in the eruption that destroyed the three cities near her base. Robert hearing the dreadful din and detecting the smell of sulphur in the air ran to the window.

"We are in for it, for its a spiral typhoon he said. He cried. Little Jennie who was outside saw the same storm and being ignorant of its on reality went out side to look at it. However before any of them could save themselves the storm broke with all its violence into the city of Calverline leveling the houses to the ground and slaying over 10,000 in one single moment. On it it tore toward the angelinian governors headquarters rending the wooden houses to pieces like if they were mere dust. A terrible scene of confusion ensued. Thousands who saw the approach of the deadly storm made a headlong dash for the cellars.

At last the storm hit Hansons headquarters which was shattered into a mass of terrible ruins, and Jennie threw up her arms with a scream and fell flat on her face as a tone of wreckage bore her down mangled and bleeding. The outburst of the storm was horrible and so black came the darkness that no one could see even the snow on the ground, while all the heavens seemed to rend to hellish horror by the terrible din of the storm. The houses went to pieces with a roar like the discharge of thousands of muskets with which increased with the violence of the wind. Hanson and his brother escaped the storm of wreckage by diving into the cellar but twelve of his soldiers were killed and the Vivian girls were caught up by the wind and tossed about like footballs until they were driven head first into a snow bank which saved them from being killed. The storm lasted five minutes with all its force then gradually subsided the sky again being filled with the terrible glow while there came, despite the cold a cloud burst of rain and hail.

Jennie who was still alive was extracted from the wreckage and taken into a building that was too low to be hit by the storm, and Hansons first impulse was to send for a doctor, and he sent a guard after one while the wounded and killed soldiers were also taken from the wreckage which was as flat as a postage stamp. It was some time before a doctor could be brought and soon his kind face was bending over the wounded child who was dying, and he did his very best to relieve her terrible sufferings, but alas alas, his desperate efforts were certainly useless.

He was obliged at length to go shaking his head sorrowfully. A few minutes after the doctor left, Jennie called her weeping friends around her and said:

"I'm going to Jesus, and mama in heaven now, and I hope you my dear friends to stay good so that we will see each other again in heaven."

Then after kissing and blessing them all, and embraced in turn, Jennie with a happy smile on her face gasped for breath, and then with a heavenly cry of joy, long to be remembered:

"OH I SEE GOD." Dropped her golden hair on the beautiful white pillow dead, but the smile still overspread her face, and she seemed brightly transfigured. On reaching the bedside of poor little Jennie the sight that met the eyes of the two governors, was enough to startle any one. Five little forms lay there seeming to be dead for they had fainted away in overpowering sorrow by Jennies side and it was three hours before Violet and her sisters recovered to tell their astonished father what had happened. The storm was still raging the rain having turned to a seemingly cloud burst of snow, and the wind was still blowing a hurricane. Within an hour Jennies little body was laid in a beautiful coffin and buried right in back of the ruined headquarters and hymns and prayers were recited and sung for a whole hour.

Then with wreaths of roses and lilies in their hands said a long prayer for the dead. It was hard to put any decorations on her little grave so it was snowing so hard but they hardly eyed no attention to this. How beautiful and peaceful, a her grave looked decorated by so many flowers. Tender hands with the wreaths of flowers which speak to all hearts of the resurrexion of the body and life everlasting for rich righteous souls.

"Can a boy forget his mothers prayers,
I Though she has wandered,
Its down the path of death and alone,
But Mothers prayers are heard the same

How these words resound in the ears of those mourners as they bent over Jennies grave. The last song she had sung on earth. Jennies grave was at the rear of the ruined headquarters beneath some tall oak trees where in summer many kinds of birds built their nests and many sparrows now sing in to her. A small white cross was put at the head of Jennies grave and Robert Vivian wrote an inscription at the feet which was nearly hidden now:

"To the sweet memory of Jennie St. Clair, who was killed by the typhoon on the day of November 26th 1911.

Aged six years, going on seven.
Lived in peace before her cruel mother was killed in 1899 by a typhoon leaving her an orphan.

In the center of the beautiful cross there were other words and these were in gold. These words were beloved and always honored by the two governors and the Vivian girls, the beautiful words whose cadence falls like music on their ears like bells at evening pealing, and point to the land of everlasting happiness and life were:

"OH I SEE GOD."

Violet and her sisters left the grave weeping as if their hearts would break and the two governors and the rest with downcast heads went to seek for some shelter from the terrible storm that was raging.

Several days after the storm Violet and her sisters had reached with the permission of their father joined the child rebels again, and reaching Aramburgs army on November 29 saw that they were having another battle with their enemies, and a severe one at that. Jacks force which was not in action as yet were being formed into line with the formation of an angle, and the Glandelinians of column no rearing with the indignation made a charge upon the angle line who fought back and fought for all there was in them. They were like chaff however for the more numerous and heavier forces of Glandelinians bore down upon them with fixed bayonets and drove them back steadily. But now several regiments came to support them and joined in the fray, and in hardly no time at all the child rebels found that they were having a harder fight than they supposed they would. Then came a furious charge by the Glandelinians and after a stubborn battle the child rebels were finally checked with great losses. But more and more of the reserves arrived and now the valley firing increased furiously, and in the series of hand to hand fights the Glandelinians were finally overwhelmed and gave way but the battle did not cease until night put a stop to it over 10,000 having fallen on the side of the Glandelinians. As the child rebels were going into camp after the battle, with the intention of resuming their attack on Lawndale the next morning when one of the sentries approached Jack and said after saluting:

"One of your spies has come back and wishes to see you right away."

"Tell him to come." Was all that Jack Evans said.
When the spy came before him he saluted a 4 and:
"From a barred window of one of the child slave kennels in California this note dropped on my head and fell to the ground and picking it up I found that it was addressed to our camp."
And he handed the note to Jack.
The enemy is well protected." He went on A "And it would be running into the jaws of death for any spies now. I narrowly escaped myself, and had been pursued closely for days. I could not learn much from them
The child labor conditions are simply terrible."
Jack opened the note and read the following:

Jack staggered against a tree when he read the startling note, and Angelina Arambur sitting up at this moment saw the alarming look in his face suspected that something was up. She took the note out of Jack's hand, and read it aloud. At first it was a terrible shock to her but instead of being alarmed she said to several of her leaders who she stopped when they were passing;

"The enemy have thousands of children in the prisons at Lamsdale and I would like to send someone right away to learn where these places are so that I can attack them in the morning."

Violat coming forward followed by her sisters cried suddenly:

Angelina: let me go. I can find out where that place is."

"You!" Gasped Arenburg while her officers gave a start. "Why Violat they / love to kill little children, and treat them cruel and so would you risk it among the murderous butchers?"

"But my Guardian angel will protect me," Pouted Violat.

"Oh please, please Angelina! let me go. I'm not afraid a bit. IF YOU are not I'll go any way."

"Oh I'll take good care of myself, never fear," laughed Violet showing a brace of pistols. "I'm a girl, but that id don't mean that I can't shoot."

"Be then my dear angel friend, and may God bless and protect you," said Angelinian Arenburg.

One hour later Violet was within sight of the factorien which she saw surrounded by a large force of Ulandlanders. She was also instead of Armburg, and he "I'd like to tell my papa about this," she said to herself. "But then he would do something worse than what may be the cause of a war. I'll let her do the work, and if she gets worried I'll bring my father down upon the Ulandlanders to her rescue!"
Violet had to avoid the sentinels when she reached the camp and works, for it was said if she she was once caught they would surely murder her no matter how sweet, beautiful and innocent child she was. She soon came near several sentinels, and she crouched down behind a large tent.
When the sentinels passed she crawled along in the same direction, and when coming near one of the tents she hid in a bush. She didn't dare to breathe f or fear that she might be discovered. Here sentinels passed, right close to her shouldering their muskets. Keeping well out of sight, Violet crept on looking this way and that. Some near- sistent men were walking their beat and when approaching right in her path. Looking toward the sentinels, she was close to her now she saw that it was Armburg the great chief of her master. Behind the approaching sentinel she saw a line of breastworks and long lines of white tents, and a house with a red-wooded floor flanking over it.

red crossed flag floating over it.

In the far distance were the factories she had wanted to get to but saw no way as yet. She stared in surprise at the familiar sentinel and quietly set out of his way. When the familiar sentry went on she proceeded on her way to the general tent first. Reaching it she sat or rather hid behind some bushes murmuring it. She heard all that he said to his fallen officer and when they retired she went into his tent secured his plans and started on her way toward the prison-like factories, across the hills, and down the hills.

reached a little girl's cell. But suddenly several Glandelinians discovered her and thinking her a young tiger gave chase firing several shots. Fortunately one of the glandelinians slipped and tripped and his fellow comrades and in the confusion he was saved. She ran the line of tents and branchworks and when she came beside the general's general's tent unfortunately she tripped and a twig broke with a loud snap. Several sentinels heard the noise.

"She's gone there!" One of them shouted.

Seeing her sister escape they fired a tremendous volley, a bullet striking Violet in the left hand, but leaving a painful wound. However as Violet was too near the rebel army the Glandelinians did not care to pursue any farther and cursing and swearing they returned to their main lines. Violet presumed her way and reaching a little brook she took a drink of the icy water and wiped a handkerchief around her wounded hand and continued on her way. She soon saw the tents of the child rebels located in the darkness. She ran but suddenly came a sharp stern voice:

"HALT IN THE NAME OF ANGELINA. WHO GOES THERE, AND GIVE THE COUNTERSIGN."

Violet saw dimly in the darkness a tall Angelinian soldier standing several yards from her with leveled musket. He could not see her well at such a distance and could not tell whether it was a man or a child. "Who are you, Violet?" "I am Violet. I am a child. I am in the enemy's camp and know where the factories are. It is this the camp of Angelina's army of child rebels?" The guard suddenly uttered a snarl. "This then is not the child rebel camp. You come in the wrong direction. They are five miles east of here."

"Thank you," said Violet and saluting the officer she sped on her way like a flitting spirit.

A day passed after the boy spy dropped the note in the battle and gave it to his assistant spy and their hearts were fluttering with hope that the rescue of the poor children would soon be made.

At seven o'clock the next day a sudden sound of incessant firing broke the stillness and the poor children listened in awe as they worked. All that morning it was heard and queer reports sounded incessantly. HERE AND THERE HINDLING WITH SCREAMS IN THE TOWN. The child rebels came shouting forward with their artillery.

Soon the factories were crowded with the frightened children and men swearing Glandelinians who were trying to control the panic. The distant "boom boom" of cannon could be heard despite the din. Suddenly a whole mass of children in one of the buildings midst was a screaming shell. It fell in their midst and exploded with terrible violence killing a score of the frightened child prisoners and by the fragments of the shell. The men killed were torn from their places toward the prisons and the distant boom of cannon was soon hurrying away from the town. It was lucky that the shell burst before it reached the factories then the fragments shattered several glass windows of the guards sleeping rooms, and tore part of the roof away. The shell was now coming like hail, and one house after another was set on fire by the frequent explosions. One of the children saw another shell coming toward their prison, and it did not explode quick enough before reaching the factory. It crashed against a wall and upset a table which had a large lighted lamp on it, sending the table sprawling and the lamp to the floor with a crash, then exploded tearing a large hole in the opposite wall and wrecking some of the machinery sending fragments in all directions.

The lamp also exploded when it struck the floor the oil splashing on the floor which started a fire at once. The fire spread as fast as it would on cotton, and as the door to their cell was locked two little girls could not get out. The fire burned fast and furious as the building it did was like tinder.

"Oh Please dear God save us," cried the little girl when the smoke began to pour into the cell. All the other children were screaming in terror. Another shell crashed through an open window and rolled into the burning burning room and exploded with a deafening report.

The ceiling and walls saved in by the shock and the wreckage began to burn like a furnace. In vain did the little girl and boy try to force open the door it was useless.

The burning door of the burning room now gave way and fell into the hall in front of the cell the little girl and boy were in an scattering the blazing embers in all directions. The falling of timbers in the burning machine room made a tremendous noise as the remains of parts of the walls fired burn faster and more furious.

The walls of the hall nearest that room was now smoking, and places where the plaster had fallen off small flames flared in and out preceded by little clouds of black smoke.

love you and do not wish to see any harm come to you

ANOTHER shell crashed into the cell, and rolled into the burning room and in exploding nearly made a part of the ceiling of the hall cave in. The little girl narrowly escaped the falling timbers, but the shock of the explosion had broken the lock of the cell door, and seeing a chance to escape the fire they ran out and from the prison, but first free of freeing the children by means of a key that fitted every lock, which which they had found. Then all mingled with the fleeing fugitives in the street. The Glandelinian chief guard of the city, now appeared and made hundreds of the children follow him. This Glandelinian came of the burning town, and shells marvelously, and took refuge in a cavern, a mile away after all day walking. The children were forced to go into the cavern first the Glandelinian and several others following after them.

It was nine o'clock in the morning when a sudden and series of yells and reports of muskets startled all who were in that cave. Then they were surprised to see scores of child rebels drop in a struggle which none of them never forgot. Suddenly it seemed as if the lanes in front of the cavern, were swarming with furious graycoats. They commanded to the man in the cave to bring the children out.

The order was obeyed.

"He you little or christian fools, who follow the traitorous belief though thought by thy enemy parents thou shalt die. IT is impious folly and thine own lives are going to be put out of you on account of this. Away captain with these fools. It is a good deed to rid the world of all christian children."

The children were seized by the stalwart Glandelinians and roughly shaken. Again they were wickedly shaken and roughly borne away to where the execution was to take place. The rear of the distant battle could still be heard, and some of the frightened children could see the awful flash of muskets, and as they were discharged in terrible volleys.

At the place where the execution was to take place the child ran were brought, and soon it was begun. A little girl was first brought out of the line of children, and was cruelly cut by awful knives.

Her life blood trickled gently but in streams, from her sliced body, and as she bowed her head, and her pretty curls fell forward. Then the murderers ripped her body open, and she threw up her bloody arms and with a cry of:

"I SEE GOD!"

fell happily backward dead but an unearthly happiness overspread her face and she seemed to a figure. The Glandelinians next brought the other children forward. The rear of the distant firing was steadily increasing every moment. Some of these children was a boy and girl, Violet and her sisters had conspired to try and save from death. The boy feared death no more than a soldier would, and as they cut his throat, he sank limply to the ground with a happy smile on his face. He cried:

"Oh I see Christ, Oh I see God!"

Then with a happy smile that was very touching he died a very happy death. The blood itself which flowed from the child's throat formed a puddle in the snow. Three other children were strangled cruelly, and as they pit the awful checking a light of joy shone in their bulging eyes, and their tongues which were protruding seemed to have a brilliant red color. They died quickly and though it was awful suffering, they died a very happy death. They also seemed transfixed and a happy smile overspread their faces. Now there issued an order that ten children were to be hung. The children were a little scared, but a strange strange happiness seemed to tear at their hearts, as they were dragged to the trees, where they were to be hung. The ropes were quickly brought, and while listening to the conflict which was still raging, and seeing nearer threw the ropes over the highest branches, and at the lower ends made a noose. One by one the ten children who were looking with a happy face toward heaven, was placed under the trees, and the nooses placed around their tender necks. The sight of their faces in their unearthly happiness, thrilled many of the other children and they would gladly submit, when their time came. They yearned piteously for eternal happiness, and the chance to see God.

At last the ten Glandelinians pulled down on their side of the ropes, and soon the strangled children, with their little tongues sticking all the way out, and their eyes bulging, as if they would fall out, were drawn to the top of the branches, and the Glandelinians held on the ropes and watched the children, who were dangling in mid air. Their suffering was unbearable and they could not help from struggling as they were of ten tender years. With one more struggle, a faint one, they laid their heads on their breasts, their beautiful hair fell forward and they died.

Though blood flowed from their noses and mouths and ears, no ghastly color appeared on their faces, although their tongues still seemed about to fall out. They seemed more transfixed than the others. Albin, and a strange unearthly hulk appeared on their heads. Four more children were also strung up, but not as high, and their bodies were slashed unmercifully, with ugly knives, their bodies cut open, their hearts cut out, and sliced to small bits like mince meat. They were also transfixed. A pretty little girl was now brought forward and placed under a tree, and was quickly strung up. The poor child could not stand this cruel suffering if she had to save her soul. The choking was fearful. She tried to pull away the rope, and unfasten it, and struggled fiercely, her eyes bulging, and her tongue protruding as far as it could go. The Gladelinians took delight in the evident suffering of their helpless victims. At last the child with a pleading look that was touching, hung limply, her eyes seeming to fall out of their sockets. Another minute would decide the child's fate. Just as she laid her head downward, and as she stretched her bare arms toward the onlookers with a most pleading look, there was suddenly a shower of shots, and a considerable body of child rebels rose up on all sides of the wicked Gladelinians, completely surrounding them. These holding the little girl's rope let go suddenly, and quickly unloading their muskets flared away. But the child rebels with a terrific yell rushed upon them and a bloody hand to hand fight ensued. They used the muskets as clubs and pistols and revolvers were fired at close range. The child rebels saved nearly all the children except the little girl who was still in the hands of the Gladelinians who in their excitement unintentionally let the little girl fall down. The skirmish was a hot but a short one, and though the remaining party of child rebels were routed in all directions, they managed to rescue all the children except the little girl.

The poor little girl was just recovering when she was taken away by the Gladelinians. The Gladelinians who had secured the little girl sped away on toward a house in the far distance the rear of the distant battle and the awful crash of muskets and rifles sounding so awfully near made them hasten their steps but suddenly in their path a row of handsome looking pit pirates, but that they were Christians, and their bravery made them look like that.

"What you child murderers, where are you going?" yelled the leader.

"Forward men rescue the innocent child!"

The Gladelinians were furious at thus being harassed by the Angolians and fought like maddened demons. They clubbed many of the Christians down, and slew many more, and after making a brave breach escaped with the little girl. But the Angolians followed furiously and resolved to rescue the child they all took aim and fired. Many of the Gladelinians were dead but as speed the survivors toward a large wood, and finished it only to fall into another ambush of a large detachment of child rebels who made a sudden rush and one of them grabbed away the little girl and disarmed the second and bound them hand and foot.

"Hang them to the tree!" yelled the leader.

Soon the Gladelinians were strung up and the child rebels dashed away to escape from a large body of Gladelinians who were pursuing them hotly. But another detachment appeared on one side and seeing the child rebels dashing away, with a rescued child opened a clattering fire upon them and at once gave chase. The child rebels returned the fire sweeping the enemy down by the score, but another detachment appeared in front of them, and they were suddenly surrounded and cut off.

The rebels fought like enraged lions. But the graycoats closed in on them and recaptured the little girl although they had to kill every child rebel in the attempt. Jennie Vivian who had been with the child rebels had also been captured, then the two detachments of Gladelinians, excited by the sound of the distant battle proceeded onward but they had not walked a quarter of a mile when they were suddenly assailed in the rear, but the Gladelinians recovered in a minute, and poured in such a deadly fire upon the assailants that they were forced to retreat and flee for dear life. Several of the child rebels who had tried to save Jennie and the other little girl, were straight at once to the final charge and related to the two leaders the startling news. "Several of our small forces tried to save them, and subdued the Gladelinians but it was half just as hard as a dozen to bring bring a saint to destruction." Said one of the rebels. "Many of us were butchered and captured in the attempt."

Annie Arenburg said that she would tell the soldiers to get into line, while Angelina said that she would bring Jack Evans, to the rescue of Jennie and the other little girl no matter what the cost. The strike on of the battle did everything, and the poor of firemen was

CHAPTER THIRTY FIVE.

HURRAH FOR VIOLET VIVIAN, THE LITTLE HEROINE.

Though blood flowed from their nose and mouth and ears, no ghastly pale color appeared on their faces, although their tongues still came out about to fall out. They were more transfigured than the others. Their skin, red and a strange unearthly pale appeared on their heads. Four horn children were also strung up, but not as high as the others.

Annie Arenburg said that she would kill the soldiers to get into line, while Angelina said that she would bring Jack Evans, to the rescue of Jennie and the other little girl no matter what the cost. The snake of the battle hid everything, and the roar of firearms was deafening. Reaching Jack Evans who was advancing on with a large force Annie said:

"Your beloved friend Jennie is in the hands of the Glandellians. Get her out fast, before they butcher her."

"What's that Annie, Jennie is in the hands of the Glandellians?"

"Yes," answered Annie Arenburg.

Jack Evans sent orders to one of his generals to order his full cavalry force to hunt their horses, while he waited a moment to question Annie Arenburg.

"Do you know how many of the Glandellians there are who ran away with her and where are they stationed at?" He asked.

"Those who tried to rescue her said that there were 500, but they have now been probably joined the main line, and there is danger that they may butcher her like the other poor children already massacred."

"This is serious Jack," exclaimed one of his leaders.

"That no matter what the risk we must save her and the other little girl they have in their power."

"I make a firm promise to God that she will be in our hands or I'm a dead girl," said Angelina Arenburg with a oath. We will give them all the fight they want."

"Forward securely now," shouted Jack waving his sabre. "To hell with the Glandellians and liberty and God our helper forever."

In a few minutes the whole troop of cavalry men were dashing toward the enemy in the face of a terrible fire to rescue poor Jennie. Jennie was intended to be killed at the slaughter when she suddenly heard the impetuous advance of the child rebels, and she thanked God, and hoped that she would soon be saved. Despite the number of twenty cannon and fifteen thousand troops a white light came upon the field.

The child rebels dashed on over the field and on to the enemy and assailed them like a sweeping typhoon. Jennie found herself with the little girl hemmed in on all sides by the Glandellians who for the moment seemed to forget the evil times of the children, and she hoped that she would be able to break through their ranks. But suddenly came the voice of the Glandellian commander Moo-Moo:

"Guard the two prisoners."

On came the child rebels charging down toward the foot of a hill where the Glandellians were. The soldiers could not see each other plainly because of the thick pall of gunpowder smoke. More than a hundred times Jennie narrowly escaped being struck by a bullet for scores of men were falling on all high sides of her. Hand to hand they fought it out, using bayonets and pistols. Jennie trying to make her way to the rebels with the other little girl but always forced back by a colonel who had placed himself by their sides. With a shout Jack came down on the Glandellians and after a fearful struggle, in which there was a scene of the wildest confusion, men and horses inextricably mixed, the wounded and dying beneath the horses' hoofs, one scarcely knowing friend from foe. Jack was seen by Jennie's side, and in a moment a hundred of others striking him and high. It was no longer a fight with pistols and muskets only but also with bayonets gathering guns and pistol bullets.

As soon as possible Jack and the others fought their way out, and carrying the now happy little girl and Jennie also, including a 1,000 prisoners including the Glandellian colonel with them, while the enemy, glad to get out of the fray, and finding themselves without a leader, as Moo-Moo was killed, took to their heels, leaving their thousands of dead and wounded on the field. As the victorious child rebels reached the division where Violet and her sisters were the fair creatures came forward, and Violet looking at the little girl said with pity:

"Your poor little girl, did the enemy try to kill you?"

"Yes," answered Jennie, "she was almost killed, and she the little girl was nearly to a cry."

"Don't cry," said Violet kindly. Angelina will see that you will not be captured again."

Most of the child rebels were almost overcome with awe at the innocence and kindness of the Glandellian girls.

One of the rebels. "I don't know what you were and captured in the attempt."

MIRRAH FOR VIOLET VIVIAN: THE LITTLE HEROINE.

Violet and her sisters were in the midst of their fun, playing in the sand, when a familiar figure approached them. It was Jacob Baldwin. He looked with surprise at Violet and her sisters, as he had not expected that they had joined the child rebels. With a glad cry they sprang toward him as he sat down on a bench. How gentle and inviting was Jacob Baldwin's look. The happy children clustered about his knees, and one after another held out their hands to be taken into his.

They joyfully prattled around him and Violet nestled on his breast and took his hand and held it fast. They were indeed happy little children. Baldwin looked splendid in his shining purple uniform, and a long sword hung from his left side.

"Are you a leader too?" asked Violet.

"I'm a general of the artillery division," he answered embracing Violet.

"It was I with my artillery who helped the child rebels to take the town of Jerusalem. You children did not know that I was a leader did you?"

"Yes your excellency," answered Violet, kissing his arm around his neck. He noticed the bandage on her left hand, and asked what the matter was. She reluctantly told him the whole story, from beginning to end, how she had aided on the enemy for the main leaders of the child rebels and how she was nearly captured. Next one of the child rebels who were around Baldwin stared at her incredulous awe, and wonder as Baldwin said:

"You are a brave little girl, and you have earned the rescue of thousands of our child slaves besides your sister Jennie. That is why Jacob's cavalry division saved her in time."

He then pinned a medal of the Angelina's collar on her waist at the left side.

"Gloria and Viola, Violet had done God and her sister Jennie, and her beloved country a great service; I have presented her with a medal. I should like the child rebels to express to her their gratitude. May she live long and so honor to her country and to her God."

Thousands of the child rebels immediately set up such a hearty cheer, that the air seemed to actually reel in sound. Violet put her hands laughingly to her ears as the cheering was so deafening, but her eyes were wet with the tears of happiness. Even her sisters did their best to cheer and shake hands with her. Then Baldwin gently set her down, and a kiss shook hands with her. Then he motioned to the child rebels to come forward. That they did so two and two, and Violet grasped each hand, delightedly and silently. Toward the end her right arm began to ache, but her enthusiasm still burned as at fever heat. After a while Jacob Baldwin showed Violet and her sisters to some soft bunka that were in a house near by, but finding a more beautiful bed the Glandelinians had used before the town was captured, he brought them to these, and after undressing, and after their prayers, they heaped into the beds, and was such fast asleep. The next morning they were up early except Jennie who was exhausted, over the past few days excitement, but they let her stay in, and brought her a breakfast for her.

After a while Angelina Arenburg came in and sat down by Jennie's bed.

"She embraced Jennie's family as she half arose in her bed."

"Jennie do you know what the daughter of the Holy Innocents means?"

Asked the leader of the child rebels, bringing out the long phrase by a great effort.

"What do you think it means?" Jennie returned as she folded her little arms around Arenburg.

"I think, I think Herod did it." The child rebel leader declared.

"Yes he commanded that all the poor helpless little boys under two years old or less be killed. You see the three other little kings had visited Herod talking about the Christ for whom they were the survivors of his throne. What could he think at the question? Where was he who was born the king of the Jews?"

"Something greedy and mean," said Angelina, with conviction.

"But what exactly?" asked Jennie.

Angelina fidgeted. She did not answer just what Jennie asked and said:

"Don't you see? Just as a king had been born the king of the Jews, Herod would be succeeded by that child."

"And Herod did not want to be put out," Arenburg exclaimed.

"That was it," answered Jennie. "Herod lived lived only for the glory and comfort of this world. He did not or would not understand, that a king of heaven. He could not imagine that the child for whom the whole world were looking would despise the wealth, and the honors of this world. Herod thought only of earthly power. The child would inherit his gold and luxury. Herod grew furious at these thoughts. 'Little as you are Angelina you can understand that a person would have to be wild with anger and hatred in order to kill anybody.'"

"Yes," agreed Angelina solemnly. "It is so very awful. But the wicked wicked Glandelinians will kill the poor helpless child slaves in this country for pleasure." She continued. She was right.

Now imagine Herod working himself up to such an extent that he killed not one or two, but thousands. He was led by the insane desire to destroy that child as wonderful, that a star showed the place of his birth.

Birth, as mighty that kings came from afar to do him homage, while he was a tiny helpless infant. Herod himself was a king. Nothing wonderful had happened at the time of his birth. Very few people know of his existence, until long years afterwards. Herod realized these things.

Surely the child born in the city of Bethlehem, was dangerous to Herod's own glory and power. He could not be an old and evil man. But Herod reckoned without God determined to make sure of his throne and his kingdom at any price. He would kill the child."

"But why did he kill so many Jennie?" asked Angelina.

"Because he did not know exactly where Mary and Joseph had taken the child Jesus, and Herod did not want to take any chances of the particular child he wished to destroy escaping. You see the wicked king only followed human reason, and he overlooked the fact that he could accomplish nothing which would interfere with the designs of Almighty God. So we do forth the cruel, selfish--"

"What is an edict please?" said Angelina Arenburg.

"A command which is a law. Then went forth Herod's command, and all the little boys of the age he had ordered, in the city of Bethlehem and in all the near by places were cruelly slain."

"But Jesus was not slain?"

"No. The holy innocents who are all the young little baby martyrs were slain for him cruelly slain, by Herod's soldiers, and hundreds of mothers were left weeping and desolate. But Herod's wish had not been accomplished. Jesus was to live and teach for thirty three years. God sent the warning to St. Joseph. An angel appeared to him while he was asleep and said:

"Arise and take the child and his mother and fly into Egypt, and be there until I shall tell thee. For it will come to pass that Herod will seek the child to destroy him." St. Joseph did not even wait until morning. The Bible expressly tells us that he arose directly in the night and taking Jesus and Mary, began the journey into Egypt.

"St. Joseph was a brave man," commented Arenburg.

"Brave and much above all obedient. You can see through how the Holy Family were distinguished by their obedience. Mary and Joseph were always ready to do sacrifice anything, for God and Jesus. The Son of God, because obedient to the Bible says, even unto death of the cross. He placed no limit to his obedience to the will of his Holy Father, God Almighty."

"Gained he loved his father," said Arenburg. "When I think how I love you Vivian Gloria, it is easy to do the will of God."

Jennie dropped a gentle kiss upon the upturned forehead, and embraced her fondly.

"Yes that is really the reason Angelina darling."

"Let us see where he left off--Oh yes St. Joseph was a brave man, and taking the child and his Blessed Mother, led them away to Egypt, beyond the power of Herod. In Egypt they dwelt as strangers, exiled and suffering many privations among the strangers who were from the Irreligion, from their friends surrounded by new customs and unknown language, and a false religion. Surely Mary, Joseph and Jesus must have missed the friends and home they had left for the sake of devotion, the reverent united celebrations of the Jewish feast. But they never complained. As soon as Herod died God sent an angel to St. Joseph in his sleep, telling him that he should return to the land of Israel, not to Judea because the king Achelous might also fear the power of the child Jesus as Herod his father had done."

"Where did they go?" Asked Angelina Arenburg and— Violet suddenly came running in, followed by her sisters and Violet cried excitedly:

"Annie Arenburg has for to day moved for a quarter of a mile, and a large force of the enemy had taken advantage of it and was a slaughtering help, helpless children year by year. Many of the Glandelinians were saving straight for here and fast too."

Jennie began to get excited but not a bit scared though she did say some prayers for protection. Rushing to the window Arenburg saw it but it was the truth. Many of the Glandelinians discovered the positions of the child rebels and rushed toward it. With a shout they drew nearer and the enemy, and Jennie threw herself in her friends arms and with a pleading look that was touching said:

"Angelina I'm going with my sisters to help the gates. Then she with her sisters went down the stairs and out and reached the gates, and just as the enemy reached them they were halted. Seeing that only five pretty children looked the Glandelinians stood still in amazement. They had an intention of literally tearing the or children to pieces but they were fooled by the very children themselves."

"The main force," laughed Jennie as one of the child rebels picked up a loaded rifle. All the rebels were armed forward all having plenty of ammunition. The few garrison that were there fortunately made such a brave defense that they were able to hold the enemy at bay until Angelina's main force arrived by the firing came to the rescue and sent the enemy flying. Violet and her sisters were overjoyed when they heard the news of several other glorious victories of the child rebels and happily danced with joy. In the stockades of the rebels which was now guarded by a strong force the rescued children had been at, and Violet and her sisters soon knew many of the children, winning their friendship by their loving ways toward them. One certain boy who seemed to have fallen in love with Violet and her sisters had been the last brother of the rebel while leader Zimmerman who had been killed in one of the battles who at the outbreak of the child rebel war had stolen from their father, the Glandelinians when he was a little boy, and had been in one of the child prison camps at Glandelin until rescued after the bloody battle there. Violet ran into Arenburg's headquarters where the two great rebel leaders were sitting, speaking together and told them both the news of the great victories. "You have not forget to thank God for saving you from being killed in that great charge have you?" Asked Violet without the slightest sign of shyness.

"We indeed why should I?" Answered Arenburg. "I'm not ungrateful to my father in heaven for winning the victories and letting me live, and I would not mind if I did die, because then my brethren will be all over."

Annie Arenburg having some duty to perform, saluted and went out.

"There is a boy among the little ones who loves me and my two sisters," said Violet pushing her hair from her face. "And I bet the Glandelinians are mad because we wiped them in that fight." She continued her eyes shining with delight.

"I should wonder if they are not," replied Angelina.

Arenburg: Suddenly there was the sound of running feet, and her sisters came running in.

"The Glandelinians are coming again," gasped Jennie. They are coming from the woods and they are on horses."

"The Glandelinians," nearly screamed Arenburg indignantly. "They will have a hot time in getting in." She screamed again. "Hide the helpless children whom we have recently rescued. It is so dark in the stockades that the Glandelinians can not find them."

Most children are afraid of the dark, but these children were no more afraid of the dark than eating ice cream when there was danger from the approaching Glandelinians and they all tried to be the first to go down a hill hid in the darkest corner possible. The rebels were near armed but after an hour the stockades were forced, and the wicked Glandelinians mingled with the desperate defenders in a blood and hand conflict, Arenburg flourishing her sabre, and holding her friends together at bay until she could escape. As she dashed out of one of the breaches the enemy came swarming in like angry bees and made a careful search for the helpless children who had hidden themselves while the rest of the Glandelinians continued their attack upon the desperate defenders of the stockades.

On the floors where the gun rooms which the rifle men had defended, the Glandelinians found children all right, about twenty five of them. The rebels fought desperately to save the helpless innocents, but the wicked Glandelinians shot and clubbed them down by the scores. The poor little children tried to get away but the merciless Glandelinians quickly caught them. They were all strangled to death, and then their bodies were sliced into fragments, their life blood covering the floor in puddles while their intentions were broken about the floor. After that the Glandelinians who were very wise went into the cellar and searched the place through. The only way Violet and her sisters escaped to them that that is that after the Glandelinians searched was corner closely they crept in the dark stealing into it quietly.

"No one here," At last muttered one of the Glandelinians in a whisper. "Now for the others in that asylum like fort."

This certainly chilled Violet and her sisters. To think that all the poor children in the asylum were to be slaughtered. They shuddered and determined to save them even at the risk of their own lives. As soon as the Glandelinians left, Violet and her sisters slipped out, and quickly rushing out of the stockade made toward the main army of rebels which was not very far away. They reached it, and shouted at the top of their wild bird like voices:

"Hurry, Jack comes, and save the children at the asylum fort."

Jack immediately ran up and demanded what the matter was.

"The enemy are going to kill them all," said Violet.

Jack gave a command and instantly a whole division of the rebels under Jack mounted their horses and set off in full gallop toward the asylum, and reached it within ten minutes. The Glandelinians were already bursting the doors down when the large force of rebels appeared, and at once there was a furious fight, thousands of the others who had followed the eagerly making a dash for the stockades. The battle became terrific as the Glandelinians showed serious resistance and one assault after another was made on the stockades only to be repulsed with their main leader killed. The carnage was unusual for this child rebellion over 10,000 of the rebels having fallen during the first five assaults on the stockades.

The fall of their leader caused a stampede which could not be stopped and the rebels having lost more than three quarters of their numbers retreated, the Glandelinians pursuing them hotly. The leader who had fallen was Jack Dane one of the first beloved friends of the Vivian Girls, and Jack Dane was also among the fallen either dead or injured it could not be determined as yet.

At the asylum the out come was better, all the Glandelinians who failed to get away were forced to a surrender. Over 1,000 of the Glandelinians were taken. Angelina Arenburg who was in the strong line of stockades not attacked and the routed rebels approaching in a panic and demanding what the cause was deployed her armies and threw them forward to a fierce attack. The pursuing Glandelinians were compelled to halt in their impetuous advance but they met the rebels with a murderous fire, which became so destructive that the rebels were also compelled to drop back a little their left wing recoiling a few yards then their lines stormed with a withering fire, and the graycoats were downed by the hundreds. As the battle went on hotly Arenburg heard that the Glandelinians had captured the Vivian Girls and that there was only fifteen minutes in which to save them from a horrible death. She quickly rode over to Annie Arenburg, told her what had happened and ordered her to make a desperate charge on the Glandelinians to rescue the Vivian girls. Arenburg saluted and mounting her horse ordered her division forward and on galloped over ten thousand big boys to the rescue. As Annie slowed down she was suddenly confronted by a vision. To her it seemed as if all the suffering slaves came to her view, and driven desperate and almost to a frenzy to it, she ordered her forces to the charge. The rebels were sent at so furious a gallop that the horses' hoofs rose clouds of snow under their hooves they came into a frightful clash with the enemy and within sixteen minutes almost 2,000 of the rebels had been sent down before the one ya terrible valley fire with musketry and gathering guns Annie Arenburg being among the badly wounded. In the meantime one of the rebels had seen one party of Glandelinians carry the Vivian Girls to a near by prison, which was fully guarded by the Glandelinians. At once he ordered his force to go forward and reaching the "Guns-on-Wheel" line they encountered a strong force of Glandelinians who gave the fiercest resistance since the rebellion opened.

The rebels leaders waited impatiently for their forces to win, but every onslaught was repulsed with frightful slaughter, every emerging column losing their commanders. The main leaders were furious. They were bound to rescue the children at all costs, and so increased the violence of the onslaughts with all their strength. Encountering one of the child rebel officers the main leader asked how far the place was where the Vivian girls had been taken to.

"It's over ten miles from here," answered the officer. "And it is guarded by another strong force of Glandellians."

"Send a big force around the enemy by the Hall-otera junction and then advance toward the place full speed without stopping and to attack with all their violence until I can notify our main leader, where they are being held. I'll continue to attack here until their lives are forced to give way."

This order was obeyed in due short time and the enemy force of twenty thousand went so fast and so steadily that the place was reached inside of two minutes and without delay the assaults were commenced and with all their fury, the Glandellians being amazed at the ferocity of the rebels. So violent were the attacks that the Glandellians were cut down by the thousands and their survivors routed but when the place was searched the Vivian girls were not there the Glandellians having carried them off to the rear, retreated to the rear.

Seeing a long line of hand cars and box cars as well as the force of rebels lined up to them and each the whole train was in use pursuit of the Glandellians. Knowing how urgent the case was the rebels were in pain impatient but again the Glandellians had taken another stand and stood near a town four miles away the rebels had to leave the cars and demanded from a trainman how long it would take for a train to come.

"There's one coming in two minutes," was the answer.

"Oh, how far is it to the old town?" asked the main rebel leader.

"About four miles."

"Damn it, why don't you say a trillion miles?" demanded the rebel leader impatiently. "Can you take us there on your special train?"

"There are six little Vivian girls who are in the power of the enemy and if we don't get there in time they will be butchered."

"Certainly!" answered the trainman. "Hop on and we will take you, and in a rush."

All the rebels got on, and the train went on so fast that the town was reached within two minutes. In a few minutes the Glandellians again found themselves attacked and this time waited for fair over 20,000 of them being taken prisoners, the rest having escaped, but not having time to take the Vivian girls with them.

The train was broken into and the rebel leader demanded the Glandellian commander to bring the Vivian girls, and all the child prisoners they had.

"But what rest?" he asked. "They are dead already."

"Did I give you a command or what?" demanded the rebel leader. "I thought you can stayed your officers. Obey at once or I'll have you strung up in short order."

The Glandellian officer was forced to obey, the rebel leader and a hundred rebels following him so that he could not do any trickery. Soon the Vivian girls and over a hundred children were brought out. The officer was then turned over to the rebels who had the other prisoners, and they began to march southward the children being taken along.

Suddenly as the rebels were lined up they came across a part of boys in gray who had some children with them.

At once some of the rebels dashed forward with fixed bayonets and the leader drawing a revolver grunted at and said:

"Stand where you are the whole of you. I'll not let you Glandellians steal these poor little children to kill them."

The Glandellian had to give them up on the odds were against them and they were also taken prisoners. In the same time the rebels by sheer force in the fury of their assault had won the field at a very point but they had suffered the loss of over 20,000 in killed and dying though the Glandellians had predicted their losses at 15,000 in killed and wounded while over 5,000 were made prisoners.

Hansen had it in his mind that he was going to put down child slavery even if he had to buy the places himself so he went to one of the owners of a firm who advertised that he wished to sell several factories and in ringing the bell set a butter with a platter in his hand. Hand

"Push with a card, have you as respect for a governor?" growled Hansen, and he grabbed the butter to the coat collar, and turning him down the stairs threw it down into the gutter. "Stay there until your hands are washed for me," said Hansen. "Maybe she will give you a spanking for getting your self dirty."

Then he went up the stairs and went into the office as if it had been his for a long time. Hansen called Hansen to go and wait in the reception room until the owner of the house came to see what he wanted. "He's not near here to get orders from some puppets like you," said Hansen. "Tell him that he will have to come here right this minute, or I will fetch him." The officer went away, and in a few moments the owner of the place came.

"Good afternoon sir," said Hansen. "Are you the owner of these child slave houses that you wish to sell?"

"Yes, thank you I am," answered the man. "Why do you ask? Do you wish to buy them?"

"Yes, but your life I want to buy them and night away," answered Hansen as he drew out a roll of bills. He handed it to the man. The man who was to sell the houses misunderstood him.

He counted the money carefully, and then presented Hansen with a handful of papers with type printing on it.

"What are these for?" demanded Hansen indignantly. "I don't want this worthless paper. I want to buy these houses if you are going to sell them."

"My dear man," returned the owner, "these papers tell you how to use the children there. Every buyer needs these and which helps them to secure more slaves for the little laborers."

"Hush, if you are not going to sell the places, then I want my money back," said Hansen. "I came not to buy these worthless papers but the places."

"I'll be sold you these places, and given you these papers."

Said the man hurt by Hansen's surly tone. "And I charge you nothing for these papers, as I just put them away. Have you seen the places? They are very spacious. You have not? Then I'll take you right there to see them."

When they reached the places after a short car ride, Hansen could not help but marvel, and was interested in the state of the child labor factories. They immediately went toward the right of the factories and as they entered the building, a five story building, a lumber factory was sight of the children laboring there, was enough to soften the hardest of hearts, if they could be softened. Their most cruel seen in they were made them do the most dangerous work, and as he was passing through he saw a poor child drop unconscious from exhaustion and starvation, and he went later to open up dead. The machinery was dangerous for these little starved ones and yet more dangerous for the new children, who did not know how to handle them. In spite of the safety the attendants were very wise and suspicious of Hansen for they knew he was the Angelilian Governor who would put child labor to an end at any risk, and they did not want this for they hated little girls and boys. Hansen and his companion made a round of the whole room then started upstairs to the second floor. Here it was still worse.

On armed with bat-o-nines. Tufts stood over the exhausted little laboring girls and boys, and the sad appealing looks on their blood stained faces touched Hansen.

"Here is your new master," the man said, talking as the children were laboring, and seeing that they were not attending for fear of their overseers, went on with Hansen, who said as they entered a plain where two children were laboring hard and a weeping bitterly.

"Why do you permit these men to do but these children with the cruel whips?" asked Hansen. "Like this?" "Don't you know that I'm governor of Angelilia and Valeriana, and could do it with all these overseers in the plantations, or I could do it with all these overseers in the plantations?"

"It's not me, it's their own will, I can't do anything with them," returned the man. "I order any conditions, I can do anything with these men and that is why I wished to sell the places, and give you these papers to do as you like with. I did not know that you was the governor when you first came in to us, but I'm glad that you was, for you alone can do away with the child slavery."

He was truthful in all he said and Hansen seeing the overseer looking suspiciously at him, and seeing, placed his hands on his revolver and struggled on looking at the plainer and the two laboring children who were girls. Suddenly their overseer strode toward Hansen and his companion and said:

"And as for this is to be our new boss?"
"Yes," answered the man. "He is your new boss and governor over a over Angelina, though he has fought these places."
"Ha!" Retorted the overseer with a sneer. "Nothing but a girl's face on him. He can't fight it, though he looks strong."
Hansen did not pay any attention to this remark and the man went back to the machine watching the children like a hawk. Then only laughing at the sneer of the other man Hansen walked on examining first one machine and then another as if nothing extraordinary had happened, thought he threw one man down to the floor with a crash as he tried to bar his way. Then he started his way up to the third floor and he heard it was still worse.

"Many children die here within a month from starvation and overwork and from the beatings they receive," said Hansen's companion. "But I know that you can change it all. These overseers are not so cruel though, only being in dread of the criminals below. And they tried to make it as easy for the children as possible."
This was one of the rooms where window sills and all other things were prepared for shipping, and it was terrible work for the poor children to lift them. The fourth floor and the fifth were the glue and the paint rooms, where window sills, doors, and other material were painting paintless.

There were more good overseers than there were bad, but they were still being cruelly afraid of these wicked men. After looking through all of the top floors they descended to the second again and strode toward the plainer. He passed it with a kind word to the children, and after reaching the first floor they went outside and as he entered the other child labor places which was a tar factory and though the children were laboring there also the overseers were quite kind hearted, and at last sternly forbade the children to work too hard. There was one good when Hansen's guide told them that Governor Villan now owned the places, and told the children the good news.

"Here you little angels, you little flowers see who can get the most of this money!" said Hansen taking out of his pockets a lot of dimes. Then these he threw out to the little laborers. There was quick scramble for the money, and when all the children of that one story factory had some of the money, Hansen asked:

"Do you want to be free?"
"Yes, yes, yes," was the eager answer. The overseers expressed a try of surprise and delight at this, and also plied the little human flowers with flowers and money as they left two by two, following Hansen.

"Then turning to the overseers he said:
"You may go to your home also, but report in the other factory in the morning and I will give each of you a good job for five dollars a day." The overseers thanked him, and he continued:
"I'll throw out these villains in the lumber factories this very day, and take these children with me, with pockets full of dimes and quarters. I'll show them these rascals something."

After they left the tar factory they returned to the lumber factory. As they reached the first floor the laboring children were surprised to see him a second time and wondered what was going to happen.

But they soon found out.
"I want every one of you children to form into line," he ordered.
"What for?" demanded one of the attending overseers.
"Is it any of your business?" answered Hansen in a surly tone.
"Well to these children are to be watched by us, and we do not labor steadily and I will not let them do as you say."

Hansen folded his arms and said with a sneer:
"Is that so?"
"Yes that is so, you puppet, and take anything out of it if you can." Snarled back one of the overseers.
"Well then then, I'll say this for yourselves form into line and quickly too before I do some shooting." And as Hansen spoke he drew his six shooters and leveled them at the rascals.
Cowering before these dangerous weapons the men stayed and filed out as quickly as possible, but when they were out side, they began to use the worst vilest words threatening him and calling him all the names they could think off.

But when they were outside Hansen said in answer to the their threats:
"Don't either of you come back either, or I'll throw you all for life in the island prisons for enforcing child labor in a free country which does not believe in you!"

Then turning to the children he said:
"But down the machines and fall in line."
The children obeyed and then Hansen continued:
"Follow me up to the second floor."

He quickly ascended the steps and when all the children were on the second floor he told them to sit on the benches, despite the nearness of the acres of desperate overseers. Hansen made another round of the place until he reached the plainer. But these two children were not there having been placed at work by the ripper, but the same water watching over them. Suddenly one of them a very pretty little girl dropped to the floor from hunger and exhaustion and the rascal raised his cruel Cut-O-Mine-Tails to strike her. Without hesitation Hansen sprang forward to lift her and relieved a blow across the back. The rascal snarled this purposefully snarling:
"You let the lady child lay. What are you putting in for? I'm attending to her."

Hansen was angered beyond endurance by that blow which left a black and blue mark on his back for a week afterward. With a leap Hansen caught the rascal by the collar and swung him around, then letting go the pile with a roar. For a moment he lay there dazed the lumber upsetting looking at Hansen with surprise and admiration. It took several of the other overseers to lift him, the rascal was so dazed, and he was helping himing to a bench, while Hansen said:
"You just dare make another attack like that and you will wish you hadn't. To dare to strike a governor with a Cut-O-Mine-Tails."

Hansen picked up the whip and broke it to pieces, putting the tails into his pockets, while the other rascals who advanced toward Hansen, snarling as fiercely as they knew how. Hansen showed no signs of excitement, but the look in his face was as terrible, they hesitated.
"Well why don't you come on?" sneered Hansen.

"Look here," said one of the men. "As you seem to want to fight you can take back here to a corner, with all your friends, and even soldiers if necessary, and we will fight it out outside. You may refuse as I well know, but these factories will not be your property for long for we will set fire to it then in the night and burn you all up."

"What is the matter here?" interrupted a voice, and Jacob Haldrin, with the other Angelina governor, and scores of their soldiers came bounding up the steps.
Without the slightest hesitation one of the Glendallians drew his sabre, and attacked Jimsie Villan furiously. At the beginning of the fight, Jimsie Villan pressed his assailant so hard that he was forced to take refuge in a small dark room leaving his sabre lying in front of Jimsie Villan, who now stood at the threshold with naked sabre, staring with vengeful eyes into the dark room.
"Guard, sergeant, see Haldrel!" he cried in a voice of fury. "Come out here and fight, or I'll kill you for attacking an Angelinian general you good for nothing day!"
For a moment there was no answer. Yet a pair of fierce burning eyes, like those of a cornered wolf, wild-cat seemed to glare out from the darkness inside.
"Dustar, reptile, spawn of Satan!" Almost screamed Jimsie Villan. "Come out I say. Into the light day, that we may fight for the freedom of the children."
The next instant the villain appeared upon a platform in the doorway. "Insolent scoundrel!" he roared at last. "What do you mean? Who are you?"

"You know well enough, who I am, you old rascal, and if you don't see me, I am the generalissimo Vivian of the Angelinian nation. Come out you rascal, come out I say!"

The rascal gave a start, but in an instant he recovered himself, and his eyes flashed with rage and scorn.

"Bah you stripling! You puppy! Had I a weapon I would sue this folly. I would fight you but I am unarmed."

His opponent stepped quickly up to him and flung it with a slatter into the room.

"Monster and devil though you are, I would not murder you." He cried, his tone thick with passion. "He came on."

The villainous Glandelinian stepped back into the darkness, a moment then rushed out his sabre in one hand, the other hand held a set thing behind his back. All this happened quickly, and for the moment knowing his skill, Hansen was loath to interfere, to deny his nephew his proper vengeance, for the assault on him, but now he saw treachery was at set. What meant the Glandelinian with his hand hidden. He took one step toward him. Before Hansen could take a step toward them the mischief was done.

"Curse you!" The Glandelinian roared, and immediately he crossed his sabre with his antagonist. Then up flew his left hand like a flash of lightning and a heavy drinking vessel sped into his opponent's face, striking him between the eyes, and falling him to the floor, and he lay writhing in agony. Hansen bounded forward to intercept the scoundrel, seeing up with him at the very edge of a lumber pile.

"Vile treacherous coward!" Roared Hansen. "Turn, turn, or by heaven above up you, I'll stab you through your back!"

He turned and faced Hansen like a wild beast at bay.

"Oh you insolent, Angelinian fool!" He snarled. "Yes you ugly!" And he thrust with desperate fury at Hansen's heart. This he parried and lunged on quickly, wounding the rascal in the thigh. The wicked Glandelinian fought like a demon incarnate, fought with the terror of the island prisons behind him. My how he fought. His blade fairly whirled upon Hansen's sabre, shrieked and writhed and darted, like a living agitated thing. So suddenly did this necessity fallen on him, impulsively, had Hansen plunged in into the fray, that he thought had struck him, concerning his unfitness for so desperate a combat, though he was one of the most famous duellists ever known. But he was soon to be awakened to the fact, to realize that his long time free practice had left him no match for a skilled swordsman, and unscrupulous unscrupulous devil fighting for his very life. A desperate thrust, barely parried in time, reared him to the full extent of his peril, for he felt his strength going fast. At that moment the Glandelinian's sabre pierced Hansen's shoulder, and a little cry of pain flew from his lips. The Glandelinian with a triumphant gleam in his eyes was pressing Hansen to the death. His arm had grown much almost useless. His limbs went and trembled under him, his breath came in quick painful gasps, and a chill sweat broke from his body. He was exhausted, done for. Hansen saw his friend's terrible plight, and with terror-stricken eyes realized that it was near the end. A sudden thought seized him. He leaped behind the Glandelinian, and raised his sabre to thrust it into his back. But he failed on account of a furious movement of the Glandelinian.

"Ha you dog, you scurvy, curse you at last!" His opponent.

In another moment Hansen would have been writhing on the floor with his enemy's blade through his heart, but Hansen had turned his sabre, and using it as a club brought the heavy blow down with all his strength and fury upon the rascal's head. The blow caught him in the nick of time with a sound Hansen was upon him even as his sabre sole had been upon him at the outset of the fight. The Glandelinian was not stunned only dazed, but in that moment or two new strength came to him. He recoiled quickly and strove valiantly to throw him off.

"You unpeppable ruffian!" His opponent cried. "You monster of iniquity! The word death shall have you yet!" The next fearful impressions broke from the rascal's lips and he heaved and writhed under Hansen as though possessed by the strength of a seven devils. The rascal.

"The bonds! Rebert! Bring the bonds!" Shouted Hansen to his brother. "And hasten!"

"His words were breathless and wary in his tones inspired him with a new and sudden energy. The rascal gave one quick and tremendous lift, gave himself he had to be in the air."

CHAPTER THIRTY SIX. THE MYSTERIOUS CAVERN.

"You know well enough, who I am, you old rascal, and if you don't mean you heard, come out, I say!"

The rascal gave a start, but in an instant he recovered himself and his he was on his feet, but he never lost his grip. In a flash a step to escape him, but he grappled with him again, and once more they went at it, struggling and struggling like wild beasts. Their infuriated struggles could have lasted a minute or two, but the time seemed an age.

 At last Hanson was conscious that his comrades were rushing to his rescue! and Hanson saw his little brother as he came with a fierce look snatch up his fallen enemy. With a quick mighty effort Hanson flung his enemy from him, when his brother with a fierce effort plunged the blade of his sabre full into the back of the angelinian, the point coming out at his breast. Hanson saw his hands fly up and his half turn about , drew full length upon the floor, a few convulsive movements of his limbs a sudden shudder, and he was dead. The movement of his all his friends drew their pistols and ordered them to leave. Seeing the determination on their faces the rascal suddenly showed leaving as quickly as they could. The overseers of the whole place were sent away and then the whole party of Angelinians giving each child a pocket full full of silver told them to follow them. Some of the other Angelinians attended to Jivian. They saw that he was only slightly injured , and when they brought him to his senses he was soon able to get to his feet and walk. Robert now gave him attention to the poor child who lay upon the floor as if in death. But he found that she had fainted from hunger. Two men fetched some water in a basin and soon they put the child to her senses again, and she was carried out the others following.

"Robert: Bring the hands." She led Hanson across to his brother. "And hasten."

Jennie was awakened the next morning by a heavy crash of thunder, and a fearful storm was again raging in California. It being a terrific storm, she came nearly as furious as the one; they were caught in it. The wind whirled in an uneasy manner and the thunder was so deafening that it had awakened Jennie. She first looked at the ceiling, which she thought she had seen before, then gazed around the room which was lit up by a blinding flash of lightning.

trying to sit up in bed as a deafening crash of thunder filled her

'Surely this is not the glandelinian aurea, and I believe that I have been here before.

When she tried to sit up she felt very dizzy, and fell back with a gasp.

"I wonder how did I get my head hurt!" She gasped. Where are my sister sisters?"

She glanced around her the room again and to her relief found that her sisters were lying in beautiful beds all like her own. Jennie was indeed unattended, for she thought that she had still been among these cruel Glandvilians. It seemed but a moment ago to her that she had been in that horrible furnace, and now she found herself in a nice soft bed, with her dear sisters, with her head wrapped in bandages. She could not make out where she was, but she felt that she had escaped from the cruel slave and she was glad to be with her dear sisters. She thought also, that it looked like her sunbeam, for it seemed so.

[illegible]

As she stood up to look for her clothes the shock of sudden moving, caused her head to pain intensely, and to leave her nearly piteously. But the crashing of the thunder made the pain increase at time, and when she wished that it would cease. She found her clothes hanging on a chair, and she wished for a light for it was getting so dark that she could hardly see. But she soon found a gasjet, and also a box of matches on a shelf.

Children more mostly like to play with matches, but Jennie hated to play with matches, and also christian that she was, feared them greatly.

She took two matches, put the box back on the shelf, and when she lit the gas she blew the match out, and instead of carelessly throwing it on the floor took pains to lay it on the shelf, knowing that it was dangerous to throw matches on the floor, for when any one steps on one they are likely to fall.

Hastily putting on her clothes, which made her look like an injured angel, then went over to Violeta bed.

Shaking her gently, she said, Violet:

"Violet, Violet, wake up. We are in a place that looks like our home. Violet dear, oh please do wake up. What makes you sleep so soundly. Don't you hear me calling you?"

She had to shake Violet many times before she could get her to wake up, which of course caused intense pain in her head and caused her to react again.

She placed her hand on her head as Violet sat up, and rubbed her eyes then looking at Jennie. First Violet was quite alarmed, for she thought that Jennie was internally injured, but Jennie smiled her fears, by speaking to her.

"Don't be afraid about me Violet dear." She said. "I'm not very badly hurt, and what makes you afraid of me. You never was afraid of me before!"

"Why Jennie you have recovered your mind!" Asked Violet her heart leaping with joy.

"Recovered my mind!" exclaimed Jennie in amazement. "Why Violet Dear what do you mean?"

"Wasn't you crazy?" Asked Violet wonderingly. "You acted like a crazy person, after the bank hit and the money was gone."

Jennie Vivian had recovered from her delirium and was no more raving like she did the night before. The blog from the night before:

Then Violet dressing as fast as she could told Jennie the whole story.

"We are surely missing friends," said Joise, drawing near to the grand reception room. "Shall I look in here?" She asked.

"Yes and be careful," answered Jennie placing her hand gently on the painful wound. "My head was hurt. I do wish it would stop. I can hardly stand it."

Violet placed an arm around poor Jennie, and said as Joise walked toward the reception room:

"Never you mind, Jennie dear. It will get better soon, and we may also be seeing friends, even if papa and mamma are not here. But any way I'll ask them to take us home."

Joise had by this time reached the room, but found no one there except the bell boy. The bell boy who was twelve years old, saw Joise, and his heart leaped into his throat as he saw her pretty face. Joise not looking for him, but the strange one, went just the door but smiled in a friendly manner at him. Her sisters followed, and when the bell boy saw Jennie, he was filled with pity at her misery, and believing that they were looking for a doctor, went out into the hall and called them.

"Little girls," he cried. "Come into the reception room, and tell me who you want, and I'll get him."

Violet was about to answer, when again they heard someone coming, along a small hall, extending from the main hall. But this time they had no dread, and only stood still, gazing on the picture of the "Garden of Gethsemane", with such overwhelming pity, that the bell boy was amazed, and ~~came~~ <sup>stood</sup> ~~overhead~~ <sup>overhead</sup>. Not wishing to intercept them, he went back into the reception room, but oh how he wished they were his sisters. They were still looking at the Holy Pictures, when they heard some one walking toward them briskly.

They looked toward the approaching man with a start, and to their joy saw their dear father coming as quick as he could walk. With a happy cry they ran forward to meet him. He lifted Jennie to his loving chest first and embraced her fondly, thanking God, that she had not died.

On how her sisters did welcome him. After they all had been embraced and kissed, and had thanked God for letting them see their dear father again, Violet who was still in his arms asked:

"Papa how did we get back to you?"

"A friend of yours rescued me from the terrible typhoid that broke loose on us yesterday afternoon, at the risk of his own life, and brought me here."

"Oh who was he?" asked Jennie forgetting the pain in her head, in her happiness. "Oh I wish that he had stayed, so that I could see him."

"You can see him alright!" said her father, setting Violet down and lifting Jennie again. "You need not be afraid, when I tell you that it is a Glandelinian."

"A Glandelinian?" exclaimed Joise. "But who is the Glandelinian?"

"I never knew that a Glandelinian had the heart to save us."

"That is except one," said Angelina.

"Who is that one?" asked their father smiling.

"That is Zuzumanna Precille," answered Joise.

Their father took them toward the grand dining room, and in, and there to their increasing joy, they found their mother, aunt, their uncle their brother, and a strange man, who they realized was their rescuer, Precille.

At the sight of the children, they all arose, from the table in surprise.

"Well, as they are alright after all," exclaimed Precille, as Jennie being set down, was the first to reach him.

Jennie at once realized that it was Precille who had rescued her and her sisters, and with a happy cry, she flew into her arms, and what a happy meeting it was.

After breakfast was over, and Joise was sitting in Precille's lap, Violet asked:

"What has become of poor Gertrude? And why?"

"They could not live," answered Precille. "And so she is in heaven, where their mamma and papa are."

Violet felt kind of sad, but did not cry, neither did her sisters, because they were glad to hear that the two little girls were now out of human way.

"Gertrude's journeying is satisfied at last," smiled the Angelinian governor to himself. "THANK GOD."

CHAPTER THIRTY SEVEN.
COME HOME TROUBLE.

Then he said aloud: Violet, I have the very Glandelinians who have treated you and your sisters so cruelly, and only will forgive them, at your word. What do you say?"

"As long as they stay here, and hope poor God they do not deserve forgiveness," said Violet, with a look of sorrow. "He told them that when they were torturing the poor children. Of course it is not for us to say no, for we cannot refuse to forgive even our enemies, so we forgive them, if you will."

"Allright," said their father, nodding to a soldier who was standing near the door, with the convicted Glandelinians. "Let them plead their own pardon and if the children still declare that they forgive them, then set them free." The convicted Glandelinians begged the children to forgive them, and the Vivian girls heartily forgave them, only requesting that they return back to their God, when they had forgiven. The Glandelinians made firm promises, and as governor Vivian set them free, Gannon felt very sorry for poor Jennie, for she was suffering severely from the wound though she tried to hide her tears. But Gannon's Presile made her quite happy, and at last she threw her bare arms around his neck, and blessed him.

"I hope you will stay with us for a while," she said as he embraced her.

"I surely will," answered Zimmermann Presile, and will do my utmost to make and keep you as happy as possible."

"Is the cruel war threatening yet?" asked Violet.

"Yes indeed," said Presile. "It is still going on yet, and if the Glandelinians do not stop their tortures of the innocent children God will have his vengeance on them."

As they talked, they could hear the continuous, crash and rattle of the falling trees, and also the roar of the distant sea. After they had talked together for a while, they sat about cleaning the breakfast table, listening to the mournful wail of the wind. It was not dark outside now, and when they were done, they went to the windows on the eastern side, to watch the hurricane which was now again at its highest fury. Their father told them that there had been another battle with the child rebels and the Glandelinians, at a place called: Annierhal. The number of child rebels was about 100,000, while the numbers of the Glandelinians was about 200,000. The estimated losses on both sides was 20,000.

Toward late that evening the hurricane became terrific in its violence, raging for six hours without any signs of abatement, and when seven hours were passed it increased so furiously, that roofs were torn away, windows blown in, and tall wooden buildings leveled to the ground. But still it increased more furiously, and the houses along the sea front, were so swayed with the eighty foot waves, Hansen declared that the hurricane blew over two hundred miles an hour, and was quite right.

But after raging over four or eight hours, without causing out anything, a single moment, it suddenly increased to two hundred and fifty miles an hour.

If the waves were not one hundred and eighty feet high, then the water was. At the water houses were torn off, like a egg shell, and the whole water front was destroyed. Near by Hansen had a big tree, which had been wrapped in like pipe stems, and carried away like shuff.

Many wooden houses, fences, telegraph wires, and poles were carried away like shuff, and terrible houses were destroyed.

At still the storm on and on, but it soon subsided toward the night of the second day, and there had been many shipwrecks.

"I am so glad you are here," said Violet, and they all their names and names are."

"Violet felt kind of sad, but did not cry, neither did her sisters, because they were glad anyway, that the two little girls were now out of harm's way."

"Gertrude's yearning is satisfied at last," smiled the Angellian governor to himself. "THANK GOD."

The final defeat of the Glandelinians at the city of Pape, by the child rebels, stirred up the whole nation, and that Mourmou, which the glandelinians had ignored for many years, was lifting her head, and uttering against Glandelinia, for her butcheries, and long continued wars on the weaker nations. The news reaching the Angolinian governors was grave, and a bewailing more and more grave. The air seemed dark as with a thunder cloud, and every one dreaded that there would be such a storm of war, as there had not been since wars were waged. As soon as the temper of the Glandelinians had been seen, the child rebel forces in the northwest, began to give way. They began by concessions, and went by concessions, and each concession was made the ground for new wars. It was like a steady falling down the hill. When they have once begun they cannot stop at all, and they go on until there is a crash, then it would be they risk themselves up, sorely wounded and bruised, and begin to reel up the hill slowly, and pain painfully, and then be dashed to pieces in a second fall.

Glandelinia had been setting this way for a long time, butchering helpless children for years and enslaving them, without mercy. By what the Vivian Girls witnessed, angered the Angolinians, and worse furies were sent into Calvernia to restore order. This trouble had already continued for over a month, and the whole world wondered why the Angolinians stood it so long. They believed that Angolinia strong as she was was afraid to do anything, but this was not the case. Angolinia was continually sending armies in case some serious trouble would break out, and these mobilizations were to old Glandelinian ignorance. Nevertheless Glandelinia had already been a mob lying on account of the violence of the child rebellion, but the Angolinians were as fit to this and the movements of the Glandelinians were closely watched. The Angolinian Governors declared that he would not stand the cruel treatment of the helpless children any longer, and also that the Glandelinians, will be compelled to leave his daughters alone in the future. And if they did not, they would see to it being done even if they had to drag Glandelinia into a war for it.

But as the Holy masses were being on the Pape would not hear of it and wished to mediate with the two giver wars. So all the troubles continued without any thing being done to stop it, though it was reported that the child even who were fighting in the rebellion were getting worse in their frenzy. However the slaughters of the helpless children continued, with terrible cruelties, and what could any one expect, when that the two Glandelinian council men like Noakie, Doggerine, by their wicked and poisonous preaching to putrupt and to inflame the anger of the glandelinians still more. Both these men heads, would have been cut off the instant they began to write and preach, if the glandelinian council had not protected them by armed forces. The Glandelinian council men called scribblers, were at the root of all the trouble, with their pestilent wicked doctrines, but it was too late now, to stop them for the mischief was done too soon. If the Angolinians had just now arisen strong and determined, all might be well, but just now the armies were weak in numbers and decision, they seeming to abandon every place ordered to do so by the Calvernian governors, and if the armies in the west and east who were in full strength, were sent out to Calvernia, it would be to the Glandelinians an act of war or hostilities, and then matters would drift from bad to worse, as the glandelinian armies in Calvernia were reinforced to overwhelming numbers, and would become the masters of the situation, and then it would be awful.

While the new mobilizations were going on the two Angolinian governors, were in Pape Calvernia, and did not at all new possible that there could be any serious danger as yet, though Glandelinia had been asked the reasons several times the sending of her mobilizations, and to disband her armies, if she did not want to risk the possibilities of war. These threats had resulted in indescribable disturbances, and horrible bloodshed, among the child prisoners, but never only were ashes of this reached them in Pape so far away. In the city of Pape the days passed very quietly there being none of the usual gaiety for a deep gloom of sorrow hung over all the Angolinian families in the beautiful city of Pape for they feared that the Governors would precipitate the two nations into a war, and terrify Calvernia.

When the news of the danger that the rebel army was approaching Pape, until the threatening dangers were passed. But the news of no fear, telling that Pape was wholly safe. If a large force of Glandelinians, whose hair was dressed in the fashion of little girls, should attack the child rebels there, though it was evident that a successful attack, and resistance, could be made by the child rebel forces there, Mourmou and the rest would not in, but if they were overated, Mourmou and the rest, if they could, were to abandon the city, and journey to Angolinia to arouse the nation, for an act of war.

Now that he heard that the blow was about to fall, the main governor drew his beautiful children instinctively to him, as if to protect them, but no word passed his lips. It would be an awful thing to lose such those cruel heartless Glandelinians, who were doing dreadful things, attacking convents, massacring children and women, and also men, and trying to pass all sorts of heinous laws, and holding thousands of helpless children as prisoners and slaves in their own little cities, in Glandelinia, and the wretched condition of the Angolinian nation ever this, especially in the far west, was something awful.

The cruel violence of the glandelinians had increased from day to day, in Calvernia, and were setting up a new kingdom. The rapacity of all the convents, had been utterly destroyed or stolen, and this measure had been followed, by the seizure of the vast estates, of all the Calvernian Catholic churches. All the privileges of all the Christians, had been declared at an end, a degree having been passed, abolishing all titles of Christianity. This degree aroused the whole of Angolinia to the highest pitch, and it was only through the means of the Pope that a sudden war with Glandelinia was avoided. Seeing that their enemies did nothing to stop them, the Glandelinians continued to pass laws of the most sweeping description, usurping sovereign power, and using it as no monarch had ever done before. The Angolinian Glandelinians were of extraordinary size and fierceness, for many days having been the terror of the Christian nations in all of Calvernia. They had been known to go into villages, and before the very eyes of the Angolinian soldiers, boldly carry off many women and children, a in midday, and butcher them and also their parsons. Every child who was found dead, and all cut up, was always supposed to have been all slain by those very Glandelinians. Sometimes they were seen, in one part of the province, and sometimes in another. Children going to school, or women carrying home faggots from the forest, were found cut up, or even opened up in entirely.

And then the news spread that the glandelinians were again in the neighborhood. The Angolinians regarded them, not as ordinary Glandelinians, but as human demons, and mothers quieted their children when they cried, by saying that if they were not good, the demons would come and carry them off. The frequent child rebel battles which were occurring, were greatly interfering with all the continual traveling. Around numbers of women prisoners terrified beyond doubt, of the great Glandelinian butcheries, had become Glandelinians themselves, not because they wanted to, but to save themselves. But this they ought to not have done, because they were butchered anyway. The distress that prevailed among the prisoners was indeed terrible. The child slaves could scarcely keep themselves alive, and many had died of absolute starvation, or indescribable butcheries, and strangulations. The Glandelinians in the city of Pape, Calvernia, slaughtered all the child rebels who failed to resist them, the massacres of the recaptured children being too terrible to describe. The fury of the glandelinians were running higher and higher, and they began to play the children of other nations also. Then soon came news of terrible disorders, in the far west of Calvernia, pillage and acts of ruffianism, in all parts. Churches and convents were burned or destroyed and the glandelinians even refused to give up the child captives, belonging to Mourmou Mourmou, who threatened war. These Glandelinian soldiers were more cruel, than those the Vivian Girls had even seen. Things were indeed growing worse and worse, and hundreds of more children were continually captured, though where they were stolen from, no one could tell. The violence, and butcheries of the fierce Glandelinians were over on the increase, and they seem to become the real masters of all the captives, and the child rebel armies being badly broken and already beaten in several battles had fled pale stricken toward the north, no longer able to keep up the fight as their enemies overwhelmed them.

The Glandelinians were indeed treating some of the more violent, and spies and scout parties were sent out everywhere to see that no prisoners or fugitives should escape. It seemed the day of Calvernia's happiness were over and that terrible things were about to happen. Rumors soon came that some divisions of Angelinians from the Shithers, under General ~~and~~ ~~their~~ chief leader, had been sent to the west, but the Christian soldiers could do nothing, without causing a war, and many poor prisoners, were treated so cruelly, and were so disorganized, were not ready to join the Glandelinians. In the meantime a large force of Glandelinians under Marguise, had arrived near Beppo causing a general alarm, and the battalions from Calvernia in the west of Calvernia, the most violent of all, had come into collision with the biggest child rebel force ever organized, and the result was that the rear of the conflict did not go on for over three days. The loss on both sides left the dead by battle was horrible. The child rebels engaged numbered about 528,000 and out of these over 36,789 had fallen and the Glandelinians lost only 10,000 in killed and wounded. To the rebels it was one of the bitterest defeats of the rebellion, and hundreds of the captured child rebels were murdered, and the Glandelinians cut off their heads in triumph of their first real glorious victory, and putting them on pikes, paraded them in the streets within sight of the windows of the child labor factories. The descriptions of the battle is as follows:

Known divisions before the battle opened, with cannon came up, and so on the battle had begun, and every moment became more and more furious. The cannon the Glandelinians had brought up were turned upon the advancing lines of the revolutionists, and the first seven lines were wiped out of existence by the terrible artillery fire, and though the child rebels were finally checked with thousands of their dead and wounded strewn on the ground, the survivors would not give way, and the foremost lines opened a roaring withering fire, that tore the Glandelinian ranks to pieces. Angelina Arenburg at this time came up with a large force and these swept forward and poured over the enemies works and mixed in a hand to hand death struggle which raged for a minute only to be paused, and to only to go at it again. However on the first day the rebels were victorious. But the next morning thousands of the desperate Glandelinians marched to reinforced these already worn, and another fearful struggle raged all that day, without a pause, driving the rebels not from the Glandelinian works but from their own as well, seizing all the cannon left behind, and turning them upon the retreating rebels opened a most destructive fire driving them back and holding them back with great desperation. The next morning the child rebels came on in all their numbers, and at once the whole line of the enemy opened fire.

The first attacking divisions of the child rebels torn and bleeding from the horrible volleys fled in terror, but though the Glandelinians kept firing terrible volleys from every place of defence, with musketry and artillery the whole surviving assaulting line with their fierce rebel yell, rushed forward and soon in overwhelming numbers burst through the works. The simultaneous volleys that followed along the whole line of both foes were indescribable.

Countless numbers fell like grass, on the side of the rebels alone, and the hand to hand fight that followed seemed to threaten the very heavens. This fearful merciless struggle raged all day with many terrific terrific onslaughts made on both sides. Then as heavy reinforcements came up to the rescue just when the Glandelinians were about to be beaten, the child rebels greatly outnumbered were forced to give way. Hundreds of the rebels who were captured, as well as helpless children were murdered, as well as the child rebel officers, the child rebels being totally routed, the Glandelinians sacking all the Christian churches, and setting the whole town of Bonnaville on fire. When all the rebel survivors recoiled and left their battered positions, which the enemy had forced, and after mass made their way to safety, but in the pursuit, many of them were captured by the wicked Glandelinians, and hundreds who would not surrender, were literally cut to pieces. The chief leader Arenburg rushed into a church when assailed, and slamming and locking the door behind her, made her way out by the back and escaped them without loss of her followers.

But her clothes had been torn, her head was bound up, and one of her arms disabled. Rescue of the helpless children on the outskirts of the city of Beppo was utterly impossible, and all of those who were seized were horribly butchered. Then there came news, that all the members of the Angelinians in Calvernia were to be arrested, and it had become necessary for all the Christians in Beppo to show themselves in the streets, where they were liable to be insulted, and attacked by the Glandelinians. Every day the fierce Glandelinians thundered their fierce denunciations against the poor Christians, and it was certain that at any moment, the order for their arrest, and butchery would be given. Such bad news had been received in Hanson's place where he was residing, at such a dangerous time.

"It might still be possible to get the children away," said the Angelinian governor. "We have all the disguises in readiness, and I commit my wife and sister in law in your charge, Walter Jennings. Save then if you can, disguise them as you will, and make for Bondivia. As for ourselves we must go in the morning and go to a vacant house close in possession of the child rebels, and remain quietly there, and await the course of events. We can very well pass as Glandelinians."

A few minutes after Walter Jennings entered with the disguises he had prepared for the two women. They were such as would be worn by Glandelinian women only. He himself was attired in the uniform of a Glandelinian officer. The women put on the queer disguises, and the parting was a sad one indeed, but it was over at last, and Walter Jennings hurried the two women away. Hanson and the rest attired themselves in the oldest Glandelinian uniforms, and were seen already, deciding to slip out at the back entrance. They would have vent off now, but that the sight of Glandelinians moving through the streets, at this time would so likely attract attention, on the part of drunken Glandelinians or of fellows returning from these rascally butcheries, which were the center of the mischief, and focus of all the mischief, that was going on. After they all had put on their disguises, Hanson and the rest of the men, decided to lie down, sending Violet and her sisters off to another place, ready to arise at a moment's notice. Should they hear a shout, they would at once run to the long gallery, where the children would join them prepared for flight.

Then they would lead them instantly to the back entrance, avoiding, if possible any observation from the servants so to prevent a panic among them. As these sleep on the floors above, and knew nothing of the dangers which threatened them, they would not awaken so quickly, and they trusted in God that they could be able to go out without being seen by any of them. Ever hour the search for the suspects became stricter, people even in disguise, were being seized and murdered. Hanson and the rest had felt that it would be more dangerous to stay in the mansion, than to leave. Morning was just dawning when Governor Robert Vivian heard the sound of many feet trodding along the street and looking out saw a crowd of Glandelinians with torches headed by two whose feathery hats showed them to be general officers.

As they reached the entrance gate, the Glandelinians at the head of the column stepped. Governor Vivian and the two others at once darted away to the long gallery, and as they did so they heard a loud knocking at the gate and continuous shots. Scarcely had they reached the gallery, when a door at the further end opened and Violet and her sisters appeared. Jennie was weeping loudly but her sisters, although their cheeks bore traces of the many tears they had shed, and during the night restrained them now. When they reached the distressed children, Robert and the rest without a word led the way along the corridor and down the stairs toward the back of the house. Everything was quiet excepting the knocking and shooting, which loud as it was had not yet aroused the servants. And drawing the bolt quickly, they the way into the yard behind the house. Then for a moment they paused. There was the sound of axes being down the gate which led from the garden into the street behind.

"Quick my children no time to lose," said their father. He took the key out of the door and closed and locked it after him. Then throwing the keys among the shrubbery he took Violet and Jennie by their hands and led the way rapidly toward the gate which was a strong one.

"In here children," he said to Violet and her sisters pointing to some shrubs close to the gate. "They will rush straight toward the house, when the gate gives way, and we will slip out quietly." For nearly ten minutes the gate which was a strong one and bounded with iron, resisted the attack on it.

Then it crashed down and was as if Glandelinians with torches and armed with pikes, muskets and bayonets, poured in, yelling like demons. Jennie was clinging to Violet who was whispering to her little sister to be calm and brave, pressing the child closely to her while Joice Angeline Daisy and the other two little viv in go girls stood quiet and still by the side of their father, and the others, and all looked through the bushes. Some five hundred and fifteen Glandelinians entered, and a minute later, there was a sound of hammering at the door through which the christian fugitives had skinned forth.

"Now," said T Robert. "Let us be going."

Emerging from the shelter a few steps to the gate, and stepping on over the door which lay down straight on the ground, in the deep snow, they turned into a lane. They hurried down the lane, fearing that more Glandelinians would arrive before long and that they could surely be questioned. They took the first turning from the house, and then skirted their path, as they heard a number of foot steps, clattering on the pavements, but fortunately they reached another turning before the party of Glandelinians came up. They turned down and stood in a doorway, until the footsteps had passed, and then resumed their way. In ten minutes they reached a broad street which was filled with Glandelinians dressed in all queer manners, and wearing human hearts and shins. Jennie was dazed and frightened, mechanically holding her father's hand. From time to time her father addressed an encouraging word to Jennie and Angeline when he saw them shrink as the they approached groups of Glandelinians who in their hurry and excitement did not notice the so-called fugitives. After they reached the vacant place, and placing the children in complete shelter, their father alone left them, and set out to trace his steps across the broad street. When he reached the place, which took him in two hours, he found an immense crowd of Glandelinians going in and out, and those leaving the mansion, were laden with articles of furniture, furniture, clocks, pictures, bedding, and other things. A complete sack of the mansion was indeed taking place. The servants had all fled, and the Glandelinians had taken possession of the place.

The lofty mirrors were smashed into fragments, the costly hangings torn down, and after they had destroyed much of the elaborate furniture, every man began to lay hands upon what ever they fancied and the mansion was already stripped of the greater part of its belongings. With his hands in his pockets, whistling carelessly, the Angelinian governor wandered from room to room, watching the proceedings. Several barrels of sweet Angelinian wine, had been brought, and round these were gathered a score of Glandelinians, singing, shouting, and dancing.

"Drink," "Drink, drink, my uh nan." An officer said, holding a silver goblet full of wine toward him. "Drink confusion to the child rebels and to the christians who help them, and Satan and Hell to Glandelinia."

As it was not had wine, that makes a man drunk, the governor drank it without hesitating, and then heart sick, at the ruin and destruction, wandered out again, into the streets. Stumbling along, the governor stepped near enough, to a certain house, where groups of Glandelinians were standing in the road, to hear what they were saying in their conversation. He learned that more children had been captured, and slain only that morning. It had been effected quietly the doors had again been locked, before the child rebels were along in numbers, in the neighborhood of Beppe knew what was going on and guards had been put inside partly it was said that the mansion might be preserved from pillage, and be used for other purposes, partly that the general who was absent, might be arrested, when he returned. As the Angelinian governor knew the child rebel officer, he thought it probable that Gansoe who would soon return, and he at once proceeded toward the gate, by which he would enter on his return hence.

The Angelinian governor sat down, a short distance from the gate, and watched patiently for some hours until he perceived a handsome looking figure in an officers uniform, approaching in full gallop, and at once recognized Gansoe. The governor went forward onto the road and held out his arms. The general a boy of sixteen, not recognizing the Angelinian governor in his disguise, and believing him to be a Glandelinian, did not check his horse, and would have ridden him down, had he not jumped aside, the same time shouting to him to stop.

"Fellow or officer, what in the name of common sense do you want?" Gansoe exclaimed angrily, reigning in his pony. "By the way I have a good mind to arrest you, you old Glandelinian for stepping me. Get out of my way confound you, or I'll!"

"You do not recognize me?" The governor said. "I am governor Vivu."

"You do not recognize me..." The governor said. "I am governor Vika Viken, and I am here to warn you of the danger of proceeding."
"Why should I care?" Ganson exclaimed anxiously.
"And why are you in this disguise, Robert Viken?"
"A great number of captives have been taken, among christians men, women and children. The Glandelinnians are waiting inside of your house to arrest you as you enter."
Ganson gave a exclamation of anger and surprise, then dropped a roll of paper to the governor, and turning his horse galloped off, saying that he would warn all the towns, and bring a big force of rebels and attack them. The news of his wholesale arrests, which had been made during the recent battle, had filled the Glandelinnians with joy, and the air was full of shouts of:
"Down with the christian dogs." "Down with the innocent children..."

At various points Glandelinnians united upon steps, or the pedestal pedestals of religious statues, harangued the others, while from these to these, masses of the Glandelinnians opened and made way for their leaders who were cheered. After remaining there for sometime, the governor made his way to the entrance of St. Patrick's Church. A crowd of Glandelinnians were gathered there, and a tremendous rush was made, when the doors were broken open. The governor managed to force his way in, and then out, as he feared that the for-fus would suspect him, and make trouble for his nation, if they suspected that he was spying on them. He now made his way to the apartment, where he had left the rest, and his entry was received with a cry of satisfaction from all. The poor children burst into tears of happiness, when they knew that they, for sometime, had escaped from the dangers which threatened.
It seemed to them all that they would be safer here, than they would be journeying to Boudinia. The papers were saying that in consequence of the escape of suspected persons, and of the migration of others to join the enemies of Glandelinnia orders had been sent that the strictest scrutiny was to be exercised, on the roads leading to Boudinia, fifty miles away, over all strangers, who may pass through. A child who could not give a perfectly satisfactory answer, or an account of themselves, and produce their papers, would be arrested and sent to Beppe. Every day the excitement in Beppe increased, every day there were fresh captures, until the prison prisons became crowded to overflowing. It was late when the child rebels under Victor came advancing, and had laid siege to Pence--Gee-Wella, and terror was added to the real emotions, which excited to madness the men of Glandelinnia by Beppe. Black flags with the skulls and bones, were hung from every steep, roof and window.
The Glandelinnians were dragging their sabres and so on would hunch furiously at the prisoners, of whom most were children, priest brothers and nuns. And now by all these massacres the Glandelinnian country was to stand forth in the eyes of all those nations, as a blood thirsty, the blood staining monster, the enemy not of christians only, but of God and his less children in general. Thus the Glandelinnians were convinced almost entirely of the souls of hell, wretches and human devils, who had long been at war with Holy Religion, who hated the poor, hated all the priests and christians, hated all in heaven above, who had loved Satan more than they had loved those that demons, or the wild dragons themselves.
The shouts of the executioners were taken up, sounding very unsonny, and echoed by the cruel heartless Glandelinnians. Unearthly savage cries, curses and threats, for wicked vengeance, and so on filled the air.

ANXIOUS AND THRILLING DAYS.

All were armed, and knives, and bludgeons, muskets, bayonets and sabres, including pikes, were brandished into the air or shaken. Blood had been tasted & tasted and all the savage instinct were on fire. Twenty four persons, of whom, twenty were children, were brought out from the prison, by a large party of Glandelinian officers who shouted:

"TO THE SLAUGHTER HOUSE."

These cruel heartless gray-coated ruffians pushed the weeping and screaming children, into coaches standing at the door, shouting:

"YOU WILL DIE FOR SATAN."

When the carriages reached the slaughter house the prisoners were carried out one by one, while some one shouted:

"FOR YOU KIDS THE EXECUTIONERS ARE WAITING! EVEN THE PEOPLE ARE WAITING TO TEAR YOU TO PIECES! TO PLEASE SATAN."

All the victims were cut to pieces, right in front of the place where Hanson and the rest were, by the Glandelinian butchers.

"This is horrible," muttered to her father who saw it all from their place of shelter.

"Look at these hellish faces, of men debased by wilful crime, sodden with stench drink, degraded below the level of beasts, exulting in the thought of blood, lust for murder, and to think that these cruel heartless creatures are the ones made by our own dear God."

"Great heaven, what can come of it in the future? What is going to take place now?"

"Wholesale slaughter I fear Violet dear," said her father. "What seems entirely incredible, impossible, is going to take place. There is to be a massacre of all the poor prisoners."

The Glandelinians had by this time reached a large tall monastery of priests and monks, now converted into a terrible prison, which was entirely impassable, escape from, though used by friends. This was right in front of their place of safety, and here a large number of priests, women and children, Christians brothers and nuns, had been collected with their arms bound with chains. The Glandelinians entered, and the poor prisoners were fixed into the street where all the Glandelinians fell upon upathen, and heaved them down, cut out their hearts and stuck them as pike, and also their heads. All the poor little children, whom Christ loved as dearly, were among the slain, their poor little bodies cut to pieces, and the assassinations did not cease at all, until the last prisoner had been hacked to pieces. Then the Glandelinians returned to the slaughter house, and with a mob of fierce ugly looking Glandelinian soldiers, and executioners, rebel soldiers, were first brought out. They did not get any trial at all, where the heinous executioners were waiting them. Many poor children who were really first, being frightened out of their wits, were hoisted to go out, when they saw the cruel murderers, and screaming ripped open, a young boy, the first child rebel soldier, with head erect was the first to pass through the fatal doors. Being pierced with long bayonets, he fell in a moment. The rest followed praying and wept as they entered into the galleries, which surrounded the halls, and applauded with fierce unearthly yells, the order of the helpless victims. When the child rebels, and the children, who were little boys had been butchered, the murder of poor little girls was now followed. One after another they were conducted, to the door and slain. They shared the fate of the child rebel soldiers, being torn to pieces by pikes, and was carried in triumph, under the windows of the main prisons, where only children were were confined, and was held up to the bars, for them to see. Many of the poor children fainted at the terrible sight, of the pale heads of their friends.

But now here at the other prisons there was a method in the work of murder. The officers of the execution, took possession of the hall, at the entrance, and permitted none to pass further into the prison, the murders and officials, bringing down the screaming children, in batches, and handing them over for slaughter. The screams of the butchered children, was indescribable, and also were the pleading for mercy. The Angelidian governor, and the rest could not avoid hearing the deafening shrieks of the helpless victims, and the unearthly yells of the Glandelinians.

"Poor things, poor things," said Violet, shaking her head sadly. "It is terrible."

But all the child rebels and the priests and nuns and Christian brothers, had indescribable courage. Men and women were alike. There was not one of them, but faced the cruel judges bravely, and went to their death, as calmly as if to dinner. It was the same thing at all the other prisons. The priest too. Their priest at the little church, at the corner of the street, where Hanson and the rest used to go in every morning to pray. He was dragged away ten days ago, to the slaughter house, and now he was a saint in heaven.

"How is it papa, that God allows such things to happen?"

Asked Violet.

"We cannot tell," said her father sadly. "As for myself I can hardly believe it though I see it. I have heard that there were 5,000 prisoners in the jails, and they were all murdered. Such a thing was never heard of before. I hardly can believe, that I am not in a dream, now as it seems so."

There was now a tall handsome child rebel officer and his sister brought out to the slaughter together. They were asked, either they had anything to say way they should not be punished for their crimes against Satan.

The rebel laughed aloud:

"Crimes!" He exclaimed. "Do you think that we are going to plead for our lives to a band of murderers and assassins? Come my dear sister. We will go to heaven together praying."

He just gave her one kiss, then took her hand, as if they were going to walk hand in hand, and then he led her down between the line of gun guards, with his head erect, and a scornful smile on his face. His pretty sister did not smile, but her step did not falter, and her eyes were all ablaze in holy anger. She was very pale and she did not look proud, but she walked as calmly and as steadily as her brother, until they reached the door, where the executioners with fixed bayonets were waiting them, and then it was over in a minute, and they died without a groan. Men with scared faces stood at some of the doors in the houses across the street, to gather the news of the murder, murder from passer bys, and pale women looked yieldly from the upper windows. Violet witnessed all the massacres, and to his horror saw also that little Annie A. vonburg was among the slain. But he could not find no trace of May, Walter Jennings.

When he reached the house he could not summon the courage to enter it, until at last he saw general Gannon put his head from a window. He saw succeeded in catching his eye, and placing his finger on his lip lips signed to him to come down. A minute later he appeared at the door.

"Is it all true Jimmie! I hear they are murdering all the prisoners. Surely it must be false! They could never dare to do such a thing."

"It is true Gannon. I have seen it all myself. I went with the disguise to see if I could rescue some of the victims, but I could not get to them. The devils have murdered them all."

"Oh the poor things," Gannon cried bursting into tears, despite himself.

"To think that they are murdered, and the poor children up-stairs. What shall I do? What shall I do? Jimmie tell me!"

"To break it to them Gannon. Do they know how great the danger is?"

"No I have kept it from them. They can see from the window that something unusual is going on every one can see that."

"They are very anxious, very anxious, but they are quite unprepared for this. Break it gradually Gannon. Tell them first that there are rumors that the prisons were emptied. Come down presently as if to get more news and then tell them that there are reports that the prisoners have been massacred and then at last tell them all the truth."

"But will you not come up, Jimmie--They trust in you as in a man. Your presence will be a support to them."

"I would do nothing now," Jimmie said. "God . . . there are so many of them. They had beat me by themselves for a while. I will come in the evening. The first burst of grief will be over then, and my call may get them to arouse themselves. Oh if I had but tried to get them out of the prison sooner, and yet who could have guessed, that here in Beppe fifty miles away from Calavernia thousands of innocent and helpless prisoners would be murdered in cold blood."

Finding that he could not persuade Jimmie to enter, Gannon turned to perform his painful duty, while Jimmie Vivian thoroughly exhausted, with the horrors, made his way to a vacant building, and throwing himself on the hard floor, fell asleep and did not wake up until the evening. His first step was to plunge his head into water, and then after a good wash, to prepare a meal. His sleep had restored energy, and with brisk steps, he made his way through the streets, to where poor Violet and her sisters were. He knocked with his knuckles at the outer door of the apartment, and Gannon opened it quickly.

"Come in," he said. "And sit down. They are in their room, and I think that they have cried themselves to sleep. My heart had been breaking all day to see them."

"It has been dreadful," he continued. "Poor little Jennie cried terribly, sobbed for hours, but it was a long time before her sisters cried. Violet fainted, and when I got her up and around, lay still and quiet, without speaking. Jesse and Angelina were worse of all though the other two cried bitterly for hours. Jesse and Angelina, sent in that lounge with their eyes staring open, and their faces as white as if they had been dead. They did not seem to hear anything anything I said, but at last when Jennie's sobs were stopping, her father began to talk to her about the innocent child victims, and their pretty ways, and then at last they all broke down, and cried so wildly and pitifully that we were all as moved and frightened and then their father cried too, and threatened, that if he ever gets back to Angelina he will make Glandelinia pay dearly for all this cruelty. After a while I persuaded them to lie down and as I have not heard a sound for the last half hour, I hope the Good God has sent them all to sleep. But--MY, the two governors were angry when I first told them this. I'm afraid they will war against Glandelinia, when they get the first opportunity. I hope that will be a long time though."

"I trust so indeed," said Gannon. "And so am I. I will stay here quietly for an hour then if we hear nothing, I will go home, and be back again in the morning. Sleep will do more good for them, than anything I can say."

At the end of an hour, all was still. Jimmie with a somewhat lighter heart took his departure. At six in the next morning he was again at the house. When he entered Jennie ran to him, and throwing her arms around his neck, again burst into a series of sobs. Jimmie felt that this was the best thing that could have happened, for the other Vivian girls were occupied for sometime, in trying to smother her crying, quietly to themselves while they did so. At last her sobs became less violent. "And now Jimmie dear," Violet said turning to him. "Will you tell us all about it?"

"I will tell you only that the poor innocents died as you might be sure they would, valiantly and fearlessly, and that they suffered but very little. But you may be sure that those human tigers will not be satisfied with the blood they have shed, but that they will long for fresh victims. The prisons are empty now. The only thing for us, is that we must turn our thoughts to our making our escape to Angelina. I fear that there is peril everywhere, but it might be forced I think it will be useless for us to reach Angelina now by land. At every inn and village they will be on the lookout for fugitives, and whatever disguise we might put on, we could not escape observation. I think that we might try and make for the sea, dangerous as it is in the winter and grab a boat to take us to Angelina. But we must not hurry. In the first place we must settle all our plans, carefully and prepare our disguises. In the next place there will be much tremendous excitement, when the news of what happened here, is known that it will be unsafe to travel. I think myself that it will be best to wait a little until there is a lull. That's what I want you all to think over and decide. I do not think there is any very great danger here for the next few days, at any rate it will be better to get everything in readiness for flight, so that we can be ready at once."

If we hear any fresh news for a search for suspects we are doomed if we do not take flight."

Jimmie was prepared to find that his suggestion answered the purpose for which he made it. The children began to discuss about the disguises which would be required, and the best way to be taken. So their thoughts for a time turned from the shock they had sustained. The Glandelinian officers had sent all the committees connecting with them in the towns throughout the country the news of the execution of the enemies of Glandelinia confined in the prisons, and urged that a similar step should at once be taken with reference to all the prisoners in their hands. The order was promptly obeyed. And throughout all of the western part of Calavernia massacres similar to these in Beppe were at once carried out. A carnival of murder and horror had commenced and the madness of blood raged throughout the whole of the western part of the country. Such being the case, Jimmie found it by no means difficult to dissuade the rest of his relations and friends from taking instant steps, toward making their escape. He was determined that he would not leave Beppe until the issue was decided one way or the other, and when with the children he discouraged any idea of an immediate flight. This was most easy for the news from the provinces, showed that the situation was everywhere as bad as it was in Beppe. He was however in a state of great uneasiness. Many of the moderate deputies had been seized others had sought safety in flight, and the search for suspects were carried on vigorously. Difficult and dangerous as it would be to endeavor to travel through Calavernia with his parents and the rest he would have attempted it without hesitation rather than remain in Beppe if he once could get one of the battle sars of the insurrection, but as he knew none would be given to any one on account of the serious condition of the rebels since the last battle with the enemy. One morning Jimmie Vivian was walking with Violet and Jennie while Angelina and her other sisters were together a short distance behind them. They had just reached a flower market which was generally the main object of their walk, when a man on horse back came along at a fast pace. His eyes fell on Violet's face, and rested there at first with a doubtful recognition, followed by a start of surprise and satisfaction. It was the one who had been knocked down in her escape from the Glandelinians, after spying on them for Angelina Aramburg. His name was a funny one, Olmbe, Terbocker. He reined in his horse instantly with the exclamation:

"Violet Vivian!"

Violet did not answer.

"It goes to my heart he went on, with a sneer. "To be obliged to do my duty. But however unpleasant it is to you I don't care and am glad. Corporal guard number one." He said raising his voice:

"I want two men well disposed to Sateen."

Two soldiers grinning friendly came forward.

"This small female is an Angelinian spy in disguise," he went on pointing to poor Violet who was too terrified to move. "In the name of Sateen I arrest her, and you take her into your charge. Where is the two men and the other children with her? Seize them also on a charge of harboring an enemy of Sateen."

"But they were gone. The nearest Terbocker had had looked around in search of assistance Violet had whispered in Jimmie's ear:

"Fly Jimmie for the sake of my sisters and parents. If you are arrested, they are lost. God and my guardian angel will save me."

Has he and Gannon are no longer concerned, they would have stood by Violet and shared her fate, but the word of F. "For the sake of her sisters," and the rest decided them, and they had instantly slipped away, among the crowd, whose attention had been attracted by Terbocker's first words, and dived into a small shop, where they at once began to bargain for clothing.

"Where do the two men, and the other little girls?" Terbocker repeated angrily.

"What were they like?" One of the Glandelinians asked him.

Terbocker could not give any description whatever of them. He had noticed that Violet was speaking to some one, when first caught, or when he first caught sight of her face, but he had noticed nothing more and did not know whether the men were young or old.

"I can't tell you." He said in a tone of vexation. "Never mind, I will find them later on, or I am a liar, and I swear even by their God, that within two days they will be captured, or I'm a gener. But this capture is more important."

He was right, and carried out his oath, as we will read by and by. So saying he set out, Violet walking beside him, with a rough guard on either hand, weeping bitterly. Violet was taken at once before the committee sitting room, for the discovery and arrest of suspects.

"She was or, I charge this little girl with being an Angelina child in disguise. She is the daughter of Robert Vivian, governor of the Angelinian country. I'm glad that it should fall to my lot to sentence her."

"You have done perfectly right." The president of the committee said. "As I understand, that she is really Violet Vivian, I will at once sign the order for her removal to the main prison. There is room there, though the prisoners are filling up fast."

"We must have another jail delivery." One of the committee, said brutally, and a murmur of assent passed through the chamber. The order was made out, and poor Violet despite her plauds and screams, was handed over to the armed guard, to be taken with the next batch of prisoners to the main prison. Gannon was some twenty yards behind poor Violet and Jimmie, when Terbecker checked his horse before her. He recognized the glandelinian instantly, and saw that Violet's disguise had been discovered. His first impulse, was to rush to her aid, but the hopelessness of such an attempt at interference, instantly struck him, and to the surprise of the other Vivian Girls, who were looking into a shop and had not noticed what was occurring he turned suddenly with them down a side street.

"What are you doing, Mr. Gannon, we shall lose Jimmie and our sister in the crowd if we do not keep them in sight!" Gannon merely answered: "I know what I'm doing, and I will tell you presently."

He walked along several streets until he came to an unfrequented thoroughfare.

"There is something wrong Gannon: I see it in your face." Jennie exclaimed in alarm. "Tell us at once please do!"

"It is bad news," Gannon said quietly. "Try and nerve yourselves little girls, for you will need all your courage. Violet is a captured."

"JOH GANNON!" Jennie exclaimed, bursting into tears, while Joice Angelina and the other little girls, stood still and motionless.

"Why are you taking us away?" Said Joice, in a hard shrill voice which Gannon would not recognize as her own. "Our place is with her and where she goes we will go. You have no right to lead us away. We will go back to her at once."

"You can do her no good, Joice dear," Gannon said with deep emotion and pity. "You could not help her, and it would only add to her misery. If you and your other sisters were in their hands, nothing at all could be done. Besides we can be of more use outside. Trust to me Joice. I will do all in my power to save her, what ever the risk."

"Jimmie could not save the other poor children," Jennie said with a quivering lip.

"No dear, but he would have saved them, had there been but a little time to do so. Courage Joice, do not give way. I depend on God D GOD to help me."

The novel was successful, and Joice burst into a paroxysm of tears. Gannon did not try to check them, and in a short time the sobbing ceased, and Joice raised her curly head again.

"I feel better now," she said. "Come Jennie and Angelina, and my other little sisters, and dry your eyes darling. We shall have plenty of time to cry afterwards. Are we to go home Mr. Gannon?"

"Have they taken Jimmie?" Asked Angelina.

"I don't know Joices. That is the first thing to find out. Let us push on now, so that if he has not been taken we shall reach home before him. We shall place ourselves at the corner of our street and wait for him for one hour. He may be appearing sometime in looking for us. But if he does not come by the end of that time, I shall feel sure, that it is because he is captured."

They hurried on until they were nearly home, the brisk walk, having as Gannon had thought it would do, had the effect of preventing the thoughts of the children from dwelling upon Violet's capture. They had not been more than a quarter of an hour at their post, when Gannon gave an exclamation, as he saw Jimmie Vivian approaching, but in a rage. Gannon and the other little Vivian Girls hurried to meet him.

The general of the danger that the rebel army was in, and the snow covered woods where the enemy would be.

"Thank God that you are safe dears," said Jimmie with true tears of rage streaming down his cheeks. "I thought of you in the middle of it all but I was sure that Gannon would see what was being done, and get you away."

"And how Gannon DID!" said Gannon. How did you get away?"

"We have been terribly anxious, thinking that they might seize you to and that would have been dreadful!" said Angelina.

"So they would have done," said Jimmie angrily. "But with that villain looking glandelinian officer looking away for the moment, Violet was released."

"But Jimmie for the sake of my sisters."

I slipped away in the crowd, without even stopping to think and ran into a shop, and it was well that I did for he shouted for the men to seize me, and the children too, but I was gone, as and as I don't think he noticed me, before they had moved away I came out. I looked for you for sometime, and then made up my mind that you have come home with the children."

"This is awful," said the governor when the rest had gone home, and told him about it. "Thousands of children murdered, Violet in prison, Joice and her other sisters with no one to trust but me, my brother, son and two friends. All the governments in Angelina are in a general state of mind about me and the villainous girl. It is awful to think of: it is enough to drive a fellow out of his senses. Have you thought of anything yet?" He continued to sit on Jimmie Vivian. The Angelinian governor was alone that evening for the others were inside the other room, and the Vivian girls had laid down and cried themselves to sleep.

"I have thought of a number of things," he replied. "But at present I have fixed upon nothing. I cannot carry out any original plan of setting out officers. It would require more than six to carry out such a scheme."

"Could you disguise yourself as a glandelinian general and get Gannon to help you seize that Terbecker? He is not so strong as you are, but he could hold a gun, and he would kill him if he tried to."

"It is afraid that wouldn't do Jimmie!" The governor said with a slight smile and a shaking his head. "It is a mistake to say that he is not strong, for he is a very good fellow, and I never knew. The plan I thought of was to try and get appointed as a warden in the prison but that is full of difficulties, for I knew that they would all recognize me despite my disguise. Then I thought if I let out that I was an Angelinian I might get arrested and lodged in the same prison and might help her to get out. From what I hear the prisons are not separate, and that all the prisoners live together."

"How much dear?" Jennie exclaimed in a tone of sharp pain as she said in. "You must not do that of all things, and if you are once in prison, you really will never get out again. Besides there are lots of other prisons, and there is no reason why they should send you to the main prison rather than anywhere else. We would never consent to that plan."

"I thought of doubtful myself," said the Angelinian governor. "Of course if I knew that they would send me to the main prison I might risk it. I could hide a file and steel saw about me and might cut through the bars. But as you say there is no reason why they should send me there rather than anywhere else. I would kill that villain who arrested me, and I would try to get out. The next best plan would be to try and write some of the wardens though it is dangerous. So I have decided to be glad enough to take money if they could see their way to letting her out without fear of detection. Of course there is a certain risk Jimmie anyway. There is no getting a prisoner out of the main prison without running some sort of risk. The thing is to fix on as safe a plan as we can. However ever however we must think it over well before we try. Now good night, and keep your courage up Jennie."

Peer Jennie made no answer but her eyes were full of tears, as she put her little hand into her father's, and he went away from her side, in answer to his good night.

Indeed for all the prisoners there was no chance whatever to escape. For all they were matched like Jews in day and night. They were packed up at day five or six together in little dirty and dark cells, filled with all kinds of dangerous rats and mice but in the night were in a common hall filled with dead stinking tow linen. Every day some persons were killed out, and these were dragged away never to ~~see~~ be seen again. Not one of the prisoners

That one of the prisoners could see any possible way of escape unless on page 1 helped them; Violet Hude had no hope, and when the list was called out every morning, those who were named were dragged off, to be cruelly slaughtered.

"If she is murdered," said the Anglinian governor to himself, "I will kill Terbecker as I would a snake, for he will be her murderer, just as much as if he himself had cut her throat. I would do it at once if I were not for her sisters. I must not run unnecessary risks. At any risk, I need not think of the new, the one thing at present is to get 'Mabel' out."

It seemed to him that there must be some way of getting her out, if it could only hit upon it. He turned over in his mind every escape he could think of and read of but in most of these the prisoner had been unable capable of using tools planned in to him to saw through iron bars, pierce walls or evade jailers. Some had even saved by the fault relatives, wives or daughters, who went in badly, and even exchanged clothes and places with them, but this was not feasible at any of the prisons here in possession of the glandelinians. There was not at any of the prisons where relatives could call upon friends far to be a relative of a prisoner was quite sufficient in the eyes of the glandelinians "to mark any one as being their enemy. T

The next day the governor felt a thrill go through him as he glanced over a list which told of children to be executed on the following day he saw the name of "VIOLET VIVIAN".

Hour after hour and had seen scores of poor little girls and boys taken out to the execution. They had a regular rendezvous, and with a cry of delight, Jennie sprang to her father and clung to him as if he were a giant. He kissed her and she kissed him in the happiness of the happiness of the return of her sister. The meeting of the sisters was a happy one. They fell on each other's neck, and for some time they were silent. Then, looking all preparations were made for the day, they started out.

For quite a while they trudged on, when Violet turning her head saw for off among the crowd a man who followed following them. Violet then came along within a few minutes, but instead of the two to go to Hannon, who was waiting, walked straight on, saying on the way followed:

"What? I think that we are being followed by a Glendalino."

Hannon at once drew back, and allowed them to go on sixty yards. Before he moved after them. As there were many people about, it was some little time before he could verify Violet's suspicion. Then he noticed a Glendalino looking very much like the other, within a short distance, ahead of him, and he followed, each thinking that Violet was mistaken, and the next day, he was right.

They were in a quiet street, and then questioned him, until he was alone behind the Glendalinos. Then he drew one of his pistols, and springing forward, struck him a heavy blow on the back with the butt. The great headless Glendalino fell forward on his face, without a cry or groan, and Hannon satisfied that he had stunned him, ran on and overtook the others, and turning down the first street they came to, was assured by that they were safe from pursuit.

"We had noticed that Glendalino looking after us after against the house opposite ours all the morning," Robert Violet said. "And came to the conclusion that he must be watching us, so we looked out for him when we came out, and noticed that as soon as we went on to leave, he walked straight up to us. He told the others to walk ahead of him, so without stopping, when we came up to him, so he is not to follow him with suspicion. I can assure you would manage somehow to get rid of him."

Hannon laughed. "If fancy he will spend his time in bad this afternoon, and tomorrow, instead of loitering about a Park. He will teach him to mind his own business, in future, and to leave poor children and children alone. I am very glad that he did follow you for I had, and him something for shooting Violet in the hand and can never leave Pappa without paying my debt. Now I think we are pretty well squared."

At the very first small village they came to they found how strict was the watch, upon persons leaving Pappa and had to reason it to capture a man from the army. Hannon had knocked down.

No sooner had they set down in the village entered to breakfast, when six Glendalino officers presented themselves, and asked them who they were, and where they were going.

The reduction of the document at once satisfied them, and they quickly left after breakfast and with their bundles in their hands they trudged along the road. They met with no adventure whatever on the journey to Alcala which was performed in never at hours the town being not far away. The weather was fearfully cold although it was moving on to the first of November. On arriving at Alcala Robert proceeded first to the town governor's house and producing the document received a small to lodge in the town. The governor's brother, and Hannon then looked for apartments in the neighborhood of the Angelino River and quickly obtained them. The three men being in danger at once were assured for themselves much attention from the authorities of the Glendalinos.

During their stay in the town, in order that they could not be for themselves with what sent the instructions received from Pappa, for the examination of all the children were being carried out. This officer then accepted of it, and made him to obtain information of all that was going on. He did not seem to be at all interested in the children, but for their feelings were deeply hurt and concerned by parents and numerous mannerisms, which they were permitted to prevent, for they did not venture to raise their voices in the case of parents.

For had they done so it would have been met with a severe punishment. They found that horrible as were the butcheries in the case they were even surprised by those that were met in the provinces and that in Alcala.

In particular a terrible persecution was being under the direction of Terrier, who had been sent down from Pappa as a commissioner from the committee there. Hannon next object was to make the acquaintance of all the Glendalinos stationed at the town, but this however he and the other two men found much more difficult than they had expected. The terror was insuperable.

The news of the slaughter of the two most children had brightened the day. Hannon had been going everywhere, over the western part of Glendalino. The worst of all the great Glendalinos or Glendalinos were not their numbers and under pretended accusations were seeking their ends on the respectable in nations around. None were to high or to low to be denounced in christianity and the domestic violence followed by slaughter. Then their efforts to make acquaintance among the Glendalinos met with very slight success.

They were strangers and that was sufficient to cause distrust and fear. Hannon, it became apparent that they had come from Pappa with no special authority to hunt in the work of a slayer. They soon perceived that they were regarded with absolute hostility, and one day one of the Glendalinos said:

"Did I see your faces, years and yet not come down the river, after dark, for there is a strong feeling against you, and unless you have some good like your bodies fished out of the river, with half a dozen knife holes in them, you will take my advice."

They began to feel about crushed under their responsibilities. Their utterances of the Glendalinos were tried them greatly. They were at no further progress whatever, whatever in their efforts to obtain a purgatory, but went back to where the children were. They told the children how completely they had failed, with the Glendalinos. The ferry men and how no actual feeling of hostility against them had been.

"I think we could have stood that Jennie, but the fact is that terrible cruelty that tries us. It is no use to be hearing those floods, marking out their victims, and exulting over their murder, that at times we feel tempted to turn our backs upon some of the Glendalinos. Glendalinos and struggle the life they do the poor helpless little children. Many poor child or any, Glendalinos and even hidden away on some ferry boat but got easily to Angelino but of course it was a great risk, for it is death to hand at any of the christians. Still the Glendalinos ferry-men are always ready to run the risk."

Two days after the Angelino governor came to the lodging place earlier than usual.

"I feel that our position is getting more and more dangerous right along," he said. "He would be entered. For I don't play my part sufficiently well. I do not butcher children with them and I'm not forward enough in their violent councils. I cannot bring myself to vote for their proposals for massacre when there is any old division among them, and neither can I vote for them for they seem to recognize the traitor of Balen. I fear violence to one of the council when they were killing a little girl in front of him. We have been asked questions lately, as to why we are here, and why we have come. I have been thinking for the last few hours, whether it would not be better for us to make our way down to the mouth of the river and try to bribe some of the Glendalinos ferry men in the village there, and could not have that ill feeling against us and this at other two men, that the men have here, to take us to sea, or if that could not be managed, to get on board some little boat ourselves at night, and run off by ourselves, in the hopes of being picked up by an American ship."

Robert Violet his brother and Hannon had to be for some days feeling that danger was thickening around them. They had noticed angry glances cast at them by the Glendalinos council men, and had heard continual expressions of doubt whether they had really been sent from Pappa, and believed that they were fugitives. That very evening as he came out from the meeting he heard one of the Glendalinos say to another:

"I'll bet they are once again it and when killed the one who were killed, all the other Glendalinos, and so in the other by King much alike, but the other fallen to such little men like I've seen before. I tell you I am shall watch them there closely. They have some children with them, that looks like those little Violet girls, we had seen at Glendalino, the men who saw the paper told me. I shall make it my business to get to the bottom of the affair, and we will make short work of them if we find that they are those accursed Angelinos."

The Angelino governor said therefore that the danger was a even more urgent and he was right.

"He you told me all that," asked Violet.

"Not quite all Violet dear, I am just thinking it over. I fear that the danger is more pressing than I have said." And he repeated the same sentence he had overheard overheard.

"Even now," he said, "that fellow is maybe watching outside, or making inquiries about us."

"But why can we not run away at once?" Jennie said. "Why do we wait till they come and take us, carry us away, and kill us?"

This was a question that could not be answered. The next morning the two governors and Hanson went out as usual. Immediately after breakfast for a three hours walk. To day they felt more anxious than ever, scarcely heading where they walked, they were not longer than usual, and it was nearly four hours after they started, before they approached the town again, by the road along the river bank. Just when he came to the first house, several stern looking Calverlinians, who were standing there rushed up to him quickly.

"You are the three Angelinians who lived with the children next door to Mary Love, are you not?" Asked the Calverlinian who reached him first.

Robert rose answered hurriedly, with a strange presentiment of evil.

"Mary Love bid me to tell you three Angelinians that two hours after you started this morning a party of Glendellians came to the house and arrested the poor little girls, and carried them off. Some of the Glendellians have remained there watching for your return."

Robert, Hans Hanson, and Hanson staggered as if struck with a blow.

"Poor girls, dear!" The chief Calverlinian said, "I am so sorry, but the ghostly puller in their faces. 'But I pity you three. I know Calverlinian is forlorn that these enemies of God should have dared carry off those who are so pure and innocent, but what could we do. We indeed did him at the Glendellians and we would have pulled them had we not been afraid of striking the poor little girls. When these watching Glendellians had gone Mary Love said to some of us 'The best thing that we can do for those poor little angels is to save their guardians from being caught also. So now we have done so and if you know the peril they were now in you would go to their rescue. Do you understand?' He asked, laying his hand on his arm, for the governor seemed dazed and stupid, with the shock they had received.

"I understand," he said in a low voice. "Thank you all for your warning."

"Mary Love said," continued the Calverlinian "Whoever met you was to tell you to be on this road, by the river just outside the town at after dark and she would bring you three men some clothes and tobacco where you would be safe for the result of this capture. It is that the city is besieged by over 500,000 child rebels and will be under fire soon. You were to go away again and keep far from this town."

"Yes, I will be here with my brother and companion this evening," answered the governor.

So saying he and the rest turned and moved away walking unsteadily as if they were drunk. The Calverlinians looked after them frowningly and then shaking their head and muttering execrations against the Glendellians, they made their way back to their houses. Hanson and the two others walked on slowly in a bitter rage to think that just as the moment when a chance of escape might be opened just when the dangers seemed nearly the children should have fallen into the hands of the enemy, and they not to strike a blow in their defense. To think of Violet Jean and the other Vivian girls, his bright fearless daughters, and ailing little Vivian girl, his bright fearless daughter. It was maddening. But they quickly changed their minds and with more elastic steps strode away into the country and for hours walked on till it was evening. They revolved plan after plan in their minds for rescuing the children. They again approached the spot, where where they had that morning received so heavy a blow.

Mary Love was there waiting for them, and told them to come up.

"Oh dear," she began. "But this is a terrible day. Oh if I had known a day or two earlier they could have saved in time, and now they are in the power of those wretches."

"But we will not need those clothes, and all save them to night or know the reason why," said the governor. "Thank you but we will start without delay."

THE BATTLE

THE BATTLE OF ALICIE.

It happened that the child slaves in the city where the Vivian girls were already taken from their father had risen up with the other rebels and serious results was to follow.

superior general of the danger that the rebel army was in. Some of the rebels retreated into the snow covered woods where the enemy would not dare to follow pursuing in a deadly fire which had great effect upon the graycoats. The rebels had already brought up sixteen field guns.

So intent were the Glendellians on rescuing the innocent children, that they did not know that over 100,000 rebels had taken the town and were aware of it only when they saw them advancing for the line of prisons where the Vivian girls were confined. The child rebels made a desperate onslaught on the Glendellians defending the prisons and the other child slaves who had risen up in rebellion also turned against the Glendellians making one onslaught after another. The Glendellians repelled the insurgents with might and main in beating back every attack with frightful loss to the insurgents. At the moment the child rebels were about to be routed the Angelinian governor came to their rescue with a host 10,000 of his soldiers captured the prisons and rescued his daughters.

The governor no doubt had in Calverlinia a beautiful mansion and lots of righteous servants but ever, day even during all the excitement over the massacres which was continuing, he had a very wicked butler, and this very man filled him with suspicion. The butler had no love for poor Catholics, shunned their idea of going to confession and said that Christ had never been on the earth. He had tried to persuade the Angelinian governor to become a protestant or a gine-gine Glendellian giving him all kinds of discouraging reasons about the Catholic religion. He even said sometimes that if Robert Vivian forsaked the Catholic religion, and persuaded others to do so, he would do more work than he was doing and find his another pretty child whom he could adopt. But the governor had firmly refused and so the wicked butler kept up his coaxing, and made fun of the governor and the rest which instead of discouraging him, like some other Catholics made him very angry. When the time came for the butler to retire, Violet went to him, telling him that he was wanted in the office. The butler went into the office where the governor was sitting down writing a message to the western governors of Angelinia. The governor arose when the butler entered, and looked at him with disgust and disdain.

"What you want?" The butler asked, thinking that the governor was going to give him his wages that day.

"See here," said the governor. "If you think I'm going to abandon my religion just to please you you are greatly mistaken and none of your persuading, and more of it will cause your arrest."

"But you are foolish to believe that there is such a person as a Christ for he is not true and never was alive." The Angelinian governor was struck with the idea that this very butler was a Glendellian in disguise for no real Christian or Angelinian would talk in such a wicked way.

"You are a glandelinian in disguise." Thundered the Angelinian governor, bringing his fist down on his desk with a bang. "Your very wickedness and words shows it, and you can't make any excuse or deny it. You are to remain only till to-morrow afternoon and if I find my suspicions correct I'll have you arrested and condemned to be shot as a spy. YOU'RE DISMISSED."

The butler left scowling to himself, and planning for revenge. The next morning the governor Hanson, Jennie and Gannon left the children in the care of the maid for they were going out to search for Walter Jennings, who was still missing. When the governor left, the butler, who was indeed a glandelinian, summoned up several more glandelinians who were also spies, though they were officers, by telephone, promising to meet them by the railroad tracks. He kept his word, meeting them, and as he was their chief officer told them about his wicked scheme, and as "We can easily get them little girls now." He said. "They have been rescued many times already, but this time we must break into the mansion and kill them right in their room, and we must break into the mansion."

The glandelinians as I said before were in disguise, for it would have been dangerous for them to enter this region, in their bright gray uniforms. After a short conversation they started off for the main alien sisters did, and her of mud suspicious were at once aroused. Even since she had known the butler, she had disliked his face, though good looking as it was, and a wicked look could be seen in his eyes. At that time there was not a single person in the mansion and their peril seemed hopeless indeed. Violet and her sisters seeing the look of alarm in their governesses face expected that something was up. "There are Glandelinians in disguise trying to break into the house and kill us all." Whispered Mrs Catherine. for that was the maids name. "We are in great peril for they are indeed Glandelinians." Exclaimed Joice. "And no one to help us or neither have we any fire arms." They could already hear the six rascals rascals coming up the stairs, but Mrs Catherine was quick in action. She dragged a small wardrobe toward the door after locking it and shoved it against it. The Glandelinians reached it and finding it locked, began hammering at it with clubs while Mrs Catherine called up the governor and the others, who were in the court-house, by telephone. The noises caused by the hammering at the door also carried the sound to the governor, which aided up saying. Several shots were fired through the keyhole, but the maid and the children jumped aside, though Jennie alone got a scratch from a stray bullet. Mrs Catherine kept on telephoning and though the governor could not yet make out her words he knew that she would not be telephoning for nothing, and told Hanson and the other two that something suspicious was going on. The governor at once summoned a fast auto mobile and quickly got in. Soon they were going in full speed for the mansion, but they arrived too late for the children had been carried off and the maid slain. Intense was the grief of the Governor and the rest when they discovered this.

The same day that Violet and her sisters had been carried off, 115,000, child rebels, mixed with Angelinians under the child rebel leader general Beppe, B Bannison, in marching toward the north collided with a force of 200,000 glandelinians, on the snow covered grounds twenty miles south of Beppe, and the result was a four hours bloody struggle, in which the enemy obliged at first to contend with over-whelming numbers of child rebels under Aronburg, who came to the rescue of Beppe were obliged to retreat. However other columns of the glandelinians were arriving, and marched in long straight double lines, toward the child rebel positions with fearful fury. Despite the withering fire that mowed them down in ranks the Glandelinians swept up to the very trench of the insurgents and the fearful merciless struggle, that ensued raged four hours without a single pause. Never before was there seen such a merciless hand to hand fight seen during the insurgent insurrection, and when the enemy gave way handsoeely rep led, they left six thousand dead and eight thousand wounded behind them. The child rebels deciding to follow up their advantage decided to assume the offensive and these under Baverin pressed on at a fearful charge, and attacked the foe under Costellien. The glandelinians who had made the second attack, had rallied by this time, and met the insurgents with being appalling.

superior general of the danger that the rebel army was in. Some of the rebels retreated into the snow covered woods where the enemy would not dare to follow pouring in a deadly fire which had great effect upon the graycoats. The enemy had already brought up sixteen field-artillery and...

However the enemy were driven from their position a sudden and engaged. The insurgents pressed on, and at asked the reinforcing columns of the army at Chatin Hill, not far from Beppe. For an hour the cannons on the hill roared incessantly, and the hills and woods were fairly wreathed in smoke from the awful volleys. Eighteen charges were made by the insurgents, the glandelinian cannon cruelly thinning their lines, and the enemy managed to hold their desperate assailants at bay until general Terbucker managed to get around the hill with his Ouarians and curdies, and at asked gladiators flank on the right wing of the insurgents. This ended the frightful and unusual struggle along this part of the line. Turn and bleeding their dead and wounded lying in windows like wreckage the rebels withdrew from their merciless assaults, but the other child rebel for as had in the meantime threw up strong positions under cover of their batteries, numbering two hundred cannon made of wood, but almost as effective as ordinary cannon. Being confident of a sweeping victory, the glandelinians were coming on in heavy force, and made a fearful and general attack on the line of insurgents, driving them from their strong position and pursuing them for a long distance. Both sides had lost over 11,000 in killed and wounded.

After succeeding in breaking down the door, and carrying off Violet and her sisters, the five or six glandelinians bound them hand and foot and quickly carried them to a cart or wagon thrusting the children in.

"The defeat of the child rebels at Beppe will arouse them from their pity to a destructive fury more fearful than the Sinoan Typhoon that whirled the houses in our cities into overwhelming streams of wreckage." Said one of the glandelinians getting into the wagon. "No doubt about that." Answered another, as his companions jumped into the wagon. "It's lucky we were managed to capture these little children fools."

The glandelinian who was to drive, started the horses with the whip, and soon they came to the Angelinian Railroad. They determined to drive to the nearest railroad station inside the city and take a train going north-west. But as they went further the station seemed to be. "Confound it! It drowled the glandelinian who was driving. 'Will we never reach that goddam station!'"

It seemed miles away and also our position seems suspicious to all who pass us." Said another glandelinian.

Violet knew that they would have to go into the very heart of the city, to even reach that nearest station as they called it and hoped that the suspicions of all who passed would soon be aroused, and that they would soon come to their rescue. But their hopes were in vain for the glandelinians dreading a suspicion, and becoming suspicious themselves were on a strict lookout.

At last after an hour passed and no signs of a station came yet, the glandelinian asked a passer by how far the station was.

"You will have to drive into the heart of the city." Answered the passerby. "And it will take you until night to get there, and besides all the trains are searched for suspects, before going out for who knows that some lurking glandelinian would be on them with stolen children."

The glandelinians were dumfounded and for a moment did not know what to do. And now the glandelinians were watching this passerby suspiciously. Finally, for it was the very policeman that they had met before and who had chased them, little while ago. The glandelinians had forgotten to cover Violet and her sisters with a quiver cloth, and as the sign passed him, the policeman saw the children and as all also recognized them. He was now suspicious that these very fellows were glandelinians in disguise, and carrying off the poor children. He quickly saw the revolution and leveling them at the rascals, bid them to come down from the wagon. The glandelinians did not flinch when they saw the revolvers leveled at them, but nevertheless they determined to pretend to obey so as to carry him off alive.

"WELL, WHAT DO YOU WANT?" One of them demanded with a sneer.

"I want you and those children." Drowled the officer. "And if you don't obey why then I'll shoot you."

The glandelinians laughed.

"Shoot us!" Exclaimed one of the glandelinians in astonishment.

"Why we have faced so much shooting that we liked to hear a gun go off. Shoot us if you will, but that will not save the children."

Slowly but surely, while this conversation was going on one or two of the stalwart glandelinians, were walking around toward the back and before the policeman could be aware of it or of their presence, they pounced upon him and took away his gun which he was trying to discharge and threw him to the ground.

"Ha, ha ha," laughed one of the glandelinians. "Another prisoner and captured so easily." Laughed the leader in glee. "You see, Mr. Calvinian, if you had not meddled into our affair this would not have happened. Bind him now."

The policeman made a furious struggle but they quickly overpowered him, and bound his hands and feet, and shoved him into the wagon.

Then they jumped in the driver taking his place, and driving off again. But not in the same direction deciding to find another station in the northwest. What caused all of the Calvinians to have suspicion was that the glandelinians again forgot to cover the prisoners so as to hide them.

"I believe that those are glandelinians in disguise." Said a soldier to a policeman. "I say, we must organize a mob, to head them off and recapture the poor children."

Five minutes after the glandelinians discovered a furious mob following them and also tearing down upon them armed with stones, pistols, and all kinds of dangerous weapons. A shower of bricks were hurled at them to which those who were not struck answered with a volley from their pistols. All those in the ever increasing mob who were armed with firearms discharged these simultaneously, but those in the wagon were lying down out of range the shots flew wide. Every shot the glandelinians fired took effect bringing down scores. The driver sent the horses going at full speed while the glandelinians who were not firing pistols prepared to throw bombs which they had in the wagon. Though these caused awful havoc among the mobs it did not check their furious chase. The very scene was like a blood-bloody riot. The glandelinians filled with furious desperation kept firing their pistols with telling effect, lying low in the wagon. There was not much danger, for the driver of being hit, with flying bricks or bullets for the luck of his seat was very high, and he was well protected. The glandelinians who were not firing the pistols threw the bombs which exploded only by heavy shock as fast as they could. It was lucky that these glandelinians had a great deal of ammunition and shells, for it would not have gone well with them. The horses running at their greatest speed soon took the fugitives quite a distance from their pursuers, but another was quickly forming on the west side. To disperse this mob, the glandelinians sent a volley of bombs, then proceeded through, shouting triumphantly. But now they were in greater danger for a train of automobiles were pursuing them, and in the leading and most handsome one were Hansen the governor and his two companions. Shots were flying thick and fast, the automobiles kept up an incessant honking and the mobs of human pursuers were increasing everywhere to the anger and desperation of the glandelinians. Even if they now put Violet and her sisters and the man prisoner out of the wagon the glandelinians would not get an any relief from their pursuers for the Calvinians would tear them to pieces if they caught them as enraged they were. To check the automobiles which were drawing dangerously close to them, the glandelinians began to hurl bombs at them disabling many, but still the governor's automobile still untouched was nearly alongside. But the glandelinians with their pistols fired at the tires puncturing holes, and disabling it so that the governor had to check the engine to avoid disaster.

My but its occupants were in a fix. However they got out and went into another. Closer and closer they came because the pursuit, and the shot shots became a regular fusillade. Once in a while the governor and many of the mob demanded the glandelinians to stop, but the drivers kept lashing the horses furiously.

Suddenly they saw another huge mob far off in front of them advancing swiftly to head them off, so he turned the horses from the road toward the tracks, and they went across the railroad with a great rattling and rousing into a large lot, which led out of the city.

Oh what a yell of ruffled rage arose from the mob when they saw this.

The other mob quickly met the biggest one and united pursuing as hotly as they know how, and running as if a panic-stricken.

Bricks were now flying past the wagon again, and the whistling threatening near. One glandelinian who was not standing at the end of the wagon, preparing to throw a bomb, and struck by a shot, and he fell headlong to the ground, the bomb he carried with him exploding as it rolled down a slight rise of ground.

superior general of the danger that the rebel army was in. Some of the rebels retreated into the snow covered woods where the enemy would not dare to follow, passing in a deadly fire which had great effect upon the graycoats. The army had already brought up sixteen field pieces and a new machine gun.

From the car the mob of men, women and children, and it was a sight never to be forgotten. The one who fired the shot that killed the Glandelinian, who was about to throw the bomb, was the governor himself. He was an excellent sharpshooter. But in reaching this point the Glandelinians managed to get far ahead of the mob, and soon out of the reach altogether. They had already used up nearly all of their ammunition in this exciting race, and so they now stopped and got off the wagon. Then in a hole they placed all the bombs, set a heavy rock hovering over them, and also set a fuse, to deal destruction to some of the mob should they reach the concealed pit of ammunition. They now reached their own railroad, just as a train came, and quickly taking the prisoners and carried them to the train, and told where they wanted to go.

"We want to stop at the very first station on the Angelina railroad." Said the leader of the kidnappers. "That is the only line that will take us through to Calverine."

Being soldiers they did not have to pay any money or produce tickets, and the one this railroad crossed the Angelina and Mc-Holleston and Pandora lines that station was soon reached and they got off. They walked quickly toward the station with the children, unbound but they did not dare to try to make a break for the glandelinians would have shot them dead right there. They reached the station and the glandelinians stood there waiting the train.

"Where are you six fellows going with the children, and where are you going tickets?" Asked the ticket agent, seeing the glandelinians standing there looking at something that seemed to be the mob advancing toward the station.

"We are waiting for a train to take us to Calverine." Answered one of the glandelinians.

"You will have to pay your tickets." Answered the ticket agent.

"Not even soldiers or generals are allowed to ride these grand roads without tickets, and it will cost each of you five dollars."

The glandelinians turned and looked at the agent in amazement.

"Five dollars each?" Gapped the leader. "As at soldiers part we with thirty dollars just to go to Calverine? Never indeed."

Then in anger drawing his pistol and leveling it at the ticket agent ordered him to give them the tickets for nothing or to be shot.

Seeing how rash it would be to disobey, the man with a scowl shoved him the twelve tickets.

"It's here." Said the glandelinian with a fiendish grin, as he saw the mob drawing nearer and nearer. "Step out here, for a minute if you value your life. No money buys business now for it will be dangerous to tangle with us."

The ticket agent obeyed cowering out but still scowling, and another glandelinian seized him and bound his arms fast.

"We'll leave both of you men here." Snarled the leader. "For it would be not look nice to take you two on the train. We ought to kill you both, and will if you say anything of this affair. We are no doubt glandelinians in disguise, and besides we are determined, at any risk no matter how great it is to take these little girls to Calverine as prisoners. We have had these little girls several times already, but that they have either gotten away from us or have been rescued. It does not matter whether they submit or not they are going to be put to death anyhow. Besides as you know now where we are going to take these little children, and probably a full tell about this to the advancing mob, when they arrive here as fast as we will take you along too but you'll have to keep tightly quiet on the train, which is coming now or by. Satans name there will be something going on. But my cause is just."

The train as it arrived at the station, and the glandelinians got on taking the mob and about prisoners with them. Violet and her sisters were too late to cry or weep, but unfortunately this was a glandelinian train for if any Angelinians had been on it, they could have noticed their presence had they cried or not. This train had been taken by an army of glandelinians a mile from the station and every one in this train were in disguise with scores after scores of child prisoners in every one of the six coaches. The mob was approaching nearer and nearer, and the Angelinian Governor and his companions were the first who saw the glandelinians get into that train which was already starting.

"Quick quick, telephone for a railway engine." Gasped the governor in anguish. "We must pursue those Glandelinians." Several men ran into a house where there was a telephone and the one who first reached the phone hastily gave the order. "Life to the governor was fairly frantic over the seeming delay. Soon the man came back out and ran to the governor, informing him that there could be an engine there within a half an hour."

"Is a wonder it would not take all day to get here." Exclaimed the governor impatiently. "Those Glandelinians will escape with this confounded delay, and then our pursuit will be in vain." Five minutes passed and soon a small switch engine arrived in a backup with five freight cars and the governor decided to take it and go on in the pursuit, never thinking that he was going to have the loss of his life. The governor and Hanson went into the cab, while the other three sat on top of a box car, while a hundred men, and three hundred soldiers sat upon the rest of the cars. The engineer started the engine at the command of the governor, though he protested that it was not his job, and soon the race began, the engine being a locomotive engine, though just now used for switching. The Glandelinian train was so on going full speed already, but the engineer increased the speed of the engine and soon the pursuit was fairly on. Within fifteen minutes the engine was fairly tearing along the tracks. Closer and closer drew the engine which was now running at full speed, making a great noise, and rapidly gaining on the Glandelinian train which was still far ahead. The Glandelinians seeing that the engine was gaining on them rapidly said to the engineer, for they knew him, and went into the cab to talk with him, leaving the children in the care of other Glandelinians.

"When we are half way across, get fire to the bridge. Don't let it get a chance to cross a burning bridge." As the engine was rushing on the governor who was looking out of a cab window, saw several Glandelinians laying a log across the tracks evidently to wreck the engine and throw the children off the track. The governor gave the word warning to the engineer in time, and the small train soon slowed down. While Hanson and Hanson was lifting off the leg the governor noticed that it was starting to snow and feared that if it snowed very hard it would be impossible for the Glandelinians to get away. When the log was removed the pursuit was again taken up. Several more times, friends of the Glandelinians tried to delay or wreck the engine by putting obstructions across the tracks. They succeeded in delaying the pursuing engine every time, but did not wreck it. The Glandelinian train soon reached the bridge, and the engineer threw shovel fulls of red hot coals upon the flooring on each side as they rushed over. By the time the train had passed the bridge was beginning to burn brightly. Hanson and Hanson saw the bridge draw the pursuing train and was nearly upon it before they knew it was on fire. The engineer checked the tremendous speed and was about to stop it altogether, when the governor yelled through the din: "Keep up you speed engineer. We do not care for the confounded bridge if it does come in. We got to get those helpless children back at any risk."

"Heavens man do you not realize that there is fifteen tons of dynamite in those cars." Gasped the engineer.

"Hang the explosives." Shouted the governor drawing his revolver.

"Continue on or I'll fill you full of lead."

The fire was already burning like an inferno, and though it seemed a fool hardy deed the engineer increased the speed of the engine again, and they went roaring across, seemingly enveloped in a seething sea of fire. Their most dread was of the bridge coming in, but it held firm and the train passed over the bridge. On toward the other fleeing train they sped down quite a steep grade. The governor dreading the danger of going too fast ordered the engineer to check the speed a little, so as to avoid causing a disaster.

"We must get those little girls at any cost if we can." Said the governor over and over. "Oh if this had not happened, I have a mind to arouse the whole nation of Angelina and make war against Glandelinians. Those poor little girls have suffered too much already."

"I'm having a queer feeling that this pursuit will be in vain." Murmured Hanson. "Oh if we once could get hold of those rascally kidnappers. I'd have them put to death or sentenced for life. They are getting too bold."

"Should say they are." Murmured the governor. "And God alone can save the little girls from these rascally heartless men who have them in their dirty hands."

CHAPTER FOURTY TWO.

CHAPTER FOURTY TWO.

THE DANGEROUS RUNAWAY.

They had not descended very far, when the governor noticed that the freight cars were on fire, and had to order the engineer to stop the train, altogether. Two of the freight cars were blazing like tinder, and the engineer at the governors' orders backed the cars, up toward the bridge, and stopped at the beginning of the downward grade. Then the cars were unhitched and left standing at the edge of the downward grade. It would have been better if they had backed it on to the burning bridge, for on account of their leaving the cars as near the downward grade, something thrilling happened, which I am soon going to relate.

As soon as the governor had the cars unhitched, he jumped into the cab, and after the men had gotten off the cars, the pursuit was again taken up. The engine had no sooner traveled over sixty one rods, when the thrilling incident happened. One of the cars filled with the explosive blew up with a terrific roar, that shattered the whole bridge, while the roof of the first car long before the explosive had blown up curved in giving the burning car such a shock that it ran ahead ahead two yards reaching the starting part of the downward grade, where it stopped. Then a section of the burning wall collapsed falling inward with a roar, giving the car another shock starting it again.

This time the car went over the top of the downward grade, and started down downward at terrific speed, dragging the others with it, making a great roar. The governor and the rest were startled by the crash and roar of the explosion, and the noise of the train as it descended the grade, and looking out of the small window, if the cab the governor saw the approaching peril.

"If these burning cars collide with the engine it will be all up with us," he gasped.

Nearer and nearer drew the runaway train increasing in tremendous speed, and the fire as fanned by the strong breeze, caused by the great speed of the downward rush, burned more briskly and furiously, the black clouds of smoke rolling from the train toward the south, mingling with the smoke clouds of the burning bridge.

"We are pursued by a burning runaway train and she is coming fast," gasped the governor. "We ought to back up these runaway cars back up to the bridge. It's all my fault too."

The engine was going down the long grade as fast as the engineer engineer dared to let it go, and now the governor commanded him to run it full speed, or let it go as fast as it could down the steep slope.

"Let the engine have its own way in speed," the governor said. "We are in worse peril, with that burning train pursuing us, than in too much speed."

The engine engineer, dreading to obey, but fearing that the governor would draw his gun again, turned on full power, and now though the engine was going down at full speed, the train of burning cars was coming down after them at break neck speed, gaining on them every second, and their peril was indeed very great. Nearer and nearer came the runaway train, increasing in speed so tremendously that it was frightful. Not far distant was a large orphan or lunatic asylum, and a long line of helpless children went of their crippled, were carelessly crossing the tracks guided by Sisters. They had been at church not very far away, and were returning. Many times this runaway train had scattered crowds of men and boys, at the beginning of its descent. All the children and the nuns, were startled by a great booming roar, and were horrified to see twenty one burning cars bearing down upon the children, still standing upon the tracks, with awful speed. The nuns also saw the peril of the children, who were on the track, and screamed frantically for them to hurry across. But they were too terrified to move. With a horrible screech and roar, the burning train, came on increasing in its speed, as it approached. Reckless of their own safety the Sisters rushed toward the helpless children, still remaining on the tracks, but with a deafening roar the train passed too quick so uttering clouds of black smoke and burning embers, and grinding both the Sisters and the children under its grinding wheels. There was a scene of great and terrible confusion, and the frantic screaming of the killed and well wished the shrill shrieking of the nuns and survivors, and the crashing roar of the train, as it steadily gained on the engine the blood of the victims scattering into the air. The sight of the mangled bodies on the tracks was enough to turn the healthiest stomach.

The surviving mums had not as yet recovered from the horrible scene when they saw to their increasing horror, that the engine was not far ahead of the pursuing train, and knew that they were also in great peril. In the meantime the governor noticed a switch track and ordered the engineer to stop the engine. The engineer obeyed and hurriedly got off, and just in time for the train of a burning train cars going at a one hundred mile an hour clip collided into the engine and hurled it over on its side, and down the embankment, the cars still plowing on not checked in the least bit. The engine lay a junk heap below.

"Gracias! Gracias as my daughters." Shaped the governor. "They are in greater peril for they will be among the wreck wreckage of the glandelinian train, for the burning cars will surely collide into it." At this moment another train engine approached from another line at a junction, and the governor leaving the switch open in his hurry and excitement jumped on this engine, which started after the runaway train.

THE WRECK OF THE GLANDELINIAN TRAIN

The engineer of the glandelinian train managed to get his head out of the cab window, having heard the roar of the runaway train, and saw that his train was in hopeless peril, and quickly checking the speed of his train, jumped from the cab and gave the alarm. But it was too late.

He had not discovered the burning train until it was within fifteen rods of them. With a crash and grinding of braking wheels heard for a mile the burning train collided with the rear coach of the glandelinian train, overturning it. Notwithstanding the awful shock of the collision the burning train with its leading coach smashed badly as it was pressed on, telescoping three other coaches and overturning another before it finally came to a stop. The overturned passenger coaches were a hopeless mass of wreckage piled thirty feet high, and the few survivors of the overturned coaches, did their best to get the wounded and killed out, but these coaches had quickly caught fire, and burned so rapidly and furiously, that the rescuers could do nothing. The other cars though still standing were in very bad condition. The roofs of two were twisted, the other badly ripped, the windows smashed, and the coaches partly off the tracks, with their ends also badly smashed, and the tracks off. Only the engine stood unharmed. The glandelinians declared that the governor, being angry over their kidnapping his children, had sent down this runaway train of death and destruction, and seeing the engine approaching, he sent their guns to open fire upon those inside. All those who were not injured in this wreck, were the ones who had gotten out before it got bad, and only few at that. Not far distant on the other track another train with eleven coaches was approaching full speed, and the glandelinians knew that it would collide with one of the overturned coaches on the track. This train was so filled up with passengers, that every seat was occupied, and the aisles were crowded. Most were children, being transported to another slave city further south.

Another disaster along side the wrecked glandelinian train occurred, and it was caused by spreading rails, due to the first wreck. The locomotive had carried three day coaches, and three pullman coaches past, when with a report like a cannon the tracks gave way. A dinner coach filled with children at their luncheon, was the first to turn over with a crash. Another coach followed crashed into one of the burning cars, and standing on and across it, with all its passengers hurled into a heap, which completely filled two thirds of the coaches, crushing and killing all the passengers. The train was heard for fully a mile. The third coach on entirely and badly telescoped, but the fourth received the worst of the impact. It was tossed off the track, and thrown with such force against one of the glandelinian coaches, still standing that it was frightfully shattered. The heavy iron glandelinian pullman was disabled as if it were wire netting. The car hung over the steep embankment, supported only by the wreckage of the glandelinian car and the coupling connecting with the sleeper, and the third car. The shower of crashing glass from the windows cut many severely. The engine, baggage car, and two other full cars rolled down the third car track and totally telescoped.

Had it not been for the marvellous presence of mind, of a conductor, the remaining five with their windows smashed, by the shock of the sudden stop, would also have turned over. Quick as a flash, when he heard the first sudden crash, that was deafening, the conductor leaped up and pulled the emergency brakes. If he brought the five coaches to a stop with a crashing of breaking glass, quivering at the edge of the badly spread tracks. His car stopped just as the forward and reached the end of the derailed tracks, and he quickly climbed down the side of the baggage car, and broke all the windows, (for this car was the only one, whose windows did not break from the sudden stop.)

and let as many women and children out as possible. He then ran to one of the telescoped cars, and pulled out three little girls whose legs were broken, and whose bodies were badly mangled. There were a few little boys and two men a short distance from the little girls, who were hurried to death before he could reach them. Then he pulled a man and his wife out from under the wreckage, and saw that both of them were badly injured. In all their lives the Angelina governor and the rest, who were witnesses of this wreck, never saw a wreck like this. People seemed insane from fright, and it was difficult to do anything in the way of rescue. A scene like a wreck unprecendented in all the Angelinian or Glandelinian railroad wrecks greeted the passengers, who poured out of the partly damaged coaches.

Victims with blood streaming from head and arms and legs, were crawling, and being dragged through the shattered glass and wreckage. Several railroad men rushed out to the rear, and as they went to look for cars still standing. Also were hurried to the men, who were already trying to fight the flames, and thrilling work of extricating the victims was begun. Holes were chipped in the sides of the derailed cars, and the dead and injured were removed as fast as the rescuers, facing a wall of fire, could disentangle themselves from the tangled cars.

In the meantime the news of the cars wreck had been flashed to every near by point, and relief trains were soon a coming from the northern stations. The car which had plunged from the west embankment rolling over was in a terrible condition. The front end of the long day coach in which most of the victims had been riding, in shoving out over the broken tracks, followed by the second day coach, had stripped the rear of or two of the glandelinian coaches and had turned over.

The end of the first day coach, that had went over struck the east embankment, and with the other seventy feet car behind it had crashed down the sloping hill with terrific force.

Both cars were filled with passengers, and lay a mass of crumpled wood and metal and glass, under which two hundred and fifty men and women and helpless children were crushed to death. Violet and her sisters were in one of these cars that was overturned, and were tightly pinioned beneath the wreckage of broken seats and tables, nearly smothered by the thick clouds of smoke that swept over them. They were among the most severely injured, suffering from cuts, scratches and all kinds of small fractures. After difficult but hard work two stalwart glandelinians managed to get them all covered with blood, and senseless. The governor seeing so many glandelinians who were all maimed to the teeth saw it was utterly hopeless to attempt any rescue, so they started the engine back again, but arranged and dismantled, believing that Violet and her sisters were dead, for they looked it as they were brought out and laid on the ground.

"This was done on purpose." Exclaimed one of the glandelinians. "Our pursuers were overwhelmed with rage because they could not catch us, and sent this train of destruction upon us."

The glandelinians were all excited, and angered over such a number of dead and wounded comrades, not caring at all about the poor captives, and leaving many to the mercy of the fire.

All the remaining glandelinians, looked the surviving captives in the other train, and to kill they did not kill, as prisoners. The other two Angelinians who had been captured, with poor Violet and her sisters were killed in the wreck.

After bringing Violet and her sisters around to one of the glandelinian office cars demanded:

"Where can I get another train for Calvernia with these children. They are severely hurt, but they can be brought around again."

"Take a hand-car." Advised one of the men. "No trains except the relief trains will run now with all this confounded wreckage strewn across the tracks."

A hand car was quickly brought by the working men of a wrecking train which had arrived and the two glandelinian officers immediately started off with the wounded Vivian girls leaving the scene of the great wreck far behind them. Violet and her sisters were and a moment and wished yearningly, as that this cruel cruel and merciless still slavery had never occurred, as it had brought them to share in all its horrors. The hand car was a slow matter but soon they came upon another at which and here a train was standing, having stopped there for a long while. The glandelinians got on just as it started off. Later in the morning the next morning. It was a little warmer since the snow fall of the day before, but still it was not so very warm yet, and there was a change in the city, better than before. Before, it being far more beautiful, except the poverty stricken district where the prisoners were kept. But in those places the glandelinians were more cruel than those Violet and her sisters had seen, or been among before. And the small or stretch far from the town buildings was like that from a slaughter house for many merciless butcheries of helpless children were committed there. But still there was some evidence of the battle which had occurred there between the glandelinians and the insurgents which had occurred five days ago. The fences in the field were still broken down, broken branches cannon balls cartridges and fragments of shells were strewn about. Here and there could be seen a line of disabled breast-works or an abatis and few broken cannon. The furrows in the ground and stone walls caused by shot and shell could yet be seen and many of the turned houses were only half mended. The house where he had been a prisoner in with Jack Evans was in ruins for it had been set on fire by the fleeing glandelinians, after the child rebels had won the battle. No signs of the few field pieces could be seen but the low stone wall and the gate was badly battered. But now like Andrew the city of Calvernia was protected by a high wall armed with cannon. Far off from a high hill which they were on now they could see the spires of the city of Bendinla, so far away, where the poverty stricken district of poverty now was still standing. That city however being an Angellinian city, and the boundary of Calvernia the glandelinians could not have it in their possession. The glandelinians who had possession of Calvernia did not care to attack the insurgents at Pounce-- Goo-- Woolia for they were too strong in numbers and position. The city was now reached, the glandelinians pausing through the gates of the walls. For a long time no one answered the ring of the bell at the door of the poverty stricken house they stopped at and the glandelinians were about to burst it open when there was a slow moving blur of shadows inside, and the knob turned uncertainly, the door opened, and three children stood there looking miserable. The glandelinians looked at the three frightened helpless children with a fearful look, announcing to themselves that they were to die that very afternoon. One of the graycoats announced with a fiendish grin at the poor children, who all were either crying or near the verge of tears. The glandelinians left Violet and her sister with the disconsolate children, and a school went away promising to return the next day. Violet and her sisters looked long at the poor children with pity written on their sweet faces. Nellie, the nine year old was biting her lip and her eyes were crimson with weeping.

A hand car was quietly brought by the workmen to the wrecking train which had arrived and the two glandelinian officers immediately started off with the wounded. ALL THE ILIZATON AND CHRISTIANITY SHOULD CRY HAIT TO ALL THE O.A
GLANDELINIAN PUTCHRIKES OF CHRISTIAN CHILDREN EVEN AT THE COST OF WAR

Jane aged three was nowhere to be seen, Angelina of three, looked so sad and presented a grinning and miserable countenance. Everywhere was machinery.

"Why what is the matter?" began Violet in dismay forgetting her own sorrows, and then the flood gates opened. The children cast themselves forward with one concerted wail, before which poor Violet and her sisters sat down in a corner and wept. Violet lifted Angelina upon her lap and she wept freely and loudly while poor Nellie murmured a damp and disconsolate face against Violet's breast. Jennie stood at a little distance and smiled with a diabolical relish sucking her finger. Violet and her sisters were not sure, she did not wink though her was blond pig tail and the cherubic blue nose of her eyes as well as her tender years were against any kind of sup artifice. Out of the chaos of tears and convulsive sobs, Violet and her sisters gathered the reason of the downcast

They were to be murdered that very afternoon. "These men" with gray clothes, hats as well because we all try to be good. Contributed Angelina looking like a grief stricken cherub with murmur: "And they are going to kill us. Some other cruel glandelinians dressed in green had called Nellie and her sisters to a fence and had seized them and carried them to Nellie wept afresh when she told the story and poor poor little Angelina, howled in agony and dread. Baby Jennie only smiled sucking her little finger. Violet and her sisters were filled with deep sympathy. She and her sisters remembered these cruel glandelinians, cruel heartless fellows, and knew that also she and her sisters could do nothing to save these little innocent little ones. Violet and her sisters petted and consoled the children as best as they could, while Violet took a secret wistful pleasure in their little wet cheeks, pressed to her, and the eager hot clasp of Angelina's hands. Presently however Violet having heard about little Jane, looked in vain for her.

"She's up stairs crying." Explained Angelina with a sniff and a sob. They trailed lingeringly up the steps, and in a closet Jane was found hiding miserably behind the winter wraps, a tearful little figure, with hidden face. Violet ceased her pit and let her cry in her arms. She was a sweet silent little thing and Violet was warm for her. With a blue blanket a flame looking glandelinian burst in followed by another. Then an officer, a cross looking fellow came in and there began a lengthy and conversation. Then the door opened again, and a glandelinian looking more like a butcher strode in armed with honorable looking

"HI RYS." Was his reticent solution. "They are having a hard time down in town with the men prisoners."

He put Angelina and the other children out of the room, with a snarlful hand, and raised living Hell with Violet and her sisters for showing them mercy. There was now a conversation about the hard times down town. There was a rebellion among the prisoners against their guards, for they had broke free and were joining the child rebels. This was the news. The glandelinians now went into the other rooms, and called Angelina who was hiding beneath a table with her sisters. T

"The glandelinians were going to murder them now." Angelina declared in a brief scream.

A tall Glandelinian dived under the table and grabbing her dragged her out, but Angelina emitted a piercing shriek, tore herself loose, desperately flinging herself beneath the table with all the abandon of a tragedienne. There she went at the top of her voice, and in quick crescendos, like the crest of a tidal wave, the side leaf of the table, rose slowly. It sank and several wine jugs clattered to a fall. There was a frightful shower of shrieks from beneath the table, and a second earthquake ensued, on which the sugar bowl rolled over on its side. The quaking was accompanied with the terrifying noises. One of the glandelinians peered desperately beneath the table as he stopped. Angelina lay flat on her back, her legs in the air, her feet thrust the middle end of the table mouth wide open.

There were tears on her cheeks but when she screamed she had a pleased expression. The night of those plump brown legs with the muscles tightening for another upheaval completely infuriated the Glandelinian. He dived quickly under the table himself with a curse. He grabbed Angelina firmly by the legs, and dragged her out despite her hot howls and struggles and in doing so he humped his back with an irritating suddenness which increased his rage.

He grabbed her by the neck, and choked her until she was black in the face. He choked her so hard that it was fearful to see how her face had turned, how her tongue protruded, and her eyes bulged. Then (See chapter twenty four)

The children of the Angelinian governor was the only beloved children he ever had, and their little lives had been all of sorrow and agony. No tender or more crueler treated children were among the glandelinians than the Vivian Girls. Their kind generous father and their gentle loving little school children idolized them and all the hopes of Hannon and the rest were centered in their only best friends. The governor footstaps could hear him plainly heard treading the floor warily, while Hannon and the rest, with tear dimmed eyes kept their lonely lonely vigil praying for the children to return. They never lost their faith in their dear savior. He would bring them back. So despite the terror of their uncles and friends, and the prayers and the kind loving fathers' warnings the children were taken further and further away. A great longing came to the Angelinian governor and Hannon to see the graves of the dead child rebels once more. Through the streets they walked swiftly and toward the cemetery carrying flowers. They soon came near the graveyard, and looked all around for their little graves and soon found them. The governors feet refused to carry him further, and he sank upon the ground. Long did the governor remain thus, suffering as only a wayward boy can. A little bird on a tree near by Catherine's grave began to sing his sweet song seemingly to cheer the poor heart of the Angelinian governor.

He lifted his face toward heaven and there he prayed as he never prayed before. He seemed to hear the savior's loving sweet sweet voice.

"I WILL GIVE YOU YOUR REST."

As a child he gave himself to JESUS. So on he arose and started back home, Hannon and the rest following. Soon they drew near the old home again and silently went to bed, waking the next morning refreshed. After breakfast the governor and Hannon went to church to pray for the return of Violet and her sisters, and when they left and went outside in the streets they heard the full measures of the glandelinian butcheries.

Day after day Mc-Cantler had denounced the cruel glandelinians and steadily aroused the consciousness of the Angelinians to revenge, and put to an end to all the merciless massacres of the men women and children or of the child slaves in Calveridia, but seemingly without success, for the Angelinian Pope forbade him to continue his speeches, as there was danger of his bringing on a bloody war with the two nations. However there was made a new army of rebel children and the survivors of the recent battles were all coming back, but little Zimmerman having fallen in one of the bloodiest battles recently mentioned, was now in the grave, and all the glandelinians whom he had fought were now in the prisons or in the graves also. At this critical time glandelinians assured the nations of the world that they will slaughter as many children as they please, that all Christianity must be and shall be away with God and the world, and that Glandelinia also shall take her place in the congress of barbarism. Though she had been dominated by the great Ulendos --Abbasinian war, Glandelinian was still Glandelinian and the shameful massacres continued. The victims were now of the weak helpless nations who were yet under her control. The descriptions of the slaughters inflicted upon these miserable prisoners were so frightful of conception or if for repetition, and more, and could not be described unless some

Hundreds of glandelinian soldiers in gray and yellow uniforms were sent to the horrible prisons or poverty stricken places, where the half starved child slaves is put to the worst kind of a death that could be thought of, and the massacres, indescribable as they were, were continued by means that were worse than any bloody murder. The Glandelinians were surely becoming fiercer, and two big strong cowardly nations who were not, or could not be out under Glandelinian looked on did nothing and said nothing, leaving Angelinian and Hannon to deal with her alone. The savage merciless glandelinians declared that they will

Right to massacre prisoners of their enemies, and are keeping order within their own dominion, that they will attend to affairs of other nations and God. And the two cowardly nations big as they are, having many people, now accepted this wicked explanation and blasphemy, and allowed these indescribable massacres to continue just because they were afraid of being placed under the rule in case they loosed out. It was though in a christian city a man within his four walls were murdering women and children, and when arrested and brought before the committee councils condemned to other execution, that he was doing it within his own wall, and within his own house, and within his own rights.

superior general of the danger that the rebel army was in. Some of the rebels retreated into the snow covered woods where the enemy would not dare to follow, putting in a deadly fire which had great effect upon the graycoats. The army had already brought up sixteen field pieces and a now as the rebels

Why is it the duty of the Christian nations in that untrue world to a whole new way and children win within his own house. A vigorous war from the united nations who were not under glandelinian rule or all of them who were would put an end to the power of glandelinian. Of course Glandelinian seemed to be the best murderers, killing helpless children because of the hearty delight that they find in the destruction of all the christian women and children, and a great hostile bloodshed. But the effort was not being made through cowardice. They were or look and were cruelly mistreated because they were christians, and because the no matter of what nation, and not that will insure them a particularly comfortable life in their own nation, some of the newspapers, or in recent instances denounced the glandelinian atrocities, which were no frightful that no nation in our real world would stand it much longer. Then the glandelinians, the new form have a right to punish enemies of Satan. Their exact explanation was that they were down upon the peaceful glandelinians on the northern boundaries and murder those which intend to be some day a part but such offenders were punished known to the authorities of Angelina. In this story it is the overwhelming number of glandelinian soldiers sent into the silverian cities of the west, to hunt and murder the defenseless women and children, enter upon the fierce chase, with rest and art business.

Just to insult him they declared that God to look with pleasure upon the mass acres of any man women and child who is no glandelinian either he wants to or not, and they will by all hostilities force God to reward them richly and in proportion to the number of their murders. And then still the murders continued. The Angelinian women and children in their prisons were surrounded by trained bodies of cruel heartless glandelinian soldiers, hounded in and murdered. When the two Angelinian governors heard about this he they said

"This is a terrible sight to arouse the christian countries. There should be enough decency in national government to make it impossible for the outrages to continue. Those unfortunate christian prisoners of other nations are murdered because the glandelinians are enemies of God. The christian nations should have these wretched people and the nations in exterminating the troops of murder, carried on by glandelinians."

It is only fulfill and more. Those that see the glandelinian murdering the children and women, because they are christians, should not stop to think of the fact that the glandelinians are a nation and a people. They should be the threats against glandelinia if threats suffice and by some nation is wiped out of existence. And if this cannot be done the power of glandelinia should be wiped out of existence. Glandelinia should become a civilized country surrounded by christian nations and inhabited by christians, and the glandelinians should be made to share or be driven back across the northern boundary from where they came.

Never in all the world has the indescribably wicked nation illustrated such relations equally to christians in such butcheries as were on men. They looked at the nations who were with the recent butcheries of women who were not under glandelinian rule or all of them who were would put an end to the power of glandelinian. Of course Glandelinian seemed to be the best murderers, killing helpless children because of the hearty delight that they find in the destruction of all the christian women and children, and a great hostile bloodshed. But the effort was not being made through cowardice. They were or look and were cruelly mistreated because they were christians, and because the no matter of what nation, and not that will insure them a particularly comfortable life in their own nation, some of the newspapers, or in recent instances denounced the glandelinian atrocities, which were no frightful that no nation in our real world would stand it much longer. Then the glandelinians, the new form have a right to punish enemies of Satan. Their exact explanation was that they were down upon the peaceful glandelinians on the northern boundaries and murder those which intend to be some day a part but such offenders were punished known to the authorities of Angelina. In this story it is the overwhelming number of glandelinian soldiers sent into the silverian cities of the west, to hunt and murder the defenseless women and children, enter upon the fierce chase, with rest and art business.

For more than a year the glandelinians have been unnumbered helpless child slaves butchering christian children after kidnapping the m, and outraging christian women simply because they are christians. It was indeed high time that christian people of all those christian nations were heard throughout that whole world in tones of thunder compelling the nations to act. If all these cruel glandelinian monsters should suffer Mercumnian subjects, because they are Mercumnians the wicked taspian o and van minarets of glandelinia, to batter down the murdered because of their religio religion the blood of the protestants would leap nations not under the rule of glandelinia, massacred just because they were Gandelinians, their king would vi voice his protest in the hall of cannon. But because they are christians of Mercumia and of Angellin, and the other nations, hold their hands free aiding them, and saying nothing for the dying and the christian martyrs, k in that Galveridian holocaust. As Mercumia protect Mercumians as Gandelinians protect Gandelinians so all christianity should raise itself and care for these poor christians. The governor ended, as many thousands of excited people crowded around his court house.

In the meantime Aronburg aroused her army a sudden blow, taking them completely by surprise. Time was the Aronburg led the army to the aid of the children in a small town and the rebels struck the enemy by rebel armies against Aronburg in a cause not more not a new one third so appealing as this, which called the entire christian world to action there. It seemed as if she would soon need new armies to call a halt to this indescribable butchery of men women and children, by the glandelinians. The great head of the Catholic church in that world sounded an appealing note through all the catholic neta papers and every Catholic church in christiandom was appealed to make answer to that cry. And the sentiment of that whole christian world, should be aroused to awaken the christian nations to active and united war against these butcheries which were simply the terrible repetition of other glandelinian cruelties which had stained the past five or years and which unchecked, were the next few months n a and the war that k is to come. The appeal was indeed indescribable. Christianity appealed to every christian nation to help men to halt glandelinia in her on march of butchery and terror. It was on one day that the governor was out in a raging snowstorm looking for his daughters, when he came suddenly upon two glandelinians in full uniform and he quickly stepped up to them.

"Your pardon gentlemen," Quoth the governor. "But perchance it will be good enough to tell me where my daughters, known as the Vivian Girls are!"

"Scoundrel! One would have thought that the governor had a right to know of all that their heads."

"Who the devil are t you?" Snapped one of the glandelinians in answer giving the quarry its most offensive emphasis.

"Sir cried the governor flaring up and with hand leaping to his side, "I will leave the devil out of that question if you please or I will cleave you in two. Un Anselinians do not stand for such talk, and will not either."

"And I will then." The glandelinian roared savagely, his own hand at the same trick.

The governor who whipped out his knife in a twinkling, and his enemy his sword, and they to meet at the very edge of combat for perhaps a minute, glowering at each other, then the glandelinian stepped back and said curtly:

"I presume that you are the governor of Angellin. Well your daughters are in our power now and even you and the whole christian army may try to get them back. We would not bring them back. Sent an army at once to get you fool christian and we will destroy the army before it can fight one battle and your daughters also. With this he turned up his snout and walked away with his companion, to the utter astonishment and disgust. He felt like running on the road and dousing him where he was, but thought it to be not prudent and went on his own way."

superior general of the danger that the rebel army was in. Some of the rebels retreated into the snow covered woods where the enemy would not dare to follow, pausing in a deadly fire which had great effect upon the graycoats. The rebels had already brought up sixteen field pieces and a how as the rebels retreated to make another show, these were without effect.

"Robert, do you think there will be any trouble?"

"If there were Hanson, I would not at all be surprised. Beppo is full of these fellows could easily make a slaughter of helpless innocent children. I don't like the looks of things at all. There are rumors that Aronburg's force of rebels in charge of Annie Aronburg are advancing to join other large forces, which are ready to welcome them. Governor Vivian and his brother had been sitting at a window of a big tavern near the City of Beppo when something happened. The governor that a conflict was brewing, decided to go and watch it. Annie Aronburg who also is ready and meet the foe."

The trenches of the rebels were situated across the Cedens Run, and here were thousands of brave rebels who were determined to hold it as long as possible, and not to yield until they were driven back by overwhelming numbers. There was a considerable force of the advance guard pressing on now, and the rebels began to send lively volleys into the ranks of the advancing foe. There were some Christian pistols cracked along the rebel line there being a solid volley everywhere. Three times the enemy sought to cross them but were driven back in great confusion. Then General Rastabrook threw a very large force toward the breastworks in a desperate effort to carry it, but as the conflict went on with increasing fury, more of the rebels massed themselves there, and defended it most gallantly. They fairly raked with the brave rebels standing ready to drive back all the Gandelinians. The rebels the latter had the advantage of position and had it in spite of everything, being determined not to yield while there was a chance of holding the works. The Gandelinian cavalry tried to dash forward on their fiery steeds and literally sweep the rebels before them, but the loss of 500 men and seven hundred horses changed the plan. Then the enemy tried to cross again with fewer horses at a trot, but the lucky rebels were ready for them, and poured in such a volley that they fell among the other dead and wounded. But the survivors graycoats tried to cross on foot, but Aronburg sent a force of her followers forward with long like made of men handles and those graycoats fall lack in do disorder, the rebels holding the works still, but not advancing. But again the enemy came on and though they were met by a tremendous volley they were not so easily repulsed this time, and they succeeded in making a big breach in the breastworks, through which they began to pour in considerable numbers firing rattling volleys. More and more of the glandelinians came pushing through the breach with a lot of noise. General Rastabrook seeing Aronburg made a dash for her drawing his cut-throat and launching a fierce attack on the child rebel. The little rebel however remained cool. The rebels pressed on and began to attack the conflict became very lively quite a number falling on both sides. The rebels showed the utmost desperation and determination. They were bound to drive away the Gandelinians and they attacked them with the greatest vim, finally driving them back and pursuing them for some distance. The left wing of the enemy made a vicious advance exacting to carry all before them, rout the despised rebels forward resolutely and more than a Beppo in triumph. But the rebels pressed on vigorously firing. However on they pressed, step by step but the enemy as long their leader fall were taken with alarm and fled.

The main force of the enemy however were determined to push their way through in spite of all the fierce opposition, but they found the galverinian immunities about fourteen thousand galverinians all private citizens mingled with grown children and even soldiers, some Angelinian, under James well posted and realized that they were not going to have such an easy time as they had imagined. At the same time the main line stood against heavy onslaughts, a small force of daring girl rebels held James bridge hurling stones and were determined not to give it up without a struggle. The little force of girl rebels had no artillery which they had wished to secure, but they had been able to seize many rifles which they learned to shoot well and so for every time the glandelinians essayed to cross they swept the bridge with their muskets, and also sent in a cross fire from the banks above and below it thus making the passage most hazardous. Thirty times the enemy tried to force their way across but the plucky fire of the rebels girls cut them down by scores per minute, and forced the survivors back, they being compelled to take their hundreds of dead and wounded back with them under a hot advancing withering fire. For an hour along James gun or line the battle had raged with unceasing fury but now the pressure of the enemy had become so great that the men rebels were compelled to give way in the greatest panic while all attempts to force back the girl rebels all mostly children under four teen years of age was impossible. At this time Jack came advancing with a large force of rebel soldiers saw the panic stricken galverinian troops cowering pursued by a heavy force of glandelinians.

"I declare it is to bad," spluttered Jack.

"These glandelinians ought to be horsewhipped horsewhipped."

"They deserve a thrashing at any rate," declared one of his staff.

The glandelinians came on with great noise and confusion, and James had just time enough to get his army of rebels to meet them. James for the first point got his artillery primed, and ready, and as the glandelinians came within range opened a destructive fire upon them. Many of James boys were good gunners, and every shot took effect, the glandelinians being mowed down like ripe grain before the thrashing machine. The enemy evidently had not expected such a reception, and they recoiled giving the routed rebels under James time to recover and rally. Some of the glandelinians in their frenzy of fear and excitement had come on furiously, but James and James seized two of the glandelinian officers by their collars and brought their heads together with a resounding crack. Then they threw them into the road, where they sprawled out in a most undignified fashion in the dust, two very much surprised glandelinians. James bowed the ears of two more and gave another a kick which sent him tumbling over a fence at the side of the road with his graycoat around his neck and wondering how it got there. The other few glandelinian survivors scattered in all directions and from a distance began to hurl abusive epithets at the rebels.

In the meantime the main force of glandelinians having recovered from the artillery fire came on again in greater numbers, having columns advancing from the woods opposite. Jack James was well prepared for them and as they came on the guns were aimed straight at the middle of the advancing columns and discharged as fast as the guns could be set off. There was a series of tremendous reports, and horses and riders were bowled over, great confusion following in the ranks of the enemy. The rebels under Hoffmann charged at this moment and fired a storm of volleys, the glandelinians answering it and then giving way, for the new conscripts who were warriors and these glandelinians relied upon the child rebels with fixed bayonets. After a desperate struggle the rebels were driven back in confusion and the graycoats captured the field pieces and bore them off in triumph. There were gunners with the glandelinians and these soon had the guns primed and turned upon the insurgents. There was a series of terrific explosions as the guns were discharged the shells bursting among the rebels and doing considerable damage. More of the rebels were arriving in the wooded region and opened a lively fire upon the enemy, as they tried again to come forward. The woods fairly buzzed, shots being fired all along the line and again a considerable number of the enemy fell. Estrabrooks horse could not penetrate the woods, while the rebels could fire to the greatest advantage and the enemy suffered pretty bad. The glandelinians lost some of their best leaders and were shortly thrown into confusion. Arries of fresh rebels attacked the enemy on the flank and although they lost heavily heavily in killed and wounded, they nevertheless made the enemy retreat. In the meantime more of the enemy were crossing a large lane coming on in great force and spreading out. Aronburg had long before now been alarmed by the sound of heavy firing, and seeing that the enemy were most determined to win decided to send her full force in action and notify her

Indeed there was a very large force of the rebels advanced and a general alarm was sounded in order to bring large reinforcements and drive back the rebels. Estrabrook seeing the strength of his force saw that he could do very little to check the rebels, but he meant to do all he could to avenge the losses he already suffered. So his force held their ground stubbornly and poured in a series of lively volleys upon the advance guard, but as the alarm had spread the rebels still moved on and as a large force was coming to the relief of those already assailed the rebels fired themselves and shot two of the glandelinian officers down. The main force of the enemy however were determined to push their way through in spite of all the fierce opposition, but they found the glandelinian innsur resisters about fourteen thousand glandelinians all private citizens mingled with grown children and even soldiers, some Angelinian, under James well posted and realized that they were not going to see such an easy time as they had imagined. superior general of the danger that the rebel army was in. Some of the rebels retreated into the snow covered woods where the enemy would not dare to follow pouring in a deadly fire which had great effect upon the graybeards. The army had already brought up sixteen field pieces and now as the rebels started forward to make another charge these were primed upon them. Indeed there was a very large force of the rebels advancing and a general or alarm alarm was sounded in order to bring large reinforcements and drive back the rebels. Estrabrook seeing the strength of his foes saw that he could do very little to check the rebels, but he meant to do all he could to avenge the losses he already suffered. So his force held their ground stubbornly and poured in a series of lively volleys upon the advance guard, but as the alarm had spread the rebels still moved on and as a large force was coming to the relief of those already assailed the rebels fired themselves and shot two of the glandelinian officers down. However on came the rebels at greater speed and charged upon the glandelinians, giving the enemy the impression that the arrival of reinforcements could not stop their onslaught. The rebels however were mowed down in frightful numbers, and seeing that the enemy meant to do all the damage that they could, came on more cautiously, firing many volleys for a time, and then advanced again rapidly the glandelinians now retreating for a while for quite a distance and making a desperate stand behind a stone wall and returning a terrific fire as soon as the rebels were within close range, and raving fire now having great effect.

One tremendous volley followed another, making many gaps in the ranks of the rebels. Firing as rapidly as possible the glandelinians kept the rebels from advancing too fast. Estrabrook who was keeping his eyes on them, listening for any suspicious sounds suddenly saw the gleam of blue and yellow uniforms and the dresses of young girls to the right, and looked fixedly in that direction. He said nothing but kept the men well at their work, the rebels being well in check, and not driving the glandelinians back as they had evidently expected to do at the start.

Then he suddenly ordered over half of his men to mount their horses and dash around the road to a point beyond the enemy, who were cowering through the woods. Away went the men led by James, Estrabrook remaining behind the wall with the rest and pouring a steady fire upon the rebels who were not too eager to advance now in the face of such determined resistance. Giacomo got around to the rear of the rebels and charged them furiously pouring in volley after volley. The rebels had thought to flank the glandelinians and now found themselves flanked instead, and by a determined lot of fellows. They were obliged to go forward the glandelinians pressing them doggedly, and now the rebels found themselves thrown upon the other division of glandelinians who assailed them more vir vigorously. By this time Donald Hanson had sent a strong detachment from his main force and the division advancing upon Estrabrook from behind the stone wall, found that they could not rout the plucky glandelinians, and instead, they found the plucky glandelinians swarming upon them from all sides, and soon were compelled to beat a hasty retreat, followed by those who had tried to flank the glandelinians. Away went the rebels, bombarded by the guns of the glandelinian battery, and fired at by the persuers, and leaving 3,500 dead and 6,543 wounded behind at that part of the battlefield. The wicked glandelinians lost over 9,000 in killed, and 10,000 in wounded a total of 19,000 altogether. This battle of the Glandelinian rebellion had ended as a glandelinian victory....

James decided to send her full force in action and notify her firing their rifles almost without ceasing and when shooting down and killing

It was now nearly midnight, and although the day had been warm the night air seemed chilly, so they gathered a pile of dry branches and soon had a h jolly crackling camp fire. Paul got out his old silty hat and placing it on his fair head asked Tom, "Pardon if he did not think he looked much like a gladiolindian boy scout."

To Paul this first night just seemed wonderfully romantic. The cheerful gleam and sound and sparkle of their huge camp fire was just too grand for anything as Paul himself expressed it to Perros. But after they had roasted some potatoes and toasted some bread and cheese and cooked some frankfurters which Tom had brought with him, and eaten all they wanted they continued on their way, so and also many exciting adventures. Finally entered the enemy's lines by slipping past the guards where is no need of telling how they succeeded in obtaining information. For they did and were back again to the old house without having been discovered or chased by the enemy as not expecting child spies the enemy had not been watchful enough. As soon as they had reached the house in the woods, they looked over the plans they had succeeded in obtaining and of the information they had written down and then beginning to feel decidedly sleepy, and somewhat tired, which was no wonder as they had taken too long walks that day and had exciting adventures with the enemy it was not long until it untill both dropped off to sleep snug together in the old log hut. I need not go back to the general's house within the christian lines to tell of the sadness and excitement that had reigned there when the boy did not return from the school. That can be better imagined than told. But something occurred within the rebel lines which brought the adventure of both boys to an abrupt termination. The robbery of the plans was discovered by the rebel generals at two o'clock in the morning and the rebel authorities of all the surrounding regions were notified by telegraph to be on the lookout for the spies and apprehend them the first opportunity. An officer of one of the rebel encampments near where the boys had been camping had been informed that a light had been seen late that night near the old house in the woods, so early in the next morning they were on their way over to arrest both boys, but fortunately the lads had awakened too soon and were near the christian lines. Nevertheless they were mistaken by the Angelinians whom selves as rebel boy scouts trying to enter the christian lines and so the Angelinians arrested Tom and Paul. The officers in charge took them into custody on suspicion believing the fact that they had been entering the christian lines at an ungarded spot justified him in doing so, and he had them taken before general Hanson, a civilian, who taking from them the important papers they themselves had secured from the enemy, turned them over to the proper authorities for investigation. Of course the examination before the army court was a mere result in the boys being discharged from custody, as there was no evidence whatever tending to prove their complicity of a crime of entering the christian lines as spies. Later it was discovered who they really were and on the information received about them they received the highest esteem for their work and were looked upon as little heroes indeed.

ATTACKED BY TURKMANNIANS, GARGOLIANS!!!
AND ZIDIERHAI ZIDIERHAI ZIDIERMANNIANS.

IN the meantime a war correspondent had an experience which it is probable he never forgot and which though brave as he was made him remain out of his career. After he had had barely escaped with his life, after being besieged with several child children in the Red Riding Hood woods for over a month or so..

In the spring of 1912 the correspondents father was declared by the falsehoods of many loyal or disloyal Calvinists as were many other persons as to the nature of the war then raging. This happened of course before the city of Adrian wisely was declared by the enemy: he was then very young and had not much experience.

born to a family which it had twatredth month of December. At the end of the time of spring had been only desultory and even then did not seem to be a war until since the battle of Jennie Wren, own as all was quiet except in Glandelinia where the Angelinians were making their first invasion into the country of Glandelinia itself his father had there y believing the stories he had heard moved from a comfortable home in Abyssinkia and bought a tract of land in southern Galverinia on the western shore shore of the Immense Lake Angeline bordered by Immense woods, within the Galverinian Territory.

At the time his experienced opened he was a man of twenty one years of age and his father had then still lived. They had all had a small clearing of three or four acres but at the time the christian invasion of Glandelinia was broken to pieces and the surviving christians driven out of the hostile christian country the man had entered the service of the christians as a war correspondent and having learned that the Angelinians planned to invade Galverinia and make a fierce attempt to overthrow the rebellion there went with them. Later after two months in the army doing nothing but just taking pictures or taking down written statements and confessions of captured Glandelinian and after he had learned of the capture of Jaden Wacey and her fortresses and had taken grave chances to enter the rebel to learn some news concerning the enemy's intention a in repelling Hanson's advance movements from Calverine. This happened at after the battle of Calverine. It is 11 miles. He did not succeed in obtaining the information but only that they played by the enemy's plan.

well drilled by the army for two hundred miles and finally was rescued at Angelina leaving his wounds healed was sent back to general Concentinian horsemen. From there he had and his most trying experience to just in November 1912 when the two "Vivian" and "Klammern" had arrived at Vivian wickey and were preparing to lay a reinforcement sent out to learn the movements of the enemy at Vivian wickey experience. He was danger to enter the enemy's line once more was again wickey and having dared the enemy but this time he played the game that got him into serious trouble. After having received all the information he could secure, he was tempted by the sight of some pretty little girl child - a slave - and he was tempted to kidnap them from the rebel lines, and used them as his own children. On this occasion his desire for little children was so strong that he could not resist the temptation and so he waited until night time and succeeded in getting away with his finally succeeded. In the conspiracy he had succeeded in getting sun to get the children through the lines without being detected. He knew that if he was detected, pursued and caught he with the children would meet a horrible death for to kidnap children wherever child slaves or not from the rebel lines was to the slaveholders a worse crime than spying or murder.

the penalty for such a deed if caught. The burden at the stake. They may even tied the prisoner to four heavy leather cruxifixon or burning have the horses by going in different directions tear the victim apart. He knew the result. His fate but his temptation was too greente and he had no been able to resist it. Of course it was a good thing to do, for he had a very right and it was a very duty to take little children from slavery but in this case it was an untoward mistake and made things to do and he who did it had no one else to blame but himself if he was caught and suffered the penalty.

When the full thing was accomplished he secured the two little girls and boy and left the log line with his two companions without being seen, and they heard the sound of bloodhounds laying and howling for the night but later discovered and were pursued took for their lives, finally reaching the river they came into the Red Riding Hood Woods and finding a large strong log cabin made in the former strength to resist attacks they went in. It was a exciting night, but however on account of the river the blood hounds had lost the scent. The fugitives went back to the log cabin and crossed the river to the other side but at that point had no means to go across the river, as it was too full of crocodiles. However they had no choice but to go across the river, as it was too full of crocodiles.

The persons decided to get across by way of Horn's Bridge ten miles down to the north, so much had been their excitement that by the adverse circumstances the fugitives had been much discouraged and frightened especially the three children and they had almost wished they had remained with the glenclinnians and had not gone with the soldiers. They trusted the soldiers it is true but their apprehension was greater than their trust, and also they having gone through such a long time of suffering misery, and loathe loneliness had no faith in anything and believed that in time the glenclinnians would capture them and play a game which would shock heaven and earth. The three men, the war correspondent and the two deserters however had it no thought of giving up the fugitives and everything depended on this trick idea that the British had conceived.

Firing their rifles almost without respite and with shooting down and striking could have been alright if a terrible calamity had not happened. During the night two children with an old woman and an old white haired man and a lad about twenty eight years of age had come through the wilderness and after nocking long and loud had been admitted into the log cabin. Their story was and indeed, on that November day the snow being cold but pleasant and sunlight their relatives had taken two others of the children out on the river for a short cut through the woods when pursued by menacing Gargolians. They had passed out of their sight in a wide bend of the river and they had never seen them again. It was believed by many that their boats may have been upset by ice on an old drowned, and still by others that they may have landed on one of the wooded islands in the river and were either killed by wild beasts or captured by the glacialians. This then now was the situation of all in the log cabin. They were in the midst of a thick woods, eighteen miles from Avian wisago or even the nearest encampments of the shrewt leg Indians, with five rebels in hot search, and with a long hard winter coming on in the bargain.

The little children children themselves were old enough to realize their position, but not to advise. The woman a fugitive was naturally very quiet and looked frightened. The children themselves remembered how pale she was and what an awful look of anxiety she carried on her face as she came to realize that the two other fugitives may really be dead or prisoners in the hands of the enemy. He and the men fugitives at risk of being seen or recognized had trapped around the woods on a river side for miles, but all to no purpose and had been fired on by batteries across the river times and once were pursued by Angolians by mistake.

If the fugitive men had decided on leaving the cabin and going to the nearest part of the Christian lines they had a limited tooling, and worse of all in many directions they were able to hear a wild distant uproar which told of severe conflict. Non-fillets raging in the woods and a week after with the conflicts were still raging the small Indian mumper in Gulerline came to a abrupt and a severe hurricane and snowstorm combined set in. The snow fell so heavy at times that in the woods itself trees twenty a feet away could not be seen at all and even if it was possible to get out of the woods on account of the fierce depth of the snow, when the men folk found out this situation they took an inventory of stock on hand to be prepared for what they feared the coming of a long winter both by the enemy and "Old man Winter".

The men folk had been fond of hunting especially the two glacialians despoilers, and after helping in getting the children out of the rebel lines for the newspapers, correspondent they had brought with them their long army rifles and plenty of ammunition, fine rifles, and also a doubled barreled shot gun, a revolver and also a small easily carried machine gun. In addition they had twenty six steel traps, and nine large bear traps. As to provisions they found in the log cabin itself barrels of corn, lofts of salt pork, and such coffee. There were also some live stock secured consisting of a yoke of oxen, two cows, nine pigs, and three dozen fowls and some of them had been distributed by wild beasts or rebels so far, and none of the glacialians who may have been searching for them had seen them near to them. After had only set in however in its general fury when to their surprise their oxen had been run off or disappeared, either by the fierce glacialians or by wolves, and were lost to them forever. A skulking rebel soldier disguised as a bear came one night and attempted to carry off one of the pigs but he was shot by one of the men inside the log cabin and the pigs then brought inside and killed, and their carcasses hung up to freeze. They also intended to kill all the poultry poultry but the glacialian raiders armed with guns called wolves secured them for their own use and saved the fugitives the trouble. The first day of December when the snow was at least four feet deep on the ground on the level, and snowdrifts nine or ten feet high and the thermometer stood far below zero about thirty or more they had nothing to care for outdoors but to watch the stalking actions of the besiegers who had arrived and indeed at dusk their forms looked so ghostly on the snow and sent a thrill through them all. Though the rebels had arrived and found out that who they were seeking in the building were the ones responsible for the lost child slaves they made no intention at that time to attack the place but encircled about the building and held a regular close siege. From the first to the twelfth day of the month of December the siege continued without the rebels attacking, and it ran even so cold that water would freeze two feet away from a blazing fire, even the thick frost froze got into the logs and kept up a constant popping which frightened the children, and the fierce snowstorms came so frequently that the depth of the snow seemed to be finally backed up higher than the windows, and shut out the light. The morning of the thirteenth the weather became somewhat milder, and before noon it was thawing considerably and it also started to rain and hail heavily. However when the thawing gales had cleared away most of the snow and dragged up new supplies of wood the glacialians around the building began to make a suspicious movements that one of the men inside and to the war correspondents.

"We must now clean and reload these weapons, for our unwelcome visitors will soon make attempts to force us, to surrender as they are tiring of the siege, at seeing that we do not show any signs of giving in to them. It will also freeze hard to night making a strong crust on the snow, and to morrow the besieging rebels will be able to move about!"

There was only one small window to the large cabin and the window sashings on each side of the window but none of the door, and these had been stopped steel or iron hinges, and secured by an iron bar six inches thick, and there was also a small crevice at the bottom at least three inches and a half wide. The fugitives had stopped to keep out the cold, with a piece of board. It was very cold again that night, and the fourth was very cold and cloudy and the fire was rapidly dwindling into a blizzard. Nothing however had been on account of the long silence from those in the cabin had become a furious as savanna beasts themselves. Death of prey had come once in a while, some wolves and even a bear but had been shot and killed by the glacialians themselves. At little past nine o'clock in the morning they were at a start led by a long drawn soldier tramping the cry of a planter. Five minutes later they discovered there were two rebels. They were no doubt ravenously anxious to secure the besieged and could realize that not only were children and men in the log cabin but their victims had fresh per hanging by the door. Some of the glacialians had mounted to the roof, some others had tried the door, and others, and now and then the besiegers unless absolutely necessary and it was positive that they must save as much ammunition as possible for a general attempt on the part of the besiegers.

The besieged therefore kept quiet for a while except the children who cried out or screamed for every little noise they heard, and pleaded and begged that the glacialians would soon go away and leave them alone, but as the rebels persisted in their efforts more desperately, on the way on with the fugitives planned revenge. They cut off several small pieces of fresh meat, and when one of the men had pulled the board away from the crevice at the door she placed the pieces about six inches away, and then one other of the men stood by with a sharp knife. The glacialians who were thus trying to break in seeing the opportunity directly thrust their hands inside under the door with the intention to try and get their arm up far enough to be able to remove the iron bar. Just what is what the man with the axe expected and he was ready. The blow of the axe lopped off two hands slick and clean, and the man reeled and bleeding from wounds bent a retreat without ceremony. About noon a large column of geycoats circled around the cabin more than a dozen times, and tried to place a fire against the building, and after their attempts failed came two Gargolian officers, but still the besieged remained quite quiet and failing in their purpose the glacialians soon went away. At about three o'clock in the afternoon the women advised the men to get out all the traps and explained.

"We have more to fear from the Gargolians than anything else. Just now we were meeting with great success but now the Gargolians will make an attempt. The others have retreated further into the woods and have gone out of our sight. I expect the Gargolians will come by secret to force an entrance as soon as night falls. We will not let all the time while the besiegers are gone and those who will get caught will be an excellent target for us."

Unseen by the rebels on account of a thick mist caused by falling snow they set the traps inside the house itself, and then crept then out, one by one, and placed their hidden net of sight on the frozen crust under the window, and in front of the door. When this was done they secured the door again and waited for night to come. It was about five o'clock in the afternoon, and was just fairly dark, and it had almost stopped snowing, when they heard a strange noise as of a hundred voices, shouting or yelling in different keys following by the hoarse noise of bloodhounds.

This was afar off at first, but it came rapidly nearer and nearer, accompanied by a sound as of a heavy wind blowing through the trees, and then the cabin and outhouses were suddenly surrounded by Gargolians on horseback, galloping in hoofs and regular like Ku Klux Klans and a pandemonium of yelling and rifle shots broke out and bullets spun spattered against the house. Above inside the log cabin could not say whether there were one hundred or five hundred in the ranks of heavily armed horsemen, and whether glacialians as each rebel in his yelling, mingled with commands of officers. The only all the noise he could possibly make and their rifle fire was incessant. One of the rebels who had dismounted dismounted rushed for the house at once and headed for the door with a high log of a tree to be used as a battering ram but they all fell into the trap at once, and then the men who had frightened the children half to death when the men inside quickly started firing, and although some of the older children felt sure that their defense was perfectly safe against any attack as long as the ammunition held out.

Every glacialian who was caught in the trap, or who rushed forward to get them out fell sprawling on the floor under the fire of rifles and revolvers from the cabin, and a rebel even was shot as fast as he got caught or got fast, and it was certain that every trap scored a victim. Fourteen rebels made a fair mark for those inside and then during a little while one of the men inside literally counted two hundred and fifty horsemen in hoofs and regulars.

The Gargolians after a little respite became even more demonstrative. Some of them climbed the sides of the building and then over the roof here and there in an effort to break in with axes, some leaped at the shutters and banged away with the butts of their rifles and others rushed at the door in a body, and at length the women decided to try the plan which had worked so well in the case with the Gargolians. She herself got the axe, cut some pieces of meat but nothing could be accomplished on this trick this time and the men were busy for the next fifteen minutes firing their rifles almost without ceasing and killing about four and killing firing their rifles almost without respite and busily shooting down and killing the glendalians. Twenty rebels literally were shot down dead and thirty others wounded. One of these a officer who looked to be a colonel. By and the fury of the glendalians seemed to be somewhat appeased and after loading around and firing in a desultory manner the pack of the Klu Klux Klan of the glendalians moved off. When night approached there were enough men lying there to represent fifty rebels fallen altogether. Throughout the night they had other adventures with the glendalians. Indeed it is still known as the Gargolian winter for so many were attacked by these rebels. But they still had a more exciting time with fierce Zimmermannians.

At this same time a band of child slaves had broken away from the rebel encampment and a d plantation and took to the woods. It was about the first of the month before the besieged had heard of them but they had not as yet approached. The other clan glendalians had also gone away after their severe repulse and several days passed without further adventure the siege having been given up by the Gargolians and Zimmermannians. Then one day after another snowfall an solitary Angelinian soldier who was also a fugitive called at the cabin and warned them to flee, stating that a large band of glendalians searching for the runaway had a d of slaves was approaching their way, and was determined to murder everyone they met who would not tell wherethe child slaves had taken refuge. He himself being pursued for forty miles had been harrowed narrowly escaping death at their hands. A heavy snow having fallen was three feet deep on the ground, and the fugitives and those in the log cabin would have to walk about thirty thirty five miles to reach a place of safety or at least the distant christian armies. The men listened carefully to what the man had to say, and then replied:

"We shall stay right here-as to leave how is folly as we could not withstand the rebels. And if those glendalians do come we shall try our best to beat them off." The man left them some fresh ammunition and a pound of powder and provisions and as soon as he had departed they again put the cabin into a state of siege. They brought two barrels of water from the half frozen river, got in a lot of wood, and the snipers to the windows were again strengthened still more by breaking up a heavy chest. That night a severe thaw set in and continued for two days, and when the weather again changed there was only foot and a half of snow on the ground. Nothing had been seen yet of the fugitives or the glendalians, but the men believed the rebels at least would be sure to come now. While one of the men stood on a high stump and watched, the others set all the traps; as they had done for the Gargolians covered each one lightly with snow and formed around the cabin a sort of abatis. This turned out to be a wise precaution.

When they went back to the cabin and had just looked up the door when they heard a voice speaking in good Angelinian from the tongue saying frantically:

"Women for god's sake let us in: I have been a prisoner among the glendalians but just have escaped and have a number of child slaves with me who I am wandering around in the woods. I am wounded in the foot and cannot travel further just now, but indeed I can help you fight."

One of the little girls inside was for removing the bar at once, but one of the men stopped her with a gesture, and tiptoed to one of the port holes and drew the peg to look to see if he was truthful: a d not a glendalians. He saw however a man standing near the door and a number of shivering half frightened girls and boys with him about three score in number.

"My god have you no mercy," wailed the man. "If captured I shall be turned at the stake for rescuing wandering child slaves. There are even now twenty glendalians dining, but with my help you can beat the off."

The man then pushed back the bar and slowly opened the door. In limped the poor fugitive followed by the half crying shivering children. Then came twenty glendalians with a rush and one or two of them got right up to the door before it was closed. At once he received a blow across the face with a musket and was knocked down, and the other was felled by having the door slammed at a swiftly in his face and secured. Noetherman put the muzzle of his revolver through the port hole, twisted it to the left, and when she fired the third rebel fell against the door, recovered himself and shouted out:

"I'll roast you alive for that you christian dogs."

There was then no more excitement and thinking that everything would be well for the time being all in the building except two men went to sleep. At about twelve o'clock that night while everyone except two were sound asleep a most terrible yell suddenly rent the air and was almost instantly seconded from another distant quarter. One of the bear traps had been set in front of the door, and the other under the window. A large band of Zimmermannian glendalians had most carefully approached the cabin and two of the rebels no doubt had stepped into the traps at almost the same instant. While the moth women tried to quiet the awakened and terrified children who were screaming and crying the men got up immediately and though their faces were whiter than marble they had all the presence of mind and from the yells and screams of the glendalians they were soon satisfied that two or three score of rebels were badly wounded even if none were killed and for two hours the firing was incessant. The rebels then drew off leaving the men inside the cabin time to reload and it was an hour before they heard anything more from them. The glendalians who had retreated cursing and growling made no more attempts until morning. They had made a temporary camp under a bank of snowdrifts about thirty rods off. The first move now was to move off or to advance with a white flag of truce, and when the nearer got near enough, he said that if those inside would surrender the child slaves, they should be well treated and conducted to a new settlement as the object of the glendalians was to recover the runaway children who they believed were sheltered in the cabin.

The men and even the women knew that it was only a ruse, and they would neither reply nor let any one else reply. This silence would puzzle the glendalians as to the strength to be in the cabin. The glendalians these hours upon withdrew and after a bit a heavy fire of rifles was opened on the door and windows. Not a bullet went through either. After about an hour the fire seemed to concentrate on the window opposite the door, and it was also seen through one of the loopholes that the glendalians were dragging up to two giant cannon preparatory to firing them upon the house. The men inside the building were quick to notice this and took their rifles, gave some of the more brave little boys revolvers and said: "They are going to try and batter in the cabin with cannon. Don't fire until one of us gives the word."

They all had been at the porthole for a about fifteen minutes when ten and glendalians in an effort to attract their attention from the concentrated cannon moved forward with a battering ram toward the door. As the ten glendalians stepped back for a sudden start and just as they were on the point of advancing one of the men gave the word to fire. There was a row of uniformed gray clothes legs in sight in front of the man who had his foot wounded who had been admitted with the fugitive child slaves, and he could not help but hurt some one. Then the smoke blew away there were seven glendalians on the ground in front of the door and some others scattered on the ground elsewhere. Four soon or so moved away wounded and bleeding, but some others had been killed by the fire of the rifles. The survivors did not try to get the bodies away, but next attacked by way of the roof. They were trying desperately to cut holes through the rough, home made shingles, when some of the buckshot reached and killed everyone of them, and ten bodies rolled off the roof in different directions. One other glendalians then built a hot fire against the logs, but it only scorched them, and soon after the party retreated to give room for the discharge of the artillery, leaving sixteen dead at the door, seven under the window, and having to take many slightly wounded.

At about this time the whole region now was overrun by parties of glendalians searching for the fugitive children who had committed all sorts of atrocities upon small Gargolians and dwellers of that region because they either did not know or would not tell anything about the child slaves or where they had went. These searchers soon coming up from several directions reinforced the besiegers of the log cabin and by a ruse drew off out of sight with the purpose of making those inside believe the siege had been given up. This was completed for three days nighting and thinking the glendalians had drawn away one of the men decided to go out and secure a little provisions before the rebels would return and had sent several men to get some more wood. These fellows had gone out and were securing the wood when thirty of the heaviest of the glendalians who were lying in ambush watching the log cabin at the time and the movements of those within, supposing now that all of the men were absent, waited themselves of the opportunity and rushed forward with all their speed covered by the fire of their comrades who remained in shelter. Even as the thirty men advanced they also commenced firing, and killed three of the children who had been returning from the river, Rebecca Gordon, and her brother William, and another lad Alexander a speaker. The two men armed with rifles attempted to get to the house, but finding it surrounded by the rebels ran past it through a small pasture in which the log cabin stood. Then he reached a fence they made a halt and started firing at the glendalians killing and wounding eight of them, but were soon shot through themselves, each with eight bullets through their bodies. Yet after they were shot they ran about forty feet, and halted to fire again but before they could do so scores of other glendalians opened from the woods and brought them down. It is probable that these two men might have easily escaped if they had not stopped on the fence to fire. The two men were then laid open by the glendalians, and afterwards buried by the Angelinians at the place where the two bodies were found lying torn and crushed and gutted. It was thought that when they saw the remainder of the defenders about to be massacred without the possibility of rendering them any assistance what ever, they chosen to share a like fate. Here were six fierce dogs in the building which had been there at the time which of course I forgot to mention which fought the glendalians manfully like horses biting and tearing the legs of many until all of them were killed by the bayonets of the glendalians. The other man who had went out hearing the alarm and seeing the house surrounded again by attackers, fled and alarmed the christians when he got to the lines. The rest who were in the building still fighting desperately barred the door but this was of no avail. One of the cannons spouted like a volcano there was a crash and the rending of board logs and timbers and the exploding shell made a gaping opening in the side of the cabin where was not one single man in the building that was not wounded by the explosion of the shell and so seeing no hope of defense for further notice down below they went upstairs to the loft. Some of the wounded men then lying down attempted to shoot from up there but another shell exploded on the roof taking away the shingles and they were all killed. There was no one surviving now except the war correspondent and the frightened children and the man and she lay on a hay pile wounded and gasping. There were five or six guns not yet loaded having been shot off and the war correspondent whose name was Evans took one of them and loaded it and handing it to the woman told her to shoot, while he took the other one and loaded with the intention to fire at the cannon before his cannon could sent forth another shell. He then fired his piece, and then hearing a man locked up and saw that the poor woman had been shot in the head through a crack, and was then near her end.

Seeing that the rebels were winning the game the happy group paraded contentedly to a far end of the cabin, lifted up a loose plank, and went under the floor with the children following. A little girl about eight years of age hid behind some war, a barrel in the loft. In the meantime the glendelinians cut down the remainder of the wrecked deer and entered the obsequies of the remaining wounded men were killed with a thrust of the bayonet and the war correspondent and the children were all soon secured. A rebel then went up to the loft where he found the eight year old child almost frightened to death, huddled behind the barrels and yet as she was too terrified and almost dodged among the barrels and prevented him from securing her, he thrust his bayonet through her throat and left her to bleed blood to death. The rebels then left the cabin with their prisoners, and the war correspondent, corresponding having broken away after a while had hid where the rebels could not find him and finally when all was quiet he thought the rebels had gone away entirely and so came from his hiding place, ran out and went behind a tree, not far from the cabin. The glendelinians were still about, trying to catch their horses, and others preparing to set the cabin and outposts on fire. The correspondent believing that one of the rebels was hidden from behind the tree prepared to fire a shot when he suddenly saw a little boy get up from behind a log and run toward a small building, near the log as dwelling, probably used as a tool house. As the little boy reached the door a rebel fired his rifle. The bullet buried itself in the door near the door handle and he was injured. He was reflecting that escape was impossible for the boy unless he interfered, fired a shot, and the little boy seeing where the reloading shot came from ran to him and gave himself up to his protection at which the war correspondent seemed very much pleased. His head was wrapped up in a bandage made from a shirt and his arm was wounded but he was able to get about. His horses were then set on fire and the whole party then set out for the rebel lines and the war correspondent knowing the fate of the prisoners since they ran away decided to follow at any risk and again secure them if possible. Fearing that a little boy by the name of Corish, who was weak in mind and body and unable to travel as fast as they did one of the glendelinians gripped him by the throat and strangled him with the intention to kill him but a shot fired by the war correspondent killed him before he could do so and in the confusion the little boy got away.

The war correspondent having hidden himself and the little boy when he was not seen by the rebels, and the snow having concealed the smoke cloud they were bewildered. However instead of sending out a party to search for the lone war correspondent the boy ran away at his own leisure believing he would paralyze alone in the woods and save them the trouble of killing him they continued on. Soon another act of atrocity was about to be committed. The rebels had a baby girl among the horde of captured children called Marga at birth but it being fretful on account of a wound it had received, they prepared to dash its brains out against a high rock when again from an unseen quarter there was the report of a rifle and the rebel who had the baby staggered, and then plunged forward. The boy and girl were secured by the daring war correspondent and then he continued to follow from tree to tree, the children having been instructed doing likewise to prevent the war correspondent from being seen. He proceeded on for two or three hours and the rebels had not for fear of approaching Christian troops moved on with haste toward their encampments. Night time had now fallen, and the glendelinians felt it very unsafe to be so securely such of the prisoners at night, and for a glendelinian warrior to be so close to the rebels with his sword or pistol in hand, so that in case of pursuit the prisoners might be easily dispatched. Not unfrequently they were several hours without fire or warmth and when they came within sight of the rebel encampments several miles away they then assembled in council and one of them who appeared to be a colonel dissuaded them from carrying the children away any further declaring them to be a burden, and to stay them and make faster headway to the encampments but at the close of it all of the soldiers slowly shook their heads and started onward. Some of the rebels had proposed to put the child slaves to death by burning at the stake, but it was not agreed to. Though the children they manifested the utmost Christian fortitude, and tore all their hardships and cruelty of the rebels without a murmur, the children at intervals conversing with each other in whispers and expressing great anxiety and hope for the moment when they should see another opportunity to escape before the glendelinians reached their encampments. Fortunately in following for only a few hours the wounded war correspondent came upon a group of sleeping Angelinians who had been out scouting and who had taken shelter in a ravine where they built a hut but had thus reinforced by those, and with the two children left in the care of others they again set out with the intention of securing the other children but without avail the rebels had reached the encampments too soon. His rebel troop being scattered and raiders had always proved very troublesome to the rear of the besieging Christian lines and many expeditions had been sent to the rebel lines. The rebels were aware of the expeditions from the time they started and when one of them drew near they concealed what they could not carry off with the prisoners left their small encampments and retreated to the main rebel lines at given places in front of the fortresses. About this time one of the eldest of the children had serious thoughts of concealing herself and several other children until the arrival of the Angelinians but fearing indeed the consequences of a greater delay in their arrival than she might anticipate she did not attempt it.

late in December about the twenty fourth or near Christmas Eve the expedition did indeed arrive and after having turned the encampments, destroyed the provisions of the rebels, returned back to their own lines after being pursued by a strong body of rebel cavalry. After this the same glendelinians returned to their own lines, but however or food they were greatly disappointed, and finding themselves without proper the infant son of Johnnie the son in paragon, who gave themselves up to a great excess in drinking, they sold two children both little girls to a rebel general while the winter had become very severe, the captive had nothing to protect her near the western bank in looks of some gun for half a gallon of brandy. Though at this time the winter had become very severe, the captive had nothing to protect her.

Other children were ransomed. They displayed much fortitude and the having been brought by Angelinians for their freedom that they could shake off the remembrance of the horrible fate of those in that solitary log cabin in the woods.

Of all the men only the war correspondent had lived to tell the tale and he had only secured two boys and one girl.

In the meantime the correspondent's adventure was not over. This following incident was related to by an officer to the glendelinians. After having secured the three children the person who was with him, left him and his companion and carrying the little girl in his arms went on toward the direct ion of the Christian lines. In the meantime a large number of glendelinians were standing up the river in their gunboats carrying out their way between the ice islands with which the river was fairly studded, they noticed the man walking along the river bank at some distance ahead with two boys with him and carrying something in his arms. Being suspicious they sent the gunboats full steam ahead regardless of the ice floes and soon came near enough to the moving object to perceive that it was a man trudging on with three child ren in his possession toward the Christian lines. The man who noticed the two boys observed from the custom of their clothing that they were child slaves, either runaways or rescued by the man and at once some of them started halloing for the man to stop. The war correspondent as soon as he noticed he was being pursued by rebels in gunboats made a frantic effort to increase his speed and get away from the river. Two men leaped forth and shells exploded near him bringing down a shower of leaves and trees from the evergreen. The rebels also who immediately landed found little difficulty in keeping pace with the fugitives, but refrained from firing any more till as they hoped he should be separated by a run from the two boy slaves whom they should kill the children and these the rebels wished to capture alive. As they followed him closely toward the side which was still some distance off it suddenly occurred to a young rebel officer in the form of foremost of the pursuers that he might enjoy a little amusement at the fugitive's expense, so quickly thought he unraveled a coil of rope he had with him, formed one end of it into a noose and threw it over one of the boys heads and attached the other and around his stomach thus compelling the little boy to halt. His intention was to dispatch the little boy with his run or his snare he soon as he got him within his grasp and great was the merriment excited in the party as the child labored hard to get the noose from him but it slipped from his chest and wounded suddenly around his throat and drawn tight by the rebel pulling at the other end started to strangle him until his tongue protruded, but a sudden surprise was in store for the rebels. The fugitive had halted from behind a tree, and the man himself darting out grabbed the little boy and made a movement that was sooner than the rebel had calculated. No sooner he did the man free the little shocked child from the rope than he secured the rope in his own hands and gaining foothold of a firm rock leaped his feet with two or three frantic jumps on the rope he sprang forward to the tree before other rebels could fire at him and drawing the rebel with him before the rest realized the situation and here on an instant the rebel was precipitated down a steep ravine and dashed to pieces, and letting go of the long rope the fugitive and his child came down under their own off triumphantly into the depths of the forest. Another rebel he shot at although he did not kill him he was so badly wounded, and so bruised and battered by his fall that it was indeed a year before he was able to resume his usual occupations.

During the further part of the pursuit another disaster occurred to one of the rebels. He was the one who pursued him from the first gunboat had been aided by others under Colonel McIntyre noting like a lot of his boys in gray sitting tightly hither and thither among trees to prevent themselves from being the target of their fugitive who looked quite dangerous. By and by those of the glendelinians who had often heard the war correspondent's son given by the officer to separate the soldiers further apart and start firing upon the fugitive in an effort to bring him down, and they all did betake themselves vigilantly to and behind a stream with the exception of one rebel soldier who bobbed up and down and straggled energetically but who seemed to manifest any intention to getting himself out of the range of the fire of the fugitive should he intend to use his gun when finding himself well pressed, then the fugitive who saw the performance heard a hoarse cry and from the officer:

"Come off from that rock and get behind a tree you fool!"

There was no answer except a more energetic struggle. Then a second fierce cry and:

"Come out of the way there I tell you." "You want to get killed by the dirty christian dog we are pursuing."

Thinking there was a frantic hobbling and struggle on the part of the rebel soldier but still no progress toward the tree. (out of all once an infuriated command) If one can bring such a thing!

"Come out of the way, come out of the way this in minute or less we'll desert you. The others have already got behind behind trees and are working themselves forward that way."

Then the infuriated fugitives and the rebel soldier take a wilder plunge than ever and heard a shrill distressed voice quiver back:

"Oh I can't my coat tail is caught in the crevice of a tree trunk."

It was so and thus by this funny accident the pursuit was much delayed and the fugitives were far behind by this time.

Finally having found his way to the ravine on a horse he rode to his comrades who then skirmished with the rebel pursuers at a bend in the road in the Red Riding Hood forest firing on them vigorously and checked them by snuffing out an inconsiderable loss. Then as they passed this bend still followed by the enemy they found among their own number four dead men, three or four dead horses, and the boy about six years old sitting on a half snow covered tree stump so white faced and scared that he could not speak a word. The Angelinians spoke to him very kindly, and tried to comfort him, and finally he began to cry and begged to be taken home. When they asked him what his name was he gave it as "Johnnie." "Johnnie what?" He was crying so so that the brave soldiers could not make it out. The soldiers of the Ange Inters civil war was a very curious thing indeed, while the heart of fierce little was always in his blood his heart would always grow soft at the sight of a poor child or other small animal frightened from cover by the awful din of conflict.

They had not a second look for the dead soldiers lying there but half a dozen troopers jangled as to who should be guardian of that poor little boy and his followers the other boy and little baby girl. He was a legitimate reason, or one of the spurs of war. As a compromise, he was sent to the care of the war correspondent for the time being until they could find their way back to the christian lines. In the during the continuing confusion of the desperate flight the little boy told the soldiers that his mother and father were dead, his father had lived on the road toward Julio Gallo by which the rebels had marched when they captured that section of the Adrian highway and as the glendelintians had taken the city he had been a prisoner until he succeeded in getting away.

Being far in the rear of the woods and to the rear of the christian lines now toward which they had been driven by their desperate pursuers the christian lines were about thirty miles away. Of course it may be true that every company of soldiers has its pet, if not a dog, cat, or squirrel to be then something else, even a possum or raccoon. It was indeed late in December when the three children had been secured from the victor victorious glendelintians who had captured the log cabin and already the two boys alone were known to almost all the men in the brigade of pursued soldiers. The two little boys were quiet little clams seeming to have a great sorrow in their hearts, and it was only when he heard the fugitives talking about the end of the pursuit and of safely reaching the christian lines and how the soldiers intended to have them adopted into some kind family that they laughed and seemed boylike.

The glendelintians pursued for three days and tried every device to secure the children but at night the fugitives hid them away and treasured the children as if they had been three gold nuggets and when attacked at night in their shelter drove the rebels off with great loss. During the time one of the soldiers forced the boys a pair of shoes and warmer clothing and when they got then rigged out they felt proud of them.

The soldiers even taught the little boys how to use a pistol to use in case of defense and all the soldiers were careful of their hard words when he was among them. Well a day and day soon came. At a certain point a large column of pursuers on horseback came up and made a desperate dash cutting off a portion of the fugitives. The others managed to rescue their comrades after a hard sharp fight, and when they came to look around they found about twenty dead and wounded glendelintian soldiers. If there had been nothing more they should have wheeled into line and fought over it. A rebel soldier takes his chance with the christians you see and gets no sympathy if he is killed or wounded. If he wins he gets no credit. If he falls there is always earth enough to hide his wicked body from sight. They were getting ready to move on before the main body of pursuers came up when there was great excitement among the others, and a number of the soldiers pushed forward to find the war correspondent sending over something lying on a blanket in the deep snow. He was crying like an old woman and some of the soldiers were even brushing tears from their eyes, and still others boldly vowing vengeance. That something on the blanket was one of the poor little boys.

A stray bullet had whistled through the air from a rebel sharpshooter during the skirmish and ended the little boy's life as quickly as you could blow out the flame of a candle, and as he lay there on his back with soldiers around him, white faced and dead, and his eyes half closed, the soldiers saw through their own tears a great tear on his cheek, like a pearl gleaming in the winter sunshine, which streamed down through the smoke yet hanging above the treetops. When in their more hearts that felt that the rebels were bent on anything whatever to prevent child slaves fugitives from escaping them.

Ordering the rebels to move onward toward the retreating Angelinians fugitives the rebel officer rode forward with captain Jaylor and held out through a grove of lofty and wide spreading oak trees most of which were more or less damaged by the gigantic shell fire of the recent battle in the wilderness.

or less damaged by the gigantic shell fire of the recent battle in the Red Riding Hood Wilderness between the main rebel and christian armies of about two weeks before and which was still raging elsewhere. Having proceeded about two miles and one half with large numbers of rebel troops the leader observed some of the Angelinians walking slowly toward the approaching rebels and stood in a line to deliver a broadside of rifle fire within fifty yards of the rebels. The rebel troops immediately started firing themselves and sent a bullet behind the shoulder of one of the leaders of the Angelinians besides shooting several more down, upon which some of the survivors rushed forward about one hundred yards in tremendous confusion yelling like fiends, and then falling back opening fire in general. Presently these fugitives made off as fast as they could leaving their dead behind them. The rebels followed but found it hard to come up with the blood running freely from some of the rear guard of the fugitives they saw been wounded in the third skirmish.

The chase led through a large herd of tall trees and so vigorous was the chase that some of the fugitives grazed back at the glendelintians in utter amazement and bewildering bewilderment.

At length the pursuers rebels delivered a second volley, but the cool colonel who also fired at the man who had a little boy with him did miss his aim because his horse became fidgety. The rebel officer however rode along side of the fugitive after aiming on him expecting in his ignorance that at length some of the Angelinians soldiers would stand at bay to defend him, which however Angelinians never do, when suddenly the Angelinian on the horse resumed his out course as if nothing had happened after trying to secure the rebel officer. Becoming at last annoyed at the length of the chase chose as he wished only to secure the two child slaves and being indifferent whether he got the Angelinian soldiers and made them prisoners or not he determined to bring matters to an immediate crisis, so turning on his horse, he dashed ahead and rode right in his path. Upon this the Angelinian with the little boy in his possession uttered an expression and instantly charged the rebel officer in the most resolute manner, yelling and swearing loudly and to the rebel quickly wheeled his horse about to his left he followed the rebel at a furious pace for several hundred yards with his "horrid snarl" within a few feet of the rebel officers' throat, and that the other glendelintians who were looking on in alarm thought their colonel's destruction inevitable. They dared not fire for fear of hitting their leaders. It was certainly a very near thing, the rebel horses' officer's horse was extremely afraid of the Angelinian's snarl, and exerted his utmost energies on this occasion.

The Angelinian officer however after trying to shoot the colonel in vain wheeled about and continued his former course, and the rebel colonel being perfectly satisfied with this first interview which he had already enjoyed with him, had no desire to cultivate his acquaintance any further, and accordingly made for the rebel column and ordered them to follow the fugitives carefully.

Another rebel officer on one occasion of this pursuit having succeeded in wounding an Angelinian soldier who had charge of the little baby girl he charged suddenly and in the thicket knocked him down from his horse, but fortunately missing his stroke with his sabre as his horse fairly rode over the fallen rebel leaving him to struggle out from a small snowdrift. Suddenly the rebel horseman got up to his feet when the Angelinian soldier turned his almost faded horse and succeeded in cutting the rebel from knee to hip with a blow of his sabre before he could draw his pistol, and knocking him over with a blow from the hilt of the sabre and riding over him again. The Angelinian soldier might have easily completed his revenge but fearing for the safety of the little girl on the same hot horse with him, he plunged plunged into a thicket and lost his rebel victim escape. The rebel officer however pursuing singled out another Angelinian and gave him several bullets and felled his horse. He then rode up to the fallen horse and man and was going to make sure both were dead, when two Angelinians dispersed from the distant crowd of fugitives and immediately charged. He hastily fired and rushed away but the Angelinians not being touched answered the fire and brought him and the horse down in a heap. Wounded as he was the rebel got to his feet and rushed away himself from the two horsemen pursued by the infuriated Angelinians which however were brought down by his comrades just as he threw himself behind a tree for safety and drew his revolver. The race with the Angelinians was so close or such a close one indeed that as the fugitives and their horses lay he could touch one of the fallen men with his finger so that another moment would have been fatal to him indeed.

Another rebel officer who led the party of the fugitives would have been able to give an interesting account of killing a desperate Angelinian soldier and the capture of the baby girl if he had been able to survive the war. Having separated his comrades into three divisions and sending one to intercept the fugitives he proceeded with the rest along the banks of the river to a point where the river was without a beach and overhung with trees on one side of the shore, here he discovered one of the Angelinians had climbed a tree with the baby girl in his effort to escape. Immediately a score of rebels, rifles were pointed upward but one of the rebels having pointed out another soldier who was also concealed in the tree top in the net of firing upon the officer he received the bullets which though only wounded him. Quickly clambering down in half way both soldiers with the little girl prepared to make a daring leap into the river one of them grasping him around the body as he descended but were killed by the second volley and both dropped into the water the baby girl following after immediately the men sprang to secure the child but as it was submerged and under water for nearly two minutes the child was very nearly drowned. After a little rubbing however the child was restored to life and very speedily showed its wicked captor capt captors that though only four years old it had a will and a temper of its own. Of course the little girl was very young but as restless as an eel and watching every opportunity. In this the little girl succeeded at last inflicting a rather severe wound upon a Jamaican man sergeant who gave the little girl a hearty slap on the side of the head and then tied her arms a bolt behind her back and fastened a rag tightly around her mouth or face. Two days afterwards the little girl from the exposure of her wound so long suddenly died, having been fierce and vindictive to the rebels to the last.

at the fugitive boat in a perfect fusillade. "Give way my lands give way!" shouted one of the rebel leaders or headmen. "We are gaining on the fugitive boat! We are gaining on them. Give way! A long steady stroke! That's the way to it!" "Ay, ay!" cried the boat steersmen. "What do you my boys!" "Hail us like them to a finish! Pull like vengeance!"

And the rebel dances round the ways and among the floating ice cakes seemingly to suddenly catch them, the chase was now truly soul stirring; the fugitives were firing constantly and the rebel in the boats were hit and wounded. Yet sometimes the harborsmen then the starboard, then the waist boat took the lead and the men who were now doing the rowing kept on firing at the fugitive boats. It was a severe trial of skill and muscle. After they had run two miles up the river at this rate, the fugitive boat suddenly turned in a slant a landing direction going dead to windward and a volley of six fired bullets struck three of the rebels and they pitched headlong into the water.

There's she goes right ahead," shouted the officer. "The officer Taborer of the 1st Infantry dancing with delight at the sight." "There they go, there they go," they cannot escape us yet."

(give way, give way my hearties.) Ordered the officer in charge putting his weight against the aft or rear, go you love him! A bottle of gin to the best man; Oh pile it on! Pile it on while you have breath... Pile it on! On with the beef shoulders; graah every ear, double en up or break en, every mothers son of you pull; go talking, lay back to it, how or I never!

rescue the Anglians when they appeared again through the haze of rifle smoke. It was evident that their oarsmen had rowed like mad and by which effort and maneuver the fugitives had again gained about a mile. The chase was now almost hopeless, as the fugitive boat was making to windward rapidly. A heavy black snow cloud was on the horizon portending an approaching snowsquall and the pursued was fast fading from the sight of the pursuers.

for a grim and ghastly story. "Never give up my lad!" said the headman in a cheering voice. "Mark my words we will have the christian dogs yet. Only think they are our prisoners already and there is no mistake about it, they will be our prisoners. Now for a hard windy pull, give me a shove, give me a haul, here they are, oh pull my lively end of the line and in a twinkling you will have a mile off. There are our fugitives!" the wind and by this time started blowing and increased almost to a gale, and the heavy black clouds had scattered over the sky far and wide in a slaty gray canopy of oily appearance and snow pellets began to fall as rain in a cloudburst and nothing now could be hardly seen. Part of the snow squall passed off to leeward down the river and the falling snow entirely concealed the landscape of the river and the distant forests. The situation of both pinnaces and fugitives was now rather unpleasant, in a rough rough snowstorm like this out in the middle of a river filled with r treacherous dates of ice, the other pursuing boats of sight and soon moment the wind and snowstorm increased.

the boy and the girl stood with their arms
"Softly softly 'y ladies," said the headman, "look out they don't see us no more."

The rifle men let fly a number of shots and bullets were hurled into the fugitive boat and two Angelinians were killed.

By the time the men of the other boats had reached the scene the rebels had been worsted and the fugitives fell on their way with a cheer into the woods again out of a light night of the rebels on account of the thick shroud of the falling snow was mine.

and managed to jump into a small boat and pulled her out of the shoreward portion of the river where she happened to lay moored, crept cautiously along the snowbound shore until suddenly he reached the entrance to one of the thickest recesses of the Red Hiding Hood Woods so common along the river regions. The gloomy recesses of these natural gigantic forests millions of sparrows resorted to a rapid flight at the approach of rebel pursuers and the glanzelinians now fired beyond respect by the continued resistance and flight of the fugitives determined to deal death and destruction and nothing else, sliding with lightly descending ears into the yawning night chaos of the deep woods he stepped nimbly from the little boat and then armed with only a rifle and having no ammunition, he penetrated into the inner recesses of the woods. He was followed by the men who stalked him, a great quantity of birds were pressed there by him because he engaged with him, he attempted to get through the woods that he did not pay my attention to the lapse of time. The increasing fury of the snowstorm until the loud yelling of rebel soldiers behind him made him aware that the glanzelinians had found him out, despite the snow still falling covering him, steps as fast as they were made in the fresh snow and now was entirely rapidly on him with two blood hounds leading

That with a design of a wheel they always carried. He might however have still and occupied easily by following the small Sunbeam Creek but unfortunately the stre stream was frozen over, and a boat seen there which was attached to a string by a tree was frozen in the ice, and the soldier believed that the last link between him and the living world was broken. Gastello Frankerson as the soldiers now was rapidly drew his only loaded pistol and following the direction of the sounds decided to shoot down his pursuers as soon as they came near enough. To go forward swiftly through the woods in such darkness and in the thick snow around seemed impossible and he well knew there there was no way of retreating from the woods, which in a few hours seemed to be fairly filled with yelling warriors. His heart died within him as he thought of the horrid fate which awaited him flamed across his mind. It was not that he feared to face death, by flood or battlefield, on the stormy sea or a dizzy cliff, and had dared it a hundred thousands moments during his life with perfect ease on occasion - but to face those grim glacial giants out there in a lonely woods alone, to struggle helplessly with the rebels in the midst of a raging snow squall was more

But his fortitude could even bear. He shrieked aloud in his agony or despair, he put out his flash light for fear his pursuers would see it and trailed along the bank of the river listening in awe to the curling water that fairly gurgled at his feet at it seemed and the noise of distant shots that fell like a death warning upon his ears. The wind which had been scarcely felt during the day before the outbreak of the storm began to rise to a screaming gale driving the snow in sheets waves in two directions or whirling sheets of it into his face and drove the tumultuous waves of the ice covered river with hoarse and tedious clamor upon the river shore. Every moment the violence of the gale increased, and mingled with the screeching of the wind was the howling and fall, howling of the pursuing Angelinians as they swept onward in the pursuit while the hoarse dash of the approaching waves along the river shore, the cracking of shattered ice cakes, and the shrill scream of the wind through the boughs of the trees formed a sonorous terrible dissonance well suited for the requiem of the hapless wretch, who had been pursued, a lost fugitive, in a gloomy forest, pursued by dangerous enemies at the on hand of bloodhounds, and out in a raging blizzard storm.

But the love of life and freedom which were in him calling to it in the most hopeless extremity was strong in gossamer heart his firmness and presence of mind gradually returned and he resolved not to perish without a struggle. He remembered that at the further extremity of the woods a slope rose upward to a certain distance, he had often observed that slope in these snow woods when he was a boy and he knew that by means of them he could place himself at an elevation above the reach of the rebels in time to rest himself. But the hope thus suggested was quickly dampened when he reflected that a most deep fathomsless fissure which ran perpendicular through the rocks formed a chasm more than eleven feet in width between him and his place of refuge from his pursuers.

The idea of pursuing Angelinians however which were approaching nearer and nearer and very rapidly gaining on him compelled him to continue his flight more quickly and he felt that the only chance he had left for life was to endeavor to cross the chasm. He was still very young, active, and possessed of uncommon courage, and he had frequently by daylight even when a boy leaped across the abyss in the presence of boy and girl friends to amuse them or even show off as it is called, few of whom ever dared to follow his example. But now alone in utter darkness, how was he to attempt such a perilous feat when he even did not know how near the chasm was and how was he to know its presence in such darkness and snow? The conviction that death was inevitable both ways but more certain from the rebels than from the chasm if he remained where he was and allowed them to overtake him decided him immediately. Collecting a handful of loose pebbles which he scooped out of the snow he proceeded cautiously over the snow throwing at every step a pebble before him and using his light incessantly at the same time to ascertain the security of his footing. At length he heard the stone a few feet ahead of him as it darted from his fingers descend with a hollow clattering noise, that continued for several minutes until out of hearing. When proceeding a few more inches he flashed his light downward and suddenly observed that he was standing on the brink of the horrible chasm. One quick and earnest prayer he breathed to God and His Blessed Mother who whose powerful merits could protect him in that dreadful moment--then putting out his light and retracing a few spaces and screwing every nerve and muscle in his body to the utmost tension he made a step in advance, and then threw himself forward into the dark and fearful void just as a horde of Angelinians suddenly came up with the bloodhounds and gave a howl of dismay as they saw him leap forward not knowing what he was doing as they had no idea of the chasm being there. Some rushed forward to catch him and were precipitated down into the abyss, but who can tell the whirlwind of thought that rushed through his brain in the brief moment that he hung above that yawning gulf. Should he have indeed miscalculated his distance, or chosen a place where the abyss was much wider or widest--or should his footing fail, or his strength be unable to carry him over, what a horrible death were his. Dashed down that horrible abyss thousands of feet probably, crashing from rock to rock, until he lay at the bottom a mutilated and mangled corpse. The agony of years seemed to be crowded into one single moment, in the next his feet struck against the firm ground on the opposite side of the chasm, and darting behind a tree before the rebels on the opposite side could open fire he felt himself saved though he was trembling like a leaf from his scare and excitement. At least he felt that he had for the moment escaped the imminent peril in which he was placed, and as he clambered joyfully up the rugged slope but keeping himself concealed behind trees and working himself from tree to tree he thought little of the dangers he had to encounter. All through the long night he continued his rapid flight not stopping once while angry pursuers having gotten around the go gulf thundering their shots behind, and while the blind and blizzard cast their cold sheets of snow over and about him. Then he finally came to the other bank of the narrow river which he observed again he hesitated to attempt crossing or following along its banks again, his limbs had become stiff and a little benumbed from overexertion and from the cold and the wetness, and his long abstinence had so weakened his powers that he shrank from the idea of making an attempt to swim across the river to the opposite shore side, while giving way to utmost desponding reflections a stentorian rattle from a familiar voice echoed through the woods despite the noise of the storm and distant pursuers and never had a familiar human voice sounded so sweetly in his ear.

He replied to it with a great thrill of joy and a few minutes several Angelinians with bright flashlights suddenly lit up appeared advancing toward him from an opposite direction and among them was the war correspondent. He had come suddenly back to his own comrades who he had been parted from the evening before. Once more he found himself among a group of his friends who were warmly congratulating him upon his marvellous escape from the "Maschera." They told him that from his not having returned to them that previous evening, it was generally included that he had been either captured, killed or drowned or snowbound in the wilderness. On reaching the side of the stream they discovered the boat he had used in his flight down the river fastened to a small rock and full of ice and snow as she had remained when he left her in his flight through the woods. This circumstance induced them to explore the woods under risk of capture, and the happy result of their search being already known.

Undoubtedly there is among all Angelinians especially among fugitive Angelinians a popular prejudice in favor of the bravery of the glandelinian soldiers to the support of which one of these fugitives has recently contributed after the long pursuit was over. He declared that there was a nobility in the character of the "Wheeler glandelinians" which differed entirely from the sly habits of Gargelians, Zimorandians, and Zimorandians and the other races of glandelinians in general. Although the Wheeler glandelinians in pursuing fugitives are more apt to go after fugitives in dense retreats, he exposed himself in many ways. This exposure or carelessness of concealment when pursuing Christians renders his destruction comparatively easy. Owing to this fact many of the number of some reckless kind of Wheeler glandelinians had greatly diminished. In most part they had almost become extinct around the location of besieged Julio Gallo and in the region of some Catherine they had been during conflicts been continually destroyed hundreds being killed every day until now the present time when such keen rifle men as the Angelinians have taken the field against them, the Wheeler glandelinians though bold and reckless as lions have but little else chance against the rifle and its powerful bullet.

A thrilling story is told of during this long pursuit of one of the Angelinians who had a strange and adventurous with a Wheeler, which illustrates the recklessness of such kind of glandelinians in exposing himself to danger and destruction in his desperate effort to secure his victim. In crossing a wide plain on the edge of the forest one of the Angelinians being behind his comrades saw at a short distance a Wheeler glandelinian following and gaining rapidly on him. When the Angelinian soldier quickened his pace the enemy did likewise, and it was evident to the fugitive Angelinian that the pursuing rebel was only waiting for an opportunity to spring upon him with his fixed bayonet. In such fear the anxious man hurried on through the snow mark until he suddenly reached a high cliff, below which he observed was a deep ravine. Here he determined to live or die, so slowly and carefully creeping down into a crevice in the rock he quietly concealed himself and he having previously placed his hat and overcoat upon his sash which he stuck in the ground by the point near the edge of the precipice he hoping to deceive the rebel in the snow mark who might mistake the bluff for himself.

In due course the glandelinian glandelinian came stealthily along, and on account of the thick fog the snow was making he did not see the abyss in the darkness but only the coat and hat and by means of his searchlight, and so mistaking the hat and coat for the man he sprang at them with much force with fixed bayonet with the intention of running his victim through the body, but he bounded over the precipice instead and was dashed to pieces among the rocks two hundred feet below.

He then recovered his coat and hat and sash which still remained where he had placed it and re-joined his comrades. Another fugitive was Colonel Baker. The sensations of what this man experienced during the pursuit was anything but agreeable. Starting out on a resuscitation of their flight early the next morning the snowstorm having abated they arrived at a denser part of the forest and were pushing their way through the deep snow when the little boy still with them manifested an unwillingness to proceed and shoved sark and undisturbable signs to proceed or of far I mean. Immediately without warning a monstrous surge of glandelinians crashed their way through the snowstorm and attacked the Angelinians at close quarters one of the rebels attacking the Colonel and knocking him completely down and turning him over on his side would have bayoneted him had not one of the Angelinians shot the glandelinian dead. The Colonel having risen to his feet with a command to himself to fight hard and a frightful lunge at one of his antagonists and after a desperate sabre duel succeeded in driving his sabre completely through his left lung and fell falling him. Two other glandelinians then immediately attacked him but for a time nevertheless victory seemed to be on the side of the Angelinian Colonel but with a sudden terrific lunge the glandelinian obtained the advantage and was fast driving their antagonist backwards in the direction of the other fighters. The position of the Colonel was a perilous one for the snow was so high in drifts and so deep on the level that a speedy retreat for safety was impossible, and the Colonel would certainly have been snared to death, had not one of the Angelinian soldiers immediately fired and by a well aimed shot behind the ear brought one of the rebels to the ground. As his first assailant fell the Colonel ceased to retreat and with a loud yell lunged forward upon his remaining rebel foe and killed him. The other rebels were scattered in the fight and happily the colonel was not so badly hurt as to prevent him from continuing the flight through the fern forest. Finally the fugitives secured a small gunboat on the river and yet there was no part of the pursuit but the Angelinians dislike most than being chased by rebel Merriamans. Angelina charged the fugitive gunboat and perforated the iron plates of the vessel in two places, with the result that it made a dangerous leak. She ran ashore and sank a small boat in the middle of the night proceeding that was fastened in the rear of the gunboat by tearing a large piece out of it by its beak. Not satisfied with this success it then again charged the iron gunboat and would assuredly have sunk her if one of the fugitives had not stopped the onset by a shot in one of the gun turrets which caused an explosion and disabled so many men that the mermaid gave up the pursuit.

It was three days later however the fugitives ever reached the shelter of the christian lines, and the war correspondent made up his mind never to enter the rebel lines again unless he was a soldier, and he had not been one but only a newspaper reporter. His quest for child slaves had been an utter failure, but nevertheless to cheer him up general Hanson summoned him to his headquarters two days after his arrival back to the lines, and gave him three pretty little child slaves all girls and advised him to give up his dangerous mission while he has them in his charge and take a train enroute to Abyssinkile which he did.

generals and soldiers were equally desperate as they were before the war. The sides were Angelinians really by Nationality though one side were enemies of the other.

the colonel was not so badly hurt as to prevent him from continuing the flight through the fore forest. Finally the fugitive secured a small punt on the river and yet there was no real of the permit to hunt the Angaitana Indians, but then being chased by rebel Mexican Americans, the fugitive, in a punt and performed the iron plates of the vessel in two places, with the result that it made a dangerous leak. The fugitive was forced to stop in the middle of the night and to attempt to repair the vessel. In the rear of the punt, the boatmen, the out of the bank. Not unfrequently with this accident, the fugitive changed the iron punt and would assume to have each one of the iron plates of the vessel.

ALL all along throughout the frightful siege of vivian, decks, when the siege was growing in force and fury again and war correspondents told and had people and christian soldiers believe a great many wonderful stories about wonderful and most terrible things which neither any christian generals or even the brave and daring vivian girls had ever seen. they even often talked about the mighty alexandrian general Hic-Allister Stanek who was the main general in command of vivian victory and he was occupying one of the pacific islands Fortresses called Jupiter Zeus and they declared that this great general sat most of the time amid the terrible storm of cannon fire of both sides on the top of one of the mighty towers of Luville. taken where from his perilous position he could r easily look down and see everything that was going on among the mighty besieging lines far beyond even despite the thick clouds of smoke from long rows of active cannons and bursting shells, explosives and tremendous fire conflagrations. Despite all the dangers he faced Stanek was like to ride on him behind the long lines of active alexandrian batteries which short forth smoke so thick that they enshrouded storm clouds and whose tremendous reports seemed to hurl upon the besiegers or their own thundering batteries frightful broadside of searing thunder bolts right and left, and among the trees and rocks, the uproar which was so very mighty at times that when the cannons of both sides thundered in single volleys miles long the earth quaked the mountains and hills in and woods trembled, the sky became smoke clouded, and the sun seemed to hid his face.

the sky became much clouded, and the sun seemed to hide its face. Both of them terrible general Mac-Allister Stank and two other fellows, both of them terrible gladiolium general, and two other fellows, both of them terrible gladiolium general, rather than allow them to be taken and set free by the christian besiegers. The name of one of the was Francis Neptuner Possidonia and the other Jacksonia. Another Stank. General Francis Possidonia had for his headquarters in, given a glittering golden palanquin. From his character it would have been better for him to have been a general far down underneath the earth, where the sun never shines, and where there is darkness, weeping, and sorrow and tremendous torments and misery all the time. He was in command of portress Pluto and I Adonise.

and military all the time. He sits in command of fortress Lucille and his army. He and his brother were ve- ry stubborn fellows and once when his fortress was the object of the christian cannon from warships he gave such a response that the shaking caused by the tremendous cannonade made tremendous waves on the waters of the bay and from the concussion the sea broke over the land, it he shells before they exploded howled and screeched fearfully and he was able to repulse attack after attack. He was afterwards called the "shaker of the Earth"!!!. It was said that when ever a child slave died during the seige, either from overwork, starvation or accidental death from explosion the general would send his messenger to carry that child down into a cheerless cavern somewhere and throw it into an abyss or lake w which ever could be found to hide the effects of the child slave crime, and for that reason no one ever spoke of the general wall but through hi thought. In fact, he enoy of all humanity. A great number of other mighty generals were in vlyan wicky with Francis A Stanokso many that no more can be named for the present. A They were in the other fortresses of Lucille, ie son with their garrison, called fortress Venus, Athens, Jsherva and Juno. Violet and her sister are the little brave queens of love and beauty who were indeed fairer and more good by far than any children than you or I have ever seen had many times wished and expressed their wish to go into some of those beautifully named fortresses and spy on the enemy but on account of the extreme danger of doing so they had been sternly refused such a request not by Hanson or his brother but by any general and the Albeucian go governments as well. Violet and her sisters however before they had succeeded into going i to vlyan wicky on the 17 had through their cleverness give many of the generals great wisdom wisdom though children as they were, and either thought then or advised them how to do many useful t hings that would prevent the enemy from successfully breaking up the great seige, there was great fortress Mars on the right probable the right wing of fortress Lucille pickens whose generals and garrisons fairly delighted in the dty and horror of battle. There was fortress Mercury. There was fortress Vulcan. and beside besides these there were many others about whom you will learn by and by as we go on with the s eige in v volume after volume an about whom the spies and correspondents told and wrote strange and wonderful but tremendous stories.

correspondents told and wrote strange and wonderful things. All of the separate sections of Lucillir (at Lucillie) picked fortifications stood high above and about hidden in the clouds of powder smoke from belching cannons and so often shrouded that at a short distance soldiers and spies and correspondents and tourists or onlookers could never see them during a time of tremendous activity. But their generals and other commanders could look down and see what christian armies were doing and oftentimes the rebel generals would leave their own lofty regions and on horses and ride with squadrons of severely under fire to scout on the christians. Both sides in their generals and soldiers were equally desperate as they were brave. No wonder, both sides were Angolinites really by Nationality though one side were enemies of the other.

All a and all of the mightiest of the fortresses was Lucille, nicknamed Propera. General Francis Mac-Allister Stanek had not at first been in command of Vivian Wickey. In the time of the capture of the city and its fortifications after the titanic battle of Julio Gallo there had been twelve generals who had brought with them their entire families and relatives with the rebel armies and at the capture of Julio Gallo they had erected a fortress called S. Saturn which the christians had demolished at the beginning of the siege.

Before the terrible rebellion had broken out and even before the terrible siege of Vivian Wickey had begun men all over the world never were so happy as they were then. It was a true golden age then I tell you. Many people even lived in Galverinia its itself where springtime lasted all the year around. Always it was seen that the woods and meadows were full of blooming blossoms of all kinds beyond counting, and indeed the music of singing birds of all varieties was heard every day and every hour even night also. Apples, and figs, and oranges and all kinds of fruits always hung ripe from the many southern c, climate trees, and there were vines with all various kinds of excellent grapes and bellions of all varieties of berries which the people of Galverinia picked and what they did not use for themselves sent to other parts of the country. Men and women would have gladly wished to live for hundreds of years and never become gray or wrinkled or lame, and would have been glad to remain young and handsome. In southern Galverinia there were never no cold winters nor terrible winds nor anything to make people afraid.

In this story there was seldom any such thing as sickness or sorrow unless was brought it on. And if anyone was poor those who had precious things never allowed them to be in want, and the sunlight, the pure air which killed germs of all kinds, the wholesome waters in the springs and rivers the carpet like grass, the blue skies the fruits and flowers of the woods and meadows made Galverinia and Angelinia and Abbeannia the most beautiful christian countries in the world. Those who were richer than another gave money and not like in other nations as we suffer was there any need for locks or bolts to keep out robbers, for everybody was everybody's friend and no man wanted to get more of anything than his neighbors had.

At the outbreak of the tremendous war all the birds terrified by the terrible destruction wrought, the explosions, the booming of cannons and the crashes of shells, and the din of a all confusion flitted away through the air in perfect fright, and over the mountains and across the sea to the flowery lands of Abbeannia itself which country though at war was not invaded by her rebel neighbors and so was peaceful. And some men and women say any to even this day the poor birds were wandering happily hither and thither about the countries of Abbeannia, causing innocent babies to smile in their cradles, easing the burdens of the tollown and the sick and blessing mankind everywhere with their pretty chirping songs.

What a pity that this Golden Age for the christian world should come to such a sudden end. But it was the rebellion of wicked glandelinia who brought about the sad change. It was hard to believe it but general Mac-Allister Stanek was the secret son of the wicked old glandelinian king glandlin Stanek and that when he was hardly ten years old he had learned of the christian nations disfavoring child slavery and having remembered from glandelinian histories he had studied when going to school the defeats the glandelinians received from Abbeannia in Eighteen fortyone he had even then while going to school began to plot how he might wage a new war against the authorities of the christians and try to be the most astonishing rebellious ever known or heard of. As soon as he had been grown up in 1901 he had in a general and great conspiracy persuaded his brothers, and even sisters and his own father to join him in his plot, and during the conspiracy they vowed that if Angelinia and her sister state Galverinia should not stop the interference in the growing child slavery they would drive all christian colonies from the earth. Can they do it?

When with the coming of the great war in 1912 really started followed the already long and terrible siege of Vivian Wickey. Though the Angelinians were by no means being driven off or forced to raise the siege, but strengthening their hug more tighter a regular war. Their hug general Mac-Allister Stanek had many helpers and he therefore was bound to hold out at any cost. He had many great cannons on the fortresses which he had called Cyclope guns which during the siege were kept busy against the christian cannoners of their opposing batteries all the time whose shells made such terrible explosions as to throw down great showers of rocks and broken fragments of trees upon or against the strongholds of the besieging christian armies, and general Mac-Allister Stanek's other great batteries of cannons from the other land forts and shore and land batteries hurled their sharp lightning like flashes through the air and the shells were so constant in their explosions that despite snow on the ground their flashes set thousands of great evergreen and christmas trees on fire every day, and the waters in the rivers sometimes boiled from the heat of conflagrations. Of course it did seem that the good old christian generals and their assistances could not hold out in their siege against such foes as these guns, but the sudden arrival of new armies under the two vivians and general concentinian Aronburg made things more possible and now it was evident that even if the enemy could hold out, they could not however break the siege.

During the siege the Angelinians had so mitted wanton destruction of all things within location of the insurgent lines. All fruit trees in the woods were broken down to prevent the enemy from getting the fruit. The Angelinians even hunted all timid animals eatable captured these animals and either used them as pets or littered them in spots beyond fee reach. Wild animals such as rabbits, chickens and other fowls were also secured. So all throughout beautiful Galverinia and also Angelinia there was now no more peace, but horrible war, instead of plenty there was starvation throughout a region of twenty thousand miles, instead of innocence there was horrible crime, instead of happiness there was unaccountable misery and desolation. And that is the sad way in which king glandlin and his son Stanek made themselves so mighty a two war lords and that was the way in which Galverinia and the world's golden Age seemed to come to an end.

HOW SOME RELIEF WAS GIVEN TO SOME OF THE BAD VICTIMS OF THE BESIEGED CITY OF VIVIAN WICKERY!!!!!!

In the meantime during the horrible siege of Vivian Wickey, there lived within the beautiful and end city two brothers who were not glandelinians or like them, nor yet like the mighty glandelinian generals who reigned amid the horrors. They were the sons of one of the last government authorities of Vivian Wickey who had fought on their father's side against the rebels, and who had been captured as prisoners and then treated as criminals and sent in chains to one of the strong prison houses of the government. One of the eldest of these christian brothers was Jack Prometheus and all the while the siege was on with its many raging bombardments and bloody battles he was always thinking of the future and thinking of what to do to take things ready for what might happen to morrow or next week, or next year or after things to come. The younger was called Prometheus Prometheus for he was still better always so busy thinking of the horrors of yesterday and of the future to come and he believed that the besieged glandelinians had no care at all for what might indeed come to pass after a while. For now comes or later the rebel authorities of Vivian Wickey and her tribunals had not sent all the remaining christian inhabitants of the city into prison with the rest who had been so cruelly slaughtered during the No. 1 Regime of Terror. The man whose name was Prometheus did not care to live in hiding among the city's tenants. He was too busy for that. While the mighty christian batteries were thundering and roaring like a million volcanoes in eruption day after day and shaking the city like an earthquake continually and filling the sky with smoke of burning shells and high explosives, he was intent upon plans for taking the non-combatants who were loyal to Abbeannia more miser and better in condition than they had ever been before. He took the risk to go out at one woman and children and live among amongst them and to help them bear the trials and sufferings of the siege for his heart was filled with sadness when he found that they were no longer happy as they had been during the golden days before the war broke out. As how poor and wretched they were. He found many living in caverns under the city, dug by themselves, in sewer passages, and in holes dug in the street streets on or in the cellars of the buildings, in small pits, secret passage ways and other places of concealment not with the purpose to escape from the enemy who were in possession of the city but from the dreaded shells of the besiegers which fell and exploded in the city as often as thunder crashes are heard in the most violent thunderstorms. Many of the poor non-combatants found by him to be shivering from the cold because the enemy did not allow them any provisions to keep themselves warm with fire, they were facing starry starvation because the enemy frequently refused to give the christian inhabitants anything to eat, they were hunted by rebel criminals and murderers being the most miser miserable creatures ever known.

"If they could have fire to warm themselves with in spite of the rebels," said Prometheus to himself. "they could at least warm themselves in their hiding places and seek their food which some one may secure for them, and after a while I could secure for them some tools and have them build shelters in their places of concealment, without fire and other means of better living these poor people on account of the siege and the enemy in general general are worse off than the beasts. And worse of all the rebels won't rebuild the ruins caused by great shell fire."

"At first he went boldly to general Mac-Allister Stanek and begged him to allow the non-combatants of Vivian Wickey who were Angelinians and Galverinians better quarters to live and to give them provisions to make fire to warm themselves so that they might have a little comfort through the long dreary months of the winter and the siege of the christians also."

"Not a Spark!" he said. "I allow them to make." "No indeed. Why if those christian dogs had provisions to make fire in their places of concealment they might start conflagrations that would burn us out of the city altogether and then the nation would win the siege without even further fighting and afterwards the christian nations would even drive us out of the kind kingdom of glandelinia. Let them live with the cold, the dirty christian dogs, and let them live like the beasts. It is best for them to be poor and ignorant that glandelinians may thrive and be happy. Their time of death and destruction will soon come also."

The Angelinian Prometheus made no answer, but nevertheless he had set his heart to help mankind and he did not give up. He turned away and left general Mac-Allister Stanek and his company of generals. As he went in disguise he was walking along the shores of the Vivian River near the vicinity of the Bridge he found a small stick in the form of a club with a hollow inside and when he had broken it in two he saw that he could put into the hollow inside a dry soft pith which if placed properly would burn softly and slowly and keep on fire a long time without burning through the stick.

888 took the long stick in his right hand and started with it toward one of the clandestine camp fires he had observed in the distance and which there was not a single soul around. He thought it a secure smoulder in the night which the enemy would not see.

"The poor victims of the police as well as myself shall have fire and means to make it in spite of the tyrant general who sits in his easy chair in Vivian Wickey while his men go to their deaths in battle," he said to himself.

He reached the place of the camp fire in the early night just as the silver orb of the winter moon was rising from the horizon in the east and beginning his daily journey through the sky. "Thinking that no one was seeing his motions he cautiously and with a quick action stuck the end of the long stick to the flames of the bonfire and the dry, pitch caught on fire and burned slowly but to his horror made a lot of smoke. Turning with the intention of hastening back to the city he made some enclosure for the stick which would hide the smoke from an old tin can and soon carried into the city the precious smoulder hidden in the hollow center of the stick. He called some of the shivering men and women and children to from their hidingplaces to him and with some provisions he gathered he built a fire for them and showed themselves how to retain the fire without any matches and how to build other fires from the coals. Soon there was a cheerful blaze in every concealment of the non-combatants in the city itself and men women and children gladly gathered around it and were warm and happy and thankful to their brave Angelinian friend for the wonderful help he had brought to them from the rebel camp fire. It was not long that he secretly secured provisions and food for them from the enemy's provision stores and the hiding people were able to cook their food and eat like men instead of hermits. However they could not dare come out of their dark lurking hiding places for though they longed to come out in the open air and the bright sunlight, they dreaded the exploding shells. After that the brave Angelinian taught them little by little nearly a thousand things showed them how to build shelters in their cavern homes of wood or stone, and how to protect themselves from the noisy shell fire and from rebels who may look for some of them to surer as was often the case. He also showed them how to dig down further in the earth under the city and when he saw how happy he was about succeeding in making the people who had been so helpless he cried out:

"A new golden age shall come in spite of the seige, brighter and better by far than even the old. Things might have gone on very happily indeed and the beautiful golden age of Vivian Wickey really might have come again if it had not been for general Mic-Allister Stanck. At one day when the shellmotes of both sides had slackened somewhat, and all efforts of the Christians as things so had seemed to be concentrated upon Andron and Ann Aronburg he changed to go out of his headquarters with soldiers, spies, and police and generals to make rounds of the city of Vivian Wickey and by the help of thousands of spies, and police, and detectives and soldiers who went from place to place on horseback or on cars despite danger of shell fire he found out that the people who were in hiding had fires burning, provisions given to them and people living in better shelter he was very angry.

"What Christian spy has done all this!" he asked furiously. And after some days passed one of the spies found out it was the Christian Prometheus, and reported it to him.

"What?" he was a young Christian dog in disguise he cried, "Mic-Allister. Well I will punish him in a way that will make him wish I had shut him up in the prison house with his kindred in some Catherine. But as for those non-combatants they will not be allowed to keep their provisions and fire for it shall be taken away from them. And if possible I will make them ten or twenty times more miserable than they were before they had been made prisoners."

Of course it would be easy enough he felt sure to deal with the Christian Prometheus at any time, and so thinking the man could not get away he was in no great haste about it. By thus delaying he never succeeded in getting the spy. He however made up his mind to send soldiers and arrest all who were found in hiding and have them confined in all prisoners within Vivian Wickey.

And he thought of a place or plan for doing it in a very strange roundabout way. In the first place he ordered his generals especially Vulcan/Vulcania whose headquarters was at Andron to take all the generals and have them in council to make sure what was to be done with the number of prisoners that would be captured or arrested from their hiding places.

So General Vulcania did as he was bidden and when he had finished he carried the laws forever to general Purrtorian who had his own headquarters at Julio Julio Callio.

In the meantime it was harder for the rebel soldiers to arrest the person persons in hiding than he thought it was. From the facilities was a strange and beautiful little girl who had done much even risked her life many times to help many of those distressed. She was only ten years old, but she was beautiful, had a pleasant voice, and good manners, a kind heart, and skill in many arts, but at the same time great curiosity.

The little girl of course despite all questions asked would not reveal her name to nobody but nevertheless she was so beautiful and so wonderfully gifted that no one could help loving her. The people in the city admired her and fearing that something would happen to her she gave her to the care of Prometheus one of those who brought the child saying:

"Prometheus here is a beautiful child for whom I fear the safety of, and whom general Mic-Allister Stanck had sent you to ask you to destroy but for I know you will leave Vivian Wickey and get her to the Christian lines in safety."

Prometheus had been often warned by his brother to be careful what he does with anything that general Mic-Allister Stanck might send him for he knew that the mighty Angelinian tyrant could never be trusted but when he saw the little girl how lovely and nice and when he forgot all warnings, and took her to his own secret home. He lived in her new home the little girl was very happy and even Prometheus when he saw the child often was more pleased with her loveliness. She had brought with her a strange looking basket of black ocher about two feet long and a foot wide, and half a foot deep which she had managed to secure from general Mic-Allister Stanck's headquarters, which she believed held many precious documents concerning the Christians, but which Prometheus had warned her never to open it nor look at the things inside while in the city as it was dangerous with so many Angelinians about.

"They must be something which general Stanck knows about the Christians who are besieging the city of Vivian Wickey," he said to herself when she knew no one was around that were rebels and then she thought of how they should be taken safely to the Christian lines.

"Why did I secure them if I should never examine them nor so much as look at them at least?" she asked herself.

The more she thought about the black little basket, the more curious she was to see what was really in it, and every hour she had taken it down from its shelf and looking about to see that no one was watching her felt of the lid, and tried to peer inside of it without opening it.

"Why should I care what Prometheus told me?" she said at last. "He is no more wiser than I am and anyway the articles would be of no use to him. I think that I will look at them at any rate. He will never know. Nobody else will ever know. But first I will see that no one is watching me for if enemies are about I will be taken as a spy and good night."

She opened the lid and saw inside papers with writings on it which of course she could not understand. As soon as she had shut it down again and hid the box there was a whirling rustling noise which scared her and before she could leave the roof she saw pass her place outside the window ten thousand strangely dressed men with death mask like faces, and wearing for customs gaunt and dreadful forms such as nobody in the whole world had ever seen. They continued to pass the window outside in long streams and then disappeared around a ally way. They were the gnomes! Angelinian child Executives who had been sent in the dreadful forms to go into every child slave place pick out children who were unable to work any more and murder them. They went into every place and without anyone seeing them in the darkness rushed down among child slaves and out an end to many a little life and then left the places unseen and unheard.

If the little girl had not shut down the lid so quickly and put the basket back where she hid it she would have been discovered and things would have been very bad for her also. But she closed it and put it away just in time, before any of the rascally fools outside saw her. At the same time a small kitten also appeared and started meowing but she continually pushed him backwards into a small closet to keep him quiet and shut the door so he could not escape and arouse suspicion. She feared if the cat had gone up to her and starting started her cries she would never know what troubles were going to come for her, and yet already she herself had had no joys and happiness as long as she had lived.

The next thing that general Mic-Allister Stanck did was to attempt to punish Prometheus for stealing fire from one of the Angelinian encampments and give it to the people hiding from the rebels and she ill fire of the Christian lines. He bade many of his officers and generals and even detectives and policemen to seize the hold Christian spy and carry him to the topmost part or roof of the highest house in Vivian Wickey. At the same time he gave this order he ordered one of his blacksmiths who showed him a horse to bind the prisoner with iron chains as soon as he was caught so that he could not move hand or foot. The rebel blacksmith did not like to do this for somehow he was a friend of the Christian spy but he felt he dared not disobey, and so the great friend of the help a helpless non-combatants of besieged Vivian Wickey who had given them means to be warm in their hiding places, and showed them how to live through all the horrors was hunted for by many rebels and knowing from his own spies that he would be chained outside to the roof of the highest building in Vivian Wickey if he was captured with the storm winds whistling always around him and the pitiless hail and snow beating in his face and fierce eagles and birds shrieking in his ears or exposed to exploding shells from the Christian lines he decided to prevent this if he could and so taking the little girl with him he hid in the innermost sections of a deep tunnel. He bore all his sufferings and persecutions without a groan and never would he give up or allow himself to be captured neither would he say he was sorry for what he had done and many who had looted him and tried to capture him met their deaths at his hands. Day after day with the little girl in hiding from the rebel searchers they hid in the deep tunnel underground only coming out at night to secure provisions. Now and then the brave little girl would look up at him with her pretty face and smile through her tears at him, now and then friendly spies would come and bring him messages from far off sections of the city, once some little runaway child slave came and were also taken care of by him and he learned them to sing little songs which from their pretty little voices sounded wonderful to his ears in that lonely place and the little children other times looked up to him with pitying eyes and cried and begged him to leave the dismal place and take them to the Christian lines, but the way he was hunted he knew that just then to escape from the city was impossible and he had to stay there.

To him the ten year old little girl looked to him strangely beautiful with large smiling eyes and a face that seemed more than human. Everytime she came up to him she stopped and looked at the old gray peak of the distant city from which her hiding place and thought of her friend which would have been obtained by the side of the roof of the highest building if she herself had not warned her. One time it was at night when after making a raid the spy saw her more closely and then taking her by the hand said kindly:

"I recognise you, I now know who you are. You are Angelina Aronburg who is the fairest and most beautiful and happiest of little girl and bravest next to the grand little daughters of the mighty christian general Robert Angelio Vivian.

And now because you have secured the precious papers from the tyrant general, Mic-Allister Stanek and his wicked generals you are doomed to remain in Vivian, Mickey until something turns up. But let us not lose hope. As as soon as we see a chance to get out we will go first to the southward, and then to the east, and probably after many days we shall come to the great River Norma Run. There you shall be accepted by the christian generals as a mad maiden more fairer and bolder beautiful than before, and you I know shall some day become one of the best friends of the many christian generals, and of the Vivian girls themselves from whom many a great hero will spring. As for me I hide in patience the day which not even general Mic-Allister Stanek or his whole "landelinian army" can halt or delay. For a while we will have to remain where we are. At Poor Gertrude would have spoken but she could not. Her eyes now more the moment sorrowful and frightened looking she gazed once more at the brave hero and then she turned and began her long examination of the important papers she had at such a risk secured from the rebel general headquarters.

Hours had passed and at last a strange man came running into the secret tunnel way whose name was Frank Hercules and had another fellow with him by the name of Caucas. He and his fellow companion had in spite of the dreadful range of thunder from exploding shells high in the sky, in spite of fear of a storm of snow and sleet had worked their way from one place to another, from one street to another until they reached the secret tunnel and then had pressed by rebel spies and pursuers slow every fierce "landelinian" they met and with a mighty blow had turned all opposition aside and had come into the tunnel and found the brave spy and the children with him.

"I know know that you and your own companion would come soon." Said Prometheus. Ten hours ago I thought of speaking about you to my little girl friend here Angelina who will sometime be the leader of all Angelinian girl and boy scouts combined.

"And Angelina" Said Hercules "is of the brave race from which I had sprung. The rebel are searching high and low for you and every street is combed by them. You better look for some other place as they may find this tunnel yet."

This man who was with Angelina in the tunnel and who had revealed his two brave comrades was known far and wide for not only his good deeds, his daring rescues of many child slaves, and the uprightness of his life, but for his famous spying exploits. In the city of Pandora (Galvernia) he had a wife and three children and she was one of the fairest of the daughters of men. After Prometheus had felt from the streets of Vivian "Mickey" with Angelina things of unusual occurrence was going on elsewhere throughout the Vivian Mickey. The "landelinians" had become very ferocious every man being fairly at war with the helpless non-combatants, and for the inhabitants who favored Angelina cause there was no law nor safety anywhere and a mass of horrible methods occurred frequently. Things were in such worse cases now than they had been since the beginning of the siege, and that was just what general Stanek wanted. He thought by being terrible to the non-combatants he could frighten the christian besiegers but by this he only was making things worse for himself. During the siege however so many bloody battles had occurred that already he had begun to grow weary of seeing so much bloodshed and hearing the yells and screams of big bombshells and explosives high in the sky, their terrifying thunders, and the roar of so many besieging guns.

"These christian be besieging generals and their armies are nothing but a source of trouble." He said to his mighty company of generals. When the siege started we were afraid lest we should be able to whip them too soon, and now the besiegers are so terribly strong and have so many guns upon our fortified works, and fortifications and shelling the city so terribly that we are in worse danger than before.

All that while since the beginning of the siege of Vivian Mickey until november there had been a perfect rainstorm of shot shell shrapnel and high explosives and the christian besieging guns rained these terrible broadsides of death and destruction day and night for a very long time without respite, great explosions had occurred, floods had been started by the enemy as is already written the water running over the land and covering the plains swamping the forests and surrounding the hills in raging torrents of water. At the christians kept tightly to the siege, while the rain of shot and shell and high explosives was pouring down especially upon the region of the fortresses near Norma Catherine.

No one had been ready for such a storm of cannon but Prometheus or his companions. He had watched all the wrong doings of the "landelinians" around him and had often taken the nerve to tell them that unless they left off their evil ways to child slaves there would be a day of reckoning in the end.

"The day will be coming" Said Prometheus "when all of the christian cannon besieging Vivian Mickey will send a flood of deadly explosives in an effort to destroy or reduce the strong fortresses guarding the land side. Be sure that you are watching out for it as all dangers will follow."

And so when the storm of shells began the brave christian had first taken shelter in the cellar of his house but now day and night he and his friends and Angelina were hiding in the deep underground tunnel while outside of Vivian Mickey the tops of trees were hidden by the flood of smoke caused by exploding shells, the hills and mountains were wreathed in smoke and if you looked outside not nothing could have been seen but smoke, smoke, smoke, and flaring of bursting bombardments the world ever heard of was on. After a while however in the vicinity of Norma Catherine the fire being directed elsewhere the storm of shells stopped falling so thickly a the clouds of smoke began to clear away and the blue sky and the golden sun shone brighter.

Even after a while the flood waters had begun to either sink very fast and to run off the land toward the rivers or freeze over and early that next morning of November first the spy and Angelina cautiously stepped outside their underground prison to see what was going on and if any one among the rebels were at all looking for him or her. After a short time they saw that the streets of the city were deserted yet and the leafless branches of some distant trees were seen shaking in the cold wind and the streets and roofs of houses were carpeted with deep snow and frost were white on windows. But the spy and Angelina for the moment felt very sad for they knew that they and their companions and the child ren with them in the tunnel were the only persons in the region of this part now slowly down the incline toward the entrance to the street tunnel wondering what would become of them soon if they did not succeed in getting out of horrible Vivian Mickey all alone as they were in the possession of rebels. While they were talking, and trying to think what indeed they should try and do they heard a strange voice behind them. They turned and saw a noble young man standing in the middle of one of the street car tracks running into the tunnel. He was very tall, with blue gray eyes, and black hair. He had wings on his shoes and his cape and wore a regala and black hood and bore a staff with a spear on the top of it. They at once knew it was one of the Geninian persons the swift spy messengers of general Hansons army and they waited to hear what he would say to them.

"Is there anything you wish?" The strange hooded man asked. "Tell me and you shall have whatever your heart desires."

"We should like above all things" Said Prometheus to see our way out of this or accused place and to reach the christian lines once more, for without good neighbors and friends and to be cooped up here as prisoners in this tunnel the world would be a very lonely and terrible place indeed."

"Go on down and follow the course of the tunnel as far as it goes." Said the hooded stranger "And as you go take the little girl by the hand and have the children with you follow, and see that no rebels are following behind you." And with these words he leaped up to the top of the parapet and was seen no more.

"What did he mean?" Asked Angelina Aronburg.

"Surely I do not know" Said Prometheus. "But before we proceed let us think a moment. How far does this car tunnel lead out of Vivian Mickey I wonder. And yet what could he mean by being careful and watch that no rebels are following us?"

"Perhaps he meant that we should be careful not to allow any "landelinians" to come upon us without being watchful." Said Angelina. "Let us go on down the slopes to the entrance of the tunnel and let's pick up some of these loose stones which we find in our path and if we are followed we can throw them at the enemy and check them."

"It seems to be rather a very silly thing to do so." Said Prometheus "and yet as there can be no harm from it I am sure, we shall do it and see what will happen."

And so they walked on down the steep incline of the tunnel and as they walked they picked up the loose stones in their way with the intention to cast them at any of their pursuers. When at last they reached the gaping mouth of the dark tunnel they found themselves at the head of a noble company of freed child slaves all eager to do their bidding. To guard them Prometheus became their leader and he gave them some of the smaller stones and told them how to do many useful things that would enable them to get away from the rebel soldiers. He street car tunnel into which they had went was called Hellas and how far it led to they could never determine. To Prometheus Angelina Aronburg appeared to be so fair and good, that all who knew her had said that there was no one in the world like her except the brave Vivian girls. So when Prometheus had her with her she had pleased him so much and so he was determined to lead her through and out of Vivian Mickey if he had to die for her.

Of course the brave little girl did not really know who he was, but thought he was some famous christian spy man maybe a member of the Geninian army when she first knew him or when she first met him he was in the guise of a rebel captain, and did not look like the great man he really was.

But Martha Junice who was the wife of Mic-Allister Stanek and shared his peril in helping to resist the siege of Vivian Mickey did not like the idea of hearing about some dangerous fugitives escaping from Vivian Mickey at all hall fall.

when she heard why the spy and his friends had hidden near the tunnel so long she made up her mind to do the ten year old girl all the harm she could, and so hearing that they were seeking an exit through the tunnel went herself with some soldiers with the intention to find the other end of it and block them in.

At least she decided to try and see what could be done if you please to mention... Promethus had however through his spies learned of her intentions and while she and her soldiers was a great way off he knew why she and her soldiers were on their way. go to save Angelina Aronburg from her and her Glandelinian soldiers he having discovered earlier than another tunnel lead from this one turned into it with the others following him. He thought that when Junice had found them gone she would go back home to her husband and general and it would not be hard to find their way back to the former tunnel again. They had progressed only a short distance however when a suspicious looking man approached them. He was garbed in gray and looked like a Glandelinian soldier in the gloom of the tunnel.

"Oh what a pretty looking little girl you have got there." He said stroding forward.

"Give her to me my good man, give her to me." Promethus however refused to do as he was told and drawing his pistol forced the stranger to give back a few steps. He did not like to do this but the sight of that muzzle made him so scared that he had to give up and let the little girl and the others alone. He however thought that it would not be long till he could get a bunch of soldiers and get her and the children away from the man. But from then on Promethus was too wise to trust anyone now who were strangers in the tunnels. He took Angelina still more firmly by the hand and led her onward through the long tunnel.

"Now my sweet little maid." He said "I will see that you stay with us until we get safely to the christian lines."

Promethus indeed seemed to be a strange man. If he did not really have ten times ten the number of eyes in his head he seemed to be equally as watchful as if he had as many. Some of the children following him were afraid of the dark but here and there the tunnel was lighted by an arch light for at least every hundred feet and they were able to see where they were going. They however seemed to have wandered into a labyrinth labyrinth of tunnels for after traveling a long distance they could not find their way out. There was no kind friends around to hear the crying of the children, and no one to help them for no one not even the Glandelinians knew that the spy and the children with him had wandered into the longest tunnel in the world. They had gone into the tunnel running from Vivian Wickey to Calverline and though they saw on each side of the two sections of the tunnel railway tracks they did not know it, and yet no train had passed them yet. Hour by hour Promethus kept a close watch and you could hardly say that when the other slept he ever went to sleep at all for he was like a man who if he had a dozen eyes kept the half dozen also closed and the other half open like if they were sleeping and watching by turns.

Promethus was indeed grieved when he saw what a hard like his little child firmed had been done, and he tried to think of some plan to come to the end of the tunnel and get himself and them free before the enemy would come in the tunnel in search of them and capture them all it was toward night time when he could tell by his watch when he called Angelina to him and bade her and his children friends to go and try to sleep while he would stay awake and keep watch on the platform alongside the railway tracks. While they proceeded to lie down on the platform he gave them something to eat from the provisions he carried with him and then they all fell asleep. Just as soon as the children had fallen into a sound slumber someone in the tunnel to his surprise began to play as sweet tones on a flute. This was just what Promethus liked to hear indeed, and so cautiously following the sound of the music he saw a young boy playing and asked him to come up to the platform and sit by his side and play still other tunes. The lad did as he wished and played such strains of sweet sweet music as no one in all the whole Angelina world had ever heard from that day to this, and which sounded doubly lovely in the hollow recesses of the extensive tunnel. And as the little boy played the spy laid down upon the platform and listened and thought indeed that he had never received so great a treat in his life. By and by those sweet sounds wrapped him into so strange a spell that all his eyes at which he could not keep his eyes open, and he fell into a deep sleep.

As just at this moment two Glandelinians one an officer and a orderly appeared and stepped on the platform. He knew it surely was not a brave thing to do yet the officer drew his long sword from its scabbard with the intention of running the man through the body but the lad seeing the performance screamed, and alarmed and knowing the strength of the spy the two Glandelinians hastily left the platform without doing him wicked deed and ran in the opposite direction down the tunnelway with the intention of going back and alarming the main body coming into the tunnel to search for the fugitives. But being awakened Promethus had seen him try to kill him and he was so swiftly after them that they halted in an attempt to make a stand. But his face was so full of wrath and as he had two pistols drawn that as soon as they saw him advance upon them, they tried to flee but one was shot immediately in the thigh, and the other then surrendered.

Angelina was so much grieved when she saw this performance that she did not know what to do but the reports of the gun had been so loud in the hollow recesses of the tunnel that she knew flight was urgent and so after trying the two rebels up on the pillar near the platform so they could not go back and raise the alarm they continued their flight.

As they continued their flight however Angelina Aronburg found a big gadfly buzzing round her head, and attempting to bite and sting her, and not catch on the fly or overtake it. In their flight through the tunnel they already stung some of the other little children one boy and two girls till they were wild with fright and pain and screamed. Hour after hour they continued their flight now through the thick dark darkness, now in parts of the tunnel to be a large opening on the side of the tunnel.

The spy Promethus opened the exit cautiously and seeing no one in sight to his fellow men and they all walked forth. By and by they came to a narrow stretch of river and since the lad land on the other side looked as though a christen an encampment might be there and that they would find rest and shelter there; the river not yet frozen over. Then they continued onward through a strange land and began to realize they had passed not only the enemy encampments but left outside thanks to the cold winter day. The gadfly however did not follow them where looking far in the distance they could see a long string of highly built fortifications. Finding a small house of cabin they stopped to rest a while and get a little to eat, and while he was preparing the food Angelina looked up at the calm cold cliffs above her and wished that she might live where all was grand and still. But as she looked she saw the giant forms of the distant fortifications stretching away for a long distance and she knew at once that she and her friends and the spy were not so far away from Vivian Wickey or the christian lines as supposed and that the distant fortresses were the river fortresses of Gertrude Angelina herself or worse of all the land and river forts.

When she looked at her spy friend and saw his sorrowful face and said to herself; "His sufferings are not so great as his." And her eyes were filled with tears. Then poor good Promethus looked down and spoke to her and his voice was very mild and kind;

"I know almost what you are thinking about." He said "and then he told her not to lose hope for he believed that soon they would find their way to the christian lines at last. She would have thanked him for the good words if she could but when she tried to speak she only felt as if her heart was burning and could not utter a single word. When while cooking and preparing the meal Promethus went off and told her that the time would indeed come when she should see the beautiful Vivian Wickey once again, and that she should yet live to see her self the leader of the best boy and girl scouts ever organized and indeed be the leader of the best child heroes and heroines that ever lived. "As for me," he said "I must bid this time in patience for I know that one of these heroes will break the war some day."

When Gertrude Angelina with a brave heart left the doorway and shutting it came to the table. A weather outside was colder now than before but she did not care the winter very much for her heart was full of hope. For a whole hour she sat by the table until the meal was prepared and at last when all started eating she began to feel so tired and lonely that she felt she could go no further, and so knowing that they were not going out any more that day she lay down on a bench to rest. At this time Promethus as soon as she was sound asleep all sleep sleep like a flash ran for a window for he heard a suspicious sound. A group of rebels was approaching the house. He immediately opened fire to the terror of the other soldiers, the shots awakening Gertrude who seeing the peril also fired her own little pistols and the rebels seeing her own too small in numbers to withstand this lone a brave retreat though one was shot and killed as he tried to cross the river. Gertrude frail and fair as she looked and as good as she was showed herself nevertheless a little fighter when in peril. After the excitement he showed her kindness to the third half frightened trembling brave little maiden and told her in his arms hold her fast and she indeed felt happy in his loving embrace.

As though her trials and difficulties Angelina Aronburg or Gertrude Angelina was pale and her big and blue eyes seemed to be always filled with excitement and fear and her long golden wavy hair flowed free about her shoulders. Since the death of her sister Anna Aronburg all she had cared to do from morning till noon was to sit in any place she could and dope out plans to spy on the enemy and cause the Glandelinians all the trouble she could to pay them back even at the risk of her life, and all she had ever cared to do from noon till midnight was to draw maps of her own of the enemy plans and study them over so as to know what to do next. And of her clever and splendid hand had been the things which she drew with her pencil or ink pens. Paper on paper, school atlases and drawing papers she worked with then all kinds pictures and drawings of the enemy works and fortifications while in the cabin, and yet when the papers came from her hands they were still so beautifully clean and whole that Promethus was glad to see it. And he said that paper so clean after being handled by her people was rarely as clean and that he believed she was the cleverest little girl and the cleanest he had ever come across.

"Can you draw by hand the little girl and near the window where sunset comes through the window a picture of the distant fortifications of Gertrude Angelina, a little boy among the child slaves who had been rescued came up to her and stroking her beautiful head in a friendly manner said:

"In all the world there is no picture drawn better than you are and in all the world have I ever seen papers so soft and clean after you got through. Who thought you to draw so nicely and keep paper so clean and good!"

"No one but taught me at all," she answered. "With the aid of God and his blessed Mother I learned how to do it in the sun and in the shade in northern California when I was only seven years old, but no one showed me otherwise."

"But it may have been that your teacher taught you, and you did not know it," said the boy.

"I never went to school," answered Angelina Aronburg. "So how could they teach me. I was once a child slave like you was and freed myself by rebellion. Any way I would like to see the teacher who could do the such maps and plans and fortifications and rebel works as good as these in so short a time and without dirtying the paper."

"But I thought they could," said the boy. "When they are grown a people they are suppose to be the smartest people of all."

"Do you think any teacher could draw like me," said Gertrude. "Probably they can if they are artists but not common school teachers. I'm not honestful or proud but just the same I'd like to see a teacher try it and do it so quick. I bet I could teach a school teacher a thing or two and I have never went to school either. And yet I can write, figure and spell as good as any one. I learned it all myself through God's help."

"I'm a teacher," said Prometheus.

Gertrude Angelina looked up and saw him this time in his full uniform a tall man wrapped in a long pa poncho of scarlet color covering his purple coat. His face was fair to see but stern of so stern and bold and his gray eyes was so sharp and bright that Gertrude could not hardly meet his gaze.

"Partu Gertrude," said Prometheus. "I am not only a spy, and an Angelinian officer with the rank of captain, but also a famous drawing teacher and I have heard your boast to this little boy: do you still mean to any that though you have not been taught to do the work and yet can draw and make maps and pictures in so quick a time and beat any teacher at it?"

"Yes sir," she answered. "No one but God and His blessed Mother has taught me and I think no one but God and his blessed Mother for what I know," and she stood straight up but not proud by the side of the small drawing table.

"And do you still think that you can draw pictures of fortifications and make maps faster than I can and better?" said Prometheus.

Gertrude's cheeks grew a little pale but she however said:

"Yes I can weave better than you can."

"Then let me tell you what we will do," said the spy. "We will immediately draw each of us on a separate piece of paper your fortifications, you on your side of the table and I on my mine. We will ask all of these little boys and girls with us and my two men companions to come and witness the contest, and the little boy you had boasted to shall be the judge. And if your work is best then I will admit it and take it for granted that the little heroine I know was a good artist, but if my work is best, then you shall allow yourself to be in my arms and allow me to give you ten kisses: do you agree to this?"

"I agree," immediately said Gertrude without hesitation.

"It is well," said Prometheus. "But I am not counting on the character of the drawing: it is the speed alone, who gets the drawing done first."

They both got pieces of paper and all of the children except the eldest boy were gathered around the table to see and witness the contest and the little boy sat beside fair Gertrude and looked on. The eldest boy stood by a window to watch and see that no Angelinians approach the cabin. Prometheus sat beside the table nearest the window and if she had sat in the shade of a beautiful mulberry tree with butterflies flitting and grasshoppers chirping all through the live-long day nothing could have made a more awe inspiring creature as she seemed to be. But Prometheus looking at her saw her sit up near the end of the table, through which the sunbeams of a wild winter sun were streaming upon her from the window and he also almost remarked to himself:

"She appears to me to be the queen of beautiful children."

Then both started the contest. Gertrude Angelina took her paper and began to draw while he did the same. And she drew the outlines of the distant fortifications with marvellous beauty and exactness and she made it of so many beautiful colors and so beautifully and correctly arranged and mingled one with another that she soon had an exact likeness of the fortifications and the surrounding scene as she saw from the windows and all the children who saw the two drawings of both man and child were filled with delight. As both contestants continued the battle of drawing they both made the snowy fleeces of the winter clouds seen in the sky and made the bright blue ether of the winter sky of California, and of the best beautiful white snow of the snow covered fields, and of a royal purple of distant woods; and designed the edge of the picture with enchanting pictures of flowers and gardens, of castles and towers, and of mountain heights and of men and beasts; and of giants and dwarfs, and of the mighty beings called planets who dwell high above the sky as stars. And those who looked upon both drawings were so filled with wonder and delight that they forgot all about the excitement they had in leaving Indian Mickey.

At the end of the contest the man was ahead a few pencil strokes and Gertrude felt thankful and surprised when he won and she hid her hands her face in her hands.

"Oh how could I ever think you could win," she cried. "Now I must do as I agreed."

But she was not afraid to accept the agreement. From his kindness to her she loved him from her heart and before he knew it she was in her arms and kissing him herself.

to go, and at times when not fleeing from the persecutors played the two best minds that was ever heard. Gertrude called him the Master of games. He had all her life liked to wander into the wooded country and in her earlier days she had taken care of the poor timid deer and the helpless creatures that lived among the trees, and now though persecuted she delighted to even hunt out a her persecutors, and soon was to become feared in every hostile land, and later later on general Hanson, Indian made her and she had a picture of the distant fortifications of Gertrude's castle, a little boy among the child slaves who had been rescued came up to her and stroking her beautiful head in a friendly manner said:

"In all the world there is no nobler slave better than you are and in all the world have I ever seen papers so soft and clean after you got through. You thought you to draw so nicely and keep paper so clean and good!"

of distant woods, and designed the edge of the picture with enchanting pictures of flowers and gardens, of castles and towers, and of mountain heights and of men and beasts, and of plants and dwelt, and of the nighty beings called planets who dwell high above the sky we started. And those who looked upon both drawings were so filled with wonder and delight that they forgot all about the excitement they had in leaving Edwin McKay.

At the end of the contest the man was ahead a few pencil strokes and Gertrude felt a thankful and surprised when he won and she hid her hands her face in her hands.

"How could I ever think you would win!" she cried. "How I must do as I deserve!"

But she was not afraid to accept the agreement. From his kindness to her she loved and as he held her fast she said:

"How could it be possible?"

Then from his arms seeing that he really had a happy little maiden in his arms he put further pity on her and said:

"I would happily have freed you from your bargain I even if you had won your agreement and so for the present I can say that there are two great prizes, one a little girl and one a man who can draw equally as good and as fast."

As he still still held her there came from a secret place in the window a spider which ran into a shady place of the window ending and began rapidly to spin and weave a beautiful web thinking of the warmth of the room that the spider had come from. I have probably heard it said that all spiders which have been in this world since then are probably the children of the spider in this log cabin but I don't know this is really true. Yet for aught I know this spider may still be living out upon his web and weaving, and the next spider that you may see may be Gertrude's friendly spider itself.

FURTHER ADVENTURES OF ANGELINA ARONBURG OR GERTRUDE ARONBURG

CHAPTER XXV. Forty Six

Indeed so fair and gentle was Angelina Aronburg that indeed her spy friend could not help but love her and only wished that she was not a child for then he would have a wife to love her.

General McAlister, Stanck however had heard of the daring escape of the fugitives he was very angry, and he sent many soldiers to search the region within the besieged lines but later he learned through some conspirator that the fugitives were even far from Edwin McKay, and so he sent orders throughout Univerinia by wireless secret wireless forbidding anything or any one to help the fugitives or give them any shelter. After 1. leaving the log cabin however the fugitives spy with his two companions and children friends had fled like wild deer from milk to milk and now being hard pressed by other enemies, and far from any kind of shelter could find no place whatever in which to rest. They could not stop for then the pursuers would find upon them, and something always urged them to go on and go on it seemed to the fugitives as even the winter birds and even deer and other animals joined in the cry and warning for them to go on. They had already traveled as fugitives for about a day since getting out of Edwin McKay, and toward night time as they fled along the beach of the Norm, an angry two twenty miles north of the besieging Christian armies Angelina Aronburg fairly lifted up her hands and called aloud to the blessed mother of God to help her and her friends.

She got her of all of us heard her prayer and was indeed kind to her and the others with her. After a short distance they came upon a large island called the Dolphin and as the spy knew how to operate it, and finding a galleon on of galleons in it they all got in and the boat soon bore them away from the cruel land rushing through the waves to Deloss Island which lay on the island. Here they decided to find rest until time could approach to allow them to safely make their way to some Christian army as they dared not approach Univerinia army just now.

As they got to the island without detection and without permit though the rebels who owned the boat found it missing, they landed and came upon a house on the island whose front veranda had four marble pillars. A chimney the boat to a rock on the beach of the island so that the waves might not move it and leave them exposed they decided to take shelter in the house for the night. Then the next morning came a good part of the river was partly frozen over but nevertheless the rising sun-drenched on the waters not changed to ice and it seemed as if the minnows stepped to the Gertrude Aronburg. In her bed and awaken her for fear from her deep sleep. After she got up and awoke the others they for the present forgot their dangers and excitement, and after their morning prayers started to prepare for some breakfast.

All through their party the face of Angelina Aronburg was as bright as the sun beams, and she seemed to carry joy in and gladness with her where ever she went. Her friend and spy gave her a pair of precious earrings which he had carried always with him and took care of her and even the rest where ever they were went to go, and at times when not fleeing from the pursuers he played the best music that was ever heard. Gertrude called him the Master of songs. He had all her life liked to wander into the wooded country and in her earlier days she had taken care of the poor bird deer and the helpless creatures that lived among the trees, and now though pursued she delighted to even hunt out a her pursuers, and soon was to be become feared in every hostile land, and later later on General Hudson, Edwin made her the leader of all the boy and girl slaves.

"Where in the world did those fugitives go. In the center of the earth?" "This was the question which many of the general's aides asked general Glandelin. He sat in his office in his headquarters working over some plans and maps and preparing an order to annul some section of the Christian lines. Of course the night Glandelin's general was to be puzzled by so simple a thing as to where the fugitives had gone but he was too busy to answer it at once. "So he said:

"It is not my fault where they have gone. Your men allowed them to escape through some tunnel leading out of the whither and so these men are responsible." "When he took two large pieces of paper and worked over them carefully and turned an hour's time he said to one of his officers: [ ]

"Take these papers to general Furrington, and have him carry these orders to his general and other officers. Then have these other papers and maps delivered to general Glandelin. Before everything is lost in darkness of night. Through your men have these important papers and maps delivered at the same time and see to it they are sufficiently armed so that they will not lose them on account of Christian spies."

The officer did as he was bidden. As he went out he saw that the lightning flashes were darting with unusual fury that night, the thunderous explosions of many shells fairly rolled, and the drum drum roar of distant and near cannons and he feared that a general artillery duel was on once more. He immediately selected the number of men necessary for the errand and one of them securing a fleet horse rode straight toward the direction of Gorm's bridge while the other rode straight toward the Julio Gallo section of Arlan Wickey and it seemed as if no arrow sped faster from the bow than did these two horsemen race on their missions.

On and on they went almost like shooting stars rushing to the sun, nearer and nearer they drew to their destination. Nearer and nearer, then there was a deafening crash, houses fell into total ruins and the horsemen were slain by a explosion of a shell above them simultaneously and horse and rider fell dead to the ground. Others however took the message after examining the bodies and started on their way but were stopped by spies and the papers secured. There was no doubting the Christian spies whatever.

In the meantime as the spy and his two companions and the children were confined in the house on the island in the river they that night observed the display of lightning from bursting shells and the spy said to Gertrude:

"The scene seems to me as if it were the end of the world nowing or as if the center of the world had risen to meet the sky. See far to yonder where the hills seem to meet together. That long line of countless cannon flashes. In the National cannon are bombarding Julio Gallo and Gorm Catherine."

"If that is the case," answered Angelina then we better make our home here for the present for it is possible that enemies may come out on the river and look around."

Indeed the scene they had witnessed was savage and wild and the din was like a violent thunderstorm raging and the darkened and lonely river was lighted up frequently by the flashes of red explosions. However after investigation the island they found that it had been a small one occupied by few people and the few people who he lived or had lived there had kept themselves hidden among the rocks as if in dread of some grave danger. On the approach of morning however after their breakfast the spy went out alone to look the small river island over and then at the foot of a small hill rose upon a steep cliff which seemed to be split in two and climbing it to make a further investigation found sheep and cattle on the island and a few men women and children. They were under masters and it was seen that rebels were in possession of the island.

"Can no one escape the rebels at all?" said the spy to himself. The spy watched the scene for a few minutes and then said to himself:

"No one will get wise I guess. There don't seem to be any Glandelin soldiers on the island and if possible I would like to secure those children from the rebel women and men."

When Prometheus with his pistol in hand went cautiously toward the place where the children were working, the workers had cut great paths through the snow and rocks and so the spy found it not hard to be hidden. Then some of the men caught sight of Prometheus they strode forward with the purpose to come out and meet him. The bright Angelina saw the glaring eyes of the rebel overseers and heard the rush of their footsteps as they came striding forward. He immediately loaded his other revolver and hiding behind a tall rock stood still. The rebel overseers however saw that their foe was no common man but an Angelinian soldier and fearing others were with him some turned to flee but two Angelinian soldiers started shooting for a few minutes. Ashot sped from the spy's revolver and put one man out of commission and the rest then took to their boats with even the women and not looking to see whether the children were with them or not fled from the island, with no doubt the intention to get Glandelin soldiers to help them.

Close to the foot of the steep cliff and beneath the spot where he had discovered the men and women overseers the white walls of the child slave house arose and among the rocks where the poor children had been confined, and near by stood a number of outhouses. The children seeing the purple uniforms of the stranger who had come to their rescue fell at once and he had no trouble in gathering them, about twenty girls and thirty boys and bring them back to the place he had secured with his other friends who having heard the shooting were coming out when he arrived with the other rebels rescued. The island now was no longer wild and savage for no longer dark and lonely for them, but was filled with beauty and light by a strong rising sun.

"What shall we do now since the rebels left the island," asked Gertrude. "We will have to leave the island as soon as possible and seek other shelter," answered Prometheus, "or the rebels will kill soldiers and then we will be in a pickle."

Some of the little girls who had been rescued among the new child slaves time secured were strange children, shy, quiet and timid, but nevertheless as fleet of foot as a young deer that feeds on the plains, but they also seemed to be as fair and as good as the days in June and Angelina Arenburg loved them and felt glad that they were free. If only they could be brought to some Christian army. During their continued flight they were now hearing the Red Riding Hood Woods and the whole batch of fugitives with only three men to guard them wandered along the banks of the river, Gorm's gun, listening to the ripple of the icy water as it flowed among the ice shelled reeds or over shining pebbles for that November day there was a slight thaw setting in. Despite the peril of pursuit the children very often would sing and talk to each other to keep up their spirits, but nevertheless they feared that every thing that moved was a lurking enemy. All around seemed suspicious. The good spy who guarded them said:

"All of you are going to be my adopted children as soon as I get the legal papers for to retain you."

"Yes," said Gertrude. "You would do a great act of that charity to adopt some of those children or have them adopted."

As they progressed onward slowly and cautiously the river seemed to smile up at them. As the men began to advance the sun shone warmer and the air was filled with a slight slight rain but now seeing suspicious looking boats moving up the river they wandered cautiously further and further away from the river than they had ever gone before. They passed through a thicket a part of the woods and all started climbing a hill from the top of which they could see the river lying wide white and clear and smiling in the valley below and full of floating pieces of ice. Beyond the river further south they could see the encampments of the enemy and the slopes and wooded tops of hills in possession of the Christian besiegers. Ah if they could only climb to the summit of the high wooded hill they might gain a view of the so surrounding part of the country and see how far away to the west they were from the distant Christian lines and of other great Christian encampments further to the south so they would know which direction to go to get back for they were still within the eagle thought though outside of the city itself.

"Good bye if the enemy would see us now," said Gertrude. "We are sure climbing a mountain within full range of the enemy cannon and if any of their spotter saw us we would never get back to dear old Christian land again."

The fugitives continued on up the hill and wondering why the summit of the great hill was so far away. By and by they came to a higher and steeper section of the wooded slope where there was a pretty water fall, and tired from the long climb they sat down to rest. Then the spy took out the flint which the boy had given him and soon from his camp the loveliest music any one had ever heard. All of the children who had been rescued stood up and listened. Some of them started singing. Some of the children however were frightened thinking the music would be heard by the distant enemy and still the music was occurring that they could not run away.

Then all at once some of the children started to run down the hill in panic, he stopped his music and looked up toward the slope. A swarm of Glandelinians was moving down toward them.

"Stop you!" three rebels with the children. "Cried a voice. "You—" but the spy nor the rest did not stop to hear the rest of the sentence. As the children turned and fled down the slope like frightened deer, the three men and even Gertrude Angelina stopped behind trees and a deadly opened fire upon the Glandelinians shooting down a number of men and checking the rest. When the four brave fugitives worked themselves from the trees as fast as possible firing frequently and the enemy returned the fire but hit no one.

"Stop you Christian dogs," cried one of the rebel leaders but they did not and while the children ran down the hill as fast as their fleet feet could carry them they covered their retreat with pistol shots occasionally bringing down a Glandelinian soldier. No Glandelinian had ever stopped or captured Gertrude Angelina yet and she was so sure that no one would yet and so she fired and every shot of her own took good effect.

"Those rascal dogs are the worst I ever saw," roared the leader of the pursuing Glandelinians. "If only I could get a shot in at that little female beauty and desperado shooting with such effect at us I'd be happy."

Through the broke, and afar, over rocks and the trunks of fallen trees, down the rugged snow covered slope, and then across small streams, leaping flying, panting, and screaming the little children continued to run while the three soldiers and Gertrude running from tree to tree kept the enemy at bay by well aimed shots. The poor terrified children however did not once look behind shook their heads and said that though the child live was going to be very short they would see to it that she would elude to it as long as she could. There were many among the other little slaves who the little girl had befriended on many an occasion and who owned their lives to her, and they would have done everything for her if they could, but it seemed to Gertrude that the only way she could save the child was to let her live. She saw the child's head and then begged the blessed mother to give the little girl a chance to live if it was her will to ask Our Lord. Then without a thought of fear she sat down beside the child who lay upon the bed unconscious and almost dead already. As she saw her lying almost lifeless upon the bed her grief cut the rest of the others were so great that they could not even speak and they wished death would take them instead and spare the one who they lived more than themselves. Among all of the fugitives every eye was set for Gertrude for the little girl. Gertrude then sat by the bed herself where the little girl lay and held her hand in her own. The day passed and night was fast approaching but no one would leave the room, and food or even the enemy was not then thought of or even their needs either. All through the dark hours of night they sat by the bed not being able to sleep and fortunately no rebels approached the house. The midnight was soon approaching and even pretty graceful little Jennie uttered the little girl's name which she had growing more normal in pulse beats and even the rest of the children came into the pale cheeks of the child.

A few moments later the little girl opened her eyes and sat up, alive, but still ill and weak. However it that the child had so suddenly become better. When she had been so ill which had struck her so suddenly from her care on account of the excitement caused by the pursuing rebels who knew no pity, the prayers and petitions of the others had been heard by the blessed mother who was so moved with pity as to save the child from dying and allow the enemy to secure another child victim.

"How you know us!" asked Gertrude.

The child seemed to know them all but as yet could not speak but nevertheless all were in joy at the good luck that befell them.

While they were feeling joyful over the chance of luck or befall them the spy realized that they were closer to the rebel lines than they had even expected for a only a mile from them was the great snow mountain of the enemy and the Gadsden and Burr Europe positions of the enemy, fortified with and cannons. He shied in which they had taken refuge in the light of which they had warmed up by the fuel inside in a small round stove was a very small one. Not far from there he could see the Bya Evangelina Gran mountains and on the opposite side was the horn run river.

The spy indeed thought that if they had been lost in the centre of the world they he and his friends would have no harder time to find their way to the distant christian lines. He had went out with the purpose to secure child slaves from the enemy and never expected he would have such a difficult time at all. He was no nearer the christian lines than when he left virgin valley by the secret passage with Gertrude Angeline. Yet he was not unhappy over it, for he was very fond of the ten children he had rescued and he had good reason to be even proud of them for the boys were the bravest lads he had ever seen, and the girls were very fair and pretty also and though not so brave as the boys had shown heroism throughout the trials and difficulties so far. At the end days were not over for them yet.

On account of the sickness of the child they had remained concealed in the shed so close to the rebels for three days and night. When they thought it was alright to sally forth again they did so but waited until night, and took their horses with them. As morning dawned they saw not far away the cattle in the instant fields which the enemy had sedured in raids crazing among the snow. It appeared that the glandelinians did not care whether the cattle ate or not and though they were very tame it did seem as if they were very hungry. The rebel herdsman or men was lying in a small tent near the cows trying to make lunch on a large. There were thousands of cows and no one of the glandelinians but that it that they the cows were safe from their lines and would be very safe. He drove them off. When the herd was separated from the bull. He was indeed very large one of the largest bulls of all and it was snowed and he had soft brown eyes which made him look very gentle and kind.

At first the bull of the cows did not look at the fugitives approaching them but when there was too long a wait for tender grass which the herd tried to find among the deep snow. But when the fugitives came nearer and the two beautiful little girls stopped the bull came slowly toward them. The little girls were not at all afraid of him or even the cows for the two little girls and even the other children were used to such animals and as the others stopped to look at the bull he came close to Jennie and rubbed her beautiful little bare arm with his nose as if to say;

"Good morning little fairy girl. Could you show me and the cows where we can find something to eat."

Jennie and even Gertrude stroked his head and neck, and he seemed indeed much pleased. If she only had a wreath of soft flowers he would hang it round his neck. The bull looked at her with his soft kind eyes, and seemed to thank her for the friendly touch. All at once no sooner had the little girl climbed his back when he sprang forward and ran away so swiftly that it seemed as if Jennie could not help herself. She did not even try to jump off while he went slower or faster, and while she held fast to his neck, the other children screamed in fright, but she was not meeting no accident. She had the opinion

The fugitives toward the middle of the month of November on the fifteenth day reached a small abandoned glandelinian town called Delphi and not very far away from the horn run river and a rebel outpost called Admetus. Here the fugitives saw that they were once again approaching the vast rebel encampments for still they were between the glandelinian lines. The town itself of course was so small that any one could have walked around or through it in less than half a day. The rebels however in the region were on high bidly ground full of big encampments, and the spy and his followers from their place of concealment saw many rebel batteries being placed into position. He realized that it was probably the arrival of the armies under Manley through a different direction and that they themselves were in the location of Evangelina Evangelina Gran for not far to the east was Norma possessing another small town and near it still was the city of Ozma O. The spy knowing that something was suspicious decided to leave the children under the care of one man in one of the houses in the village of Glandelinians in favor of the rebellion while he in his bag of bag and Gertrude would go within the lines and see what the intentions of the enemy was in concentrating at Norma peninsula, and whether they were really within the edge or not. The snow that evening and night had been falling heavier than usual for a previous day in Glandelinia and the wind was blowing zero cold from the northeast but the spy and Gertrude entered the enemy lines unseen by the sentries on account of the snowstorm and came to one of the enemy's headquarters pretending to be heavy beggars asking for alms. He appeared to be half ragged and starved and dirty, and so feared no day detection by the rebels in camp Admetus. The glandelinians who saw the spy asking for alms thought that the spy had come from some different land. The general in command here was a literal child but butcher indeed but nevertheless believing he could make some use of the two supposed beggars he took them both into his headquarters and first gave them something to eat, had them given a bath and secured for them some warm clothing and uniforms one as a soldier and another for the child as a girl scout and made his orderlies make a place for them to sleep for the night. In the morning the two were transferred to another quarter and brought before general Calmanwin Shoemanna himself. He asked to the spy and the little girl their names but they shook their heads and made no answer pretending they were dumb. Then not seeing the dastard general Shoemanna asked them about their own home and country and how they came to be in the state of beggars and all Angeline herself would say "We were fugitives of the rebellion your excellency. We were fugitives of the rebellion. We only took shelter within your lines during the snowstorm. We have wished to be over some child slaves as we liked to see how child slavery works."

The general looked surprised at that for within his own encampments or elsewhere he did not allow children slaves and though fighting for glandelinia was not in favor of child slavery and only fought claiming the christians were invading glandelinian territory. He did not know what to answer to their words and he felt sure at that that the poor poorest child slave had been better off than these two the child and can so though a naughty glandelinian general as he was he took pity on them both.

"I will do what I can for you!" he said. "I will give you shelter food and clothing and you shall serve me and by my soldier and girl scout as long as you like."

At first there was little that either the little girl or the man really knew how to do but they were both sent to Manley's lines to take care of his bodyguard of guards property. Many glandelinians of better nature than the rest were both kind very kind to both and the food and clothing which was given to them was the best of the army. But the two strangers did not tell their names or any anything about their kindred or home but nevertheless some of the glandelinians had looked upon them in a way to say I know who you are but though they did really recognize the two strangers, they had been ill used by general Manley and many of the other generals and they had desired revenge. Immediately a secret conspiracy was started in which the disloyal glandelinians helped the spies not only to secure plans and important information concerning Manley's intention but also enabled the man to escape in Manley's full uniform and hat and overcoat, and then money to and passports to enable them to get out of the lines undetained and then followed them to go into the christian lines.

The spy and the glandelinians in order to elude any pursuers separated going in different directions but one glandelinian remained with the spy to guide him through. It so happened while the two and Gertrude were leaving the rebel lines had reached a certain hill all at once the sound peculiar music fell upon their ears. Indeed it was no such music as shepherds or any one else was ever heard to play but was sweeter and richer, than any they had ever heard before. It being a bright day they looked carefully to see where the sound came from. Ah who was that small creature sitting on the hill top raked in arms and feet and only wearing such a small thin gauzy robe on such a cold day and yet playing music so sweet with a lot of children around it listening to the music. Surely it was not a girl child. Indeed on examining closer they saw it was true. It was a very pretty child more in beauty than usual seen in human beings before and clad in gauzy robe lighter and finer than even any king might dare to wear. Her little face was in curly golden hair was as bright as sunbeams, and her eyes gleamed. Upon her shoulder was a beautiful silver bow, and from her belt hung a quiver of sharp arrows and in her hands was a small golden lyre. The three fugitives stood still and wondered and then Gertrude Angeline seemed to recognize the strange child who suddenly spoke;

"I am Jennie Turner. I have served the child slaves for a whole year before the war broke out and now I'm here as you see me. It seems strange to see me dressed like this on such a cold day and yet playing music but it is only to show how much cold I can stand and what I will suffer for the sake of my country and god. Is there anything I can do for you three fugitives?"

"Yes," said the spy. "Please tell me your names once more."

"My name is Jennie," answered more earnestly. "Twelve months ago my father and mother were killed by the enemy fighting now in this far and I fled from home a fugitive as you are and was for a whole time friendless and alone upon this cold dreary earth, and I felt sure that I would never return again toward home as long as this rebellion is raging so I decided to serve the christian armies. But how came you sir to be so ragged when I'm sure you have been so kind to many children as though they were your own sons and daughters?"

"It's my make up," said the spy. "I'm a spy and this is my friend and child companion Gertrude Angelina. I have important papers in my possession and have information for general vivian or any of the others as to conducting the siege. That shall I give you to reward your little girl if you come along with us."

"I have all that I want," said the little girl. "I am happy in the very thought that I can and am some help to my own country. I can ask for nothing more."

"Very well said the spy," but if the time should come when you need my help and guidance just let me know, but will you come and help me to the christian lines?" he bright eyes eyed child walked swiftly toward them playing the sweet music as she went, and then seeing all she had on said;

"Why do you dress that way? Ain't you going to dress warmer. You look like a little girl just going to bed."

"If the child slaves have to suffer so I will choose to do so. At any rate I can stand any cold weather and choose to dress this way summer and winter alike. As the fugitives now having the new companion went on with her she told them some things important about Manley. She said he was a cruel tyrant for a general who cared for nobody in all the world but himself and was a general hater of christians and all their children. He more innocent and pretty they were the worse he hated them. As she told her story about Manley and also of his intentions concerning the concentration of his armies at north position the spy saw that his new companion was equally as fair as Gertrude, as fair as any rose in June and saw from her features and face that she was gentle and good but just the same time a little amazon if aroused. Despite the peculiar way she was dressed she had a cartridge belt around her bosom and two pistols in their holsters and though she was somewhat younger than Angelina Armstrong she showed that she was nevertheless a good crack shot. They soon reached the town where the others had been left and then the whole troop proceeded on their way eastward. Many of the boys admired their new companion and were indeed surprised but there was only one lad who dared to speak to her at first and that was the boy who had started the drawing contest with Angelina and the spy through his argument with her as to who could draw the fastest.

The spy as he went on toward had told Jennie that he had once an intention of going before general Purgatorian in Julio Gallo and try to spy on him also.

"No one had been able to spy on him yet," she said in answer and he who could prove himself able to do so is a miracle. You heard of the great greek story where Admetus had Apollo help him harness a lion and a wild bear to a chariot. He had asked the King Pelin for his daughters hand and he had refused him unless Admetus could come before him with the lion and bear harnessed to the chariot. Of course as the story told it he succeeded but nevertheless to go any spy on general Purgatorian is a tenfold harder task than that. If you come to his encampments in any way or any disguise it would do no good. Many spies attempted it even along the Gemini and never were successful. One was killed, and others mortally wounded in attempting to escape."

The spy at this felt very sad, for though he himself had heard of Admetus with the help of Apollo harnessed a lion and bear to a chariot, he had not believed that spying on the enemy under Purgatorian would be so much harder performance. But she told him that the bravest man could not do such a thing as that successfully. He walked along through the deep snow and saw in the distance more encampments to right and left and men moving about as thick as a million ants in one group he chanced to again think of Appo Apollo and Admetus and wondered if such a story was true or not and if so could he really risk the dangers of entering Purgatorian lines.

"Maybe if I pray to the blessed virgin to ask her to ask god to help me through successfully, I would try it," said Prometheus.

"It is up to you," said beautiful Jennie. "But I'm sure our blessed Mother would not like to grant such a thing as allow a man to be hurt. It would be an unworthy prayer I'm sure. Still you might try it."

They continued onward avoiding the distant encampments of the enemy and their artillery and rifle positions and saw here and there where the enemy had made countless camp fires with the purpose of cooking and roasting meat and the smell of burning or roasting flesh was strong in the air and almost made the fugitives feel hungry.

"Jennie my friend," he suddenly cried. "If ever I have shown kindness to the poor and distressed, I'm sure the blessed Mother would help me if I made the done dangerous enterprise. For the country is in sore need of the city of vivian, taken from them by the rebels, and I remember that Our Lord had said; 'Ask anything in my name and it shall be granted unto you.'"

Hardly was he down upon when Jennie who was still bearing his boy and quiver of arrows led him to bed and stood before him.

"My dear friend," she said. "I'll do you think you can really do it. If so tell me how can I help you and I will."

He was astonished at this remark of the beautiful little girl but he then told her the reasons. He told her how he had heard that the fairest creatures known as the beautiful vivian girls were prisoners in the enemy city and how their father would give them under the care and guidance of the man who would succeed in rescuing them even if it would be a more difficult problem than the one in which Admetus with the help of Apollo harnessed the lion and the bear to the chariot.

"Let's proceed onward then," and I will think up a plan to help you," said Jennie. "But I had no idea whatever that the daughters of general Robert vivian were in danger, but it is their own fault but nevertheless I will do what I can."

They now continued their way again into the forest, Jennie though so delicate looking as she was leading the way and the spy had a great temptation to stop and grab her and hug her in his arms. As they continued on their way the spy thought over the story of Apollo and Admetus who had wanted into a forest and started a lion from its lair. As he was thinking there approached the fugitives a fleet footed rebel runner and six men with him and would have surely seized either Gertrude or the children first had not the spy stopped them.

As the spy shot down two of the glandelinians who had appeared suddenly from behind a thick thicket the other children terrified ran and then to their surprise one glandelinian appeared and let loose a great dog at the fugitives. It howled, barked, and snarled with its fierce jaws but it did not have a chance to touch any of the fugitives for the spy shot it dead. Other bloodhounds were with the glandelinians who had so suddenly appeared and it was now evident that the glandelinians were the same pursuers who had followed them so long ago from the river. As the fugitives now ran on in a nother direction the glandelinians gave chase the foremost dog leading two other beasts and the fierce glandelinians followed on behind. It was not yet noon of the sixteenth of november when the fugitives after killing the remaining dogs and six other rebels came to the edge of the woods and saw the river once more and the town of Ona. On only a little while off. A rebel squadron of fierce Gargolies stood by the roadside only a little way off. It was indeed a strange squadron horses dressed in white sheeted clothing and also headed and the men also and if it had been night they would indeed have looked very much like ghosts. The Gargolies seeing the three men and the fugitives especially the two very beautiful little girls, one dressed very thinly though thought then saw prey and they lashed their horses forward with their spurs but to their surprise they received a strange reception a reception they had not expected. While the boys and other girls ran on, the three men, and the two beautiful little girls stood still and waited until a few moments later, when their hostlers they quickly drew their guns, and followed the reports horses came in the snow, and men fell from saddles throwing the columns in great confusion. They were terrified also by the little girls' scared horses which the man and the others two men and even the little girls' scared horses which ran about riderless and were mounted in no time. Jennie was helped onto a horse by herself while the spy stood by her side, and while she held the reins, the Gargolies secured a horse and grabbing as many children as possible had then by three or four on each horse until all were safely within their grasp and then each holding each other tight they urged the horses on and away they went at a gallop with the dreaded Headed glandelinians after them like the wind.

The leaders of the Ku Klux Klan of the glandelinians was indeed astonished when they saw that even the two beautiful little girls could ride and even secure horses so gloriously. They pursued like mad, in a frenzy, and tried desperately to shoot the horses or the fugitives down, but there were too many movements between each man and they could not get in the aim while when the men fugitives and the two little girls answered the fire a glandelinian fell or horse and rider together in the roadway thus always checking the pursuit for a few minutes. So swiftly did they urged their horses onward that finally they managed to outdistance their pursuers, and soon lost sight to them. Now the poor terrified children must have gladly felt over the escape.

"Look you two little girls," said the spy. "You certainly were lively for your size and fragile form." "Said the men," "You captured more horses in that confusion than we did and got more children on the backs of the horses than we did." "How could you manage it?"

"It must have been from the excitement," answered one of the beauties. "I bet now we could not do it so quick. But that certainly was a narrow escape. The foot men were bad enough but those horrid headed glandelinians. One of the other little girls among those who had been rescued from child slavery was suddenly sick and in danger of death on account of the excitement and feeling sure the poor little child might become well if they reached some secure shelter they decided to try and find a place in a solitary spot."

In their haste they had indeed come upon a spot a small solitary place on a hill top and after they got here they found the little girl had grown worse and all hopes that she would ever get well was now lost. When I those who loved the poor little girl remembered what they all had done through for even the sum of saving her and they began to ask god to save her if it would. All of them felt as if they would have been glad to have given up their own lives for the sake of the little girl. Feeling sure that there was only a chance for the little girl to live only a short time at best it was believed that it would be more merciful to end it right then for she suffered greatly but many of them shook their heads and said that they would not do that. They would not do that.

that the cows would follow the bull where ever he went and so it was a ruse to try and run away with the enemy cattle and cause such confusion as to prevent pursuit for in looking and pursuing after their cattle the enemy who had discovered the fugitives would let them alone. The ruse worked for with a mighty bellow the whole herd of thousands of cattle followed after the bull in a rush like a panic or stampede and the herdsmen jumping up and running out of their tents saw what all the commotion was about. He saw the bull running within a pretty half naked little girl toward the east of the west bank of the river and the whole herd of cattle following with other fugitives or at least three men and another pretty girl shouting and scolding the horses on.

Yelling, cursing and swearing, he ran after them as fast as he could, but it was of no use, and the rebel encampment was a mile away. He bull desperately and boldly leaped into the river, and swam swiftly away and the cows followed despite the coldest water the bull still having the little beauty on his back and she was screaming with joy and delight at the fun she was having. Several scouting parties of glandelinians however had seen the performance and gallantly forward they opened fire vigorously with an effort to bring the children and the men down but only hit some of the cows and disabled them.

Soon the whole distant rebel encampment was ever alarmed, and thousands of soldiers from elsewhere streamed out toward the river. They saw the herds of cows rushing past on the opposite side of the river, and the general sent out his fastest squadrons of Gargolian and Garmannian cavalry to try and overtake the cows and the "Robbers." He pursued them far off and straggled alongside both banks of the river much further than a pursuit had ever been made before, but no effort could cause them to overtake the fleet runaways and their fugitive human beings. When they came back every one in the rebel encampments felt that there was no more hope. Many of the glandelinian soldiers were fearfully angry and orders were sent throughout one encampment after another to have them try and secure the cows and the ones who had stolen them from the field.

General vic-allister blanch himself heard of the affair and calling some of his generals he sent men to go in search of the fugitives and the cows, and told them to tell the men that no matter what dangers might be in their way, they must not come back until the cows are recovered and the fugitives overtaken and captured or killed.

In the meantime the cattle had been scattered so far that it was impossible for them to be regained but Jennie still had the bull in her possession and decided to bring it to the christian lines or die. It was indeed a great undertaking to have secured all those cows, for in the flight the fugitives and even the cows had passed through an unknown land and woods and they did not know what other perils they would come to face. Indeed it was feared after they had scattered the cows throughout the woods that they would never come within sight of the besieging christian lines at all. So great was the peril at that that men and officers had never dared to wander far from the christian lines in those days. But these men and the two little girls were not afraid. They were ready to face any danger. Only Jennie had rode the bull and the other fugitives had crossed the river by means of a small portable bridge across it. While they were encamped themselves for the night on a small island in the river they found there in hiding a little child slave boy who did not understand the glandelinian language. He named to take out by signs who and what he was and to ask them if they had seen his little sister but they only shook their heads and pointed to the west. They nevertheless took care of the little boy and on the nineteenth of november progressed down the river on small boats. They came to many small islands and stopped at every one for some but could find no trace of game but small forests only. At last they came to a large island called Greece Island. It had been as they saw previously occupied by rebel soldiers for a few glandelinian tents were still there but no one was in sight and save for a few houses the island was barren and quite treeless. For three hours leaving the rest of the island sheltered in the tents of small houses, the men and the two brave little girls wandered from hill to hill and finally secured small game at least.

On the twentieth of november when the bull had been left behind in the care of a glandelinian farmer the fugitives had continued on their way after the farmer had told them the direction of the christian lines.

A few hours after a strange old lady told Promethus that if he would go to camp Delphis and ask some strangers there, perhaps they could tell him where the vivian girls were kept prisoners in andrea. The spy and his companions had never heard of the fact before and he asked the old woman what she meant.

"I will tell you," said the old lady. "Delphis is a strong rebel encampment located near the region of Norma ossinia. It is under general apollo and John Jackson Hanley and there is his headquarters there built close to the spot where the first battle of julio Callio raged many days ago. The building general Hanley's headquarters in is the most wonderful building in the world. On the outskirts of the encampment there is an extent extensive line of fortresses or high earthworks guarded by cannon and cannons extend in so such a distance nobody knows where. A strange line of fortifications extends forward from the works to a certain distance and the encampment is so strong that few of the rebel generals think any one would ever dare approach it. But you and the three little girls alone can do it if you are careful. It is of course a dangerous undertaking."

"But who are the strangers that you talk about," asked Promethus. "I will tell you said the old woman even if it costs me my life." The stranger is also a secret spy who had come from andrea and andrea who in the disguise of a rebel officer lives in Hanley's headquarters. When any of the generals ask him a very hard question he answers correctly. If you ask him where the vivian girls can be located, he will take a piece of paper and draw the exact spot. Then he will sit by a table and draw a strange code and he will talk cautiously with you and tell you things which no one else will know of. Men from all nations of the rebel encampments not knowing who he really is go to him to ask about things which they would like to know. The general's headquarters is full of the beautiful and costly gifts stolen from the christianland during raids. Sometimes he will answer the questions very plainly, and sometimes he answers them in riddles, but what he says is always true indeed."

So the spy and the two little girls decided at any cost to return to Hanley's dreaded lines camp Delphis and also camp Pythin. After some difficulty the three managed to secure entrance to the lines at night, and obtain entrance to the general's headquarters. Fortunately the general was absent but the secret spy was not. He was very kind to the two little girls and when he had given them a number of good hugs and then while he held both in his arms he first told them of his adventures and then letting the two brave little girls down he sat at a table after seeing that no one was around and drawing a code told them to follow it out and it would tell them exactly how to find their way into andrea and find the vivian girls who were there suffering as child slaves at the time. He also said that the glandelinians there was doing all in their power to snuff the lives out of the beautiful little vivian girls.

"But what shall I do when I get inside of andrea," said Promethus. "Is it exceedingly dangerous to enter andrea?"

"Not so dangerous as entering the rebel lines or any other section of the besieged city," said the man. "When you once get into the city you may have to remain there for a few weeks for there is work to do in finding the vivian girls. At your reward will be great for the general Robert andrea had offered a great sum of money to any one who would recover his daughters."

"That must I do to get inside of andrea," said the spy. "Discover the bull you came to the farmer and bring it to the lines retarding you are a glandelinian with two children that he had secured at least the runaway bull."

Promethus did not understand what he meant by following the bull but as glandelinians were entering the building he dared not speak another word on the subject and they were also compelled to leave the building by a secret way before they were discovered.

"This must be one of his riddles," he said to himself as he left the house and by darkness passed to without difficulty to leave the rebel lines without being seen by any glandelinian. It did not take him long to locate the farmer and he got back the bull quite easily enough when he stated his mission.

"I will give my life to see the vivian girls back again," said the farmer. When he left the farmer's house he saw the snow white bull standing not far from the door the farmer's helper having brought it up. Even the bull seemed to be waiting for him for he looked at him with her large brown eyes and then turned and walked away. He remembered what the strange spy had told him and so he decided to follow out the plan. All day and night they traded on with the children following them. The children were sometimes afraid but went with him. Any one was seen, and the morning, they found themselves on the top of a beautiful hill, with leafless trees on one side and the snowy meadow on the other. Looking over a small map they had learned they were over thirty miles away from even the rebel lines at andrea and that also a fierce conflict was raging about andrea. At noon the young man made a fire of dry sticks and Promethus killed some wild rabbits and prepared a meal. Yet they feared that if they roasted any of the flesh the smell of it would be lifted toward the enemy somewhere so they felt sure they had to be careful.

Finding that they needed water to wash the flesh of the animals they had killed, one of the men went down the hill to find some as they dared not use the snow as it was not clean. The man was gone so long that the other young man became uneasy and went after him to see what was the trouble. Promethus waited for them, till the small fire had burned low. He waited and waited until the november sun was high in the sky. He called and shouted and so did the children but no one answered.

At last being suspicious he and the two little girls themselves drew their pistols and went down to see what was the matter. He and they followed the path which the two men had taken and came to a frozen stream at the foot of the hill. He saw something moving on the banks and bushes which grew near it. It was a fierce Gargolian waiting to spring upon him from ambush as it had done upon the two other men. There was blood and mangled human beings on the snow and it was not hard to guess what had become of the two men. The rebel murderer sprang at Promethus and tried to raise him and run him through with a long knife. But as Promethus leaped quickly aside the rebel then sprang for one of the little girls but to retaliate for the spy struck him in the neck with his long sabre.

would not sink, but Gargolian

A great stream of blood gushed out and the rebel fell to the ground dead. The spy and the two little girls had seen many a dreadful sight, but never anything so fearful as this hooded Gargolian. And they had never been in so great a danger before though it was only a single enemy they had met. They sat down on the stump of a tree after returning back where they had left the rest and trembled and all the time he almost wept with grief on account of the sad fate of his other companions. Now he had lost four faithful friends. So now he would have to go to Andrew and he did not like to take the other children in as they would be in great danger. Only he and his two little girl friends could accomplish the mission.

While he was still brooding over the tragedy he was surprised to hear Get Gertrude and her new found friend Jennie talking to him. He stood up and look at them sadly. The little girls told him that he must take out the code the strange man had given him and study it so he could take the trip without danger to the little girls and boys under his guardianship. He thought indeed it was a queer kind of a code but Jennie and Gertrude said that they could understand it if he could not do so and before he could say a word the two little human fairies were examining the code for him.

The code indeed was very strange and had very many designs or figures so many that when Gertrude and Jennie had examined them they almost found the code hard to make out themselves. The next thing was to find a place to make a better examination. Just as they turned away from the stream he saw a large force of Lancelinians coming a little way off. They were hiding the children behind all the nearest trees, he and Gertrude and Jennie hid also behind some rocks and watched the approaching rebels who were a thousand in number. Here they persuaders or a party of foragers. The ground behind the rocks was soft and black and a little warm no snow laying here and so they had no dread of exposure to the foe. Soon after halting a few moments the rebels again began to stir and move forward. Soon between the trees the bodies and forms of the men were easily seen and their faces were half hidden in helmets worn like those of Grecian soldiers but a little larger. They were the Gorgon Condemnedmen.

What could they want to come up here? Thus at the spy to himself. Before he could think anything more however the thousand warriors leaped out of the woods and moved forward toward the direction of the hiding Christians. Every man was clothed in a ash gray uniform more in the form of Confederate soldiers but of longer coats every one had a long rifle with a bayonet attached to it, and two officers had his sabre drawn. It was surely evident at that now that they were more of the Lancelinians who were scouring the region for the fugitives. The other little children were frightened when they saw the strange force of gray coated foot men approaching and the men in gray looked so fierce that even the spy feared they would kill all the children before he could stop them with one single shot. He had hid himself behind a tall cedar tree, and prepared to shoot the first one who came any nearer. The foremost Lancelinians had however observed some of the hidden children behind the trees and knowing they were the fugitives they were after came rushing forward. Shots came then incessantly from Prometheus and the two little girls and men after men were killed or wounded and fell like ten pins and in a little while only five of the nearest group of fourtymen were left and they retreated in panic back to the others. Then the leader of the rebels called out:

"Stop advancing upon the fugitives you fools or they will shoot you down also. We will fortify ourselves here and besiege them if possible." The men obeyed him. He remained stoned on moving forward and they were such good workmen that in a few hours they had built a little fortified work for themselves in a half circular form but toward night when the rebels started forward cautiously they soon discovered the fugitives had flown. Indeed Prometheus was a wise man. Even Gertrude Angeline and Jennie were very pleased with him in more ways than one. At the present time that Prometheus did is yet to be told. As for all the excitement they went through nevertheless both Gertrude Angeline and Jennie were very happy. They cannot tell but it did seem as if the fugitives would never hear of or see the Christian lines under an Amazon Indian or the others again. Harder there was really a thousand rebels in that column no body really known. The excitement was so great during the skirmish with the fugitives and the persuaders that there may have been some mistake about the story, and I should not think it strange if it were a small matter of rebels who had attacked them with the intention of recapturing the children and bear them away to Indian life. Of one thing I am very sure, the two little girls were so loved by the spy and their children were companions that they had no troubles or trials with them whatever and the little boys and girls obeyed every word they said without hesitation.....

Here was indeed a most difficult job. But the Christian spy Prometheus had ever on a previous night entered Andrew with the little boys and girls was utterly out of the question and he did not think it right to do so even for the sake of Violet and her sisters. If the boys and girls were even soldiers he would not know what to do, and he feared that if the fifteen girls whom he heard of stayed longer in Andrew that would die at the hands of the five fierce insurgents some time, and this was a very serious matter. He had to be so much worried and probably did not know what to do. He was a very brave man and a noble without tending a night

THE DIFFICULT ATTEMPT TO GET INTO ANDREW.
ANOTHER EFFORT TO ENTER ANDREW.....
THE GRAY WALLS OF THE FORTIFICATIONS OF ANDREW.....
EXCITING DANGERS NEAR THE REBEL LINES UNDER GENERAL MC-HOLLISTER H. JOHNSTON...:

unfastened the rope and started off when the wave tossed ice cakes. He saw thought that probably in this way they could ride to the extreme of the extreme danger for surely they could get into Andrew easily this way, and surely the chest would not sink. But Gertrude fell. That is the whole story of the danger and escape.

926 . A great stream of blood gushed out and the rebel fell to the ground senseless. He and the two little girl girls had seen him die a dreadful death, and they had never been in but never anything so fearful as this hooded Gargolium. And they had never met him in so great a danger before though it was only a simple enemy they had met. They sat down on the stump of a tree after returning back where they had left the rest and the fate of the rebels and all the time he absent was spent with on account of the sad fate of his other companions. Now he had lost four faithful friends. Now he would have to go to Andromeda and he did not like to take the other children in as they would be in great danger. Only he and his two little girl friends could accomplish the mission.

While he was still brooding over the tragedy he was surprised to hear

There was indeed a great difficulty in proving that the christian spy Thompson had ever on a serious, to enter underground with the little team and girls was utterly out of the question and he did not think it right to do so even for the sake of a nickel and her sisters. Of the boys and girls were even still there to wait out, to wait what to do, and he feared that if the victim girls whom he wanted to capture later in prison that would die at the hands of the five federal instruments some time, and this was a course, several days before he could correct and probably discover, and that to give up his concern and retire without landing a visit to the rebels, as he pondered on the difficult situation he asked both Petrards, in a line and "come" answer that if they both told him that he would not only have to leave the boys and girls out of the quest but that he should go with only a couple and her alone. And indeed about frightened the near any way such, and he tried to think of some plan by which he could keep the boys and girls in secure confinement, so that the enemy would not be able to capture them and return them into slavery, he remembered that once rebel workmen had once been seen to dig a deep hole in the ground not far from General Canine's lines and in this secret hole which was two hundred feet across and ten deep they had built a round fortress which had but one room and only a small door, and for windows it had tunnels for guns. And he considered the idea that it had been finished, and he considered since it and but one room had only a small door, and for windows it had two narrow slits. It had resembled the time that it had been finished, and I wondered where it had been deserted when whether he could not find it. It was in it with plenty of provisions and everything that could make one happy, and where they probably could stay in safety until he could find some one to come back for or notify the christian gentlemen where they were. With the two girls and the children went to look for that round church which like fort and fortunately came upon a vast christian settlement, in which he had never seen before and upon which he had arrived very suddenly. It therefore left the children in their care and telling the general who covered his intended mission - started out and soon were on the way to a small town in general with a lighter heart. Gertrude and Jennie had no one to talk to now but the boy, and for a time they never saw the river or the beautiful red riding hood, but only the blue sky, with now and then a white cloud sail. The part and the snow covered fields and other distant woods and along the far distant twisting lines. Four after hour they trudged bravely and in the deep snow facing the biting cold covering winds and wondered why any man ever dared to go into such so far away, and also wondered why the christian gentlemen had ever dared to go into such a place, and why whether they would ever see any more. They had passed by but got Gertrude and Jennie could not hear any more to the rebel lines at night heard so much noise of firing somewhere that they grew a little apprehensive and the boy who looked like a brave little little girl and loved them felt peculiar too.

traveler of our active and so it directed him to the the was indeed to the two little girls a tall and out hands youth and having set so could a man and also a lawyer for their companion no road a friend as the any they were so happy the that neither Gertrude or her own companion did not feel any longer a loneliness or afraid of the distant display even when they were so far away from the probatin christianity lines. While he followed them a little distance and while they hurried away there was suddenly above them a blinding flash of light followed immediately by a terrific crash like thunder but descending not for a moment they were surrounded like was found in the woods in the cold snow for four months a terrible famine and rather had vent it hidden for the enemy and to the life and so the three men who clung to near by heard it the spring then the a learned the truth he was very much alarmed for he thought that now in spite of all that he has done he could not be able to go into mystic life. Now that the only way the glacial distance could take such a child would be to put it in a death. Now he had taken the poor mother and her baby out of the ice and now place the one before him and he knew that unless the child was he could not have the thought of having seen it he could not doubt but the wicked headlamps. At some time he must be done, so he would come in one alone of paper he directed the woman to the christian lines, which he was sure she could easily find. soon afterwards toward morning still hearing the noise in the direction of where they once upon a wooden chest of enormous size that was under light and storm, and they decided to try and get into andrea by means of the chest itself. It was climbing close to the banks of the gorma un river they had managed to shove it in and then before it started off, they and caught it by a rope to trees and finding were pulled from a few boats out in it unfurnished the rope and started off along the same rotten ice cakes. he only thought that probably in this way they could ride it themselves of the extreme danger for surely they could not take into andrea easily this way, and surely the chest would not sink. but Gertrude felt that the winds would always direct in and save capturing the fugitives would be lost and that would never do. Two of the columns of the surviving rebels turned from their course and dashed anew after the fugitives firing themselves. It was however a case enough to take this maneuver but while the rebel leader had been doing so the fugitives gained upon them again. They were almost to the river bank almost to the point. How the rebels strained every muscle of their horses now to overtake them. It was useless before the rebels came to the shore. The "Landelinn" then fired blindly but all in vain they could not hit the fugitives and they soon escaped.

After going some distance down the river they found progress by boat much further almost impossible but nevertheless after landing again the fugitives came to a steep stony hill. As the fugitives observed when they reached the top it had once been used before the war as a sort of place for many child slaves held by the enemy. The child slaves had been sheltered in the little caves which the rebel engineers had dug in the earth or hollowed out with machinery among the rocks, and from the evidence the food of the child slaves had been the food of wild animals which the rebel masters and overseers had hunted in the woods, with every now and then a few berries or nuts.

From other evidence around it was positive the "Landelinn" child slave masters had used, slings, clubs, and sharp sticks to use on rebellious child slaves, and the little clothing which they wore probably had had been worn only in winter and was made of skins. The child slaves had been living under the charge of their masters on top of the hill because there no one it was believed could have rescued them or set them free, and that they were also safe from the wild beasts of the great Red Riding Hood Forest around them, and safe also from the more vicious "Landelinn" who sometimes roamed through the land. And the hill was so steep on every side, indeed that there was no way of climbing it, save by a single narrow path, which during that time had always been guarded by some men at the top.

While they were investigating the hill and the men soldiers were hunting for provisions in the woods on top they suddenly came across a strange strange youth whose face was so fair and who was dressed so delicately that they could hardly believe him to be a man of "Landelinn" or like themselves and called the attention of the three little girls to him. His body was as little and slender as indeed he moved so nimbly among the trees, that they fancied him nevertheless to be some skulking rebel in the disguise of a solitary stranger, and all stood at all in wonder and alarm. The young man spoke to them but they could not understand a single word he said, then he made signs to them that he was hungry, and they finally gave him something to eat and for a time were no longer afraid or suspicious. Had they felt sure he was some one sent to prevent their quest for "Landelinn" they might have taken him prisoner at once. But they did not like to use harsh judgment and they called him and heard him talk and so they took him with them as a man though not a prisoner was nevertheless under their guard. They thought that after they had him with them a few hours they could then find out who he really was and if he acted suspicious or made any show of them they would either kill him or make him a prisoner. At after they had him with them for nearly all that day the young stranger proved to be so gentle and fair that after they all had taken a good look at him they began to think it would be a great pity to suspect him of any treachery and that by his language he was surely no "Landelinn" in disguise at all. So they gave him food and treated him more kindly, and in his own language he sang some songs to the little girls and made them happier than they had been more many a day, give us my pay.

Nevertheless he managed to make them understand that his name was Gecocroch. Gecocroch and that he had been shipwrecked several years before on the seacoast of "Gecocroch" and then finding that Jennie, "Gecocroch" could understand his language he told her many strange things about the land from which he had come from and to which he feared on account of the war he would never be able to return. The poor little girl listened and wondered, and it was not long before all the "Landelinn" with the three little girls began to love him and to look upon him as one wiser than themselves. Then Jennie, "Gecocroch" came to and him in his language everything that was to be done concerning the expedition to "Landelinn" and there was not one among them who refused to take his advice or do his bidding.

So Gecocroch—The strange language man as they afterwards called him because the adviser of the expedition he thought they had to avoid rebel sharpshooters lurking at every place in the land, how to set traps to catch birds for game, and he showed them how the rebels had built decoy houses with roofs of wood and laced the roofs with reeds which grew in the swamps to attract fugitives or runaway child slaves which he knew all about, and he told them about the great and mighty dangers of going into the city of "Landelinn" in quest of little girls who no doubt foolishly choiced their own peril to go into "Landelinn" to spy on the child slave masters.

By and by they left the hill with its wretched abandoned child slave caves and after going a short distance came to the outskirts of a small little village also abandoned which had neat houses and a once lovely market place and around it was a strong wall with a single narrow gate just where a foot path began to ascend from the river shore.

while the party who were in quest of "Landelinn" and her sisters were standing in a large group in the roadway and planning how to reach "Landelinn" by a safer way than going to the rebel lines two other strangers were seen in their midst or had just come up the road on horseback. No body among them could tell how they came there. None of the "Landelinn" had seen them approaching, and no one had ever dared to come down the road with too much caution and firing a suspicion on himself. At there the two new strangers were. One was a tall man in the uniform of a "Landelinn" soldier and the other was a young girl and the man was so tall, the and the face of the little girl so noble and beautiful that those who saw them stood still and wondered and did not for the moment say a single word. The man had a rope of gray color over his uniform coat, and green wrapped around his body, and he bore in one hand a drawn sword four feet and three inches long. The little girl who was eleven years old was beautiful had wonderful gray eyes and in one hand she carried a small rifle, and in the other a cross of curious workmanship.

"What is the name of the section of "Landelinn" you travelers are going to for a quest?" asked the strange man.

The group of "Landelinn" soldiers stared at him in wonder and amazement and hardly understood the meaning of his question. When one of the soldiers answered and said:

"Unless we know who you really are we will not reveal the name of any place where we are bound for. We who are grouped here are for an important mission, but since we face many perils we have no intention to reveal anything to strangers unless we are sure they are not rebels in disguise."

"We have no time for arguments," said the little girl herself to their surprise, "and we rightly know where you are bound for though you think us spies and will not reveal where do you suppose the 'Landelinn' girls are whom you seek? Do you think we don't know?"

They were in the section called "Landelinn" with the child slaves and doing all possible to liberate them," said the man. And you grouped here and bound for "Landelinn" to help them out."

"Show me lead you to this information," said Gertrude Angeline.

"I fear you are here with the intention to hinder us."

"No indeed was the answer. "We came to lead you safely to "Landelinn" and you have suspicion that we are spies."

"But who are you asked the spy?"

"My name is Jonathan Kane," said he. "And I am a war correspondent, a member of the Abolitionist Committee, and also a famous spy for the "Landelinn" cause. Here are my exact identification, and my proofs."

He then looked over the papers handed to him and saw it was evidently true, that the strangers were no suspicious persons at all.

"And I am Gildred Maxwell," said the girl. "And I came to help my friend in helping you in your enterprise."

"I heard you were planning to go to "Landelinn" to make an effort to secure the freedom of the 'Landelinn' girls," said Kane. "And I indeed have with this little girl who is my beloved daughter come to help you. Her name is Gildred Maxwell Kane in full. Give your squadron of soldiers under my command during the trip and let me also with the spy be the protector and patron of the three brave little girls with you and the staff of the 'Landelinn' girls who are called Violet and her sisters shall be yours at the sailing ships from every rebel port. 'Landelinn' wicker is guarding all river approaches to "Landelinn" but I and my daughter can only lead the way in and out."

"The father, after you fair promises indeed," said Milton but listen to me.

"Give us also a chance to help you and let us be your 'little patron' and I and my father will both give you all the help, aid, and information that even gold cannot buy, and during the expedition I and my father will teach you how to do probably a thousand things of which you now know nothing. I will make your little squadron my favorite friends and I will give you wisdom about "Landelinn" that shall sway the minds and hearts of all the men until the end of all time."

The spy leader of the squadron bowed respectfully, and turned to the column of the soldiers, and then looked scornfully at the little girls themselves.

"Well we select these two persons to be the patron protector and patrons of our squadron," he asked. They both offer us their services in two different ways. One offers us aid, and another offers us information. Shall we choose both?"

"Choose Kane and his little dauntless daughter by all means!" cried some of the soldiers.

"And the little girl is so bright so looking she would make good company for us," cried the others.

At last when it was plain that the soldiers and the little girls agreed one of the soldiers whose advice had always been heeded said:

"These two strangers have only given us promises, and they promised 50 things of which we are really ignorant. For who among us knows what can be done in our trip to "Landelinn" and we are a long way off from the place. Now if they would give us some real information we should know better whether we could choose them and let them go with us or not."

"What is true, that is true," cried some of the soldiers.

"Very well then," said the two persons, man and girl. "We will each give you a proof of our ability, right now and right here, or when the opportunity presents itself. And if we prove to falter or desert you in any way you are free to shoot us down for desertion and cowardice." "And so it was agreed."

Then the rebel guard white with excitement and fear wrote on a small slip of paper a f Jakopson and handed it to him just as a number of rebels came down the pathway. Seeing help coming the spy the guard attacked the spy with the intention of trying to recover the slip of paper but after a struggle, there was a scream in midair, which the mountain eagles answered from even above, there was a great explosion in the water below and some rebels below on the shore fled in terror from their tents. When the other guards came forward of cried out:

tenants, when the other guards came, forming a circle around the man. "He will have nothing to do with no vile number of watches on the christian dog and they attacked 'em and chased the men down high dale, at the same time for any more there was the pour of none. At the explosion, the air was lighted up by a bright lurid flash, there was a sudden start like an earthquake and all were thrown off their hinges to the concussion. For the concussion the woe river seemed to be furious for a moment, the waters were boiled into foam and a great wave met the body of the roof the boat drowned upon the shore. The concussion of the distant mysterious explosion had shattered the great rock and this rock was broken into three fragments and fell. One third of it fell into the river, one third was embedded in the sandy bank, one third was scattered about the river, and the rest fell upon a plain amongst two hundred feet down below.

the rest fell upon a rebel encampment two miles up the river close within view and within range of the guerrilla party now free of fear guards continued on their long journey to the north and soon reached the top, and by means of the false password got through without difficulty and soon left the road and hill positions without permit and as a down into the valleys where rebel sheep and cattle in the Llanillohu possession were herded together and fed by rebels and where the rebels had large storehouses full of grain and grain.

The same of the deeds of this party of strange robed uniformed soldiers with the children in their midst had gone on before them however and so many rebels came crowding onward toward them to see the strange squadrons that there was great danger of their being discovered but after much difficulty and by many tricks and by showing false papers they managed to get in without being suspected or detained.

"As long as we are not detected we shall be allowed to go in peace," said Gertrude Angelina."

Gertrude Angelina.. As they continued on through it was now near midnight, and finding out by the passport they had they realized they were in the Niagara enactment the rebels and so to keep clear off too many rebels the they followed the shore of the river toward camp music.

"Do not go into camp Flu, Aleusis but take the road which leads around it through the small hills." whispered the boy who was riding on the horse with Gertrude Angelina.

"He shall see to do that!" he cried.

"Listen little girl," I whispered, "don't let him hear you." This is the argument where there generally are mistakes. Johnston said, "I am here every day, and I am looking for him and identify themselves and such is the character of the struggle as far as he goes and find won't convince him that we are rebels or untended rebels and when he discovers our true character we will all perish at his hands."

"My wishes had entered his own lines but no one ever of army. I was a slave within his house and know." *****

"It will have to pass through his encampment now," said "Ertrude." "To go back the way we came is more dangerous and the party still continued on their way. Soon they saw a party of rebel cavaliers approaching from the distant encampment and realized that the commander was Lieutenant Cereyron.

"Rebels under Lieutenant Goryunov are approaching our way." "Sold the way." "If we wish to save ourselves from detection or capture we will have to hide to save ourselves, but to turn now and flee will be useless, and I fear these rebels may have heard of our coming." "!!!!"

"How should we flee?" asked Lemmie Turner with a pugnacious cluck.
"We are not fondly cats" and his wife moved as if she intended to take the lead and a day after the rebels had left the five fierce argallians themselves.
The rebel officers sat still on the horse however and he had seen the squadron of gray horses on with the little girl in their sled going through the lake of the mountain and he being suspicious, pinned seriously as he thought of five little children whose young lives he was about to destroy for he thought sure the party were as really "Christian" as he "idiot" as he.

While Promethine was indeed wondering who it should be, the small black shadow of that once pretty house a large squadron of rebel came upon the road from a bend in the road and hurried down to meet him and his company of soldiers. A leader of the rebels was a well dressed officer and to their surprise his face was well wreathed. In the most pleasant guise, and he bowed low to Promethine and kindly invited him and his little group of soldiers and the little girls to come up to his big tent and be his guest that night.

"This is a lonely place for you scouts to be trawling!" he said to Promethine and is not often that a party of Unionist scouts like you ever pass this way on your return to the lines. But there is nothing that gives us or my soldiers so much joy as to help wounded soldiers and feed them at my table in my tent and hear them tell of the things they have seen and hear heard while scouting on the skirmish dogs. Come up and sup with us all of you and lodge under the roof of my tent and you a little girl friends will sleep on my wonderful bed which I have in my tent a bed as a bed side and a table to sit every child and even cure her of every possible ailment."

 around them to see what sort of a tent it was. It indeed was! "The tent" was filled with surprise at the richness of it--at the gold and silver and other beautiful things with which every part of the tent seemed to be adorned--for it was indeed a place fit for a king or prince's palace. While he was looking, and wondering the tent cloth parted "above him and the fair face of the little girl who they had rescued peered out at him with her finger on her mouth.
 " "Silent friend!" he whispered. "Do not let the little girls lie down on the bed or do not remain here another minute. I wish us for those of the realm there will be no escape for us."

"The man who betrayed us is called Gargant Frocriste," said the little girl-----and she talked low and fast for fear she would be overheard by the other rebel soldiers within the tent."At first not thinking we were christians the lieutenant and his men want well of us but as soon as we learn who we are all will be off. He will put us little girls on a fire bed and murder us. To own who comes into his tent and is discovered an christian slave ever goes out alive."

And what is that from bed you said you had come to fit us children?" "And the lieutenant not tell you that we had come to fit us children?" "And the little girl?" "And mostly to observe that it can be made to fit us. For if we are discovered we will all be seized, seized and made into prisoners and the rebels will throw us and the other little girls on the bed and either make us submit to slavery or huc off our legs or kill us or stretch our limbs and burn us until we die from the tortures or torture and do it with ropes until we are long enough; it is this fate that will come to us little girls if we are arrested and you and the other christian soldiers will be led off and who will

to the officers.

"Hark, hark," whispered the little girl. "I hear the spy coming." and the cloth tents closed over her hiding place. The very next moment the spy stood in the doorway bowing and smiling as if he had never intended to betray the Christians he knew was in the tent.

the christians he knew was in the tent.

the lieutenant would like to see you first."

Prometheus and the little girls arose with their hands near their pistol holsters and followed the man to their host and when they had come into an inner chamber of the tent there surely enough they saw several beds of iron and very curiously wrought, and upon it a the soft mattresses which seemed to invite them to lie down and rest, but Prometheus per peering, about saw an axe and ropes with strange cunning pulleys lying hidden behind the curtains and they saw too that the floor of the tent was covered with stains of blood.

that the floor of the tent was covered with staining of blood.

"Now said the 'ost.' 'After you little girls have taken a pleasant little nap, the soldiers and your comrades will in the meantime sit down at the table and you may tell us of the wonderful things which you have seen in the course of your scouting duty. Now my dear little girls, my pretty little sprites - are you lying down and take your ease, for I know that you are tired and have traveled a traveled far and are faint from want of sleep and rest. Lie down and while some slumber overtakes you, I will seat in some soldiers who will see to it that no unsavory l noise, nor buzzy fly, or bird nor vexing knee disturb your dream.

"These are wonderful beds indeed for the children," said Brazantius without showing any signs of his suspicions.

"They are," answered the rebel lieutenant, "and the little coils need but lie down upon them and it will fit them perfectly."

Seeing that no soldiers were in the fort but his own "Prometheus said;

"But you must lie upon one of the beds first, and let me see how it will fit itself to your form or stature."

"Ah no! I've heard the rebel officer! For then the s... will be taken! And as he spoke his cheeks grew ashy pale and then he burst out!" on are sides by way.

"I found it out and you are under arrest and the little... were... He got these beds."

"If they are to die on the beds," I tell you, "I will be one of them first, and shall," said Providence, and he seized the police officer around the waist and threw him by main force upon the bed. And at the same time the candlestick officer sprang upon the bed then suddenly curious from afar he resolved out and clasped his body in their embrace and suddenly held him down so he could not move hand or foot, the wife stretched him would have shrieked but the very many cursed him and then standing over him looked him straight in the eyes and said:

But the rebel was not able to answer a single word because he was gagged. When Trevelyan brought out the axes, the ropes and the strange pulleys and removing the gag and rotating a gun at him said;

and removing the cap and holding a pin at him said;
 "I'll kill you if you tell me are these for me and why where they hidden in the car?"

the rebel officer was still silent and he would have liked to yell but the gun did not look very pleasant to him and he could not do anything now but tremble.

"Is it true" said Prometheus "you dare rebel that you have lured hundreds of children away from their beds into your den of a tent only to murder them when you discovered they were Christians? Is it true that it is your go purpose to fester them in this bed and then chop off the tr little legs or arms or stretch the out, until they fit the iron frame and allow them to die by this tr torture? Tell me, you full of evil you where you lay..."

"It is true, it is true," sobbed the frightened lieutenant, "and now kindly touch the spring on the bed above my head and let me go, and you all shall have back all the things that I possess in this fort."

But Prometheus ordering his soldiers out of the tent and the little girls also turned in 50.

turned to Co. "These are caught," he said, "the trees of let you and not for the 14th

Let your commander care and release you. We'll leave you and not found until we let you go from you very dear. I'm Abdullahin (brother of Abdullahin)."

and he and the followers went out of the tent and left the wife stretched to stay in the bed and either perish by his own cruel device or be released by his own mercy. The moment they had spared the time to look through the big tent and found there great wealth of gold and silver and costly thin as which the rebel soldiers had taken from all prisoners inside of Syrian wicker, and all other Argelins who had fallen as prisoners in their hands, he went into the dining hall of the great tower tent and there indeed saw the table spread with a rich feast of meats and drinks and of delicate foods such as no king or general would have dreamed of. There were enough seats for the host and visitors it was evident that a man had been lying in wait on them and caused this detection which almost resulted in the ruin of little girls and the shooting of the man.

then the other little girl came running up to Francesco and she seized the young heroes hands and blessed and thanked him for saving her and the other little girls from so terrible a fate and because he had escaped the rebels once more.

Q. Now, a month or so he said with tears in her eyes and ready to weep "My poor father a rich owner of silvermines was traveling to find a tin mine and was with his happy and carefree as any bird in the woods." "I was not lucky and the goldminers at Chuquibambilla in the fields outside where a rancharo was looking for gold with my father and I that I not killed were taken and carried to the rebel camp and there I was sold into slavery to the goldminers at all." He was killed before we saw on the charge of being a christian any diamonds and a pearl.

1. The first of these is the fact that the Commission has not yet received any information from the Government of the United States regarding the results of its investigation into the activities of the American Friends Service Committee in the Soviet Union.

Prometheus heard all this talk as he rode along with his party of followers and with the little girl in his front and it angered him not a little, but he did not come to the rebel lines to quarrel with Mandelstam because it would mean their betrayal and capture. He talk about the rebels did not reach him then at all and it was a good comfort at that point that that fact.

However without knowing the exact time of day, he did not know that a bomb shell came from a mine from the Christian lines and that it was when it exploded a part of the company street - it leveled a street of ten by the explosion and the shock of the explosion buried horses and men over the top of the hill and did likewise with no oxen along in deep holes with the children and he been injured however by the sudden outbreak and burning their horses out of the scene of wreckage went on their way down another company street and left the wonder-stricken Mandelstams in the other company street to stare after them speechless. Soon they had reached the hill where General Mac-Hollister Johnston's headquarters was and then leaving the rest outside and the little girl under the care of the soldiers climbed the stairway which led to the top of the steep rocky summit of the hill and his heart beat fast in his throat as he stood on the threshold of the rebel general's headquarters.

"Where is his excellency general Johnston?" He asked of the man.

"You cannot see the general unless you show your own papers."

was the answer. "But if it is anything important I will take you to his apartment."

The guard led the way into the front hall of the general's headquarters and there the spy saw fifty generals sitting about a big table looking over plans, reading important dispatches, and letters and writing out orders or drawing maps of their own, some others were drinking and making merry, and somewhere else in the building there was a great noise of revelry in the hall, minstrels singing and dancing, and the slave children crying or weeping and working scrubbing floors, polishing oil cloth and so on washing windows, carrying heavy objects and cleaning down stairs and making beds or scrubbing and cleaning the uniforms and cloth clothing of the generals, and then came along two half-drunk rebel officers who were shouting and cursing. As Prometheus stood in the doorway he knitting his eyebrows and clenching his teeth for the anger which he felt, one of the officers who was a general saw him, and cried out:

"See the tall stranger in the doorway. What does he want? I believe he is an Angelinian spy."

and he was immediately surrounded by soldiers with leveled muskets.....

"Well, tall stranger what do you want here please?" said one of the soldiers.

"I'm here," said Prometheus showing his passport "to ask the hospital hospitality which men of our own race never refuse." "What to ask but a

Andreas to secure some child, a seven child slaves I claim to, Andreas and what to get the permit from general Johnston."

"You do me refuse," cried the soldiers, "shouldn't their arms and also allowing him to be free. "Go in with us first and let us drink and be our guest."

"I have no time to care in now," said Prometheus "but later on I hope to be the guest of his excellency general Mac-Hollister Johnston. Where is he?"

"Never mind the general in chief," said one of the soldiers. "He is in his home and does not wish to be bothered now."

But the spy strode boldly through the front hall, and went about the building asking permission to see the general as soon as a moment's notice.

At last he found the fierce looking general but fierce and mean as he was he looked lonely and sorrowful. He was sitting in a high chair over a Geographic map and studying the map of Lyvan vice W. Lyvan W. Lyvan and her surrounding vicinity. The heart of Prometheus almost felt sad as he saw the lines of care upon the old man's face and marked his trembling halting ways but then he was a wicked Angelinian rebel and did not deserve to be pitied.

"Your excellency," he said "I am a strange officer in your lines and I and my companions have come to ask you the permission to go to Andreas and secure seven child slaves which I claim by this rightful paper and also ask for food and shelter and friendship such as I know you never deny your rebel subjects and to those of noble rank and of your own race."

"And who are you my young man?" demanded the general haughtily. "I have never seen you before."

"My name is Frank Deane," said the answer from Prometheus.

"What?" demanded the general. "Are you the rebel man general Deane who has rid the world from one thousand of millions of Miles in German

Catherine, and has worried the officer who shot him self in the front weather in the world."

"I am supposed to be," said Prometheus smiling. "It is completely necessary to secure detection. And I come from round a rebel camp on the opposite side of horse land."

The Mandelstam general was pleased to get a part of his own name.

"Yes, yes," he said. "You are welcome brave soldier and your friends to such shelter and food and friendship as I can give and I will fit you out an extra number of men to go into Andreas with you and look after the children who are the slaves you claim to rightly own."

the fire, except in the center. The flames and smoke in the foreground were all spent, like a burning firebrand of lightning, flaming out and then disappearing. The smoke and soot blowing from the fire, carried out by the wind, were black and white, coming in thick waves of smoke and fire against the clouds, and the glow was reflected in the water for a long distance and the first, farthest reaches of Henry's valley, and with getting, and all distant hills, and the next black was lifted up by the flames, and all the heavens thereabout seemed to have caught the solid configuration, for in some columns of flames, masses of flames in fire rose and fell, when the surface of the fire ocean and huge volumes of smoke and soot and clouds of smoke of many different dark and light colors rolled and fell into the sky like volcanic eruptions, clouds, or as if hundreds of volcanoes were smoking below. 1. The first thing that I noticed when I stepped out of the car was the heat. It was a sticky, oppressive heat that seemed to wrap around me like a heavy blanket. I had heard that the weather in Miami was perfect, but this was something else entirely. I wiped sweat from my forehead and looked around, trying to get my bearings. The city was a blur of colors and shapes, with cars honking and people shouting in the background. I felt lost and overwhelmed, like I had been thrown into a foreign world without a map. I took a deep breath and tried to focus on the task at hand. I had a meeting to go to, and I needed to find the office as quickly as possible. I started walking, following the flow of traffic and the sound of the city. I passed by a busy intersection with a traffic light that was stuck on red. I saw a group of people waiting, some looking at their phones, others talking to each other. I felt a sense of urgency, knowing that I was late. I kept walking, my heart pounding in my chest. I saw a sign that said "City Hall" and I knew I was close. I turned a corner and saw a large, modern building with glass windows. I walked up to the entrance and saw a security guard. I showed him my ID and he let me in. I took the elevator to the 10th floor and walked down a long hallway. I saw several doors, some of which were open. I knocked on one of the doors and a woman answered. She told me that my meeting was in room 1010. I walked to the door and opened it. I saw a man sitting at a desk, looking at a computer screen. He looked up at me and smiled. He told me that the meeting was in 10 minutes. I took a deep breath and walked into the meeting room. I saw several people sitting around a large table. I took a seat and waited for the meeting to start. The meeting went well, and I was able to complete my task. I walked out of the building and took a taxi home. I was exhausted but satisfied. I had survived my first day in Miami.

Unknown to the writer, the Government of Illinois has the distinction of being the only State in the Union which has a law on the books forbidding the sale of alcoholic liquors to persons who are suffering from mental diseases. This law is contained in the Illinois Criminal Code, Chapter 10, Section 1-10.

Deposition of the witness, General Ivanov, and all that time -strutted Angelina would hardly eat a bite of food and this was very hard on many of the poor christian generals and soldiers who loved them dearly. He had worked for days trying to even get them to eat and be cheerful but nothing was accomplished. So they begged some of the doctors to help them or feed them by force if necessary. When the doctor found that the little girls were unable to eat of their own accord on account of the great sorrow knowing at their hearts over something he sent a messenger to general gonatimian Abramov and he notified general anson Ivanov. The doctor was really afraid that she and her friend would make themselves ill so he sent word to the doctor to find some kind of beautiful food that might tempt them to eat a little. The little girls however were very hungry and knowing it was suicide not to eat they ate a little every now and then, and night almost cried themselves sick and wished a bomb shell would come and kill them and end their sorrow. Just then an officer arrived to general Proserdinia and said:

"General concentinian Ironburg demands that you notify general Anson Vivian that a certain man is seen entering his lines with seven unconscious children with him and several men. Who the children are w it is not know but they must be rescued child rebels."

Unfortunately Gertrude (Angelina or her friend) had not heard this news and the general who saw them so unhappy said to the messenger; "Take these two unfortunates and transfer them to general Anson's lines immediately. He alone can cheer them up."

On their way to his headquarters it was snowing, and the waves along the shore of the river seemed to be trying to push the ice on the shore out of their way, but the ice would rattle back again as fast as they could every time. The river bench was white with foam, and the forlorn little girl could hear the roar of the diadems, and the shouting of the little, and she spoke still more loudly to the diadems. They felt even sadder that it was snowing. They could not even see for both little girls had their little fingers wound up in bandages and now they were lonely for they had no girl friends to play with.

"It will be some day," said the man. "It can't last forever. Why don't you play with my doll."

"It is not very pretty to me any more since I lost my dearest friends," said Gertrude. "At least I don't care for anything now."

ward night they were driving within sight of general ansons lines which was the only christian army that appeared quiet though it was concentratin forward toward jordan osseinin and it was toward december fifth life fifteenth.

"If a battle rages," said Jennie Turner with a mischievous light in her eyes and a pout "I'm going into it at any risk see if I don't" and the manner of her words alarmed the man.

"A battle is not coming yet," said the soldier but if you do you will be a fine pile of mangled pieces on the ground."

"Oh I don't care," said Jennie pointing still more. "I'll make the christians win by grabbing a flag from a color bearer and deal in front of them in the face of the enemy's fire. I care not what I do in so I have lost my friends."

"I'm afraid no one will let you," said the policeman. "But at least have -strange news for you, you came from under the moon and brought into general concentration, because Linan some children who he sent with the men to general Robert, Edwin Linan. They are with Simon now."

"Oh," said Gertrude with a slight feeling of loss in her heart. "May we be allowed to go with you to the place and see who they are. I'll work as hard as any one will to try and cheer them up. They will be company anyway. May I sir?"

"Yes you may too," said soldier Starbird. "You'll be to make them cheerful." "I did not know it was so much fun to see how many child players are rescued until I saw those little orphans. And pretty, but a fairy could not beat them."

So they conton continued on their way a little faster now, artrude on one horse and Jennie on another. It was a snowy cold day indeed, and the river beach was piled high up with dabrif from some wrecks and ve evening burned embers.

She turned wearing a living on the shore of which the river was full and when she took it out of the water she found it to be but a beautiful doll with a blue waist and a red dress, such a deep red it was, it had a shining head of white, a beautiful, clear, pink cheeks, and yellow brown hair. Gertrude had never seen such a beautiful doll whose dress was made of silk. Gertrude felt it with careful fingers, it was real silk, and she realized it was the doll belonging to Jennie Vanden who she believed was dead or buried to ashes in prison.

She ran down to the other two with the doll.

'I wonder whose it is' Said the soldier.

"Oh Jennie," said Gertrude, "I'm going to keep her. She was Jennie's own dolly, and the poor little girl sat down and cried bitterly."

"There, there don't feel so bad please don't" Said Starbird. "It surely belongs to Jennie Ividan. But it will have to be given up to their poor sorrowing father. Won't you do it Gertrude."

Gertrude was an honest little girl even in her great sorrow and she tried not to cry any more. It was nearly two miles to general Hansons home lines yet and Gertrude hugged the dolly very close and kissed her a great many times.

As they rode up to one of the outer encampments of the main lines a boyscout was standing near and the soldier asked if general Hanson was in a good mood to receive any visitors that day as he knew the sorrow of the generals over the supposed deaths of Violet and her sisters he felt sure no one would be received by Hanson whose temper was very ugly that day with the enemy.

"Always he is recovering any one." Said the boy. And I'll tell you that is Jennie Givans doll. "I'll go and find her."

Gertrude wept at these words and so did Jennie. Murmer and before any one could know what was happening, a beautiful little girl came out of a certain house and in hand with the boy. Jennie Murmer recognized her as Jennie. Jennie sure enough.

"Where in the world did you come from?" Asked Gertrude amazed and half scared as if she feared she saw a celestial being.

"I came from a 'gendreau'" she answered. "A soldier rescued me and my sisters two weeks ago. We're in the lines ever since, and you two have been crying. Do you wish my doll was yours?"

"He thought you were dead," said Gertrude now feeling more like werewolf. And in a moment she had Jennie in her arms.

"I have some other doll dolls" Said Jennie. "Haven't you any dolls of your own."

"No 'Mail Gertrude.' at we want you a more than a doll. Oh, think god know god is so good to return you and your sisters so to us."

FROM 1962 TO 1970, 6000 TO 10,000 JOY BOATS, 20 TO 30 M.

The next morning the sun was shining and Gertrude Angeline and her friend with Violet and her sisters once more were very happy. The water dolly given to Gertrude looked as white as if she felt quite, quite good at home. Indeed how to a. Hertrude looked happy too as if she felt quite quit and at home. Indeed now their little brave hearts did beat with joy and how they did look indeed with their brighter smiles and happy faces. After this union the little girls so happy again despite the near of the night had even more gentle, loving and brave:

happy again despite the roar of the siege had grown more gentle, loving and brave and there seemed to come stealing over their faces the most glorious shining lights, which seemed to prove that the children were going to be still better boys and girls, more self-reliant, more the spirit of December and Gertude Arneling.

and Jennie Warner were out on a horse trot with a soldier. Soon they came to a small hill top and suddenly little Jennie almost shrieked in surprise and amazement; "Look, look, every body look," she cried, "look look blue."

"Oh, look, every body look," he cried "look look, blue, green, red, yellow, i indigo, pink, and purple lights. what in the world does that mean."

"Of what use if there in watching them!" Egan bertrude when the soldier halt ing said;
"You might not know them but those light s are mighty darn suspicious to

"I'm afraid that you might be disappointed if you did make a signal."

"I'm not sure I would be disappointed," said the soldier. "I should like to send a signal very much by means of a sky rocket."

So and the little girls turned to look at the lights which seemed to move back, and forth, and to and fro untill for a few moments they died out and they could

"Perhaps you have no means to send a signal to the lines." Said Angeline.

"Oh yes I have all necessary means." Said the soldier.
 "Dear me," said Violet. "If I had any means to send signals to attract a general I should go first back to the lines, and should start my rockets and roman candles and everything—where the little girl stopped! Oh she sudden broke out! Will you wait a minute for me. A piece of stone is in my shoe and it hurts me."

"How came there to be a stone in your shoe?" asked the soldier.
 "Because I made a mistake and put on the wrong shoe. They are new out. See this hole. I wish in my hurry I had not forgotten and wore the other pair."

But Violet mistakes sometimes cannot be helped.
 By this time her little foot gave her so much pain that she could think of little else and had to ride on the horse all the way back instead of walking until she untill they reached the lines. As they rode on they came to an army shoe maker and the little girl said:

"Oh there is a pair of little shoes which I am sure will fit me."
 "Perhaps they will," said the soldier. "But you cannot be sure until you have tried them. Oh, you think you would like to watch me send a signal but you cannot be sure of it what is going on over yonder until we have watched those flickering colored lights more carefully."

"I don't know about the shoes Gertrude," she said as she asked the man for them, "but I'm sure I should like to know why all those colored lights are for within the rebel lines."

"Well which will you have?" asked the shoemaker admiring the pretty children in his presence and struck with awe by their nature those shoes, or this pair. I will give either one to you as I have no other pair of children's shoes in the shop."

"Then perhaps I had better have these shoes. Let those lights. I think I can make signals myself till the end of the evening, don't you think you could help me and my sisters Gertrude?"

"You must think for yourself," said Gertrude. "The signals you can make are different from mine, but I can probably catch on."

Violet stood with one shoe on and the other in her hand as she thought over the matter.

"Well Gertrude," she said at last putting on the other new shoe and nitching the old ones in the army store. "I choose your help and will show you how to make the signals. I know what the lights mean. Something is going to be done which is suspicious and I believe it is meant for us at that."

It was not long before they came to the christian lines and the signal was soon started.

"Oh Gertrude," cried Violet as soon as she and her sisters had sent off the first signals. "There is something dark moving over yonder and the air is very disagreeable."

Just before the signals were sent once more Violet's disappointment was very great when the lights suddenly disappeared and no more were seen. Violet and her sisters almost burst into tears.

They realized the outcome and the soldier said to them:
 "The best thing to do is to bear out our bitter disappointment with good humor. The enemy has made his own choice. I am sure and seeing our signals had immediately stopped the lights."

"We will bear it as well as we can," said one of the beautiful little girls wiping her eyes. But their disappointment did not end here. One hour after they were to resume their journey and as Jennie mounted her horse her shoe dropped off and she was unable to find it.

"Why Jennie!" said Gertrude looking at her shoeless foot. "I can't understand why you girls have so much bad luck to day."

"Oh Gertrude," said Jennie as she finally found it. "Our shoes had remained within the christian lines. I hope I shall be wiser another time."

AN ATTEMPT TO A REBEL SPY. A LITTLE GIRL AND HER SISTERS. A SOLDIER'S DISCOVERY.

Oh that night Violet had put out the lamp light so that her sisters could sleep that night and then she went in to stay in a little while and was with general Anson who was in his room looking over a map and event in a way his eyes were still. Violet sat down in the room where her sisters were sleeping was also fast asleep and suddenly turned and didn't know what her eyes were upon his legs at once. There was a strange light in the room and she saw the little girl's girls were sleeping.

Violet's sisters had also been awakened by the light and Jennie thought to herself. "How pleasant it is. It is really as light in those rooms as it is in daytime. I suppose I ought to have a little for the sake of some of the soldiers who like to hear me."

So she went unconscious of any other she began to sing, softly at first, but more loudly until she was crossed by the face that the light was growing brighter and brighter, and was a dazzling light, unlike anything she had ever seen before, too bright to come from a number of electric bulbs or from a gas candle.

"Sometimes general Anson," Vivian looked up from his map to listen.
 "Listen," he said. "I think I hear a noise in the air."
 "It is a noise," said Violet with a smile. "I will go up and see what it is!"

Violet opened the door to her sisters room she was blinded and choked with the smoke of the light. It was so faintly now came the cry and Violet's voice of her sisters while she joined them in a cry of terror. He two rooms adjoining the one her sisters were in were ablaze. In less time than it takes to tell it general Anson and a number of soldiers on a flying up the stairs and the little girls just set them on the top of the stairway and half suffocated by the smoke they were helped down to a place of safety, while general Anson organized a large number of soldiers to come and put the fire which they accomplished and the fire was soon put out. When general Anson went into the blackened room and made a light. There were two ears in Anson's eyes as he made an investigation and found the fire had been set. Not only were guards placed at every window, cellar door and entrance of the building but a force was detailed to find the culprits. But they had escaped. Soon the excitement had died down and everyone thanked God and his blessed mother for the dear little lives which had again been spared them. The poor dog had been with the little girls and had stuck to them to the last and why no one heard his wild barking was a mysterious mystery for the dog had discovered the fire before the little girls had.

It had not been long after when Gertrude Angeline alone out meeting had come across a small little girl who was a runaway child slave. After seeing the little girl met to be afraid she had been able to get the child to come along with her toward the christian lines. The two children were now walking toward the lines through a portion of the forest with the sun striking narrow gleams of silver out of a black pool to the right half frozen over and covered lightly with snow. Gertrude knew this place well. It was a mud hole and she had often shunned this place for any one who got caught in that pool may sink in it and die. She had reached the creek near the river, and Gertrude who went on the "little" and was lifting the little baby girl in order to carry her across the creek. When a dreadful thing happened.

Gertrude saw a ferocious dog bounding toward her with a loose chain in its mouth. In a furious race through the trees, a large bulk of the dog and though falling between two jagged white trunks of trees, its eyes were turned out to the level of the sky. Gertrude went in and against her will, the dog's back no that she almost dropped the baby girl. It was not a moment before the dog was free but where ever it had belonged it was not.

In one swift glance she saw the only chance of escape.
 A long log floated on the water of a hollow ditch one end almost touching the dry ground the other end against a tree. It was half frozen but still water in the center. Believing Believing a mad dog being afraid of water she decided to jump across and if it still followed to climb a tree. The little baby girl had seen the creature now and though she usually was not afraid of any dog this one looked so queer with its bloodshot eyes and its foam frothed mouth that she was frightened and found the dog was coming to bite her because she had run away from her master. She clung to Gertrude trembling so that she nearly toppled her over into the half frozen water and was lost.

"Oh don't let the dog kill or bite me," cried the child's voice.
 Here the little Gertrude Angeline was with able to carry the frightened child over the water to the log was sure to tell her a tale of it, and seeing the dog coming, Gertrude held the child on a low branch. If she only had her wamp so she could have held her but she could not even draw when she had to hold onto the child.
 Yes. The dog was still coming. He was hunting the log blindly. He was rushing recklessly over the logs.

"Hurry, hurry," cried the frightened baby.
 "Hurry, hurry," cried Gertrude. "The dog's caught in the mud. We are saved if we can get out of this."

But the dog's small log bridge sank under the reckless dog and there was no more to be said. He heaved and plunged until he got two men upon the log. He could do no more and roared at his layings. He then stood looking at the children with a vacant stare and seemed to look at them and as Gertrude looked at the mad dog a wonderful thought came to her. Was it really mad or was it only a dog? The dog's face was so fierce and so wild.

"Please don't let the dog kill or bite me," cried the child's voice.
 "Please don't let the dog kill or bite me," cried the child's voice.

"Please don't let the dog kill or bite me," cried the child's voice.
 "Please don't let the dog kill or bite me," cried the child's voice.

"Please don't let the dog kill or bite me," cried the child's voice.
 "Please don't let the dog kill or bite me," cried the child's voice.

"Please don't let the dog kill or bite me," cried the child's voice.
 "Please don't let the dog kill or bite me," cried the child's voice.

"Please don't let the dog kill or bite me," cried the child's voice.
 "Please don't let the dog kill or bite me," cried the child's voice.

she did not like to speak of what she saw her sisters lost as they might think she had eaten too much cake the night before, but another strange thing happened that morning. Her other sisters were preparing for their drilling wash before breakfast, and Violet who had just finished combing her hair and fixing it up in the best beautiful fashion she liked best when she saw a note hanging over the chair in the room a rebel general's uniform.

When she and her sisters came down to breakfast general Hanson noticed the strange look in Violet's face and he asked her what was the matter.

"Why Uncle?" said Violet with a twinkle in her eyes. "Who is the 'Landelian' general who has a prison in your headquarters?"

"Why I have no rebel prisoners!" He said equally as astonished as her sisters were.

"Why?" said Violet. "In my room hanging over a chair is the full dress uniform of a 'Landelian' general, and there are important dispatches in one of the pockets I saw them."

"In there?" said general Hanson more calmly as if there was nothing more remarkable in that. "Well one of my generals disguised as a rebel and with a party of soldiers like himself all disguised went out on a raid and captured some rebel cavalry last night."

Violet and her sisters longed to ask a dozen questions, but they felt they had no time for further if formation as they were in a hurry to eat their breakfast and go and see general Hanson in on a little business on of their own. So the matter was dropped.

"But it must have been a funny occurrence!" she thought but did not say any more words.

On their way along the shore of the river Violet and her sisters had an experience that they shall never forget as long as they live brave as they were. As they were on their way to the general Violet said:

"Look here girls! I've got a swell plan."

"What is it?" said Violet who was always eager for adventures.

"Let's go nearer to the river and watch the opposite shore and see what the enemy are doing under Manley. You shall take the lead Jennie, and I and my sisters will come on behind. But be careful!"

"Let them dare fire upon us," replied Angeline scornfully. "It's a long distance across but we have pistols which will reach them."

"But suppose they pursue us?"

"Oh no they won't. We will back away from the river if they spot us."

So Jennie led the way and they soon came to a jutting part of the cliff at the river's edge which formed a little area of a bay in the river near the shore. The ground round the corner the sand was smooth and not covered with snow and was untrampled.

"This is a good place to watch them," said Jennie.

But they were seen by the enemy. Boom. Boom. Boom. Boom. roared a number of guns. The shells and one exploded above the cliff and rained a shower of rocks down upon the little girls who in their excitement and in their efforts to escape ran across to the other bank or of the bay only to be fired upon by other guns. But the aim was too high and no shells damaged them. Getting out of the range they found themselves in perfect solitude and laughed at the rebels. On all sides there rose steep rock rocks, below were small caves. They for a few minutes explored a cave and then Jennie said:

"Now the ocean tide is the river going out!"

"Let's see!" Violet said for the first time beginning to think it was prudent to retreat their steps. They rushed around toward the cliff or toward the cliff round which they had come into the bay. Not only was the water close up to it, and the tide coming in, but they could yet have escaped, but rebels saw them on shore and tried with shot and main to shoot them down with machine guns.

"Run before they hit us!" Violet shouted in alarm and they set off at full speed.

"CRASH. BANG. Two big shells exploded above them just as they arrived in time and no sooner had they got around the cliff when they saw the water had closed over the narrow passage. They were not only cut off on both sides, but rebels with cannons at the opposite shore was also making ready to fire, and now they could neither advance or retreat. They ran backwards and forwards, with exploding shells raining fragments of broken rocks all about them, and they hoped to find some ledge so that they could climb above high water mark; but the rocks were steep and smooth. They did not fear drowning, for they were good swimmers and could stand the coldest water and they would have swum the flood gathering about them but to wade or swim in the river would be sure death as snipers would surely now them down from the rebel guns. It was not the tide they dreaded. They were under fire, a searching fire, which only the rocky cliff protected them from.

Although they knew it was of no use, they called and shouted, till they were hoarse, and then trying to make an attempt flung a white handkerchief as a truce but the rebels disregarded the flag and fired just the same. As the men indeed purposely fire only little children with cannons. But they heartily wished to destroy them, as those who spotted them knew they were the "Hated virgin girls" who Manley would give any sum for their capture dead or alive and the rebels knew it and strove to kill them. There was only one little foothold, and above that a sort of sloping platform out of range of rebel fire, almost too high to reach.

Had they been there they would have been half under water at high tide just the same.

A cold dry wave of water washed over their ankles where they stood. They rushed to the place where they had noticed the ledge of rock. Jennie knelt down with her hands buried in the cold water.

"Get on my back Jennie, there is a niche higher up for your foot. We will try once more."

She got on, and Jennie slowly rose with her. When Jennie slung upon her shoulder, she then steadied herself against the rocky foot rock, and stood upright. Jennie's feet were on her shoulders. She niche was at her waist, while Jennie felt her feet sinking into the wet sand. Jennie seeing the chance seized her legs tightly.

"Now," he cried desperately. "Hold quite stiff!" and she raised her body bodily till her right hand grasped an upper shelf above her head, and then she hoisted herself with one foot in the niche. Jennie and her sisters watched her wild with excitement, forgetting for the moment their own peril. In several moments she was on the ledge, and in still another moment, she sprang on the top with a cry of joy.

"I'm saved Jennie."

When her other sisters got up to the top of the rock in the same way Jennie said:

"How will you manage to get up? How will you get up?"

The ledge turned to be wider and less sloping than it really looked from below. Jennie and Violet lay down flat on her bell their bellies and stretching their right arm down as far as they could, she cried cheerily:

"Take hold of our hands girls--and we will pull you up."

Jennie clutched her sisters hands, giving at the same time a spring. It was indeed a terrible moment for Jennie felt Jennie and Violet rolling almost over with her weight and had they dropped off the rock they would have fallen thirty feet and probably been killed or injured. Jennie should have let go; but she would not.

Finally with one hand in the niche, and the other hand grasped by Violet, and her wrist grasped by Jennie, she scrambled up the thirty foot rock like a spider; how she could not tell. It was a dangerous climb, a climb that no other girl probably would never have dared, neither any boy, and neither a man unless compelled to do so by the same danger.

What joy was theirs when they landed on the high rocky ledge, and yet they were not saved. They might slip off and fall, and if they did and were lying unconscious below they would be drowned at a moment. The wind was rising, and every moment the waves of the bay not frozen on account of the water being salt grew rougher and rougher. The ledge was soon flooded and they had to stand in water, and every time they moved their feet would slip. Finally, while holding tight against the ledge a big wave lifted them both off into the river, and flourishing about desperately they had to make for shore. Fortunately by the means of the foam the waves made the little girls were not seen in the water by the rebels until they were finally tossed ashore, and then they were knocked unconscious by a dreadful explosion near them. Then the next thing they remembered opening their eyes and finding themselves lying in their own beds at Hanson's headquarters. Well, their adventure was over and neither of them had been killed or injured; but for days and days afterwards and months afterwards it was the talk of the army, and general Hanson used to say:

"Those little girls are prettier than any fairy or child I ever seen in pictures, or any real children, and your very forms and looks seem to betray boldness, fragility, and cowardice but one thing I can say, that nevertheless those little girls dare anything that no man would dare face. I'm afraid your braveness, if simply recklessness, and you will go through something some day that will surprise the world and make you sorry so I warn you please be careful."

At the same time Violet and her sisters had their thrilling adventure by the river shore Jennie's nurse had been while returning on a scouting tour with several soldiers. She had went into her own small place on the outskirts of the Christian lines and was herself getting dinner for though a little girl she could cook many things. In the broad fire place she had made a roaring fire to warm the place while her men friends went out to get some more wood. The fire sang in the big chimney and she shut out the soft sound of the driving snow.

A great big wooden bar of green length stretched from side to side or from one side of the chimney to the other, holding sixteen big hooks for pots and other things. From these were swung the kettles in which the dinner she was preparing for her men friends was cooking. On one kettle corn and beans were simmering together, high up above the blaze. A little lower down to the right hung the meat pot, with its boiling beef, while still lower to the left dined and biled the plum pudding she also made. As it was not much occupied by her, and only as a side house there was little furniture in the room. Two wooden settles with high backs and hard narrow seats stood before the sherry fire. A large square oak chest stood by the window and on the other side of the room was the small dresser with pewter dishes. The low room with its heavy rafters was indeed bare and cheerless, but to Jennie's nurse it was shelter and a place for rest before going back to the main lines. She sang happily as she worked, looking up and then at the tall clock which she had found in the place the first day she took possession, and which she had started going. How fine it was to tell time without going out of doors like she used to elsewhere in the army.

The old Army sundial was better than nothing, but she did not see or understand how she could have lived without a clock. Surely she began to think to herself: "Those followers of mine are very long getting that wood. They must be either blocked by the snow, or have a hard time finding wood."

She went across the room and pressed her pretty face again against the tiny window pane, thick with frost.

"Thank God they are coming," she said with a sigh of relief. "I see something blurry through the snow fog down the road and it must be them, all right."

Jennie was glad that she had dinner ready for them. She now laid the round table with the coarse linen cloth, and put the cups, plates, salt cellars or salt shakers, knives forks and spoons and the sugar bowl in their places. By and by as she looked out of the window again, she sank back in sudden terror and excitement and instinctively felt for her little gun. Coming up the path and so near the house that she could see them plainly, were four squadrons of the fierce "Wheeler" gladiolians in their terrible black hoods and feathered hats and long overcoats.

What could she do. What was a simple wooden bolt against these cruel "gladiolians"? Jennie knowing she could not resist so many even with her pistol, and all the ammunition she had cast one frightened glance around the kitchen. There was no way of escape! Oh how loudly her little heart was beating. She then thought of the oak chest, and got into it, and let down the lid, but finding she was unable to breathe under that great lid she struggled hard and got it open and was out looking for a new place to hide. Her despairing eyes then fell upon the tall clock. She sprang across the kitchen, pulled open the door, took off the heavy weights, and staggered with them to the cupboard. When she crept quickly into the hollow case, and shut the door as closely as she could. It was not a minute too soon. The gladiolians who stopped and dismounted were already scrapping the snow off the windows that they might look in, and one of them started hammering at the door demanding admittance. When the pounding ceased, and there was a moment of quiet. When she heard them at the outer door. It seemed to her only a little while before she saw thirteen gladiolians in the room, the rest remaining outside. Soon she heard the chest lid fall with a slam, and a door open into the inner room. The men were talking excitedly.

"Perhaps they are looking at the clock now," thought Jennie's heart, shivering with fear and drawing her gun to shoot in case of necessity. "I'm glad I'm so little. And I'm glad those two holes in the back let in some air. It's lucky I did not put in the screws as I was going to do. Oh I wish my companions would be here with a force."

There was all of a sudden a roar of pistolry outside, and simultaneously there was a rush and a scuffle outside and a confused shout of:

"Who, stand still you rascally gladiolians. You are prisoners. Jennie where are you. We are here with a party of soldiers come to join you. We have the rebels prisoners for they surrendered. Don't be afraid. Where's the child." "If you gladiolians—"

And then without a word of warning out of the clock casketed Jennie in a little white heap. When she dared to open her eyes, she was in the arms of one of the soldiers. The rebels were gone having been led away to the lines as prisoners.

"Is the dinner safe?" asked Jennie sitting up very straight.

"Yes Jennie it is," said the soldier gravely. "And so thank God so are you."

THE FRIGHTFUL BATTLE OF PHANTON OF THUMBELINA A.

During the time that Gertrude Angeline and her friends were looking for violet and her sisters or at least attempting to enter the city to rescue them the reckless whim of an Angelinian officer on board of a warship came near causing the destruction of a whole christian fleet during the battle of Phanton in which the rebel seaborde fortification of Thumbelina was bombarded by ten thousand five hundred Angelinian and Abissinian warships and which not only caused a woeing war of the world but whose din came near robbing the whole earth of its wits.

It was the intent ion of Admiral Thomas to try and capture this fortress erected by the rebels themselves and which though not belonging to the gladiolians fortifications had been copied by the rebels and was equally as strong, a mile long and like tall breastworks twenty feet high and armed with 10,000 great cannons.

The admiral had on board his flagship two young officers who were too brave and who were utterly reckless and were overwilling to die rather than see a fight he was by the rebels. One was Captain Epaphus Johnson and another Lieutenant Zeussar Apollo.

During the time the fleets had steamed down the gladiolian River up its mouth toward the great rebel fortress ten miles from portress Cederline the two were boasting together, each of their own bravery, and the captain angry at the lieutenants fine story dared the lieutenant go make an attempt to run past Fort Gertrude Angeline.

Full of rage and much humiliation Apollo went to the commander of the dreadnaught where he was in conference with his other officers and asked when the attack on the rebel fortress was going to be made.

"As soon as we can arrive there," said the Admiral. "If you have any doubt we can calculate the distance and from that we can ascertain."

They had arrived there however sooner than was expected and the attack had at once been started and in response, portress, Mays and Thumbelina and Gertrude Angeline responded to the tremendous cannonade. The sky at night time during the conflict was so brilliantly lighted with shell flashes that such harrowing scenes like lightning made a great display and all colored lights flashed along the points of the also active shore batteries and so many colored lights were seen that they were like gems moving back and forth like frozen fire. On the shore blazed the flashes of mighty and tremendous explosions, and the sky was dazed with the light of conflagrations. Some of the sailors of the fleet could hardly bear the radiance and had to wear blue or green glasses to keep going. At that time also blazed the blinding light enveloped even androan which was at that time also burning. The Admiral Thomas who was clothed in a purple uniform beheld the scene and climbing in the rigging had a narrow escape when a solid shot struck the mast and brought it down with a crash tearing the rigging and almost making him fall a hundred feet to the decks below. The mighty walls of portress Gertrude defending Thumbelina was wreathed in sheets of flame and smoke from cannons, the uproar was a perfect volcano of flame and din a hundredfold and several ships being already damaged dropped back. It was becoming one of the most titanic sea fights or fights on the water the world ever witnessed. The explosions shattered the air with flash and din towered high above the smoke clouds of the conflagrations, and geyers of water spouted in thousands per minute all about the ships. In one glance it was seen that a great number of ships had already been disabled, ten transports were on fire, and the decks strewn with many dead and wounded and the water of the rivers mouth was now cased in floating wreckage.

At it was the purpose of Admiral Thomas to make an attempt to run past screaming Gertrude Angeline Lieutenant Apollo who heard the engineer of the flag ship was killed in the action cried out to the admiral:

"Please let me drive the engines for you. I'm an engineer as well."

For an instant the great admiral face looked clouded.

"Choose again my child," said he amid the dreadful uproar of the battle. "Thou art only a young man who never handled those engines, and this task is only for expert engines and I alone could not dare to run those engines. The way up that river is past dangerous submarines, rebel monitors and Herrmanns and mines and full of terrors, both for the whole fleet, and all the marines on the ships and the transports would have to be left behind as being wooden ships they could not even go near the bombardment. Be wise lieutenant and choose again. You can only command the marines."

And therewith he warned the lieutenant of all the dangers that beset the way, the great gauntlet of guns the ships will have to pass, the maiming disfigurement of the uproar that will follow when all guns on both sides let loose in final fury, the fierce conflagrations on the fire ships that will be sent against the fleet, and the sinking of many ships that may happen, and as he was not an expert at engineering it was only too risky to take the chance. But these counsels only made the reckless boy more eager to win the honor of such an enterprise as he longed to defy his superior the captain and a attempt to take the dare that he offered.

"I will take care, only let me go and attempt it," he said. "I'd rather die than see the fleet repulsed."

Already portress Aurora had thrown forth its own stream of deadly shells and explosives to help in repelling the sea attack of the christian warships and as he started to operate the machinery Apollo looked with great exultation at the whirling wheels and other works of the machinery whose lord he was for the day. Outside as the ships were speeding on pouring tremendous broadsides, the uproar had become wild and mortal, and the din from the forts, and the crash of explosions sounded as if the planets were destroying each other in a wild untamed conflict of their own. As the young officer stood by operating the machinery he found that he could hardly endure the terrible din of the noise outside, and then the admiral gave him orders what to do.

"Have the engine running so the ship will follow down the river at right ahead, and never allow it to run so that the rudder will cause the wheelman to loose control and allow the ship to turn out of its course. Do not run the engine too fast or too slow, and for heavens sake keep cool and collected for the battle outside is so fierce now that it seems from the noise as if earth and heavens were blown blowing to nith nothing. God and His blessed Mother is being prayed to constantly by every one as they alone know whatever evil is to come from the results of this attack. Yet if your heart fails you, as I fear notify me, and I will send a man down to relieve you as I am wont to do."

But the young reckless lieutenant held his choice and took full charge. temporary farewell. He took his place in the engine room and took full charge. As the flagship started forward taking the lead to run past furious Gertrude Angeline the firemen looked bewildered wondering the meaning of the strange increase in the roar of guns on both sides, the shaking of the ship and turned their wild terrified eyes upon the young lieutenant to his secret foreboding, and whispered to one another that it was madness to pass the rebel forts.

This man to them was no master engineer, but a mere lad. Soon from the din itself and the fierce heat in the engine room the young lieutenant was blind with dizziness and bewilderment. As he received an order to run the machinery a little faster he did so and the ship firing like mad with its guns redoubled its speed, seemingly wild with new liberty. Before he knew what was up the din of firing was enough to startle the constellations in the sky themselves, and the hissing and screaming of shells, grape, and bombs, was like a typhoon let loose all over. It seemed as if the whole world was on fire. One ship went down already, the flagship had been struck by shots that made it go this shake this way and that if as if in a tempest, and the heavens itself seemed full of terror. Up far above the clouds the shells flashed and thundered in a bewildering drum drum roar that was dreadful and men on board the ships were excited and terrified by the monsters on the river they had never encountered before, ships like floating rams three thousand feet long, and rushing past like gigantic titans pouring broadsides, and fire rafts went against them, submarines launched torpedoes, and the ships had to begin a retreat to pass again the guns of Gertrude Angeline whose ramparts looked like thunderclouds from the sheet lighting from rows upon rows of thundering cannons. Great rivers of flame seemed to shoot along the ramparts of Thumbl Thumblin and also from Maya, and batteries on shore seemed to be consumed in their flashes. The ships hurling fire bombs caused conflagrations that would have caused whole harvests to perish like a moth singed in a candle flame, but the fleet for the time was getting the worse of it. Seemingly millions of rockets flared in the sky from the direction of the rebel shores, roman candles, flared, red lights shone bright ly, and lights of all kinds, fourth of July sparklers seemed to also appear and the scene was a grandeur that was enough to startle the Gods themselves.

A solid shot had crashed through the engine room and every one in there including the young lieutenant was wounded, and in vain he called and yelled for help as he was unable to manage the engine but amid the din no one heard him and the flag ship was running toward one of the forts. The Admiral having his decks strewn with wreckage, with the cabins shot to pieces realized the scene and had to send down men to take charge of the engine. As in a hen hedicious dream, it appeared as if the earth, his own beautiful home, and all the men, were parched by the fires of this mad bombardment, and blackening beneath him, some sections of yorma Catherine was glowing with conflagrations, the glare from midrean was at its height, and it seemed as if the ground itself cracked open, and the sea was shrinking from the shore, something like water nymphs seemed to be left gasping like bright fishes, the waters of the river swarmed with wreckage and dead fishes of all kinds, the dryads shrank, and tried to cover themselves from the scorching heat of flaming fire rafts and it seemed as if the poor earth herself lifted her withered face in a last desperate prayer to God to save her if he might.

While Admiral Thomas was calling all his officers on board the flagship to witness that there was no other scene of safety than to fight his way desperately through the gauntlet a great explosion on shore occurred that looked like a mighty volcanic outburst, and flaming wreckage shot high hundreds of feet in the air and the wreckage then fell a flame like shooting stars. It was an explosion among one of the rebel shore batteries and it was doubtless that many lives were lost.

A great rebel Merrimac was rushing through the waters of the warships. The rebel commander of the merriam had been late in receding, relieving his command however and a furiously advancing Angeline monitor and Merrimac dashed into sight just right ahead, and in an instant there was a terrific collision of warships and the merriam. A shrieking wild roar of guns, and ships and merriams disabled together by the broadsides went down with flags flying and fighting together. The disaster could have been averted if the order had been given to the merriam commander on time.

During the time of the fleets actions the Angeline transports still further down had launched an immense number of troops to try and take Thumblin by the rear. So simultaneous to the sea attack a great battle for the possession of the mainland on land was on. One immense column after another of Abbeasians, and Angelines under a terrific fire from glandelinian redoubts, and from sailents in the woods, and from the guns of the rear portion of the fort had been precipitated with savage violence for eighteen mortal hours on the enemy posted along the ridge of a hill on the Maya and Red riding Wood Positions.

The Ganderella works were also heavily assaulted and the Angelines advanced in the face of a fire from a million muskets added by one thousand machine guns.

The winter sun was sinking to the west, reinforcements for the obnoxious Wheeler defenders were already in sight, it was necessary for general Kane in command of the marines to carry the insurgents positions with one final charge, or everything would be lost. A powerful corps had been summoned under general Meldon and if it came up in season all would yet be well, and once the position was captured all would be well. The great christian general, confident of its arrival formed his reserve into an attacking column, and when the reinforcements arrived ordered them to charge the enemy and rushed forward with them behind the attacking columns. A withering fire from rebel rifles, and machine guns met them. The whole column was torn to pieces, Kane and ten officers were killed, the right of the assault being counter charged failed to appear to join in, and the assault was lost. The poor general Kane died a prisoner in port Thumblin because the rebel as counter assault had destroyed his columns.

One war correspondent during the battle on land had witnessed during the conflict in particular one of the most resolute and desperate hand to hand encounters in his life. It occurred during the final charge of the Nationals against the wheeler glandelinians who defended the Ganderella sailent like works. In a statement when he came to general Hanson and before violet and her sisters was thus: [ ]

"That day your excellency I heard on the seaboard of the river and all the following night a tremendous roar of many thousands of guns that shook the earth and the morning later the roar having redoubled I was surprised to see immense forces in blue or pale purple and red moving against the rebel positions to the rear of fortress Thumblin. I watched the scene in excitement and saw a great many assaults repulsed and whole lines torn and jagged but later that evening I had been much closer to the scene after the main assault had passed and through the smoke of the fierce firing which had not settled yet I had went out to an abandoned sailent where a number of bullet torn battle flags still floated defiantly to the breeze and not far away I observed something like two men one in the red uniform, the other much larger with the bobbed hair of like a little girl, fiercely contending with one another in a bayonet duel. Having once got together in this clash they never stopped or retreated, but struggled one trying to disarm the other, while appeared two other men who were wrestling like titans and rolled about incessantly punching each other, and cursing and wearing together and defying one another like children so in a fight. Looking further, but being behind a rock so not to be exposed to a fierce musketry fire going on, I was surprised to see when the smoke slightly life lifted to find that the upper section of Ganderella works and its sides was fairly covered with such combatants, that it was not a single duel, but a fierce hand to hand bellum, a war upon those very works between two races of Angelineans, the red and purple pitted against the immense swarm of gray and light blue, and frequently two or three red and purple ones to one gray. The rebel yell was fierce and terrific and reminded me of the yelling roar of a raging tornado passing by. The legions of these fierce fighters covered all of the whole stretch of works and extended over a certain small fortified hill and even the whole stretch of works and vales and lanes were packed with the fighters, surging to and fro across a meadow and vales and lanes were packed with the fighters, and the works were strewn thick with dead and dying, both purple and red and gray.

Of course the hand to hand conflict lasted only five minutes but I witnessed conflicts which takes me a very long time to relate. It was the only and first battle up to this time I had ever witnessed at such close quarters, the only battlefield I have ever trod while the battle was raging and not receive no injuries or risk capture by the insurgents, indeed a bloody battle of this horrible infernal war; capture by the Angelineans on one side, fighting and on the other side the Angelineans the rebels called glandelinians or imperialists or Angelinean Confederates on the other.

The most exciting scene I witnessed was the battle flags of both sides torn like the rags of a bigger girl waving back and forth in that inferno of close conflict, and on every side for those five minutes they were engaged in deadly conflict. And yet the rebel yell of the Wheeler glandelinians as such they appeared made it hardly able for me to hear the noise of other firing except the dreadful distant artillery storm, and I never saw any of human soldiers fight for that short time more resolutely and more desperately. I watch two soldiers one a private who was more Angelinean and a rebel officer looked in each others embraces and if it had not been for their wives I could have sworn from their appearances that they were little boys. A little boy and girl fighting together, the boy trying to choke the girl and the boy striving desperately to get his pistol into readiness so he could shoot his boy assailant. They fought so desperately that I felt sure that were prepared to fight till the sun went down or till their lives went out, but soon the appearing girl champion had fastened himself like a vise to his adversary's front, and through all the tumbings on that field for that minute never for an instant ceased to struggle for the possession of that gun, having once or twice made the pistol go off without any harm done, while the seemingly girl soldier danced the Angelinean private, from side to side, and as I saw on looking nearer, had already directed him of an ear, had given him a back eye, knocked out a whole front row of teeth, had pulled a lock of hair from his hair head, and had wounded him in the shoulder, and almost broken his wrist. Still they fought with more sore pertinacity than bulldogs. Neither manifested the least disposition to give up, and once when apart they only rushed one another and again closed. It was evident that their battle cry was 'Gander or Die'.

In the meantime there came along through the sea of smoke a single red uniformed soldier on the hilly portion of the sailent, evidently full of excitement with bayonet at the level, who had either dispatched his rebel foe or had not yet taken part in the tremendous hand to hand battle (probably the latter) for he was not wounded in the least or had no turn uniform. Or perchance he was some thing like Achilles, who had nourished his wrath apart, and had no way come to avenge or rescue his Patroclus. He saw this unequal combat—for the rebel soldier was a giant compared to the Angelinean fighting him—he drew near with more rapid pace, till he stood on his guard within a few feet of the combatants, when watching his opportunity he with leveled gun sprang upon the rebel warrior with the intention of running him through, but the second red coat recovered his gun and snatched the gun from his hand. But the rebel officer had his sabre drawn and knocked thrust his bayonet near the foot of the rebel captain's right forearm, leaving the foe to slay among his own members, and so there were three men united for life or death, as if a new kind of attraction attraction had been invented which puts all other looks and cements to shame.

I should have not wondered by this time to find that they had their respective generals, and even their respective musical bands stationed beyond range of firing, and both sides playing their national airs the while to excite the slow, and cheer the combatants. I myself was excited and even scared somewhat, for once in a while sharpshooters, or bombs burst dangerously near where I was watching the scene, and the smell of powder made my eyes water like the fumes of onions, and the more you could think of it the more I was excited, and certainly there was not a fight probably ever recorded in world history, or at Gettysburg at least, probably any fight in any country of the world that would bear a moments comparison with this, whether for the frightful numbers engaged in it, or for the heroism and patriotism displayed. Each tried to stab with bayonets, shots were fired point blank, and muskets and rifled rifles and pistols were used as clubs, and those unarmed threw stones and snowballs at each other, not soft snowballs, but those with rocks in it. For numbers and for courage this single hand to hand fight though only lasting five minutes had the whole battles of Waterloo, Dresden, Waterloo, and Leipzig combined a simple minute's encounter fight. Two killed on the Patriot side and the officer Luther, severely wounded. Why here every soldier of both sides at Gettysburg works was a perfect putrid. "Fire for gods sake fire" and hundreds of thousands shared the fate of Dan Davis and General. There was not one firing there for the time being. I have no doubt it was the principal work they fought for, the Angelians striving to take it and the rebels repelling the assault, and the result of this tremendous battle on both land and sea will probably be as important to those whom it concerns as those of Gettysburg at least.

The conflict with the rebel officer however and the two Abyssinian killans was a deathstruggle. Watching the first mentioned red coat I saw that though he was still assiduously slashing at the near foreleg of his wounded enemy having severed some of the rebels fingers on the left hand, his own breast was almost torn away in the tussel exposing what vitals he had there to the gaze of the rebel warrior warrior, whose breastplate was apparently unharmed, and the eyes of the sufferer shone with ferocity such as war and excitement of battle could only excite.

They struggle half a minute longer and when I looked again the rebel soldier had severed one of the arms of each of his foes from their bodies, and still struggling the same arms were on either side of him like ghastly thro' thropies at a mans saddlebow, the two combatants still apparently fixed to him as closely as ever. He was endeavoring with feeble & feeble struggles, being without fingers and with only the remnant of a leg, and I knew not how many other wounds to free himself of them, which at length after half a minute more he accomplished. He then being free of his enemies arms crawled along the ground in that crippled state. Whether he finally survived the combat, I do not know for the rebels relieving reinforcements were pressing the Angelians back with force and as a batch of rebels were approaching toward my hiding place with the devil in their very eyes I hast I hastily retreated from tree to tree. They saw me and fired and then perished but I managed to escape. Nevertheless if that rebel officer did survive his wounds I think nevertheless that he would not be worth much to himself thereafter and would be in no condition to work or earn a living. I never learned which side in that struggle on land was victorious but I have felt for the rest of the day and night as if I had my feelings excited and my harrowed by witnessing the terrible struggle, the ferocity and carnage of a human battle right within a hundred feet from where I was hiding, thirty five bullets had struck the rock behind which I had been hiding and yet I escaped those random random shots without being wounded myself and from my pursuers also.

A soldier who was an Angelinian officer lay wounded on that hard fought land side of the battle field, the roar of the land battle having died away but still the roar of the sea conflict could be heard still more plainly. Out on the a landside he rested in the deadly deadly stillness of the land aftermath of the bloody land conflict. On the land side not a single sound was heard as he lay there in suffering, sorely afflicted and even speechless, but the shriek of the Angelinian wounded, the blasphemies of the rebel wounded, and the sighs of the countless dying soul as it escaped from the tumult of earth into the unspeakable peace of the heavens was heard. Off over the bloody field of Gettysburg that following night flickered thousands of lanterns, of men and army ser surgeons with the many litter bearers, searching at the risk of being under fire that they might take away the wounded or those whose lives could probably be saved, and leave in heart rending sorrow and dismay those who were doomed to die of mortal shell raked wounds, with pleading eyes through the darkness pierced occasionally by the distant glow of scores of gigantic conflagrations.

This poor soldier with his shell torn body, and with a bullet hole in his cheek, and breast, watched unable from the pain and stiffness to turn or speak as some of the distant lights from the lanterns drew nearer and nearer toward him. At last a bright light flared into his face, and after two men came up with a stretcher, he was followed by a ser surgeon, with a kindly whispered face and crimsoned uniform, who bent over him, looked at him closely, he hesitated a moment, shook his head, issued an order to the men, and then strode sadly and slowly away and was gone, leaving the poor wounded soldier alone with death and sorrow. He watched sorrowfully and in patience and in agony as they went on from one part of the vast battle field to another and then he groaned as he saw a shell flare with its burst overhead and then bang like the loudest thunder crash and shake the air with the din.....

A SECOND ISSUE FOR THE BATTLE OF GETTYSBURG. FRIGHTFUL CARNAGE. AGAIN IMPULSED WITH GREAT LOSS. DEATH OF ADMIRAL THOMAS. THE GENERAL ACTION OF THE FLEET, AND THE GENERAL OPPOSITION OF THE REBEL SUBMARINES AND MONITORS. FORTRESS THUNDERBOLT TAKEN. ONLY TO BE TAKEN. END OF FIRST MOST FRIGHTFUL BATTLE OF THE WAR.

Queen and... bending probably with tears in his own eyes... until the night passed mailed to the cross on ebbing life and held on the staunch until the night passed away and the sun rose through the rift of snow clouds and shone down on the brave mans heart and blurred in his glistening eyes, and cheated his own wicked enemies of one more christian victim.

I should have not wondered by this time to find that they had their respective generals, and even their respective musical bands stationed beyond range of firing, and both sides playing their national airs the while to excite the slow, and cheer the combatants. I myself was excited and even scared somewhat, for once in a while sharpshoot, or bombs burst dangerously near where I was watching the scene, and the smell of powder made my eyes water like the fumes of onions, and the more you could think of it the more I was not excited, and certainly there was no more you could ever recorded in world history, or of any war.

...hesitated a moment, and then strode sadly and slowly away watching sorrowfully and in patience and in agony as they went on from one part of the vast battle field to another and then he groaned as he saw a shell flare with its burst overhead and then bang like the loudest thunder crash and shake the air with the din.....

Finally another surgeon approached the same wounded soldier and bent over him. This surgeon was alone and wore the uniform of an Angelinian colonel.

After some hesitation he said to himself but out to it!
"I believe if this poor sergeant who is so badly wounded lives till sunrise to-morrow morning he will have full chances for recovery."

And he also left him, not to death as supposed, but with full hope, and all that horrible night long those words fell into his heart, as the snow fell from the all clouds upon his face and lips (he doctor having wrapped him up around in a dozen warm blankets)

"If I live till sunrise, I will surely recover."

He turned his weary head slowly for his cheek felt painful and numb, to the eastward, and waited for the coming of day. At last to his surprise the glow of some distant fire began to go out, and the snow pellets still falling tinged his pallid face with feeling, he watching the white snowflakes falling all around him and feared if it grew to a snow storm he would be buried with the rest of the countless dead. He then thought of life, its hopes and ambitions, its sweetness and its raptures, and of his past sins, and he fortified his soul against all feeling of despair until the snowfall had subsided somewhat and was proving only to be a heavy snowdrift. Already it was half past nine o'clock that evening. He saw on the whiteness of the snow covered ground strange objects still moving about, some went slowly down a hill in their slow descent, and he began to feel that his life was slowly ebbing away, and his heart was faltering, and he needed stronger stimulants to make him stand the final desperate struggle until the end of that horrible night had come. He first thought of his far off beautiful home in sunny Angelina where it is always summer, the blessed home, the blessed house, resting in the tranquil peace with the Angelinian roses and Geraniums climbing to its door, and the palms and other trees whispering to its windows, and drowsing in the tropical Angelinian sunshine, the beautiful orchards, and the little brooks, and beautiful lake near by, and the Krainis river half a mile away running like a wide silver or blue ribbon through the country and of the beautiful forests near by. When he tried to recount the number of sins he may have committed and was happy to remember he never committed a mortal sin in his life.

"If I only I will recover at the break of day I'll live, and I shall have the happiness of seeing it again. I shall walk down the beautiful shady lane, shall open the battered gate, and the Angelinian birds, birds of paradise will call to me from the crooked, and I shall drink again at the old I now mossy spring, or go sailing down the beautiful river."

And then he thought of his beautiful wife, so gentle and loving, and almost like the blessed mother of god herself in nature and modesty and generosity, the beautiful wife who had come from the neighboring farmhouse near his beautiful home in the town or city of Angelina and put her hand shyly in his and brought sweetness to his life, and the light to his home and all he loved. Now he wished the cruel war had not come.

"If I will recover by morning and shall live despite my wounds, I shall have the happiness of looking once more into her deep and loving eyes, and press her golden head once more to my aching breast and say!

"My dear I'm home again!"
And he thought of his poor dear old father, patient in prayer, in sorrow over the departure of his son that sad day, bending lower and lower every day, more from sorrow than old age. Then he thought to himself if he could only recover indeed and be able to live despite his horrible wounds he would have the chance to see his dear and loving father again, and wind his strong arm about his feeble sorrowful parent, and his hands would rest upon his sons poor wounded head, while the unspeakable healing of his blessings would fall into his heart. And he thought of his own dear little unhappy children, that used to clamber on his knees and tangle their little innocent hands into his own heart-strings, making to him such music as the world shall not equal, or probably heaven itself surpass. If he could only recover and live through the horrors of the battle of Gettysburg his poor dear little children in sorrow over the going away of their father should again find his parched lips with their warm mouths, and their little fingers shall run once more over his face.

"Oh god, and Blessed mother!" He sobbed, "for your own sake, and for your agony on the Cross and You Dear mother Your own sorrowful mysteries, have pity on these prayers."

And then with tears in his eyes he thought of his poor old mother who hiding her gnawing sorrow gathered those sad children about her, breathed her old heart afresh in their brightness, and attuned her old lips anew to their pleadings and quae questioning. "Will papa ever come home again?" till she might live till her big boy came home from war. If he could only recover from his wounds he could see her again, and he could have the chance once more to rest his head at his old place on her knees and weep away all memory of this desolate night.

"And the Merciful Loving Son of god, touched at the pleadings of his queen and Blessed Mother and probably all His Saints, He who had died for men, bending probably with tears in his own eyes from the stars put the hand that had been nailed to the cross on ebbing life and held on the staunch until the night passed away and the sun rose through the rift of snow clouds and shone down in the brave man's heart and blurred in his glistening eyes, and cheated his own wicked enemies of one more christian victim.

A SECOND ISSUE FOR UNDERWATER. FRIGHTFUL CARNAGE.
AGAIN REPULSED WITH GREAT LOSS.
DEATH OF ADMIRAL THOMAS.
THE GENERAL ACTION OF THE FLEET, AND THE OPPOSITION OF THE REBEL OUTBOATS AND MONITORS.
FORTRESS THUNDERBOLTS TAKEN ONLY TO BE REBORN. END OF BATTLE..

WAS LARRY, the next morning a furious onslaught was made by fresh troops landed from the transports in an effort to carry the Generalalla fortified works once more.

At eleven thirty o'clock while on the seaboard the artillery hurricane still continued an assaultive made by three double lines under general Napoleon Nagode. The rebels stood for four hours. Here their rifle fire for that time swept everything before it, branches of trees crashed down under the shell fire from the advanced rebel position, but finally it was carried. Thirteen christian generals fell in that struggle and many troops were decimated but the frontal works was won, better success than yesterday. At the moment the a yelling

AngloIndian insurgents drew back the christian general started up. We saw the plateau of generalalla works laid bare immediately, and the front of the whole rebel army disappear in a smoke cloud which rolled and surged out in thick wreaths which almost hid the snow and distant trees. It rained behind the main works, but kept concealed while its artillery put in a careplitting barrage of shells which made the region a "no Mans land."

the Christian general half assed half arose in his stirrups. The flash of expected victory now passed into his eyes! He felt sure the whole rebel line under general Mayton had been hurled back through the forests of Red Riding Hood and partly destroyed before it reached the Genderralla works.

He felt sure now it was the final overthrow of the rebel army there by Angelinia, the hope of the capture of Thumbeleinia by land. So generals Greasy, Poitiers, La Melpet and Ramillies were sent forth with their divisions to storm the main rebel redoubt hoping these to carry the position while general Maro was wiping out the rebel line under Marengo. There was soon an astounding roar of musketry, cannon, and mylonic noise from machine guns, and soon back came the divisions with half their numbers gone and their leaders and every regimental commander, and brigadier officer down killed or wounded. The main general then contemplating with horror this terrible turn of fortune, swept his glasses for the last time over every point of "Go Man's Land. His officers and other generals on horseback waiting with their immense commands with grounded arms looked up to him with a sort of worry on their faces. The general was reflecting, he was examining every slope of the Genderralla positions of the rebel lines, noting the ascents, scrutinizing the smoke wreathed portions of the tops of trees, the square fields, over which a storm of shells were bursting with a drum drum roar, the footpaths, and seemed to count every bush. All these were under fire either from rifles or cannons. He looked for some time at the Genderrallian barricades all along the fields in front of the worlds two lines of immense ashia thirty feet high all of trees, and woodwork, and machinery, and cotton looms, barbed wires, broken fragments of glass, bayonets, and all other implements and sarrage, also armed with machine guns, that in front of a railroad line above La Palma gun armed 5 with two hundred cannon, which alone of all the Genderrallian artillery rode upon the bottom of the field of battle, and the abatis stretched along the Mic-Hollerster and Pandora railroad line, where glinted the heavy guns of the wheeler and Munchkin rebel infantry and artillery men and of Genderrallian brigades. Behind was a long line of freight and passenger cars loaded with explosives to be fired with batt eries in case the position was carried, whose explosions would destroy any force carrying the works. He noticed near that almost unassailable b barricade barricade the old Church in honor of St Nicholas or Santa Claus, painted red, which was at the corner of Andean Grossroad. He then with a sorrowful face bent over and spoke in an undertone to general Francis L. Lacoster. The general made a negative sign of the head probably suspicious. The general then rose up and reflected. Can it be possible that the main line of Angelinian rebels had fallen back. If so why were all their cannons thundering enough to make the devil out of hell, and shake the very air and why was the line of works so like many blast furnaces with the musketry fire, and so walled in smoke of artillery and musketry. It seemed to him it only remained to complete this repulse for a tryout by a last crushing charge. General Napoleon turned abruptly to his generals sent off a courier at full full speed to general Pariser to announce he felt sure the battle of Genderralla was won.

General Peytonia drew his sword and placed himself at the head of the immense cavalry force of the Gonsentianians and as soon as the infantry went forward in the face of the rebel storm the numerous squadrons began to move to cover the grand and final charge. When was seen the most fearful sight of the first year of the war for cavalry movements... All this christian cavalry, with sabres drawn, banners waving, and trumpets and bugles sounding, and drums booming and rolling, and bands playing formed in column by division descending with an even movement, and as one man fared the crushing followed the crushing infantry line of twice the length and opened a thousand breeches... A odd numerical coin coincidence—twenty six immense christian squadrons, were to be relieved with the help of their own infantry the charge of the christian infantry supported by christian artillery, and to relieve these twenty six christian cavalry squadrons of cavalry. Behind the crest of the Genslerella works, under cover of the twenty five masked batteries, the Zimmermanburg, gorgolia, and wheeler rebel infantry formed in an immense wedge like line, while the other infantry in front of the abatis formed into immense squares, fourteen in number supported by their wall of artillery fire, two immense battalions to the square, and upon two immense lines—seven or eight on the first, and six or more on the second—with musket at a ready, and eye upon their enemies, waiting calm, silent, and immovable. They could not on account of the thick smoke of shell explosions see the oncoming christian infn or infantry or supporting cav cavalry behind them, and the onrushing Angolians could not see them. They heard the increasing sound of many countless feet and the roar of the hoofs of three million five thousand horses, the alternate and measured striking of their hoofs at full breakneck trot or gallop, the rattling of the Angolian cuirasses, the clicking of the countless sabres and a sort of hellish fierce roar of the coming host amid the din of cannons and exploding shells and shrapnell and the hiss of grape and canister. There was a moment of fearful uproar of yells like a million demons let loose; then suddenly a long line of infantry passed through the smoke with waving flags and brandished rifles appeared almost above the crest of Genslerella two hundred feet in front of the abatis, with b bayonets at the ready, with trumpets, and bugles, and waving standards of all kinds and colors, and six million faces with mustaches, or whiskers or plainly shaved foreheads, crying—
d—m—t—h—l—t—slaves—mur—murrah for their freedom.

"On to Ivanlakky down with child slavery," hurri hurrah for their freedom." On to from behind came at a mighty thunderous roar debouched the immense christian cawery and the din and noise, from yel yell, pandemonium of shells, and cannons and crashing of musketry was like the outbreak of a thousand earthquakes and ten thousand volcanic eruptions at one time. The infantry lines received a murderous withering fire, and within ten minutes, the torn and jagged columns reached the abatis and were met by an a fierce machine gun and rifle fire that withered the whole front line, and crushed the rear portion. All was wild confusion, and those who fell not, dropped flat, or jumped behind trees and rocks, and behind snow banks, and returned the fire filling the battle with dead and wounded rebels.

Finally the second line of infantry came up, cut their way through the abatis and almost carried the works, when there was a roar like a thrillion cannon and the whole line of ears filled with explosives went up into a flame flaring arch and the survivors of the gendallians drew back leaving their mangled mountains of dead and wounded behind them, retreating slowly from that horrible mass of gendallia works. Still more simultaneously and so relate at the left of the shealers and on the right where the battle raged in the wildest with an in same madening roar by the ledges of infantry dropped back, with men falling by the clamor as the purple ridges of the rebel fire of machine guns and musketry, grived at the with every sweet of the crest of gendallia, unmanageable, full of terrifying and coulin aimed point of the extermindation ext extermination of the rebel squares and fury and bent upon the extremindation ext extermination of the torn and mangled infantry lines and cannons the cawery saw the recoil of the ship in a wild tempest.

Infantry shot to pieces like the rigging of a shiping moment. There was the lines of infantry shot to pieces like the rigging of a shiping moment. There was the scene was now like his Hades island. It was a frightful moment. There was the panic and confusion unlooked for, and also, the main rebel lines and abatis and conflagration along the railroad tracks. he second line of cawery pushed on the third pushed on the second, the first came to rally the columns drawing back, the third pushed on the second, the first came to rally the columns drawing back, the third pushed on the second, the first came to rally the columns drawing back, the third pushed on the second, the first came to rally the columns drawing back, the third pushed on the second, the hot horses reared and neighed, shells, and grappe grape and musket balls and canister threw or moved them down, other horses reared and threw themselves over the fallen masses, fell upon their backs mangled heaps, and struggled with their feet in the air, piling up and overturning their killed or wounded riders, no powd power to retreat, the whole column was like a tidal wave torn by a million projectiles. he force required to crush the wished rebels was crushed and mangled by the rebels. he an inexorable rebel fire could not would not yield, and still horses and riders rolled together in immense masses, grinding each other, making of cannon flash in this gulf of the earthly hades; and when this grave was full of dead dying, and living men and horses, the rest marched over them and passed on only to go down the same way. Almost a third of this immense squadron of the cavalry sank into this death abyss of fire and destruction. Here the main christian loss of the battle began. At the same time with the machine gun fire of the fatal barricade the remaining artillery held in reserve was unleashed. Sixty thousand cannon and the thirteen or fourteen hundred and the main infantry line in gray thundered, screamed, yelled, and crashed, and flashed like a conflagration into the christian cavalry and into the remaining infantry line. The brave general Delorterton of the rebels gave the military salute to the rebel battery and was shot down from his horse. All the rebel flying artillery took position in the squares at a gallop despite the fact horses were going down by hundreds. The cavalry and christian infantry had not time even to breathe. The disaster of the fearful barricades had devastated but not discouraged them. They were men, on foot, and on horseback who though horribly diminished in number grew greater in heart. General Walter Muehler's column alone had suffered from the horrible disaster and the others which general Meyer who was wounded had sent obliquely to the right and left as if he had a presentiment of the deadly hail hell snare, arrived entire. The infantry also were rallied, and by dint of courage, and by the bravery of their leaders went through that fearful inferno of guns and musketry and hurled themselves upon the rebel infantry line behind the works and drove them at the point of the bayonet from the abatis and upon the squares behind. At full gallop with free rein, their sabres in their teeth, and their pistols in their hands, the cavalry men looking like a army of fierce pirates on horseback rushed forward over the works and the main force of the attack began. The uproar was now like a fearful war of the elements and worlds together. I dare not dare, not tell the number of falling or the horrible scene that now ensued. There are moments in battle for even both sides when the heart hardens in battle even to changing the soldier into a veritable statue, and all this flesh becomes like granite. The landolinian main infantry rallied, and held, like a re returning tidal wave, they seemed a conflagration and the squares and the artillery men though their losses was by the wholesale and desperately annihilated did not yield an inch and their "Devil yell" was horrible. When it was redoubly frightful and the world seemed on fire. At five o'clock the rebel general drew out his watch and murmured these words: "Reinforcements from Mic-Allister stanck or light our only chance."

It was about this time that a distant line of bayonets glinted on the rear of general Delorterton. Here was the turning point of this immense colossal drama of the rebellion. The rest was soon a change, the fearful irre disruption of a third army, the whole battle line thrown out of joint, eighty six thousand pieces of artillery suddenly thundering forth in annihilating fury not to troops only but the woods as well, a new battle line falling at night fall upon the dismantled divisions, brigades and regiments of christian forces, the whole rebel line with fiercer yells assuming the offensive and pushing forward the many gigantic gaps made in the christian army, the "heeler, Gargal gargolian and Mic-Hollensteinian grape and canister, and shell and shrapnell, landing actual aid, terrible disaster, in front, worse disaster in flank, the guards entering into line, the second main christian commander killed and the cavalry receding seeing this terrible crumbling, feeling that they were going to their deaths they cried out in horror. There was nothing more touching in any history than this death agony hurrying forth in acclamations.

In the gathering night on a field near Cendere 11 a two officers Bernard Haneucia Dunn, and Bertrand Nero seized by the flap of his purple coat and stopped a haggard, thoughtful gloomily gloomy looking christian officer who dragged time far by the current of the total rout, had dismounted, passed the bridle of his horse under his arm, and with a bewildered tear stained eye was turning alone toward the river side of "In-Hollister gun almost ready to weep like a child.

It was the extreme main commander poor general Napoleon, endeavoring to advance again, mighty communist of a vanished dream, soon all was over, the remnants of the troops came back to the ships, with their countless wounded. "Arrow was every where.

The first imposing armed movement against fortress Thumbelina on the 19th of peemberdid not take the rebel generals of fortress Angeline and Tyn Thumbelina by surprise. Since the beginning of the siege they had seen the possibility the probability and the certainty of a coming contest that would be a war of the worlds. They had quietly organized, the troops got cannons ready, watched and patiently waited. As the winter had advanced, it was plain to general Mic-Allister Stanck that some dreaded movement might be made by the general christian fleet that was operating in grand attack, and helping the blockade. On the eighteenth of December general Mic-Allister Stanck who had decided to send stronger forces to fortress Thumbelina, had sent forces also to destroy all stores that the christians might capture along the river front, and picketed the roads from Andron to Norma Catherine, to prevent any reports of the intense intended movements from spreading through the city among the christian non-combatants. But the air was completely so electric. In the tension of the poller popular feelings and mind, every sight and sound was significant. It was part of general Mic-Allister's plan to seize Dr Franklin Hancock and Adams, a farmer who were in hiding at Norma Catherine who had secretly gave news to the admiral of the christian fleet that Thumbelina was the only rebel fort not strongly garrisoned. The Angelinean coalition of fifty near Andron however sent them word to beware for many suspicious rebel officers were abroad searching for them. In the afternoon of the eighteen of December one of the landolinian governor general's groves strolled into a stable where general Mic-Ballard was having his horse cleaned. This general was Mic-Allister Stanck's advisor and when the groom idly cleaned what might take place the next morning because he had seen a big swarm of black suspicious ships moving through Wiskey Bay for the mouth of the "In-Hollister river, the general's heart leaped, and his hand shook, and hearing a noise far off which sounded like thunder, which was probably the roar of guns from fortresses which he asked the groom to finish cleaning the horse, and ran to one of his generals who carried the news straight to general Revere Hemonster, who told him he had already heard of it from many other officers and from scouts, and heard of it from the signal stations also. He said it was feared the whole Abbeismian fleet of warships was entering the mouth of the river bent upon something suspicious and alarming and as the direction seemed straight south it was feared Thumbelina was their goal. That evening at eleven o'clock eight hundred thousand landolinian troops under general Francis Smith took ship at the foot of Norma Catherine and crossed to the Mic-Whirlthian shore with the purpose of garrisoning the threatened fortress. General Mic-Allister had kept this a secret and thought that his secret had been kept, but general Percy Herdrude who had heard the landolinian inhabitants say on that famous evening that the troops may not get there on time undelivered him. General Mic-Allister Stanck fearing something unusual would happen instantly ordered that all people whether christians or not, who were in the city, and nearest the sea or river front should go further back into the city, and stay in the houses or in cellars cellars and if anything happened to them because they disregarded his commands it was up to them and their own responsibility, yet the soldiers were allowed to leave town. But as the immense force of troops crossed the river, general Hemonster with a message to others was riding over the neck of land to Cendere 11 to give word of danger and to see to it the works there were strongly fortified and troops sent there, and general Revere was going over the river in a fast gasoline launch over the river to Norma Catherine, having agreed with his friend, general Robert Lander to show lanterns from the parapets of fortress Cendere 11—as a signal of the advance of the christian warships. Already the moon was rising through a haze of thin clouds and while the troops were steadily landing at Cendere 11 Point, their secret was flashing out into the cold December night telling of the approach of the flagship of the Nationals already seen, and general Revere springing into his saddle, upon the river shore spurred away to warn general Purgatorius of the coming storm. Now far the rosen candles and glaring rocks threw their lights. The tower still stood. Startling the land that night with the warning of approaching danger, let it remind the rebel land of the fierce patriotism with that danger was averted. It was a brilliant night, the winter though appearing to be unusually severe was just of growing. Under the thinly cloud covered moon the soldiers silently marched, and the general Revere with a swift march and rode, galloping through the streets of Andron, and evading the secret he went spurring for general Purgatorius headquarters, and evading the secret National patrols who had been sent out to stop the news. Stop the news the rebels had already known. Already the signal corps were beginning to flash the alarm, and in the awakening houses lights flashed from window to window. Buns bent faintly far away and on every side bugles were heard, signal guns flashed and echoed. The dogs barked, the cocks crowed. Stop the news then stop the sunrise. The murmuring night trembled with the summons so earnestly expected, so dreaded, and yet so desired. The fort was on its guard and still it kept on. begun met this results already stated and still it kept on.

Admiral Thomas who was running the blo gauntlet of guns a second time admit all that tremendous world roar felt certain of a triumphant issue of the day indeed, and asked one of his admirals what he should consider as a great victory and whomist whether the fort would be taken or not. That officer answered that considering the handsome and furko furious way the battle was offered by the enemy, their detestable determination for a fair trial of strength and the situation of the land batteries, and of the two big fortresses Thumbelina and Gertrude Angeline that it would be a glorious result if the fleet escaped at that as already fourteen ships were down and the disabled numbered nearly a hundred and countless had fallen in the assaults upon the rear of Thumbelina.

Admiral Thomas replied:

"I shall die first before I retreat and I shall not be satisfied unless I have captured the fortress and silenced the land batteries."

Soon afterwards he asked his under admiral if he did not think that during the struggle there was not a strange signal warning that looked suspicious. The under Admiral made answer that he thought the whole christian fleet seemed very clearly to understand what they were about and that a wise retreat would be necessary before Gertrude Angeline let go all her guns. These words were scarcely spoken before that signal was made which will be remembered as long as the Angelineans, even the meagre money of Angeline shall endure. "Poor Admirals last signal!" God and Angeline expects every man of the fleet to do his duty.

It was received throughout the whole immense thence thundering fleet with a loud shout of answering acclamations made sublime by the spirit which it breathed, and the feeling which it expressed.

"Now," said Admiral Thomas, "I can do more. We must trust to God and His Blessed Mother and the Justice of our Holy cause."

It had been the part of Admirals Thomas and Foster that the whole Angelinian fleet in that tremendous storm of battle might be distinguished by all of humanity and the world itself in the victory which he expected. Setting an example himself, a desperate one indeed, he twice gave orders to cease firing upon the shore batteries and put all the guns upon the two fortresses alone, and supposing one of the rebel ships had struck because her guns were silent he also ceased the fire of one of his merrimacs upon her for she carried as it seemed now a white flag, and there was no means of instantly ascertaining the facts. From Fortress Gertrude Angelina which roared like a thousand volcanoes in eruption and even looked as bad he received his death. A ball fired from the upper ramparts of Gertrude Angelina exploded and the fragments struck the spallote on his right shoulder and his whole chest was mangled. He fell on his face and one of the captains who was a few steps from him, turned around and saw three men raising him up.

"The rebels have done for me at last," he said.

"I hope not," said his under Admiral.

Yet even now not for a moment losing his presence of mind poor Admiral Thomas observed as they were carrying him slowly down the ladder, that the tiller ropes which had been shot away, were not yet replaced as he had ordered before, and repondered that new ones should be rove immediately, then that he might not be seen by the battling gunners inside the ships turrets he took out a large cloth and covered his face and ears of the collar around his neck. The cockpit was crowded with wounded and dying men over whose bodies he was with some great difficulty conveyed, till he reached the main cabin and laid upon a pallet in his own berth. It was soon perceived, upon examination, that the wound was mortal but the doctor said he could live for two weeks at the least. This was however properly concealed from all of the crew, except the under admiral, the chaplain, and the medical attendants. All that could be done for the poor Admiral was to fan him, and frequently give him lemonade to alleviate his burning thirst. He was in great pain for his whole right side of the chest was torn away, and yet he expressed much anxiety for the event of the action which was now worse, and which now began to declare itself in favor of the insurgents. As often as a counter rebel ship struck after a conflict, the crew of the battered flag ship struck; and at every hurrah a visible expression of joy gleamed in the eyes, and marked the countenance of the dying hero of country and God. But he became impatient to see his beloved under admiral, and as that officer though often sent for, could not leave the deck, Admiral Thomas feared that some fatal cause prevented him from coming, and repeatedly cried:

"Will no one bring Admiral Mic-Hollister to me? He must be killed. He is surely dead. I have already lost 25,000 men in dead. Oh God it is dreadful. Why did I start this disaster?"

An hour and five minutes elapsed from the time when Admiral Thomas received his fatal wound, before Admiral Mic-Hollister a black whiskered man could come to him. They shook hands in silence, Mic-Hollister trying desperately but in vain to suppress the feelings of the most painful and yet sublimest moment.

"Well Mic-Hollister," said Admiral Thomas, "how goes the day with us?"

"Very unlucky in the bombardment but ten ships attacking us have already struck," said Admiral Mic-Hollister, "but five of the rebel merrimacs and six monitors have tacked and show an intention of bearing down upon this flagship. I have signalled six or seven of our fresh warships around, and have no doubt of giving the rebel boats a drubbing, and more fire rafts are going against us."

"I hope," said Admiral Thomas, "that none of our warships have struck."

"Mic-Hollister answered:

"There is no fear of that."

Then and not till then Admiral Thomas spoke of himself.

"I will soon be a dead man Mic-Hollister," said he, "I will only last two weeks and then it will be all over with me."

Calling Mic-Hollister again he said to him in a low voice:

"If necessary throw all the dead men overboard and I desire when I die to be buried with my parents when I die unless it should please the Abbeauxian government otherwise. Then," then "kiss me Mic-Hollister please."

"Admiral," Mic-Hollister with tears in his eyes knelt down, and fighting to overcome his emotion, kissed his cheek, and Admiral Thomas said:

"Now I am satisfied. Thank God that I have indeed done my duty."

Mic-Hollister stood over him in silence for a minute or two then knelt down and kissed his forehead.

"But fortress is that now that is firing upon us," said Admiral Thomas; and being informed it was a portion of War Abbeauxian he replied:

"God Bless you Mic-Hollister." And then Mic-Hollister left him—forever.

The mortification and sorrow that followed the mortally wounded of Admiral Thomas was forgotten at the splendid naval victories won in the struggle in the river with rebel warships, wooden and iron. The first fiercest of these was the famous river duel between a rebel merrimac and an Angelinian warship. The name of the merrimac was Jinjur, and the Angelinian warship Glinda. It was one of the greatest and only one of the many victories by which the name of the "Glinda" became one of the most famed and beloved of all the ships in the immense christian fleet. She was a fine iron and steel warship eight hundred feet long, and carrying eight hundred and forty four guns, and though the rebels had ridiculed her as "A bunch of twisted iron under a bit of plank boards and hunting it was not long before the rebel captains of various ships were busy engaged in trying to prove the Glinda was too large a vessel to be properly called a battleship, and that she greatly outclassed ten of her opponents in iron or wood and men. It is true that the Glinda had only one hundred guns, but she was a first class vessel, more than ten times the size of the first merrimacs and others of other ships also which great naval triumph of the first magnitude and others of other ships also which prevented the fleet from meeting total destruction.

Captain Isaac Sanderton who commanded her had just before the engagement proved his superior seamen seamanship during the running part of the fleet through the gunnelt of fire from the forts by escaping from a whole squadron of glendelinian warships, out-maneuvring them at every point and then engaging each ship singly and destroying them all. It was during the first day of the naval action against the forts and shore batteries on December the 19th when turning on his pursuers he described the powerful merrimacs of the rebels named the Jinjur-Jinjura. Both vessels at once met with a roar of guns. Though the battle lasted but half an hour it was one of the hottest in naval warfare of single fights within a battle of its own. Twice the Angelinian battleship battleship was on fire, and both ships were seriously crippled, the merrimac by her gun currents knocked in, and the warship by injury to engines, gun turrets and spars and flag staff. Attempts of the merrimac to ram her was thwarted by the fire of the guns of the warship, and here the accuracy and skill of the Angelinian gunners were something marvellous. At the end of half an hour the rebel merrimac called the Jinjur had been battered, and the warship had lost both mainmast, and foremast, masts and rigging were smashed or knocked down and cabins were demolished and decks torn up into wreckage, but the merrimac with all her guns put out of action and her flag floating in the water floated helplessly in the open river. Her surrender was indeed no discredit to her rebel officers as she though strong and staunch was in almost a sinking condition. It was hopeless to tow her out of the river and after transferring the prisoners to his own vessel the capturing of the Angelinian warship blew up his prize.

In the fight the Angelinian warship out of two thousand men lost only eight men in killed and thirty in wounded, while the glendelinian vessel had as many as seven men killed and seventy nine wounded or disabled. The conduct of the Angelinian seamen on board the warship was throughout more gallant than in the highest degree. Captain Sanderton put it on record that "from the smallest of the highest degree. Captain Sanderton put it on record that "from the smallest of a boy a man child in the warship to the oldest seamen and marine and gunner, not a look of fear was seen. They all went into action undaunted by the tremendous din of rebel guns from forts and on shore, giving many cheers, and requesting to be on deck when wounded to see the display of the scene. The charge of the rebels however at the unexpected results of this battle with two ships during the gun general struggle was changed to amazement when one after another in less than an hour there followed no less than thirty six combats of the same diabolical character in which the Angelinian warships were invariably victorious. One of these was between the Angelinian merrimacs "The Horat, and the glendelinian monitor and warship pitched against her, called the "Sloop, and the "Sloop which was carrying a fleet of fire barges against the rebel warship and monitor was one of the monitor or merrimac I mean against the rebel warship and monitor was brought so first most desperate in the river, and at times the three ships were brought so close together that the that any one if he happened to be outside could have touched the sides of the opposing vessels with their hands. Broadside after broadside was poured upon the rebel monitor and warship by the merrimacs, though combat with two powerful ships obtained the superior position, but the sailors of the merrimacs being unable to await the victory rushed the merrimacs forward with tremendous speed and disabled the monitor in the same fashion. Again the sunk her with all on board and wounded was large, that of the merrimac not one man was rebel loss in killed and disabled no monitor was towed ashore by a rebel gunboat. killed or wounded and the disabled no monitor was towed ashore by a rebel gunboat. It in no wise detracted from the glory of this victory that both victory and escaped prizes was soon sunk by a rebel ship both going down together and when water too nevertheless so was the rebel ship both going down together and when water too tore over their decks they fired shot after shot and broadside until flying in the water reach the guns and every one on board perished with their flags still flying as they sank to a watery grave. Heroism was emittingly tremendous on both sides, because opponents were Angelinians, one rebel, the other National.

Simultaneously to this action commanders Stephen Santa James in the Angelinian warship the "Deantuer, the "Macedon, and the "Francis and easily defeated the three of them combined sinking one on board and used them to back the advance of the fleet as they ran past Fortress Gertrude Angelina. The same result followed the attack of the battleship "Minna, under the command of Commodore Franklinter upon the rebel battleship the "Maltoni, the latter had her admiral and two thousand men killed and a hundred wounded, and was left such a wreck that it was decided to blow her up, while the Angelinian warship suffered so little damage that she was called "floating fortress." Other great combats resulted in the same way in the great majority of cases—in all. Unmistaken praise which afterwards was awarded by the whole world, even including glendelinian herself to the admirable seamanship, the wonderful gunnery, and the constant personal interest and intrepidity of the Angolinian naval forces in that most tremendous battle. Within two hours that fearful day the Angolinian fleet had been responsible for the capture of twenty six steel rebel warships, floating dreadnaughts, each ship alone armed with five hundred and sixty guns, and had sunk thirty six others, and a hundred merrimans and ten monitors went down, while so far the Angolinians had lost only six or seven ships, in the combats with rebel ships and over twenty others from the fire of the rebel guns on shore and the forts.

But if the highest honor of the war on the river was thus won this was by the Angolinian fleet the most serious injury water in by to the rebels was in the lower section of Mic-Hollister Run in the devastation of her smaller ships by the Angolinian armed transport ships and steamers. Within an hour at this part no less than two hundred and fifty of these sea or river guerrillas were moving into the waters, and had captured over three hundred rebel merchant vessels sent to support the bombarded forts with provisions, some even attacking, and overcoming the smaller classes of rebel warships. Some of the attackers were only launches and even rigged schooners and small steamers and in some instances even ships armed with a few small guns, but carrying one long cannon mounted on a low swivel so that it could be turned to any point of the horizon and known as a North gun. The havoc on that day on the rebel shipping was wide spread indeed. Altogether between fifteen hundred and two thousand prize prizes were either taken, destroyed, or disabled by the transports and steamers within five hours. To have computed the value of these prizes was impossible, but some idea may have been gained from the statement that one huge steamer in a attack of less than a hour had captured five rebel transports, and four warships with cargoes valued at over five million five hundred thousand dollars. The men on the transports who were engaged in this form of helping in the attack were bold to even recklessness and their exploits could have furnished many a tale of horrors beyond these amazing.

The naval combats thus far mentioned were almost all of single vessels during the struggle. For battles of fleets at the same time we must turn first the lower mouth of the rebel river to the outer mouth. The control of the river was of vast importance to the Angolinians in view of the continued land fighting of the great siege, and of the attempted movements of the besiegers, and the threatened counter attacks. The Angolinians however had the advantage of being able to reach the water ways of Vivian Wickey by ways of the rivers, from Mic-Hollister Run and the Angolinian St. George and also by Wickey Bay, Lake Mic-Hollister and Angolinian. The naval fleets engaged at the mouth comprised of seven ships against eighteen Christian warships. General Hazarderton was in command of the Angolinian fleet. When the fleet against the Christians, the rebel commander had taken advantage of the carelessness of the Angolinian commander in going on shore that evening when he should have been watching the movements of the rebel fleet, the rebel drawing his fleet through the river mouth which had protested it while in Hazarderton's hands from the onslaughts of the main Angolinian fleet when it first steamed up the river to attack fortress Thumblin. To get the fleet on in the advance without running into the main fleet of warships was a work of time and great difficulty. And an attack at that hour by the whole Christian fleet would have certainly ended in the total destruction of the rebel fleet. Once accomplished the rebel commander in his flagship, headed his fleet of seven warships, each carrying five hundred guns and a thousand men. Opposed to him was Admiral Barker with seventeen ships, all merrimans, monitors, and gunboats and eight warships, each carrying of the war ships along six hundred and sixty five guns, and also as each warship about four thousand men. The Angolinians wishing to attack in and join the other ten thousand main warships in the bombardment ignored this rebel fleet and for several hours avoided the conflict, but in the end were cornered and forced to fight.

It was at the beginning of the battle that the rebel admiral was killed, and the victory from the superior number of the Christian fleet was a complete and decisive one, all of the enemy ships were captured, and with great loss, while not a single Angolinian was killed or wounded. Simultaneously Captain Henry in the Angolinian warship the garnet won a complete victory over the rebel gunboat called the rebel poul, and the Angolinian point or called the Mary Ann, captured the rebel battleship "Bombers" but one distinct defeat marred the record for the Christian fleet—that of the fine warship called the Jennie. Vivian commanded by Captain Lawrence Norton which had been captured in a sinking condition after one of the most hard fought contests of ships during that battle by the rebel merriman the "Mic-Hollister Johnston". The Angolinian commander fell mortally wounded exclaiming as he was carried away:

"Tell the men never give up our ship even if she sinks with all on board."

Despite his defeat Captain Lawrence's fame as a gallant seaman and high minded Angolinian patriot was untarnished and by the Angolinians throughout the whole country only his death was deplored and not the loss of his ship.

Again one of the most notable naval engagements during the bombardment took place on the eve of December 19th when the most powerful of the rebel merrimans called the Thumblin rushed against the Angolinian attacking ships accompanied by ten warships. She plunged her iron ram into the Angolinian merriman called the Mole, causing her to sink and carry down all of her crew. She by hour shelling blew up the Angolinian merriman called the Mayton, destroying more than half of her two thousand crew and drove the warship gathering under the guns of fortress Gertrude Angeline which blew her to pieces, and bombarded fiercely with terrific energy aided by the gunboats and warships the Angolinian ships the portney, Gale, and Ozerton which in retreating had got aground.

she seemed destined to work irreparable and unimpeded havoc upon some of the other Christian ships in her efforts to stop the bombardment of the forts and shore batteries but Providentially during the meanwhile the monstrous Angolinian monitor with thirteen turrets on her decks and two thousand feet long and armed with a hundred guns on revolving turrets and commanded by Henry Jackson its captain steamed to meet the rebel warships, and merrimans and an unwonted and most desperate duel occurred from which the rebel ram retired badly crippled, and end of the supporting warships blown up, and another lost in waiting meeting a storm of fire from the Angolinian warship the Mary Jane.

At the same Admiral Johnson Pope with forty seven of the Angolinian fleet of warships and one thousand three hundred and eleven big guns stormed the rebel fort Ten Thumblin from the north, and destroyed a hundred fire riffs, and twenty gunboats and after a series of brilliant actions during the night compelled the rebel general Frank Lovewell to withdraw from one of the shore batteries, but Maroucian prevented the landing of the Angolinian troops from the transports and the batteries were soon recaptured and the fleet fleet repulsed.

Indeed the origin of this most tremendous naval action of the war and the siege of Vivian Wickey could have dated from the commencement of the struggle given as I once declared before the rebel nation had a very small navy and had only looked for the capture of many Christian ships to increase her own navy. The number of Angolinian warships engaged in this great conflict was numerous and they were armed by singularly good and daring officers and men. The Angolinian and naval forces of the Angolinians was the greatest in the world, and was even doubtless at sea and everywhere else stronger than all others put together, and could sent great numbers of ships, to bombard any portion of Vivian Wickey that suited them, and yet blockade all ports of Galverinia and glandolinia also and still have ships in numbers enough to roam the seas and make raids upon rebel shippings.

Angolinian was therefore not only able to command the Galverinian and Angolinian and glandolinia seacoasts with her fleets, but also largely to thwart what ever strong and desperate efforts toward the construction of a new and stronger rebel navy which were made by the glandolinian governments and Congress sought in the bombardment of the Vivian Wickey fortresses the losses in ships were heavy. The attack and capture of fortress Thumblin and then her recapture was not the only action of the Christian fleets during the bombardment of fortress Thumblin thirteen Angolinian war cruisers had been caught in the fire of shore batteries and only six of them ever got out of the storm of fire and to sea. During the main engagement probably one of the fiercest naval battles of the war a total of twenty large steamers and twenty one sloops and forty transports flying the Angolinian flag, were attacked by a rebel fleet near the southern bay near Thumblin and either captured or destroyed. That goggle shells of old time wooden frigates would have ever dared to storm such fortresses which guarded Vivian Wickey on river and searides. But during the military engagement of Thumblin which lasted fully two weeks, and raged hot beyond the time even of the battles of gunnadenilla and gunboat track, and Worms coast, many gunboats of the Angolinians steaming down the river, and passing the forts under heavy fire captured more than six hundred rebel vessels further down the river, without a fight, and these being armed were manned by men from the other ships and increased the number of the attacking ships at the mortally wounding of Admiral Thomas Mic-Hollister had to assume command that fatal evening of the second day of the storm, and Wiklan, Jinnoy, and other Angolinian admirals had been wounded and the loss in lives already was dreadful as so great a number were either killed on board ship by explosions of guns or by the ships sinking with all on board having no chance to save themselves. Captain Howard Jones who was on his sixteen gunned gunboat first tore the Angolinian fleet to the very shores of the rebel batteries and during the whole bombardment the Christian fleets made it a great terror to the great wicked rebel power in Vivian Wickey. Being struck by shells from Thumblin and Wey, the Christian ships, Gustavus, and Hero went down with all on board but nevertheless the whole region during the bombardment and so occurred the sight of the rebels in the Mic-Hollister Run river, and down gun, and the shore line of Wickey bay that all of the Angolinian ports were crowded with Angolinian ships which dared to venture forth and storm all the seaboard fortresses and make a perfect war of the world with artillery. The explosions of many shells from fortress Gertrude had burned much shipping at the docks, and the Angolinian fleet had to withdraw a short distance from the conflagration, though Captain Pargin captured the rebel merriman Gruberton much larger than his own warship warship, and then made his way down the river under fire with all his prizes in tow. The Angolinians had a flagship also called the George Richard, Franklin, Poor Richards, Lawrence, Malay, Gert, The Vengeance, the Pallas, and the Alliance which went down together when raised and torn to pieces by the fire from the rebel batteries on shore.

On this mortal date of the battle of Thumblin as this engagement is called Mic-Hollister had expired through the red glare of conflagrations a fleet of forty rebel ships, guarded by two monitors retreating from him, and with what of the fleet not engaging the forts or shore batteries he immediately gave chase. A terrific fight began each ships of opposing sides fighting two by two. The Angolinian flagship the Angeline Vivian attacked the main rebel flagship called the Landais. The two immense ships had the same number of guns.

This was not only one of the most desperate and deadly naval battles between opposing ships during this tremendous attack on the forts and shore batteries by the christian fleets. Three of the most famous Merimans of the Angelinas called the gonswella, the Angelina, yano, and thelanders were disabled in the conflict and two merimans, the rebel called Insurgente, and the Angelina called St pitts engaged each other in which the rebel was forced to surrender. The Angelina ship killed only four - one wounded and none killed. The rebel ship had twenty killed, and eighty wounded, and two hundred and forty of six captured. Half an hour later the same Angelinian ship came up with the rebel warship called La Palma. After chasing her two hours, the commander of the Angelinian ship brought on an action. The two ships fought furiously all night and in the morning the protection of the forts where she was latter condemned as unfit for further service. The Angelinian ship was also badly injured but no loss of life occurred though nearly thirty were wounded. This same Angelinian ship captured one rebel gunboat and destroyed a rebel monitor. At the same time desperate black whippers Mike-Hollerster who had lost his flagship and who was now aboard another warship determined on the third day of the bombardment upon a bold counter stroke. Taking a small rebel gunboat which he had captured during the engagement, he sailed boldly into the main harbor flying the Angelinian flag, and pretending to be a merchant of that country coming with a gunboat, running along side one of the wooden portions of fortess Tumbalina and too her to be under her fire set the wooden sections on fire by exploding thirty gallons of gasoline, and then steamed off away in safety, though amid a fearful storm of shot, and shell, and grape. The whole wooden part of the attack was burned down, the fleet in the mountains had made a more vigorous attack upon the harbor and destroyed two and captured three rebel ships. Other sections of the fleet made equally desperate attacks, in which the ships, the Trolls child, Hull, state junction, Deacurton, Macdonald, The wasper, the Trolls child, the Abbania constitution, penabridge, Javato, gornet, Pencock, Erle, Perry, Mac, enough, ghamplaine, glannoner and the Lawrence were sunk by the batteries on shore.

and also from the fact that there had been thousands of exulting celebrations on between the national ships and the blockade runners near the water fronts. Two during the same time on the Hornum gun and the Gunboat gun rivers and other portions of the Rio-Hollaster gun rivers the gunboats of general Meyer and Walker greatly aided land forces in the bombardments and assaults upon the rear of portresses Thumelinda but an already stated had been repulsed one day notations of the most first striking events of the battle was the forced entrance of the Rio-Hollaster gun and a most desperate attempt to force the submersion of portress Gertrude Angelina which was doing so much to help Thumelinda.
The whole fleet started a fierce concentrated fire on the sixth day of the battle on Gertrude Angelina p. Along. Opposed to the fleets were not only Gertrude Angelina, but Mercutio and Urundecillo, and two other great fortresses St Andrew and St Phillip, and Santa Claus flanking it each fort singly mounting two thousand two hundred and thirty five guns. All along up the river from all the forts from each side of the river from one to the other similar like at New Orleans at the civil war, stretched many stretched of ponderous iron chains charged with ten thousand volts of electricity and completely barring the passage further up the river; and beyond this was the main fleet of iron clad rebel gun boats, battle ships, mermen, and warships, fire ships, and torpedoes and submarines; at the beginning of the expedition all military authorities of Thumelinda and Angelina had combined believed the idea of such an expedition was suicide but now Rio-Hollaster who took Thumelinda command made his way up to full range of the forts now after half vanquished the other rebel fleet and began a more general bombardment than ever. And one of his ships within one hour threw two thousand shells at the enemy. Hundreds of huge fire rafts were sent against the Christian fleet, but his ships managed to avoid them, and sunk a torped boat together as the fire rafter passed. He was by many others were sent down during the following night a fair number of ships mountains of flames. One of these were blown up, or blown up, or allowed to pass by but several of the captains deliberately ran the ships into it, and towed the against once more wooden ships which caught fire, and turning hoses upon others toward them out of the way. A whole sea now the fierce bombardment had been kept up and one ship after at the forts during that week over five hundred and sixteen thousand eight hundred shells at the forts. On the day of this artillery storm and every winner in the city of Avon Moke and damaged many buildings from the connections when with shells Admiral Rio-Hollaster managed to cut the chains and started to run the fiery gauntlet of the forts and shore batteries of the Christian fleet. Before daylight on Christmas morning the gunboat motor boats of the Christians furiously opened fire in general way under cover of which the battles ships, the transports themselves, the mermen, and all the rest of the fleets steamed straight up the river. Gertrude Angelina screamed with her volcano of flame and din, and appeared on fire from the flash of guns, then Urundecillo blazed away, and all the forts then let go Thumelinda firing the worse of them all, and twenty six thousand ships in a long line ten miles long replied with full broadsides for three days after that with a short ceasing day and night over five hundred thousand cannon war thunderings. Many ships had been disabled and dropped back and others sank but the rest can expect on in a cloud of flame and the fire from the mermen demolished many guns of Gertrude Angelina and Thumelinda and received a fierce storm of death and destruction in return. Van before the fleet was past the forts, fire ships came down upon them by the whole fleet setting transports on fire by the score, and causing a trillion dollar worth of ironclad gunboats attacked the fleet, and the rebel warships and monitors and mermen attacked by the three score at once increasing the frightful frightful din of guns to redoubled fury.

The Japanese under Admiral Kurogami was surrounded by seventeen rebel gunboats and was sinking them all. At the last of them sunk, a huge rebel iron clad ram or corvette three thousand feet long and armed with five hundred guns was rushing upon the American battle ships. The Admiral seeing he could not escape it turned the la pousse so as to receive the blow squarely admidships. The ram doing at the rate of sixty miles an hour crushed her like an egg shell, and in half an hour she sank firing to the last, but her fearful broadsides of two hundred shots per volley at such horrible close range, riddled the biggest ram in the rebel lud, and the two went down together firing the last broadsides and with their fla. s still fl. ming or flying. In ten minutes in the wild confusion of cannonade evens more rebel gunboats were sent to the bottom of the river, and a portion of the fleet was past the fortifications which hammered broadsides ten miles long amid a ram that sounded like a world of cannons going off in a perfect fusillade.

long and a ram, that caused the most significant of the combats between fleets, forts and ships. During this tremendous movement when the fleets had been running past the forts there ensued one of the most tremendous single ship fights on the record of the whole siege of vlyan glocky. The ram between a great rebel Mermine or ram which was only of course three hundred feet long, but sixty feet high, and mounted like a battle ship with guns as large as the fortresses themselves had, and also launched torpedoes and had a ram which was as long as the ship itself and very strong.

It was a great ram at her bow was made of heavy iron seventeen inches thin thick and as sharp as a needle at the point, the great ship was fitted with larger and more powerful guns than any of the Angelinian warships ever had, and with seven most powerful engines which drove her through the water with the terrific speed of the Twent ieth century Limited on the New York Central.

The rebels to protect her further had coated her sides, and thereof the roof thickly with tallow, and with sharp protruding objects, she was regarded as entirely invulnerable to any shot, cannon shot or shells, and her boulders had believed that she would be easily able to destroy all christian warships and merrimacs and other craft sent against her, and even the rebel forts themselves should she wished to do so, and that she alone if steaming out of the bay could have opened the blockade of all the seaports, and placed all of the seaports of Angolinia at her mercy. One section of its frontal hull had been made so that it was completely submerged beneath the water to be hidden from the christian ships, and upon its front was a large circular iron tower armed with ten guns, which was turned round and round by machinery. Its sloping sides carried one hundred bronze mortar and centimeter and other big guns soon on big warships now a days. Despite its size many naval experts, both Angolinian and rebel had laughed at it and thought it unworthy, because of its formidable size it could be liable to be attacked or resisted by a whole fleet and demolished.

The merrimac which was named the Elizabeth was a perfect floating fortress of iron and steel, without any vestige of wood except that behind the iron walls and when the christian fleet, passed the forts, and had demolished the strong fleet opposed to them, the merrimac came to the rescue of the remainder of the Angolinian ships. The Angolinian warship Mansel fired broadsides upon her as she advanced knocking down some of her masts and rigging, and shooting off her flagstaff but she paid no attention to this Angolinian warship but moved on swiftly to the battleship Thunderer, crushed her side in with a blow of her horrible ram, riddled her with shells and solid shot, and sent her to the bottom with all on board. The solid shot and shells from the Mansel's immense ten inch guns did some considerable damage to the big merrimac, disabling some of her guns, and denting the roof, and tearing away a portion of one of the revolving turrets, but the rest of the shots glanced from the rebel ships roof as harmless as so many pease. The monster then turned back to another warship and destroyed her in a moment. Next she resolved the attack of six warships, and drove three of them aground, and sunk the others causing a terrible loss of life.

It appeared apparent that she was going to be able to destroy what remained of the entire christian fleet but suddenly shooting against her came a great Angolinian merrimac of her own size but carrying less guns and having no back or smaller revolving turrets. The rebel merrimac sought to ignore her and attacked the Angolinian merrimac. The Angolinian merrimac would not allow herself to be ignored. Captain Zimmerman ran her along alongside the Angolinian merrimac so that they almost touched and hurled his one hundred and sixty six pound shot and shell at the second iron monster as rapidly as all his broadside guns could be worked. It was the first duel since the beginning of the war with two merrimacs. These shots at close range told, as all the broadsides of the warships had hot. The rebel merrimac's armour began to splay, and her own firing had equally as much effect upon her own adversary. Very one of the shots of both sides hit the ships and the conflict raged all night. Fifty times each merrimac tried desperately to ram or run down the other, and some times they also eluded each other and sometimes they came to gether in a terrific collision that started twenty foot waves on the water of the river. Putting the fifty sixth time the rebel tried to ram the Angolinian merrimac and the rebel back that had crushed the Angolinian warship so a disastrously merely glanced on the christian merrimac's armour, and glided upon her deck. The rebel merrimac was so lifted and tilted as to expose her steel hull to the rebels deadly fire, while the christian merrimac quickly slide out from under her uninjured.

Then the rebel merrimac being worsted to retreated slowly up the river a mere wreck, but so was the christian merrimac a mere wreck also. Despite this tremendous combat no one was killed on either side in the merrimacs but on the rebel side the commanding officer looking through the periscope was stunned by the shock from one of the christian ships last shots, which struck squarely just outside his eye never recovered his sight. The Angolinian merrimac had saved the remainder of the christian fleet from destruction. The success of Admiral Silvester in passing the fortresses led Admiral Spuderton his aid to attempt to enter like manner with a second section of the fleet to the fort of Silverbell of the seaboard. The manner was in vain. The fire from the fort of Silverbell of the seaboard was too fierce the ships shaking and running like an earthquake and leveling all to the ground, and his fleet was forced to fall back with heavy losses and every ship fairly torn to pieces or disabled. Simultaneously Admiral Farrar's fleet forming a second section number three of the fleet in line of battle now stood in the rigging of one of the heavily armed transports glass in hand, and directed their movements. As Admiral Spuderton had done he swept around and around in a fiery ellipse, but his ships were like Indians sweeping around in a circle when attacking a pioneer wagon train. We know how the Indians were shot down. Well that was the way the ships went down. At a critical moment of this dreadful fiery fray the outlook reported:

"Torpedo and submarine boats ahead." A cry arose to stop the flagship, but the huge ram called Federacy came forward to crush him as the other merrimac had crushed the Angolinian ships opposed to her. But F. Farrar with sublime audacity turned the bow of his steel or iron warship upon her and ran her down without mercy. But all attempts to silence the guns of Fort Silverbell was unwilling. The remaining ships for a whole day and night bombarded the fort furiously, but the transports landed troops which attempted furiously to take it by land. He however failed and returned to the transports declaring that Silverbell was more than a common fort and could not be taken. But Farrar thought otherwise and remained at his post with the remainder of the fleet. General Terry O-quarker then went down with an army 1,000,000 strong, the bombardment was renewed with redoubled violence, the outer works in front of the fort was taken but the assailants met annihilations. Still elsewhere near the south while the National navy was thus attempting to carry all before it, in that war of the world in the river and along the coast, the Angolinian Confederates were active elsewhere. Their swift armed cruisers, torpedo and submarines and other war crafts secured other portions of the river and gave such credit to christian transports that it appeared as if the fleet would soon be out of existence. One of these rebel cruisers making this flank attack upon the attacking fleet of christian ships was called the Abrahamama commanded by Admiral gonius Stanck, giving her one day career she destroyed more than ten millions worth of Angolinian transports. For a long time during the conflict her speed and the skill of her commander kept her out of the hands of the Angolinian navy.

But at last toward evening Captain Winlow Dargy with the Angolinian merrimac Cherbourg came up with her in the Harbor of Orma Gatherine and a terrible duel occurred almost as wild as that between the rebel and christian merrimacs.

The rebel vessel and the christian vessel were equal in strength but the Angolinian ship had sixteen more guns that made awful havoc on the Abrahamama. The Abrahamama however on the other hand had less guns but more powerful ones and besides had ten eleven inch pivot guns which hurled great high explosives but the famous rebel ships time had come.

As the two ships circled slowly around and around, or dashed past each other keeping up a constant broadside, every shot from the Angolinian ship seemed to find its mark, while many of the shots of the rebel shot went wide. As soon as the rebel ship was disabled and in a sinking condition the crew were surrendered and taken on board and just in time for the great ship went down to a watery grave.

A whole volume might have been filled with accounts of the notable exploits of the navy in this tremendous battle which there is not room enough even to mention here, the daring exploit may be mentioned however to daring and so novel was it thought fatal in its consequences.

During the engagement that some horrible big ram despite her defe t defeat by the Angolinian was again sent forth despite her condition to try and drive the National vessels from the river. He again came steaming down the river and again boldly attacked the fleet, destroying six ships at the first onset by delivering thundering broadsides even at long range, and damaging others, while again showing herself almost invulnerable. She then against eluded with the same christian merrimac and sunk her with all on board in a terrific conflict of four hours. It was now feared and succeed in raising the blockade, and even get out of the harbor and succeed in raising the blockade, and extra extraordinary efforts were made to destroy her, but without avail. At last a job was undertaken by a young officer, Captain Henry Saunders, who had already during previous actions and this one in particular distinguished himself by his daring and even recklessness.

He went on board a rebel iron plated gunboat that had been captured during the engagement, and named itself. At himself, with thirty six other men, and armed the boat with a large howitzer, and carrying a large mine and torpedo combined. The merrimac at the time was stationary under cover of Fortresses Gertrude Angeline and both banks of the river at this point were closely lined with rebel infantry, pickets, and batteries, firing all that at horror the gunboat flying the rebel flag steamed boldly up the vic-Hollister gun river, and got within a short distance of the merrimac before it was seen by the pickets who though observing the Angolinian flag and seeing the alarm was given, and a hail of bullets fell upon the gunboat doing no harm, and shot and shell exploded around her but the range was too close and did not reach her. The officer in command headed straight for the mighty merrimac and running the gunboat boat till its bow touched the side of the mighty merrimac he thrust the torpedo and mine at the end of a iron pole under the latter and lighted them. The explosion being big wrecked but did not totally destroy the merrimac though it was put out of commission. The water being too shallow there she failed to sink. The gunboat was also wrecked by the same explosion, and the thirty men took to the water floating with wreckage, and sought to escape by swimming under heavy fire of bullets, grape, and canisters. All were however, either killed killed wounded or captured, by the Angolinians, save six of these two were drowned, and the others, one of them being the captain himself who was wounded, reached an Angolinian gunboat and got safely back to the fleet.

During the first week of the battle of Thunderbolina on the water side, there were forty two big Angolinian battleships were destroyed, most by the rebel merrimacs alone, there were twenty seven other ships, put out of commission by the forts, twenty one rendered unseaworthy by the other ships of the rebel fleet, and twenty six sunk by Fortresses Gertrude Angeline. This was only by that small comparison. Fortresses Gertrude Angeline disabled one hundred and twenty five warships, put out of commission sixty eight Angolinian merrimacs, and sixty boats of the gunboat type and ten of the Subaboats and one submarine.

984 The ship was wrecked but survived the engagement used twenty three of the remaining thirty of two hundred, and with the twenty three fired within three hours one hundred and thirty nine times against Gertrude Angelino, usually at from five hundred to twenty five hundred yard range, they also hit portress Aurnecliffe hundred to twenty five hundred yard range, they also hit portress Thumblinla 10,000 times, portress Silverhill, 12,000 times, and portress Thumblinla 55,000 times but did very little damage. Against this one ship the rebel ship portress Thumblinla used only seventy seven guns and in one day fired against that one ship twenty two thousand two hundred and twenty nine times, and hitting the vessel and others five hundred and twenty times, but doing little damage except to one merrbon and a gunboat which were sunk. In the bombardment of St Phillip simultaneously 221, 736 projectiles, solid, shot, and shell, and shrapnell, and high explosives, were thrown by the ships. The bombardment of the most thrilling event

122; the prisoners were thrown by the blades during the last week of the bombardment one of the most thrilling events in the bombardment occurred in a time when the forts were firing their worst; and a terrific volley of broadsides struck the van guard of the fleets and destroyed nearly every vessel there. Three big Abbeemian warships were wrecked, one Abyssinian warship by hurricane efforts was saved from damage, Ten Angellian warships were wrecked and then sunk, and one was saved after being run on the beach out of danger during the slow retreat of the fleet when it was seen the effort was a full failure. This was the St Gertrude the main wrecked vessels two big warships were the Pandora, and the Catherine. Arian named in honor of one of the Arian - Iris Arian girls.

The combined strength of their engines and anchors was not enough to keep them from being driven to destruction. The Pandora was already stranded in her retreat when caught upon a shoal in the river and was pounded to pieces by a ton of shot shell and explosives, and a rebel ship was bearing down on her. Still the Angelina flag was flying from the gaff of the ship. All the flags on any of the battleships whether rebels or Angelinas had been torn or shot to pieces as the battle had been raging so furiously and the gun fire had been so terrific that nothing could escape. It seemed now for a while during the retreat as if the great gallant fleet was doomed, and the stranded ship seemed to have been determined to go down with the flag of her country flying above the storm of battle. Presently the last faint ray of daylight faded away, and night came down upon the awful scene of the last day; the fleet was retreating hammering broadsides with the same awful fury as they again stemmed the foete a third time, the efforts of the fire from all the forts and shore batteries was still raging with as much fury as it had been at any time during the long incessant engagements.

 the poor surviving creatures on the stranded warships the Catherine, Avian margin of razing of the Catherine Avian were bruised and bleeding from their wounds, but they held on with the desperation of men who hang by a thread between life and death, and their guns continued to fire their guns in broadsides.

 The fragments of shipwreck had cut the flesh of their arms, legs, and chests, and their eyes were blinded by the salt spray of the mouth of the river which swept over them when explosions in the water three great geysars a hundred feet or more into the air, gask and exhausted as they were, they felt they would be unable to stand the terrible strain much longer. They looked down upon the angry waters lashed to fury by the concussion of the a artillery storm, the thousands of great geysars, and the swift movements of the retreating ships, and knew they had no strength left to battle the waves. Their final hour seemed to be at hand as the

The great black hall of a rebel merrimack firing broadsides at the retreating ships nearest her could be seen through the glow of conflagrations which pierced the darkness like the glow of hades. Almost ready to crush into the two stranded warships and gride them to atoms, suddenly a shout was borne across the waters.

who warship pretoria was cheering the stranded ships, and with two others standing to their rescue; the sound of nearly six thousand four hundred and fifty six voices broke upon the air and was heard above the roar of the battle tempest. Three cheers for the Catherine pirian and the Pandor a. was the first cry that warmed the heart of the dead and dying men in the rigging and the shout died away upon the storm, and then arose from the quivering masts of the two sunken ships a deep response so feeble that it was scarcely heard on board of the approaching rescue warships. The men who felt they were looking death in the face aroused themselves to the effort and united in a faint cheer to the flagships. Those who were on board the rescuing warships listened in silence for that feeble cry which was the saddest they had ever heard. Every heart was melted with pity.

"God and His Blessed Mother help them." Was passed o from one man to another. The Fathering band was playing "Hear ye, O ye men of the sea! Hear ye, O ye men of the sea!

The sound of music next came across the water. The Gull's Horn band was playing "Nearer My God To Thee. The thousands of men on the other ships were drawing nearer now had never before heard the strains of music as at such a horrible time as this, and so after all we resumed the two good ships went to wreck and many more lives were lost nevertheless during the retreat, but a standard of endurance and valor was there in that raging fray set up that shall and should command the reverence and wonder of the Angelinian world as long as tin time shall endure."

During the retreat of the christian fleet the remainder of the rebel fleet pursued and the fleet had to stop outside of the range of the fire from the forts and the fleet, who now fight had hardly begun when the Mollasters new flagship was separated from the rest; and was so furiously attacked by the rebel new flagship that in a short time the Angolinian ship was in a sinking condition leaving her in charge of a captain who transferred himself to a ship Francis and renewed the attack with such vigor that the rebel fleet is repulsed. CHAPTER F: 50.

THE ALMOST FATAL PASSAGE ON BOARD THE THUNDERBOLT, AND THE OTHERS. THE WORKS OF THE ENGAGEMENT AND THE RESCUE OF THE FLEET.

One ship was wrecked but survived the engagement used twenty three of the remaining guns out of two hundred, and with the twenty three fired within three hours one hundred and thirty nine times against Gertrude Angeline, usually at from five hundred to twenty five hundred yard ranges; they also hit Fortress Aurandachillo 10,000 times, Fortress Silverbell 12,000 times, and Fortress Tamborlinia 55,000 times but did very little damage. Against this one ship the rebel and fortress Tamborlinia used only seventy seven guns and in one day fired against that one ship twenty two thousand two hundred and twenty nine times, and hitting the vessel and others five hundred and twenty times, but doing little damage except to one warship and a gunboat which were sunk. In the bombardment of St Philip simultaneously 121, 718 projectiles, solid, shot, and shell, and shrapnell, and high explosives, were thrown by the ships.

During the last week of the bombardment one of the most thrilling events in the bombardment occurred in a time when the forts were firing their guns.

During the retreat of the Christian fleet the remainder of the rebel fleet pursued and the first had to stop outside of the range of the fire from the forts and battle the fleet. The new fight had hardly begun when the new flagships became separated from the rest, and was so furiously attacked by the rebel fleet that in a short time the Angeline ship was in a sinking condition. Leaving her in charge of a captain who-Hollister transferred himself to the ship. Francis and renewed the attack with such vigor that the rebel fleet was repulsed. The Angeline lost one more ship in this encounter and the rebels took.

In this story none of the Angeline naval heroes of the great glandico Angeline war was better remembered than David Johnson who-Hollister, the right figure of this brave admiral in the fight during the retreat through the water. He was a man who when running past the dangerous forts again, and daringly standing in the rigging of his second ship with his glass glasses in his hand, directing the movements during the slow retreat of the fleet could have made one of the most splendid pictures for any war so terrific, and no braver man or better and nobler than who-Hollister ever took the deck of a vessel and to mention in the third year of the war he lost his life during a still worse bombardment when this same fleet reinforced by fleets from Allen's bombardment the Anglo-American fortifications for two weeks, and began in his retreat past the forts, Tamborlinia, Aurandachillo, and Gertrude Angeline, and at the outset and during retreat of the war in the harbor of Angeline, and at the outset before running past the forts again encountered the Angeline warships that attack and like a sudden as a squall. Her very masts were the masts of the third flagship and was shot away and crippled by the storm of shot from the two rebel ships, and was unable to change her position, and lay helpless at the mercy of the enemy's guns. After a bloody battle of two hours and a half however under such fearful odds other ships came to her rescue and the flag was lowered on the two rebel ships. The retreating fleet comprised of many thousands of sea vessels still, large and small but all of iron and steel, except the mighty transports and steamers which were of heavy wood and iron.

The river and seaboard as stated before was also defended by fortresses St Philip and St Andrew, and by the masts which the Christians gave them, but called by the rebels "Fort Stern" and "Fort Masts". These two mighty fortresses the strongest of all facing the river banks on opposite sides lay like breastworks instead of buildings and each were two to three miles long, and a hundred feet high and protected by many gunboats, and rams and warships which lay near the forts, these warships were not only below the forts but also two forts, the others. After having succeeded in getting out of range of the two forts, the found it possible to escape he found it was necessary to bombard them with his whole fleet, and even to use the ships captured from the foe, and so a while the advance was slow and during the short but careful preparations were made to on the thirteenth day this still formidable fleet of Christian and rebel warships combined all operated by Christian warships and sailors at last started the main race and opened a furious fire at the same time the lower part of the river on both sides seemed for nearly nine miles lined with fire of thousands of guns.

All day long the earth for nearly a hundred miles trembled like an earthquake under the roar of so many guns, the heavy explosions, and by the roar of the guns from the forts, and by night two hundred thousand shells had been hurled against the forts and land batteries. The Angeline rebels having expected an attack on the fortress Tamborlinia by means of war correspondents and spies on their own side had not been idle during the days of the previous months, but had well contrived and constructed every possible instrument of destruction, and to defenses that could be made. On the first morning of the fleet's attack to the beach and ran past these batteries and forts on the retreat, the rebels were again set adrift a long line or screen of fireships made of a of huge flatboats a hundred to two hundred feet long each, piled with cotton, soaked with gasoline and pitch pitch and lighted pine and cordwood, and turpentine, and explosives together with blazing masses however the wooden transports without middle of the stream, and so fortunately passed for five hundred yards with doing any harm though the heat could be felt for five hundred yards with sign of any effect. At night another big screen was sent out in spite of the Angeline guns were sent to meet it as it drifted correctly, and in spite of the intense heat from the flames mounting two hundred feet into the air, had it grappling irons fastened to them, and the masses of flames were either towed to the shore, and left to burn harmless away or were put out by being blown up by explosives. Having at last made all main preparations that he could with the means allowed him, and the own thousand motor boats having accomplished all that was their power to do for the present, midnight was fixed for the passage of the forts, and the escape of the ships still stretched across the channel had been cut by means of torpedoes. It was however determined to start at twelve o'clock at night and the evening before Admiral who-Hollister had visited his ships for a last interview with the commanders.

THE ALMOST FATAL PASSAGE OF FORTS THUMBELINKA, AND THE OTHERS. THE WORK OF THE ENGAGEMENT AND THE BROADS OF THE FLEET.

At length at high midnight many lighted signals were seen to rise slowly to the unseen peak of the flagships, the portlights shrill and run rung over the water, and the drums finally bent to quarters. The enemy was on the lookout, and the big fleet of vessels was traveling in ranks, by fours, and moving in a long line nearly a mile long. He had scarcely got under way, when the various colored signal lights flashed along the shore, there was a grand display of fireworks, red and blue light, massive sparklers, and whirling whistles when there was an unrelenting roar along both shores, and a furious belt of fire nine miles long glared through the intense darkness lighting the river and the next moment the heavy shell storm and air shrieking over the bows of the stream, and the sky was brightened by a blinding flash by their explosions that seemed to tear the heavens and make a million echoes that seemed to fill the very streets of the whole of Irian. Away with a hundred thousand echoes as loud as thunder and shake the city like the throw of an earthquake. All eyes were turned to the batteries were turned on the flagships, as they silently stood on—this signal alone nation "alone action" leaving from her rigging. In the meantime the forts were roaring incessantly, and the Angolan motor boats, merrimes, monitors and transports and other ships opened a dreadful stream of fire which lighted the waters of the river away, and the leading storm of shells rising in graceful curves over the advancing fleet dropped with the thunderous sound of a thousand exploding volcanoes, into the forts above. Eruptions glowed like fiery volcanoes above the forts, and in a few more minutes the advancing fleets opened with redoubled roar, firing madly, and vigorously at the thousands of flashes from fortress Gertrude Angeline, the fleet with full steam on was soon a abreast of the forts, and then forts Thumbelinka again let go her dreadful roar, and the fleets responding to shore batteries and forts and their rapid broadsides of many thousands of shells per hour mingling with the deafening unrelenting explosions on shore, seeing flashing in long lines, with the lightning glare of shells in the air turned night into a fiery day.

While this horrible bombardment was in progress, an immense fireball pushed by a large ram ran called the planteroy passed through the dense smoke of gun powder and bore straight down on the forts. Irian the flagships of the Christian fleet Admiral Mc-Hollister shored off to avoid the collision and hurried at it a broadside of solid shot and shell to sink it, and in doing so ran aground, when the great fire ship six hundred feet long came full against him and two transports close by. In a moment the flames caught the transports, and also leaped up the rigging of the flagships and along the sides of the other ships in a fiery sea of flames.

However horrible as was the situation there was no panic as was expected, every man on the three ships was in his place, and soon sixty hoses were turned and immense streams of water were turned on that red rolling mountain of flames. The fire after desperate work was soon got under, and Mc-Hollister again moved forward at the head of his column of warships.

And now came once the remainder of the rebel fleet guarding narrow, of thirteen battleships, forty eight gunboats, and nineteen iron clad rams two thousand feet long to mingle in the intense combat. Broadside to broadside, crashing against hull it quickly became at once a thousandfold gladiatorial combat of ships, once again. The Veronica and the Jesso Irian and the female urmer and the Ingahip sent fifteen of the rebel vessels to the bottom one after another with a hurricane of shot shell and explosives, and finally themselves were sunk, and their crews were with difficulty rescued and taken aboard the other ships with the Admiral who was wounded badly in the shore shoulder. When the sun rose the following morning the wounded Admiral looked down on a scene that even Heaven and Hell probably would never forget as well as he himself, while the naval deeds are honored by any nation. Here lay the thundering forts, with the beautiful glendelinian flag still flying but they had been almost passed through for a time it did seem as if the doom of the fleet was sealed as the rebel fleet lay like a barricade to prevent the escape of the Christian fleet if possible.

Yet too driven ashore and wrecked were thirteen more of the Angolan warships—out of seventy seventeen that opposed the strong rebel fleet, and the fleet of glendelinian ships which had come down river to assist the forts to resist the passage of the National fleet looked like grim monsters through the blinding smoke of the still more blinding conflicts.

For a time it did seem as if the Christian fleet was at both the rebel fleets and the forts mercy. Admiral Fowler of the rebels commander of the main fleet seemed for a while to hold the Angolan fleet under his control. The rebel fleet for that morning seemed more formidable than even the fortresses themselves.

But only was the fleet barring the passage but below the fleet were two more rebel forts to pass which also barred the passage of the river out of Adrona. These were the seaward of fortress Lucilla sixteen, and and Bellview

Fort Bellview itself was mounted with sixty guns on the river side, even here there were fifty armed steamers and forty rams inside, waiting to receive any vessels that might succeed in passing these forts. The outlet through which the big fleet had come in to make the attack was still more strongly guarded by the bigger rebel fleet from across Catherine and it seemed almost probable that the Angolan fleet was now bottled up. Even there and beyond batteries lined the shore, and torpedoes paved the bed of the river, while he was fiercely engaging the rebel fleet opposed to him he saw the glendelinian iron clad ram Lucilla steam up the channel and anchor near the forts. This complicated the situation very much, this contest with the Christian fleet on one side, and a superior number of rebel ships on the other side, mostly warships and iron clad rams and a line of strong forts on the other was so unequal that it was almost foolhardy to enter it, but to remain where he was meant total destruction or capture. After two days of further fierce fighting with the forts and fleet however the Angolan Iron clad June arrived to the assistance and so Mc-Hollister Johnston determined to make a desperate attempt to escape and proceeded to attack the fleets by main force and fight his way through. The vessels were arranged by ranks four by four, and lashed strongly together. The fleet with the Angeline was finally ahead, steamed swiftly on, and within a few minutes there was every ship in the engagement on both sides fighting as desperate a gun duel as ever could be fought and the uproar was doubly terrific. All of the forts were still roaring, and the ships not opposing the rebel fleet or who became disengaged with them replied to the forts and the battle fairly resumed with redoubled fury.

The brave Admiral Mc-Hollister had boldly and recklessly landed himself near the masthead of his fourth flagships so as to be able to overlook the whole scene, while watching indeed with an absorbing anxious and bewilderment the progress of the fleet through the most tremendous fire not concentrated upon it by forts and every rebel ship suddenly to his utter amazement, he saw the ship the Angeline, the stop and begin to back up. The order to reverse engines, passed down through the whole fleet, bringing it to a sudden and unexpected halt just as it was entering the main fury of the fiery gauntlet.

"What does this mean anyway?" Had hardly passed from the lips of Admiral Mc-Hollister when he heard the cry:

"Rebel gun submarines and torpedoes! Our big merrime is going down and twenty other ships."

Glancing toward the spot dimly seen through the fog of smoke and where the merrime was supposed to lay he saw only the top of her turret which was rapidly sinking sinking indeed beneath the water, and ten other ships were torn in pieces, and others sinking swiftly with all on board. Right ahead were the rebel submarines half submerged in the water and which had turned the Angeline's bow back indicating where torpedoes even were supposed to be sunk, ready to life lift even his own ship into the air as it had done to the merrime and the warships and six transports about now Mc-Hollister's blood was up.

"Shouting" Never mind the submarines or the torpedoes and shouting "Go back," he had the Angolan torpedoes boat commanders go after the submarines and pointing between the threatening bows of the torpedoes the order said the din was given to move on, and with foam dashing from the bows of his vessel, he swept forward, determined to take the chances of the desperate escape or die.

Heading to the northwest and then straight west as he kept the channel of the river mouth, he brought his whole broadside to bear on the forts with tremendous effect this time and explosions on shore erupted like volcanoes in action.

The other many warships and craft following desperately in the wake of the flagships one rank after another swept past the remainder of the shore batteries and forts cutting the way like a tornado through the rebel fleet, the crews loudly cheering and were signalled by Admiral Mc-Hollister to come immediately to anchor, but the officers had scarcely commenced clearing the dead decks of the warships when the remaining rebel merrimes were seen boldly standing out in the river with the fleet and steering straight for the Christian fleet, with the purpose of attacking it with a final effort to stop the retreat or cut it off. It was the most thrilling moment of the four weeks action. Ad accidentally in advance of the fleet of Christian warships was a fleet of frail wooden transports and big steamers, attacked by a fleet of huge rams and in armor impregnable to even the guns of the warships themselves.

The moment Admiral Mc-Hollister discovered it, he signalled the wooden vessels to open up and allow the warships to pass through with the purpose of running down the fleet of merrimes, and halting his own anchor, ordered the pilot to drive the flagships full on one of the big iron clades, however the Angolan under the command of Lieutenant Jenezhin being near the rear of the line was still moving up the river when he saw the swarm of rams heading for the line of transports. He instantly steered out, and ordering on a full head of steam, drove his warship with tremendous force and speed straight on one of the iron clad structures, wheeling he again struck her pouring broadsides at the same time, though he carried away his own iron prow and cut water, while under full headway firing as she advanced and rolled the rebel boat over on her side, the next moment down came Mc-Hollister's flagships but just before the vessel struck, the other ram coming on steered, so that the blow was only a glancing one, and the former rasped her o iron plated hull and it fell along side, when receding for some distance the flagships poured in at a distant of twenty yards a whole broadside of nine inch solid shot and shell hurled with charges of fifty pounds of powder. The heavy metal though sent with such awful force and in such close range hardly made any impression but immediately broke into fragments on the very mailed sides of the merrimacs or dropped into the tossing waves of the river. The shot and shell from this rebel merrimac and the others in a perfect storm went crashing through the iron sides of the warships, throwing the interior of the ship into a mass of fire and dying and putting out of commission a number of guns. The merrimacs and some of the other warships now stood off and began to make a circuit in order to come down again with the warship the gamma and the gamma which were also driving on the merrimacs by accident struck the Angelinian flagship a little forward of her main mast, and cut her down to within three feet of the water. He was indeed indeed at first thought to be sinking and the cry of...

"The Admiral, the Admiral please save Admiral McCallister rang over the shattered deck and cabin and gun to turrets. But Admiral McCallister seeing that the huge vessel though a derelict was still afloat with half her guns still in working order shouted out to put on full steam ahead, determined to send her crushed and broken as she was full on one of the rams. By this time the Angelinian monitors and merrimacs had steamed up and were pouring in their heavy shot and shell. The gunboats and merrimacs and monitors got under the stern and knocked away the very smokestacks of the rebel merrimacs, while now some of the warships sent ten shots clean through one of the merrimacs, and disabled her stern port plunger with a shell, so that the gun could not be used, while a third carried away the steering gear. Thus with her steering gear gone, while her smoke stacks shot away, many of her port plungers jammed, this merrimac stood the crowding fleet like a stag at bay among the wolves. The Angelinian merrimacs called the raider was driving toward her under full headway, and a little further off bearing down on the same errand were coming the Angelinian flagship, and six other warships. The fate of the rebel iron clad was sealed, and her commander immediately hoisted the white flag, but not until the Angelinian flagship with McCallister on it was so near that her commander could not prevent a terrific collision and his vessel reared heavily upon the iron side of the ram and cut her completely in two. The members of the crew however were rescued and the fleet finally recovered the survivor from the other vessel the ram about ten in number. One of their commanders an admiral having been wounded in the arm and leg and chest. This ended the horrors of the morning's work and at eleven o'clock McCallister brought his fleet to anchor within four miles of fortress Lucilla. The loss of the Angelinian ram with her commander and crew, tempered the exultation over this splendid victory. A torpedo was exploded directly under the vessel, blowing lifting her out of the water and blowing a hole in her bottom so large that she sank before her crew could even reach the deck. McCallister's magnificent bravery however, and the picturesque picture picturesque novelty of the many wooden transports and battleships together running twenty iron clads made this one of the most famous naval engagements of the whole glendisco Angelinian war, and gave the to the brave Angelinian admiral who had once been a child slave master a wide and lasting renown. Officers and men too seemed to catch the spirit of their brave commander, and fought with the most splendid bravery. Many of the wounded refused under any so conditions to leave their turret rooms but continued to fire their guns. Others retired and had their wounds dressed, and then returned to their posts.

A few days later after a most severe bombardment from the Angelinian fleet both the remaining rebel fleets and forts were passed and the Angelinian fleet finally escaped and got back to the harbor and joined the squadrons of the besieging ships. This completed the Angelinian victory, but did not however accomplish the capture of the fortress. Soon after this his vanguard came for him. Admiral McCallister obtained some leave of absence and sailed for home. He was warmly welcomed at the Angelinian capital. At the Angelinian capital he was indeed welcomed with impressive ceremonies and received the most highest testimonials of appreciation of his services to the Angelinian nation, a number of wealthy men of sea Marston presenting a gift of a million dollars as a token of their esteem. The rank of vice-admiral was created immediately for him by the Angelinian Congress.

During this time he was off duty Admiral McCallister had indeed all the qualities for a popular hero. Brave almost to the point of recklessness, he was always simple and unassuming in appearance and deportment and kind and genial in manner. Once it happened that on his return he had been called to general Mazon's headquarters and as the admiral had taken one of the private cars in his arms and kissed her and talked playfully with her he happened to be dressed in civilian costume and looked in her beautiful eyes very much like any other man, and totally unlike the hero whose many praises had been so long ringing over by the land. In her innocent surprise Jennie said:

"Why you do not indeed look like a great admiral. All the generals I see within the Christian generals are covered all over with decorations and wear great imposing uniforms."

The admiral had to laugh, and to please he he several days later returned to see her in full uniform and she was satisfied when he went away to resume command of his fleet. That was the last she ever saw of him.

The scenes during the battle of Thumelinta was indeed fierce on the water, but the attempts on the land side had also its own terrifying horrors, especially for the Christian assailants. Immediately upon the repulse of the two main attacks on land, the soldiers had thus recoiled toward the ships, but on the following morning the entire fleet of transports had landed all the soldiers which had advanced with the purpose of striking the wheelers a crushing blow. It was their plan not to make an abrupt assault upon the face of the salient as before, but to take the woods first lay all the rebel encampments in ashes, and try and annihilate the rebel left wing, and then by holding the woods thus captured, and also that section of the river, and the lake in the location, to imprison them in the general salient. The first main force of the Angelinians with red and purple uniforms were landed at Pannacollola, and the plashinda Run small creeks near the salient, disposing arms to the loyal inhabitants in that location who had run away from Vivian, delay and preparing for the grand expedition to Gonderella.

Just as the hostile Angelinian in that location flying from the most tremendous blow which the glendiscans at the salient had dealt them also taken refuge near these two small creeks. The rebel general in charge of Gonderella works on account of the fierce bombardment of the forts going on at the time had been left to act almost without instructions. He knew that the main Angelinian forces would probably soon land to make a general attack decided to take the responsibility and assume the offensive against the first coming troops of Angelinians. The whole south and western region of the wooded portions held by the rebels were aroused to meet the advance of the landed Christian troops and already general Mazon who commanded the salient had sent general Moblier with an army of four million men to march in a counter movement upon the Christians landed at Pannacollola where the Angelinians were shattering the Angelinians and as he hoped to rout the Angelinians. This general advanced upon that little stream, stormed the works thrown up by the landed troops took possession of the breastworks, and drove the Angelinians back out to the transports. Then garrisoning the small line of works as quickly as possible he moved the main force of his troops to the other stream and in the engagement here general Moblier who had been wounded in the early engagement was so feeble that he could hardly ride his horse but yet retained his command. There he concentrated a force of nine million three hundred and thirty nine thousand rebels and every man here was actually brought into service. An Angelinian fleet of sixty big steamers and transports with a hundred smaller ships and some of the battleships themselves not engaging the forts many of them off first class ships and which had obtained world wide renown in the other naval engagements around Vivian. Earlier in the siege and blockade was assembled in a spacious little bay on the western part of the river. This fleet which whose ships single ships at that carried a thousand small cannon was manned by nearly sixteen million or filled with nearly sixteen million soldiers and marines, and had a crew of thirty thousand men and so that third morning managed to land a force of almost ten million men fresh from the battles of Calverine and Abbeism and other points where battles had raged and finished with victory over one of the Manlys already.

The fleet of transports entered a portion of Lake Angelina which was a most shallow bay opening into the Calverinian seas. There were five small fleets of rebel ships in the lake at the time mostly small gunboats which were soon overpowered by the immense force of the Angelinian fleet. Unaware the nature of the force of rebels and the strength of their positions the Angelinians did not deem it prudent at all to move upon the Gonderella works until they had greatly increased their numbers as they had remembered the experience of their comrades in the other two engagements the two days before. This delay probably saved Gonderella from capture.

At ten o'clock on the morning the rebel general Mazon learned that the foe marching in immense columns from the vicinity of Lake Angelina was within a few miles of the left wing of his main position. He immediately ordered his collected Angelinian cavalry about two hundred thousand in number to charge forward and meet them. The cavalry fell upon them impetuously in a desperate attack, checked their progress, and drove a portion of the Angelinian force to their landing place and held them there for a time. The Angelinians surprised by the fury of the assault of the rebel cavalry, waited for reinforcements, which with the landing of more troops came up within two hours later. General who immense force of Angelinians were in the highest place. It was to them absurd to suppose that a few score of million of rebels whose cause was so horribly wicked and the vast majority of who whom may have been guilty of the worst massacre of innocent children could resist the Abyssinians and Angelinian veterans who had in Angelinia conquered the armies of famous Turner at Antenna. General Mobble had quite thirty three million men behind his ten mile front of breastworks but every one were imbued with the spirit of their chieftain. For three hours there was the wild tumult, the wild horror, the resumption of the horrible carnage of the fierce battle. The Angelinians here had in their possession a formidable breastworks of fence rails, logs, cots on poles, sand bags, and brush and abatis.

Fredman, ordered at about eleven o'clock pushed his immense veteran battalions forward on a general reconnaissance reconnaissance, and to sweep it possible over general Mazon's or oblique unfinished great breastworks near the two small creeks, and then push on and assault the main line. It was a brilliant morning. General Mazon with his telescopic in his hands was on the watch and reinforced Moblier troops with more men and artillery. The solid column of red and purple coats came on in military array, as beautiful as it was awe-inspiring, the main forces in front coming on in long lines, and the rear divisions advancing in squares. He landed small pieces of artillery led, heralding the advance with a great shower of congregate rockets, round shot and shell. The muskets and bayonets of the Christian infantry flash flashed like a multitude of mirrors in the light of the noon morning sun.

In the face of the fierce rebel resistance the position was desperately stormed. The fight was utterly desperate and most sanguinary indeed. Not a rebel would dare think of accepting quarter, and when he bleeding of wounds from shots or bayonets they desperately fought those who endeavored to spare their very lives. The carnage was awful and most revolting revolting. Many being forced back and cornered by the desperate Angelinian assailants seeing themselves in danger of being captured threw themselves into the streams frozen half over as they were but the unerring bullets of the assailants struck them down as they struggled across or swam. Nearly every one of the pursued were killed. A few probably did succeed in swimming and escaped, but in the fire along the main line of the rebel position was dreadful, and the Angelinian host seemed to have fairly melted completely away. With shattered lines, divisions shot to pieces, brigades reduced to regiments the Angelinians leaving their dead behind them in perfect seas retreated. A second effort was made and had the same effect.

There was then a slight lull and general Mobble having been forced to move off the wounded became assured that the Christian forces were preparing to resume the attack on both sides of the position simultaneously. Half an hour later a rocket from the hostile Christian lines gave the signal for the attack to be recommenced. In ten solid squares, with two long waves in front the Angelinians again advanced upon the Christian ramparts, which were bristling with infantry and artillery, and behind which general Mason had not a force of twice the same number all inspired with the zeal of their main commander. The Angelinian forces were dreadfully exposed and the Angelinians were well protected. With great force and ferocity the Angelinians rushed up the embankment from which there again poured forth an incessant hurricane storm, of bullets, balls, shells, and grape and canister, which no flesh and blood could stand. It was one of the most awful scenes of slaughter ever witnessed near Antenna. Very little accomplished its mission, spending its force in the sea of scores of thousands of bodies of those who were miserably driven forward to inevitable death. Two hundred and fifty Angelinians were cut down by the discharge of a rebel thirty two pounder loaded to the muzzle with grape and canister and musket balls, and poured into the head of an Angelinian column at the distant of twenty yards. Before the fierce fire regiments fairly vanished by the scores if the earth had opened up and swallowed them. The whole rebel line looked like a fiery storm of furnaces.

The rebel general Mason rode slowly along his lines, cheering his men and officers through all the storm of battle, and saying: "Stand to your guns every one. Don't waste any of your ammunition. Let that every shot tells. Let us try to finish the business to day."

All the while like the constant maula horrible burst of millions of thunderbolts that seemed to split the earth as from the cloudless heavens came the incessant crash of musketry and cannons, and as the troops continued the attack, the tempest of lead, and shells and grape and canister swept down their very ranks by the hundred. Crash followed crash in endless and quick succession, soon not only before, but behind as flankers attacked them from a bend in the position, and then came rebel assailants from the right and left. So thick became the smoke of firing that hardly the foe could be seen, yet every bullet, grape shot and shell accomplished its mission. The ground was soon covered with renewed seas of the dead and wounded Angelinians.

Amazement and utmost consternation ran through the surviving ranks. So much smoke was made by firing that it almost seemed even to the rebels as if an unseen foe was assailing them. The Angelinian general in command Cockford stood his ground with bull dog courage and strove to keep his men at the attack until he fell pierced by a bullet and mangled by a shell. When nearly half of the army of assailants was slain or wounded, the remnant broke into wild disorder and fled.

The resistance of the foe was entirely successful. In hundred thousand of the rebels who counter charged were wheelers. They made the forest ring with their derision and yell in scorn of the folly of the Christian assailants.

The general who took command in Cockford's place who was general Mobble through all this awful scene, which he had been constantly anticipating was perfectly collected, and with the cool collected courage, did everything possible which human sagacity could do to retrieve the disaster. His horses were shot under him, and he was wounded himself by four bullets but retained command. Eight hundred thousand of his own troops including many officers were killed or wounded. General Mobble rallied around him the Abyssinians upon whom the rebels had looked with contempt. Each man placed himself behind trees, and rocks and as the rebels burst from their works to rush forward in a counter charge the unerring destructive fire of the Abyssinians drove checked them with dreadful loss and then compelled them to fall back and seek the shelter of their works.

But for this this the entire force of assailants would have been utterly destroyed. All of general Mobble's efforts in endeavors to rally the Angelinians were unavailing indeed. Later he wrote indignantly to Admiral yic-golleston:

"They ran like sheep before the hounds or wolves. Officers and men strove with might and main, even risked their lives to rally them but could not do so though they strove to boat them back. They were panic stricken, an abandoning artillery and baggage, and continuing their tumultuous troop retreat to the

OTHER SCENES DURING THE BATTLE OF VIVIAN WICKY.

When in the midst of a somewhat successful attack at one of the rebel positions the apparently hopeless fortunes of his army's existence. At one time when general Mobble had ordered him to fall back to the main works and remain still he had

The immense force of Angelinians were in the highest glee. It was to them absurd to suppose that a few score of million of rebels whose cause was so horribly wicked and the majority of whom may have been guilty of the wanton massacre of innocent children could resist the Abyssinkilian and Angelinian veterans who had in Angelinia conquered the armies of famous Turner at Pantonia. General Molbilles had quite thirty three million men behind his ten mile front of breastworks but every man was animated with the spirit of their chieftain. For three hours there

But for this, this the entire force of assassin ants would have been utterly destroyed. All of general S' previous efforts or endeavors to rally the Angelinians were unavailing indeed. Later he wrote indignantly to Admiral Gic-Hollister:

"They ran like sheep before the hounds or wolves. Officers and men strove with might and main, even risked their lives to rally them but could not do so though they strove to beat them back. They were panic stricken, an abandoning artillery and baggage, and continuing their tumultuous retro retreat to the river coast."

Indeed it was some rout. The Abyssinkilians in orderly march and retreat protected the Angelinians from pursuit. General Rockford's defeat rang through the country as one of the most brilliant victories the enemy had ever won. The Abyssinkilians who submitting to the military authority of Angelinian Generals had allowed themselves to be led into this wooded region of death, proclaimed far and wide the precautions which general Uque had urged and the heroism with which he had rescued the remnant of a remnant of the Christian army.

The rebels though much stronger in force than the repulsed Christian assailants made no attempt to pursue their advantage but quietly retired to their works there to await another assault should the Angelinians decide to make one. A force of seven hundred thousand men was required to hastily remove the terrible number of wounded Angelinians and Angelinians combined and all the wounded were placed under the care of rebel doctors. For three hours during this struggle the Angelinian generals and other officers had given all their energies to this arduous enterprise and it would require a volume to record all the awful scenes through which they passed during that wild onslaught.

Four hours had passed, and the work had been done—effectually done. As the smoke lifted the whole proud Angelinian army had disappeared. The ground was so covered for nine miles with the dying and the dead, that for all that distant distance one might walk upon their bodies, and far away in the distance the retreating lines of the foe were to be seen. On both sides of the position the Angelinians had been repulsed. The Angelinians had about nine million in this engagement, and the rebels about four million. The rebel or Angelinian loss in killed and wounded was two million, two hundred and twenty two thousand six hundred and forty six in killed and wounded while the loss of the rebels was only three hundred thousand. Thus ended that day of the land actions.

There was no further action on land so far however and no more assaults were attempted.

General Uque rallied around him the Abyssinkilians upon whom the rebels had looked with contempt. Each man placed himself behind trees, and rocks and as the rebels burst from their works to rush forward in a counter charge the unerring destructive fire of the Abyssinkilians drove checked them with dreadful loss and then compelled them to fall back and seek the shelter of their works.

General Uque in the midst of a counter charge... he had ordered him to fall back to the main works and remain until he was ordered to advance.

demanded; of the general and even of his officers earnestly:

"My God generals. How long will you continue these movements!"
"Serenely general Seb replied:

"We shall retreat and counter march if necessary over every river of this region of the country, and then over to your heights, where I shall make a last stand against our enemies."

General Seb having been relieved reinforcements from general Manson a week after crossed the region into the wooded country below the heights. The rebels being overconfident pursued him even under fire from Manson's batteries. With consummate skill and bravery, general Seb and his commanders baffled all the efforts of the rebel force. With an army cut off from the main lines, and reduced to a freezing, starving band, of but three million men, he retreated toward the location of Carbondale with the hope of being reinforced and receiving support and shelter.

The rebels expecting nothing unusual pressed on excitedly on deeming the conflict with this national commander soon ended, and the resistance crushed. It was now December. The foe were able to track the retreating Christians by the very blood of their lacerated feet on the frozen ground of the Calvinian shore and woods. With great difficulty and suffering from two wounds received already general Seb succeeded in crossing the small gunbeam creek over poe pontoons and boats which were so secured and the bridges destroyed just as the rebels arrived upon the banks of the wide wide half frozen stream. They needed but to cross the river and make an attempt to retake Carbondale. He was already so rapidly forming that the rebels felt sure they would be able to pass at any point without obstructions. The rebels however had nothing to fear, but nevertheless did not relax their vigilance as they knew the tricks of the Angelinian commanders.

That following night was dark and stormy and far away the roar of the bombardment of Thumolonia could be heard fairly shaking the ground. It was also becoming intensely cold, and another fearful storm of snow and wind was raging furiously. The rebels however knew that the Angelinian force which had retreated across the river to the other side were not dispersed or disheartened, but as a broad river or creek creek lay before them and the retreating Christian troops, and only half frozen over they could not cross, as the Angelinians in the retreat had secured or destroyed all boats, and to construct construct pontoons bridges over ice which was floating did not seem very probable. It was determined however to force their way across by either ending, or by going over the ice and propelling the ice like boats with poles or tree limbs. So in the darkness of that wintry night, and amid the conflict of its elements, and amid the lightning flashes of exploding seige shells high in the air, and their deafening thunder crashes like a thunderstorm raging in the midst of snow and wind, the rebel troops with what boats they had secured embarked the first column of troops, over with the artillery, while others crossed what small bridges there was, and the remainder boldly plunged into the water and swam across, or rode on the large cakes of ice which they propelled ashore. Those with the artillery forced their boats through the floating blocks and cakes of ice and succeeded within two days and nights in landing the army upon the opposite shore, so ten million four hundred thousand men, and five hundred and twenty five pieces of cannons of light weight leaving the bigger guns in care of the army that was to remain behind to watch the movements of other Christian forces so the attackers would not be flanked. The Angelinians believing themselves safe from pursued pursuit seemed to be carelessly dispersed, and to all appearances they did not seem to be looking for danger, but it was an ambush. The Angelinians suddenly from an unseen quarter sprang upon the vanguard of the foe, and after a short but bloody strife, scattered or routed them two toward the main advancing lines, capturing ten thousand prisoners, and sixty cannon. This column of rebels retreated to general Price Princeton's army of the Angelinians, and the Angelinians with their prisoners then fell slowly back with their main column covering them.

At the same time general Heildose who was the commander of these rebels suddenly received reinforcements, and marched forward upon the retreating Angelinians under general Trenton, confident that cut off as they were from the heights general Seb's badly crippled division could no longer escape them. At the close of a bleak winter day his line appeared before the lines which general Seb had thrown up, and general Trenton was raising his artillery.

The rebel general alarmed by this formidable army made preparations to attack the Angelinians, declaring that the rising sun of the next morning would see the end of the Christian army under general Seb. The sun rose the next morning cold but cloudless. In the night the Angelinian army had again vanished. Replenishing his campfires to deceive his enemies at midnight, with the utmost precaution and precipitation also he had deserted his camp, and sending a portion of the army by a circuitous route fell upon the rear of the rebel army under general Princeton. This movement occurred in the morning and a dreadful battle raged which lasted for six hours. The Christian attackers were repulsed with great loss, but the rebel general was mortally wounded, and six others would be wounded, and the Angelinians had captured a hundred and sixty thousand rebels as prisoners and had shot down nearly twice as many more, the total loss of rebels being in killed and wounded about five hundred and sixty six thousands. This was the battle of Allen Bettsen.

Deceived by this blow struck the enemy, general Seb led the handful of Christian troops to the direction of the heights now ten miles distant from the river.

where he intrench himself until he could receive reinforcements. He however while waiting sent out a considerable detachment of frequent detachments of on vary and infantry which so harassed the enemy who had pursued who remained within eight that in a short time his own front was delivered from their presence. The whole main Christian army under Manson seeing the performance of their comrades who he had been cut off from them were animated by the achievements of general Seb, and general Seb expecting reinforcements soon roused himself and his officers to new energies. During the few days staying there vigorous efforts were made in preparations for the opening of a counter movement of or diverting the different generals on the heights sent from their commands troops to join general Seb's army at Bettsen. The general Grensbury managed to sent two fleets of the unengaged Christian fleets. General M. Marquis periled his life out scouting one day but succeeded in getting information that the rebels now harassed by general Seb sleepless vigilance, and yet unable to compel him or to lure him into a general engagement, left the region to go back to their fleet eighteen million soldiers.

They got as far as Wiktonia in a small creek running in into the gunbeam river and general Seb with but eleven million men marched to encounter the rebels and not allow them to escape to the river if possible. Caught and cornered the rebels made a stand and that next morning a portion of the two armies met on the banks of that very small creek. A bloody encounter ensued which raged four hours. General Seb after the short but severe engagement, was compelled to retreat. General Seb seeing it impossible to stop the retreat of this column sent general German to stop the rout and check the enemy but his troops after a short but more severe engagement was compelled to retire, and during the falling back of his troops he received a severe wound in the arm.

The rebels attacking successfully took possession of the Christian works. One of the other Angelinian generals Lancaster by name was also wounded and his troops retreated precipitately toward the rear. It appeared now that the rebels were comfortably housed in the Christian positions. This day indeed was a period of great discouragement and suffering for the Christian troops. General Seb did not dare to allow to be revealed and neither dared to notify general Manson of least the foe should rush in upon the retreating Christian forces now in a helpless condition on account of their rout and panic. They were toward evening how however rallied and in this dark hour of need general Philadelphia from the heights came down to his aid and the rebel army under general Frank and Yorkerton with armies amounting to thirty million men moved forward in general against the Christians who did not exceed fifteen million men. The rebel generals could not do anything much, because under fire from the batteries on the heights, and apprehensive that a number of strong Christian fleets might soon appear from the region of Lockdown thus endanger the troops across the stream evacuated the region without further fighting, and the troops commenced their general retreat back to the gunbeam gun and to their own ships. All this while they were under constant fire from the Christian batteries of seige guns on the heights.

Quickly reinforced by general Obama's troops followed close in the rear rear of the retreating Angelinian force under general Mowther watching for a chance to strike a more general blow. That day following was one of intense cold but clear. Not a breath of air was stirring, while the unclouded sun poured down its rays without giving the slightest warmth whatever upon pursuers and pursued. It was a slow march of one day and it was hoped that another blow to the enemy would enable general Seb's army to be united with the Christian force of Wiktonia under general Frank. So that they would be safe from a fierce counter attack by the rebels. General Seb sent orders to him immediately to commence the onset with the assurance that he would hasten to his support. The roar of battle soon occurred and as general Seb was eagerly pressing forward to his inexpressible chagrin he met general Wizzard at the head of his remnant of troops in full retreat. It was said that general Seb with the greatest volensness of manner and utterance demanded of general Wizzard:

"General Wizzard what means this ill timed retreat of your forces!" Instead of explaining properly the retreating general threw back an angry retort. Nevertheless it was no time at all for any alteration for a large stream of Angelinian troops was advancing with loud yells. General Seb turned to his own men. They greeted him with cheers and at his command they moved forward and charged the rebels while officers and cavalry were sent to rally the retreating forces of Wizzard's army. A sanguinary battle was raging now, and a portion of the rebel troops was driven from the field but the remainder of the rebel columns held their ground until night fall. The Angelinians encamped and slept upon their arms with the preparation to renew the battle in the morning. But when the morning dawned to the surprise of the Angelinian generals no foe was to be seen. The rebels had retreated in the night leaving three hundred thousand of their dead behind them. The Angelinian losses were only sixty nine thousand in killed and wounded.

Another cold and cheerless day came. The rebels remained with i within their lines before general Zeb beyond the river. They sent Agents however to the six divisions of the wh wheelor landolinians of the KU Klux Klans with an order to make some fierce raids upon the christian lines further on the south. These fierce landolinian savages with their tremendously fleet horses accompanied by gargolian Kurds and gimmermannians perper a perpet rated horrors too dreadful for recital. A fearful massacre occurred at Vandella within the very christian lines where the most awful tragedies occurred which was never witnessed on this real Glode. but no children were harmed fortunately wh because they either escaped or withdrawn by the christian troops who rushed to the scene. Nevertheless the narratives of these fiendish deeds taken by war correspondents when sent to the world sent a thrill through Angelinia and other nations. Our million men all cawary and gongontinian cawary at that were sent by Manson into the wilderness to arrest if possible these massacres of christian soldiers, and after fierce fighting so savage as to take a thousand volumes to relate the Gargolians were driven out of the raided christian lines with the deaths of ten of their generals, and back to the rebel lines with the loss of countless dead, and where they were finally received into a landill landolinian fortress. Simultaneously general Purgartorian had commenced a vigorous prosecution of a syst system of incoosceivable violence and plunder upon the outskirts of other portions of the besieging christian lines and the sky was reddened with an wanton conflagrations. The flourishing encampments under general Fairfield and orwalker were reduced to ashes but the raiders here were attacked by christian troops and cut down and routed without obtaining any plunderwhile the enemy was thus ravaging the ot ot outer portions of the christian lines general Zeb had planned an expedition again river north point on the orma gun which was held by a portion of the same rebel army which had so relentlessly perused him. General gartner conducted t conducted the enterprise on the night of the twelfth of Decm December with great gallantry and success. sixty three thousand of the rebels were killed in the engagement of three hours five hundred and forty three thousand were taken prisoners, and all the military stores of the fortress captured. However during this time the small army of Angelinians was never sufficiently strong to t k take the offensive, and was not necessary tobe so anyway as Hanson desired feebunly to harass the rebels and prevent a strong force from being landed upon the opposite side of the river. so the small army had been incessantly employed striking fierce blows upon the rebels wherever the eagle eye of general Zeb could discern an exposed spot. Excuse me for saying so but it may be probable thn that this general was a cousin of goothy Gale in the Wizard of Oz Books and she can probably be proud of her her indeed. It was apparent indeed that the horrible winter of 1918 1912 was on with unusual severity. The small Angelinian army seemed to be in such a starving condition that general Zeb at times was compelled to make the utmost exertions to savahis wasting bands from annihilation. These long days of war and seige and woe filled many thousands even of the most sanguine hearts with despair. Not a few Angelinians decessed it full madness of the authorities to maintain such a seige of works and fortresses made by i their own hands and now in the possession of the enemy who were like themselves in nationality and in fighting manners and courage wicked as they were and felt that any longer to contend against such an enemy in such a powerfully defended city unimpooverished as they were and the most powerful army upon the glop globe at this section as suicide. General Hanson vlyan himself as stated before had on De cember suffered a crushing defeat at worma Gesinia or Evangelinia Grania and having recoiled from the region at first had saw no hope for his country ever cap recapturing vlyan iskey. He declared that his armies besieging vlyan wicky were "like a sinking ship in a storm." He even had trouble with a Angelinian who was so cowardly and so discouraged that he foolishly turned traitor and offered to sell the main christian positioj christian position under general Hanson vlyan himself to the rebel under general Manley. The r treason was detected but by the help of general Manley, and the rebel boysoouts and soldiers the wicked traitor escaped, and a lamented rebel soldier who had been lured into the position of a spy and the conspiracy because the necessary victim of the traitors crime. The spy was held guilty of harboring not only the traitors work but his escape and sentenced to be shot without tri l trial.

On account of the defeat of general Hansons army at Evangelinia Grania general John Manley was now with his well provide army and an assisting rebel navy overrunning the region and moving forward to the protection of Aurandecallio and Glorinia. General gindernine had been sent with all the force with which general Hanson could spare to watch and harass Manleys army and to fir furnish the christian troops in the region there with all the protection in his power. General Lafaye was in the vicinity of Aurandecallio with his eagle eye fixed upon the rebel foe ready to pounce upon any detachment which dared to present the slightest exposure. General Hanson himself was everywhere with Far Patroclitus with never flagged, with hope which never failed, cheering the army, animating the inhabitants retreating from the region, rousing the other generals to highest esteem, and guiding with his well balanced mind in both military and civil legislation.

This the dreary days after that fearful bloody Christmas slowly lingered away. Manley in moving toward Aurandecallio directed at his chief attention to the south intending to strike a blow against the rear of the other besieging forces he o belonging to Hansons army. The encampments of general ridmons was laid in ashes and a general system of devastation and plunder prevailed. The enemy fleets at the same time ascended the worma gun river and some of the fleets landed troops to aid the garrison near Aurandecallio. The Angelinian manager of an estate being a coward to save his mansion from pillage and flames furnished the rebels with abundant sulp supplies. General Hanson vlyan hearing of it was much displeased and angry. He wrote to his agent:

"You have acted like a traitor. You should have been compelled to oblige yourself as my repre representative and should have been compelled to reflect on the land example of communis communicating with the enemies of god and Christianity and not make a voluntary offer of refreshments and supplies to them with a view to prevent a conflagration. It would have been even better to me to have heard that they had burned my own house and laid the plantation in ruins instead of complying with the request of rebels and traitors. For your act you will be remote renounced and shall have your property confiscated and you yourself shall be thrown in prison as orders are sent for your arrest on the charge of harboring an enemy of god."

A part of general Manleys army under general Look the Gook was now near Aurandecallio strong but a few miles from the besieging lines in their rear, and on the land example of communis communicating with the enemies of god and Christianity and not make a voluntary offer of refreshments and supplies to them with a view to prevent a conflagration. It would have been even better to me to have heard that they had burned my own house and laid the plantation in ruins instead of complying with the request of rebels and traitors. For your act you will be remote renounced and shall have your property confiscated and you yourself shall be thrown in prison as orders are sent for your arrest on the charge of harboring an enemy of god."

"Do not allow the Angelinian forces of troops to show any sensation of satisfaction for the grand and complete triumphs we have gained so easily to induce them to insult a fallen enemy though they be traitors and wicked enemies of our Lord. Allow no shooting of any kind watery whatever, nor no clamorous huzzas, increase their mortification. Any one who does shall be humbled themselves with firing frunting the firing squad. It can be that posterity will huzzu for us."

This glorious capture of sovast a rebel army, renewed hope and vigor throughout the main christian army under general Hanson vlyan. To the joyful tidings reached the rebel lines through secret signals. Also within the christian lines. Millions of candles were lighted, the sky reddened with rockets and roman candles, wit windows in every generals headquarters were thrown open to catch the cold weather, figures in night robes and night caps bent eagerly out to catch the thrilling news of Hansons victory, shouts were raised from hundreds of thousands of soldiers at once "Look the Gool is taken." soldiers in swarms rushed into the company streets of the besieging lines, even half clad many of them, they wept they laughed, and cheered.

The news of general Hansons victory flew upon the wings of the wind, nobody can tell how, and the shout of an enfranchised people or soldiers rose like a roar of thunder throughout the whole christi n lines of the besiegers....

The following morning of the twenty eight of December was cold and chill. One of general Hanson's best officers general Mayford had been making his usual rounds of the besieging lines during the time the roar of the rebel cannons was at its worst in replying to the besieging guns and he received a wound from the fragment of a shell which did not prove serious, and returned late in the afternoon, wet with sleet and snow and shivering with the cold and half deaf from the din of such an artillery storm and bewildering storm of bursting shells, and noise of great explosions. Though the wet snow was clinging still to his hair when he came home in to have his wound dressed he nevertheless sat down after changing his clothes, and feeling comfortable despite his wound sat down with general Hanson and other generals to hold a convention over certain matters concerning further movements of Hanson's line of besiegers. The following hour it grew colder again, and three inches of fresh snow lay upon the ground and the sky was darkened. After the convention the general felt a sensation as if he had taken cold his wound pained him severely and so all the evening he remained by the fireside. As it cleared up late in the afternoon he went out to supervise some work upon the building of batteries. He was then hoarse, and the hoarseness increased as night came on and the wound in his shoulder made his arm so weak that he could not hardly move it.

He however when examined by the doctor did not think it necessary to do as the doctor bid take some medicine for it saying:

"I don't believe the wound is mortal. It will soon goe."

He passed the evening as usual reading over important letters, answering questions of other generals and conversing with the unhappy civilian girls who had felt badly over Hanson's defeat at Gorm's Pass. About one o'clock at night he awoke in great pain and also in a severe chill and felt seriously unwell indeed. At sunrise his doctor was again sent for and he was predicted to be suffering from a mortal wound indeed. Everything was done for him but no relief came and he rapidly grew worse. Two other consulting physicians arrived and also general Hanson and as the general had difficulty in breathing and swallowing and which rapidly increased a venesection was attempted but with no results. It was now evident that the general considered his case very doubtful. He therefore destroyed some papers which he did not wish to have preserved and examined a note he had written to Hanson.

His sufferings from inflammation of the wound and of the throat and struggle for breath as the afternoon wore away became quite severe indeed and still the wounded general retained his mental faculties unimpaired, and even spoke briefly of his approaching end to his officers declaring he was not under any conditions afraid to go, and declared that he really did believe from his first attack from the wound that he should not survive it as it was a shell wound of great size, and that his breath could not last long. About eight o'clock the next morning his physician asked him if he would like to sit up in bed a little while. The wounded general held out his hands and was slowly raised upon his pillow when he said:

"I sure feel that I am going. I thank you indeed for your kind attentions. You had not better trouble about me any more as I wish to go off quietly as I know I cannot last long."

He then sank back upon his pillow and made a number of unavailing attempts to speak. About ten o'clock at night he said:

"I'm just going. Have me decently buried far away from the scene of war, and do not let my body be put into the grave until I am brought home to my poor wife and children in Abyssinkile. Do you understand me?"

"To the urgent reply 'Yes sir.' He remarked 'It is well. I hope to see my god as soon as possible.'"

These were the last words the poor general ever uttered. Soon after this he expired. At the moment of his death many of the generals including Hanson and even Violet and her sisters stood or sat in silent grief at the foot of his bed.

"Is the poor general gone?" asked Violet in a firm collected voice. The physician unable to speak from his emotion gave a silent signal of assent.

"It is well that he left the world in all its horror," she said in the same tremulous utterance. "All is over now for him. Many others will soon follow him. And we who live still have so many trials and adventures to pass through."

During the time of the fearful bombardment of the Fortress Gertrude Angeline and Thumbelina by the Angelinian fleets a certain war correspondent of distinction had been sent down to the region by one of his superiors on some business of his work in that location for the first time and had an old soldier assigned him as a guide. They arrived over the sea of Wickey Bay and came in the middle of the night to the scene of the fierce fight of Thumbelina. When through the thick clouds of smoke, the roaring of guns, the thousand conflagrations, he saw the fire of hundreds of thousand of great guns, the gigantic explosions, the conflagrations in Andree, the flashes of shells, the ships torn and sinking, the ground and interior of forts covered with thousands of mangled limbs and bodies of dead and dying, the ships of both sides simultaneously opposing each other in an inferno of battle, and sinking by the score burning or blowing up in the air, the gigantic geyzers of water made by explosions and the unusual immense quantity of pain and inconceivable misery, and destruction of so many crews by the wholesale yet I alive were thus with so much eagerness dealing round to one another, the fierce scenes around the transports, and the fierce land assaults of Thumbelina—he turned angrily and fiercely to his guide and exclaimed:

"You are one of the most blundering blockheads and fools I have ever come across. You are even completely ignorant of your business. You undertook to conduct me to one of the lowest depths of hell instead."

"No sir," said the guide. "I have not made any mistake whatever. This is really the earth and these are all the men. I don't believe any of the devils treat one another in this horrible and cruel manner or wage such horrible battles, for they brought me down into the lowest depths of hell instead."

Up to the time of his concentration upon the works at Aurandocallio Hanson civilian had been assiduous in his attendance upon his own troops devoting himself with tireless diligence to all his duties. He finally wished to cooperate with his brother who had a command of any other big army not so very far away and this of course was a severe trial to his own patriotism as it separated him from his own command for the time being leaving in his stead general Andree, whose imminent peril of capture by rebel cruisers a or warships. As he was an important general his capture would be of the greatest importance to the enemy. He probably would even be tried in civilian dock on the charge of treason against Thumbelina and on the other hand if he did not go and see his brother and give him advice in that fashion the results of the siege, and the very country itself would be in the most extreme peril. It was clear that without the aid of his brothers consultation the besieging armies must be crushed. So as what was to be expected of Angelinians the highest general he resolved to run all the risks and go. It was several days before he could secure a transport, and have rebel flags flying over it, and his crew disguised as rebel marines and sailors. On a cold day late in December, a wintry rough wind lashing the river waters into broken fields of ice and waves general Hanson took a and leave of his many best generals, and many children friends and the civilian girls also and also bid good bye to Gertrude Angeline and Jennie and was accompanied by his nephew general Gertrude. Hanson was rowed out to the transport called the Thumbelina by his riding at anchor at some distance from the river shore. The voyage down the river toward general Robert's lines was stormy, uncomforable, and eventful. Once or twice he was under fire from rebel shore batteries. When two days out three large rebel warships were seen, probably on cruising for the Thumbelina. They gave chase putting on full steam the steamer which Hanson was on however had engines that drove the ship faster than the other warships could go and they were soon run out of sight after exchanging some shots. The third rebel warship was a faster one continued the pursuit firing occasionally but failing to hit the transport. The win blowing so long had now rose to a furious gale. The snow clouds hastened the approach of the darkness of the night in which the ships lost sight of each other altogether and when morning dawned another dreadnought was no where to be seen. However on the following afternoon another warship bore insight. Trusting that it might be some prize they might be able to take the transport was then clear itself but seeing it was really a warship beat a hasty retreat. The rebels however hesitating to fire because the transport had the Angelinian flags flying, the captain in charge of the transport however begged his superior general Hanson civilian to retire to a place of safety below as the other rebel ships were coming. Soon after as the bullets and the shells of the hostile ships were flying or exploding over their heads, the captain saw general Hanson on deck with a musket and pistol in his hand fighting as a common marine. In the excitement of the moment the captain rushed up to his illustrious passenger exclaiming with authority:

"Why are you here general Hanson civilian? As long as I am in command of this ship you are under me and as you are on my ship I am to carry you to your brothers army safely and I will do it come what may." And seeing general Hanson in his strong arms he forcibly carried and almost dragged him from the scene of danger. On the following morning they came within sight of general Robert's encampments and they were once more reunited after Hanson had made the perilous trip down sixty five miles of the river.

During the time of Hanson's movement on the ship down the river the rebel general Mic-Hollister Johnston taking Manley's advice to strike the heaviest blow, but the forces of Andree had been prepared as well as expected and before the blow had been struck he had sent the Angelinian general Charles Brown with a big and strong raiding expedition to general Mic-Hollister's lines and this raid being terrific and by man force into the enemy's lines almost caused after the withdrawal of the latter himself. Scarcely five or six minutes had elapsed after the withdrawal of the latter encampment for and after the hurried escape of general Johnston and his family also her his headquarters was temporarily in the possession of the raiding Christian troops. Simultaneously the rebel lines seized also another section of assault upon another portion of the rebel lines seized many hundred of thousands of tents, burned his barns and fens, drove off the cattle, seized all the serviceable horses, cut the throats of the colts and left that whole section of the rebel encampment a smoldering blackened waste. Twenty seven hundred child slaves were carried off to the Christian lines to freedom.

spies in the meanwhile had declared the misery seen among prisoners in the hands of the foe. The worse suffering was seen among child slaves, given fresh captives taken and brought on the way to the rebel encampments were not allowed food or even water on the way and afterwards thrown into wretched army or internment camp prisons, without beds, medical attendance, or any means of dressing their wounds received in battle. They were even kept on the most miserable food, and to crown all many died of small pox and other diseases. Dying and dead lay thick on the ground in the prison pens and in the cold of winter the prisoners had no shelter what ever provided for them and death from freezing came to scores every day. One child a child slave who had been taken from the christian lines saw her brother and sister carried off her brother killed. Their mother came to the rescue of her two children and somehow through a trick obtained their exchange, and took them home and nursed them both, but the youngest child died in two or three days and the mother herself fell a victim to the disease. Thus the little girl was left all alone in the world and had to find her way to the christian lines and seek protection there.

During his short stay with general Vivian one of general Hanson's most exciting experiences was when he and his brother went out scouting. Hanson had went out numerous times and had such encounters. As he was out a shot was heard and a ball almost broke his ribs and glanced leaving a bad but not dangerous wound. General Hanson seeing it was a rebel sniper firing on him from a bush drew his pistol quickly and took deliberate aim and pulled the trigger. The pistol did not go off. He quickly examined it, and finding that it had stopped at half cock readjusted it and again taking good aim fired. The rebel recoiled and fell before he had a chance to fire a second shot. The ball had passed through his body just above the arm pits. Both parties were wounded but the rebel worse.

Later the same day two more snipers popped at Hanson and in the bloody fray which followed the six rebels were shot dead. Hanson and his brother's arm and shoulder were badly shattered by two balls and a slug from the shots of the rifles of the rebels. His wounds were very severe. While he was lingering for three days haggard and wan upon a bed of suffering news came that the rebels were planning and preparing a move a general attack upon general Henderson and Hanson's whole line near Guadalupe, and that in sorties and raids already the enemy Cargolians and Indians and Mangaboos were committing the most awful ravages.

Decisive action became necessary and poor general Hanson with his fractured bones just beginning to heal, his arm in a sling, and unable to mount his horse without assistance gave his amazing energies to get back to his lines. Indeed I can bet that no man of less resolute than either probably general Andrew Jackson or Hanson Vivian one an American and another an Angolinian could have conducted the concentration of his armies to a successful repelling of the foe in his condition. Though the whole time he suffered terribly from his wounds and debility conditions. He was sniped by rebel bushwhackers. Poor general Hanson Vivian was pale and haggard, and pain worn, often enduring the extreme of agony. Not many men suffering so much as he did would have been out of the sick chamber.

During all the time he remained in command of the army despite his wounds his sufferings was dreadful, but he bore them with the greatest fortitude never uttering a complaining word and holding to his work like a bulldog. During the time he suffered from his wounds he captured a large number of rebels who had been caught in the act of committing outrages upon the frontiers of the besieging christian lines. He punished the rebels severely and shot by court martial the leader and hung another rebel leader accused of inciting the glandelinians to revenge the murder of innocent children.

The cause of the greatest dread to approach Vivian Wickey by the merchant ships of other nations was indeed very unquestionably the terrible impression of glandelinian warships and their crews of sailors from any ships that they could capture and what nation it belong to did not matter. It was however believed that with the purpose to escape war and its horrors a great number of glandelinian sailors and marines did desert from their naval vessels and take refuge in the much easier service and better treatment of the merchant vessels of many other nations. And at that the glandelinian country herself was straining every nerve to strengthen her already powerful navy and the press gangs war gangs were also busy at work in many rebel seaports of glandelinia and at sea.

Once on board a rebel battleship the impressed sailors was subject to overwork, very bad rations and even the lash, and that did under this terrible regime will always remain a wonder to even the Angolinians themselves. But it was anyway very certain beyond doubt that glandelinians had deserted in great numbers and that they had early in the war before the siege of Vivian Wickey found in the commercial prosperity of the carrying trade of other nations a tempting chance of employment despite their being glandelinians as they were.

Now the glandelinian authorities at Vivian Wickey had a great contempt for the naval weakness of some of the other christian nations and assumed without claim the absolute right to stop all merchant and other ships of any nation near the coast or ships that dared venture near to examine the crews, and to claim as her own which whether they were or not any and sailors on as her own she chose to pick out.

This would have been very bad in itself but such in which the way the seafarers had been outraged was worse than the mere impressment of sailors by the Angolinians before 1812. The very form of insolence and overbearing was beyond describing that was exhibited. The rebels who claimed to seize rebel deserters even made pretense of kidnapping of a sailor of other nationalities. The glandelinian officers and outrageous kidnapping of a sailor of other nationalities. The glandelinian officers of blood cruisers, battleships, and privateers, and even transports went so far as to dare lay the burden of proof of nationality in each case upon the sailor himself whether he be a glandelinian or not, and whether he was with or without papers to prove his identification he was just the same assumed to be a rebel subject.

So such an extent had this insult been carried out to the flag of a christian nation that the country of glandelinia had a record of about 20, four 1845, cases of desperate impressment from her own ships, between the months of December and January November and December, and the country of glandelinia declared that the number of her sailors serving against their will in rebel war ships and transports was variously believed to be fourteen thousands.

It was even recorded in hundreds to thousands of cases that ships of many christian nations were obliged to return home or seek shelter in some stranger christian port, or go to Abbeinnia in the middle of their voyages, because their crews had been so diminished in numbers by the seizures made by rebel officers of rebel warships that they were rash the short landed to proceed. In not a few cases these depredations lead to even frightful bloodshed. The greatest outrage of all was the attempted capture of a large Protestantian war vessel called the Osema by the glandelinian dreadnaught the Lapard. The latter was by far more the most powerful vessel and the Protestantian warship was quite unprepared for action nevertheless her commander under any condition refused to yield to a demand that his crew be overhauled in search for rebel deserters. Whereupon the Osema poured broadsides upon broadsides upon the Protestantian warship which lapped poured broadsides upon broadsides until after a fierce combat the rebel flag herself was ripped with unerring aim until after a fierce combat the rebel flag herself was struck and the ship in a sinking condition. When hundred glandelinians were killed, and the remainder of the crew were taken away to Protestantian prisons, of these others who were released afterwards some were returned to Angolinia for trial, while in the other cases by the Protestantian sailing of the government on the question of the rebel warship was hanged. The loss of the Protestantian ship in killed and wounded was only three hundred. For both sides however it was believed the whole affair was without justification under the laws of neutrality and was in itself an ample ground with of for war with Protestantian and glandelinia. Protestantian however in a quite ungraceful and tardy way refused to apologize and offer reparation for the resistance to the rebel warship, as the outrage rankled all that time and nothing did more to fan the outbreak of hostilities. It was such deeds as this which led the Protestantian king to exclaim:

"The glandelinian authorities are not content with fighting Angolinia, blooding all ports of Angolinian property and maintaining other choirs with which to make the world suffer but seize upon all our own property which falls within her rapacious grasp, the personal rights of our own countrymen and other nations country men—right of all nations which must be forever secured—are trampled and violat ed violated by the complete impressment of our own and other nations seamen. What are we to gain if we intervene in Angolinia's cause and go to war against glandelinia? What are we to lose by peace if we will like cowardly hang a in the back ground and keep peaceful when a wicked nation like glandelinia is making the whole christian world suffer? We are powerful and can crush her alone and so why stay in the background? Glandelinia, a nation best treasure, and honor are ruined by glandelinia's insults. Protestantian is firmly at war with glandelinia and should do all in her level power to aid Angolinia, in every ship and men to crush Vivian Wickey, and rebel shores as well."

The attack on a commerce of christian nations was also a very serious danger to peace. I given in the early part of the very siege of Vivian Wickey both glandelinia and Angolinia adopted in strong practices the most extreme theories of non-intercourse between the neutral and hostile nations. It was the era of one of the worse series of blockades ever known for wars given already in Eastern Calvernia one thousand eight hundred miles of coast and seaports were blockaded by the Angolinians, whereupon Hanson and his authorities declared all coast of Abbeinnia and not to be outdone by Abbeinnia declared all coast of Abbeinnia and Angolinia guarded by ships, and that all of Calvernia western seaports and also all coasts of glandelinia, south west and coast were to be under blockade.

Up to a very certain point the interruption of the sea neutral trade relations between the countries of the other christian nations was to the commercial advantage of Angolonia and the world in general. Their carrying trade with Angolonia before the war had grown and prospered wonderfully, and much of this trade had consisted of taking goods from the countries of Angolonia everything necessary, bringing them first to Abbeville, then transshipping them and conveying them to other christian nations.

But after the outbreak of the war, and of the sieges in general and of the blockade all kinds of trading of this sort was forbidden by both sides. Angolonia and Angolonia combined absolutely forbade this system of transshipment as to nations with whom she was at war, and any vessel of which were caught engaged in this form of trade were seized and condemned or confiscated by Angolonia Prize courts. Naturally Angolonia also followed Angolonia's example and even went further and her courts of many christian nations who had actually been carrying on a few freights under the old system now found that their commerce was indeed woefully restricted. So all christian nations had toward the latter end of the first year of the war taken an absolute embargo and Angolonia been compelled to resort to a severe measure on absolute embargo on their own ships and its immediate result was to reduce the exports of the countries from nearly three hundred and sixty millions of dollars worth to nine million dollars worth in a few months.

In the meantime general Harrison, Avian too though suffering from his wounds decided before making a general advance upon Burnsideville determined to attack the rebel outposts about two miles in advance of the fortresses. This plan of attack however, however, as it might have seemed to a strategist failed wretchedly. In his first days of the desultory actions so far as regards the outcome showed nothing but reverses and evenness. There was a long and thinly settled line of works within the christian outskirts of the christian lines in which for two days the rebel forces of pickets struggled to hold their own desperately against the barbarous onslaughts of the Mangaboo divisions of the rebel lines, and expelling a mile across the borders into a portion of the christian lines, and fighting with some success but at last, cost the christian lines a great deal of the Mangaboo troops. The strength of one of the attempts was badly disrupted in an attempt to hold the fortified outer works under general Wayne, Walter Harrison, and other works against the attack of the Mangaboo. It was a desultory battle with the outskirts of the christian lines indeed, and still was disappointing was the complete failure of the attempt under the command of general Walter Jennings, to advance general Walter's divisions as an outpost into the rebel territory, and when he was easily driven back with much loss to his own works, and when the christian army was confidently awaiting to hear of a bold defense of his works, it was startled by the news that general Jennings had been severely wounded in a fierce engagement and his works captured by the Angolonia gladiolus. It was all on account of the treachery and cowardice of one of his generals, who was in fact built marveled by Jennings from his own bed as he lay wounded, and condemned to death.

General Harrison with general Proctor engaged the rebels from that part of the Mangaboo near one of the outposts and drove back the rebels from that part of the region and restored matters to the position in which they stood before Walter Jennings was defeated and wounded. In this fight the rebel general of the Mangaboo called with the rebels was killed and about thirty three thousand of the Angolonia, and fifty thousand of the Mangaboo were killed or wounded on the Angolonia side. Simultaneously in the west a force of Angolonia under general John Hunter Gumpin had been captured at a river town near the christian lines and there took place a terribly a atrocious massacre of large numbers of the prisoners by the Mangaboo, who were quite beyond restraint of their leaders. On the other hand the Angolonia had captured the rebel general York, and general York's rebel line was ambushed and captured, though at the cost of their leader general Pike head who with two hundred of his men was destroyed by the explosion of a land mine. A small vessel called portress St George had also been captured by the Angolonia, and an attack by the rebels on Harbor River had been gallantly repulsed. Following these desultory actions along the outer frontier of the christian lines extensive operations of an aggressive kind had been planned to bring toward the capture of one of the nearest and most important of the rebels but unfortunately a blunder occurred and the expedition was a complete fiasco.

We also we attempted to turn for consultation from the mortifying record of the defeated expedition to the stories of the continued and great successes which had accompanied the naval expeditions upon the river. On plain under Gump in his fleet ship called the Hornet's Nest won a complete victory over the rebel fleet led by the Angolonia flagship called the snowbird, and another small christian fleet led by the flash flagship called snow white captured the rebel flagship called snow Redding, and other equally welcome victories. A very repeated one distinct defeat had marred the record however, that of a fleet of two score of Angolonia ship commanded by Admiral Lawrence to which had been captured or partially destroyed after one of them had fought out its part of the war on fleets by the Angolonia fleet led by the rebel flagship called the "Mammoth" who Angolonia admiral himself was mortally wounded, exclaiming to his crews he was carried away to his cabin. Tell my boys not to give up the ships to the enemies of God but fight the rebels till she and the other ships find a watery grave. Either all die than surrender to the foe of our dear Lord who had died for them.

It was a paraphrase of this announcement which later Admiral T. M. Hollister made on a ship signal in rallying his comrades in the battle of Mids-Winter. Just a month later one defeat Admiral Lawrence's fate as a gallant Angolonia seaman and high minded Angolonia Patriot was unclouded, and best of all his death was more and more deplored throughout the country than the loss of his fleet which was sunk and his crew would surrender. In the latter part of the month of December the week before New Years General Harrison, expecting strange movements of the rebels at Burnsideville was enabled to send large reinforcements both to his armies and to the army engaged in the attacks and movements upon the rebels. It did seem for the time being on account of being crushed in the battle of Mids-Winter that general Wayne's army was crushed and his power temporarily broken. However, for some time after that part of Avian Wickley had at last their hands free. But before the reinforcements reached the besiegers a confronting in Burnsideville the rebel armies had won a greater credit and had shown more military skill by far than were shown in its earlier operations and it was evident elsewhere throughout Angolonia that the rebellion was going to grow very fierce in the extreme.

Along the whole line of the Mangaboo river active fighting of most savage description had been going on for a month every day and night. In one fierce action not far from the Mangaboo region a fierce conflict occurred at Burnsideville. A city junction, with also actions and captures of a portion of fortified works and an engagement of great violence at Galesburg, and the defense of fortified works near Galesburg, the troops under general James Hunter, Scott, Winfield, and general James Brown and his outposts holding their own and their slaughter against the superior rebel forces led against them under general Sherman, and had even won from the gladiolus officers themselves the admission that they fought as well under fire as angels themselves would.

More encouraging still was the total defeat of the plan of Mids-Winter to crush kindred christian main centre undertaken by the strengthened gladiolus army under general An. Annie Wade. These numbered about twelve million men and were supported by a battery of fortress guns, and by a fleet of unengaged rebel warships on the lake. St. Mary's. Their main operations were directed against Angolonia and in that terrible contest which called by that name the Angolonia flotilla under the command of general Wayne completely crushed and routed the rebel fleet, within a week and a half the rebels with the loss of ten thousand men and killed their admiral and two other high officers and captured twenty ships. As a result the heavy assaults upon the land fortifications raged the same time were crushed and the rebels were forced to beat a most rapid and indeed one of the most unqualified retreats were forced off before back to their main positions. This was the time the last important engagement near that region. Meanwhile great expeditions or onslaughts of great size were directed by the gladiolus army against general Sherman and western Angolonia. These onslaughts were made by general Frank Rose chiefly the pick of the best of christian gladiolus army. General Frank Rose moved straight against the christian position easily defeated the christian troops at the left with the loss of general Bladens who fought however with intrepidity for the most part, seized the Angolonia encampments, and carried out his intentions of destroying the general's headquarters, all the tents and barracks, and a great part of the christian encampments before he was checked by reinforcements. A further attempt upon the main position was less successful and in the frightful engagement some were killed. The Angolonia here made a brave and terrific defense, behind their main position upon extensive fortifications. At another part part of the battle the conflict raged on the river when a supporting rebel fleet after a severe bombardment of the christian positions by water was driven off with the loss of half the number of rebel ships. The gladiolus admiral had boasted that the rebels could hold in a few hours two days after they still held a still larger onslaught of rebel troops moved against the other section of the main christian line under general Lawrence. In this part of the engagement Bladens killed, and general Lawrence was wounded and his aiding christian Bladens killed and himself in this section was who was in command of the centre and distinguished himself in this part of the bloody battle by putting down with a strong force supported by artillery and cavalry the hostile Mangaboo attack and killed their leading general. Furthermore, Williamson and captured the surrender of general Menden and his division of Mangaboo. General Hunter who commanded five million troops sent against Lawrence troops expected an easy victory. But Jackson's army who had expected the storm had summoned to the aid of the other portion of the christian lines the stalwart christian and christian lines which were made up of Abbeville's Brin Brigade men used from boyhood with the rifle and was made up what was in fact a splendid war army of christian soldiers who christian troops here expecting the attack had several days before threw up eight extensive and lofty mounds mostly of snowbanks, and forts, cotton bales, and non cotton bales and every thing on the line line of old broken engines, dead animals and also of abatis and sugar barrels filled with hands who attack of the rebels was wild terrific and even box houses.

The gladiolians were repulsed again and again with dreadful loss in men and generals but still made gallant and persistent attacks on the christian fortifications. They were Angelinian however only fallen away from their mother country and turned wicked and so fought as desperately as the Mohammedans. They would not give up even when their lines were torn and shot to pieces and all their flag bearers were mutilated. Regiments dissolved away like snow, the lines and grape tore the soil into lines through and through, and only when their main command was killed and fifteen generals down wounded together with many officers and men did the rebels tardy night fall abandon the assault. Seven hundred thousand rebels lost their lives in that mad struggle. One gladiolian officer who looked more like a pretty girl with his bobbed hair and closely shaven face had plucked with a small body of troops to the top of the Angelinian earthworks and demanded the surrender of the Argo, Angelinians, whereupon he was taken prisoner when he realized that the men he supposed to be supporting him had vanished as if the earth had swallowed them up. The Angelinian losses was heavy but the rebel loss was three times more and only three christian generals fell.

During the repulse of the rebels a company of gladiolians had captured a large brass six pounder and was trying to remove it, but one hundred and eighty Abyssinians fell upon these gray coated Mongolians with such vigor that they after a few minutes resistance turned and fled losing over 1 several men. An Angelinian was killed.

However on the following morning the battle was renewed more furiously than ever. The rebel soldiers who were at this point under weak and incompetent commanders were again dispersed and driven out of the region after some fierce countercharges by the Angelinians. But general man ganta glama an able general, and false and cruel took the field, with an army or division of several million men he crossed the little stream before him and renewed the attack against the Angelinians. One section of a christian encampment was defended by a force of one hundred and seventy five thousand Abyssinians. Among them or their leaders were generals Groucher and James David. The main force was commanded by general Samuel Hanson a brave young young Angelinian. On the approach of the immense rebel line they had to abandon the encampment and took refuge behind their high earthworks about half a mile to the north of the burning camp. For two days this line of christian withstood the rebel assaults and decimated them. A shower of bombs and shrapnell, and grape and canister fell incessantly among the attacking rebel lines, but at last after a most brave defense by the small force of Angelinians against such an overwhelming odds the works were captured, and the prisoners captured by the rebels were massacred in cold blood. But this was not the worse. At another part of the line of battle where the rebels however in their assault was not successful a company of christian soldiers had been captured under colonel jamie and captain Gollader were marched in different directions and forced in front of the advancing rebel troops and were threatened with the deaths of dogs if they did not endeavor to induce the christian soldiers behind the parapets to stop firing on the rebel lines. It did no good however for the Angelinians seeing the prisoners advancing with the rebels were rebel in Angelinian uniforms fired upon them also and not a man escaped. The assault was therefore repulsed in the bargain. While these horrible events were taking place general Moustier with general Gonzales advanced to the support of the christian right with a force of less than four hundred thousand men.

This general had received intelligence of the atrocious massacres and of the rebel advance. General Bexar had been wounded and was unable to take command and his division was crushed. The beaten portions of the christian line seemed to be in a state of panic. Troops being driven back in confusion seemed to be everywhere abandoning their encampments under shell fire, and fleeing in terror at the approach of the gladiolian soldiers. General Moustier's force of a few hundred thousand men was the only defense of the broken line, and during the action this was even diminished by frequent losses in the ranks. The holding of this position without at all strong reinforcements seemed utterly hopeless. However in order to gain time while watching his opportunity for a counter attack general Moustier slowly withdrew the remainder of the sagged christian line and the whole retreated slowly before the rebel line of advance. After waiting for two hours for reinforcements which he soon received he moved forward again with general Bayous division of Abyssinians and coming to a small stream connecting with the worm run river, he made preparations to meet the advance of the rebel surge and counter charge it. The lines of battle being formed again general Moustier made one of his most impassioned and eloquent appeals to his Angelinian troops firing every breast by giving as a watchword:

"Remember the innocent child leaves even demand their freedom. Give the enemies of children all the fight they want. Let's show our superior general Hanson that we wasn't afraid to fight against overwhelming odds."

Soon the rebel bugles rang out over the region announcing the victorious advance guard of the gladiolian army, almost two million eight hundred thousand strong.

The rank and file of the rallied christian divisions was less than seven hundred and fifty thousand men. Their disadvantages served indeed to increase their enthusiasm of the christian soldiers and when their great general said to them: "There is the wicked enemies of innocent children and of our dear and blessed Lord: do you wish to fight them and show them what they are?"

The universal answer was: "Yes, let's go at them!"

"Remember it is for the Liberty of little children or theirs!"

CHAPTER FIFTY - J.W.O.

THE BREAKING OUT OF GREY'S REGIMENTARY BATTLES NOT FAR FROM AURANDICAILO. WHAT CAME OF THEM.....

The glandelinians were repulsed again and again with dreadful loss. Men and generals but still still made gallant and persistent attacks on the christian fortifications. They were Angelinians however only fallen away from their mother country and turned wicked and so fought as desperately as the Nationals. They would not give up even when their lines were torn and shot to pieces and all their flag bearers were annihilated. Regiments dissolved away like snow, shot to pieces and tore the p and main line through and through, and only when their main commander was killed and fifteen generals down wounded together with many officers and men did the rebels toward right fall abandon the assault. Seven hundred and men lost their lives in that and struggle. Van ...

more like a pretty girl ...

The rank and file of the rallied christian divisions was less than seven hundred and fifty thousand men. Their disadvantages served indeed to increase their enthusiasm of the christian soldiers and when their great general said to them: "Then there is the wicked enemies of innocent children and of our dear and blessed Lord; do you wish to fight them and show them what they are?"

The universal answer was:

"We do. Let's go at them."
"Well then," He said "Remember it is for the Liberty of little children or theirs and our deaths. Remember we are fighting to crush Child slavery."
At the moment of attack a lieutenant general came galloping up his horse covered with foam and shouted along the lines as loudly as he could:

"My troops have cut down all the bridges."
Each army, the rebel and christian, had used this bridge, the Angelinians in retreating, and the rebels in coming upon them, and general Houser had ordered the destruction of these bridges, thus preventing all hopes of escape for the rebels should they be vanquished. General ganks glausse glandelinian forces were in perfect order, moving forward not expecting the Angelinians to counter attack them, but as the Angelinians rushed forward a portion of their rebel line was thrown into confusion but the main line held and reserved their musketry fire while the cannon shot and shell tore gaps in their lines. On and on came the Angelinians with their yells of savages and the rebels waited until the christians were within sixty paces of their works. Then they poured forth one of the most tremendous volleys an enemy had yet ever poured forth, and the roar and crash of musketry and the din of cannons and machine guns was deafening and shook the earth. Down went many columns of the unfortunate Angelinians and a ball struck general guster in the leg and another in the shoulder and desperately wounded him, and a shell fragment inflicted a painful wound near his left side. Though suffering and bleeding as he was, general Houser kept his saddle during the entire action. The Angelinian assault being supported by artillery as it was was repulsed but another was promptly made after a short lull, and in this wild rush the Angelinians themselves were reserved their own fire until it was given to the enemy almost in their very bosoms, and then having no time to reload and answer the return withering fire which mowed them down in tens thousands the survivors with terrific yells made a general rush upon the foe who were altogether unprepared for the furious charge.

The Angelinians clubbed their muskets or used bayonets and daggers and fired pistols and rifles point blank, and after a desperate hand to hand fight the great of the rebels soon began as suddenly a heavy force of troops sent by Hanson to the support of general Houser and the rebels ran like sheep. Suddenly however a force of Angelinians came moving up from another direction and half of the rebel force was captured with general gaus himself. The fierce action only closed with the night. Seventeen thousand of the Angelinians were killed in those two charges lasting only half an hour each, and two hundred and twentythree thousand were wounded, while the rebel loss in the whole battle that day of gausse army was six hundred and thirty two thousand in killed and wounded, and seven hundred and thirty thousand among whom was their chief general were made prisoners or had deserted. Thus his victory so gloriously gained as it was struck the fetters forever in this rebel division and drove back the standard of this rebel division back across the gorma gun never to return except in predatory and transient excursions or in defense of their fortifications at gorma gathering.....

Indeed for the gentle readers the History of this great Child slave rebellion ought to forever set at rest the main idea that the day of heroes is past—that there are no longer, and could no longer be great men to be found in occasions of great need. As it seemed never was the states of Galverinia seemingly more helpless than Galverinia and even Angelinia herself when the rebellion had its outbreak with the results of the seizure of the strongest fortresses and fortified city in the world, Vivian Wickey and her sectional towns and cities. Vivian Wickey as declared before without large army, or navy, a government and Galverinian authorities here and there throughout Galverinia honeycombed with treason and treachery, and apparently falling to pieces even, with a weak and nerveless and cowardly administration giving place to one made up of new and untried men a people in Vivian Wickey without in unity of mind or purpose whatever and not knowing whom to trust at all thus was and had been the situation which all loyal Galverinians strong for Angelinia's Cause faced with sinking hearts when Vivian Wickey was glandelinia's possession so quickly..... Yet only in days later after the capture of Vivian Wickey and the gorma gun echoed over Angelinia and Galverinia, all was changed in the twinkling of an eye. At the call for new armies to march to and lay siege to Vivian Wickey it seemed as though immense armies had sprang from the very ground. Among among these immense armies were not only soldiers, but great commanders with no fear of the enemy and only the fear and Love of god in their hearts—the only men who were needed to organize and drill these mighty christian hosts, to convert them into good and great fighting armies, and lead them on to lay the siege.

THE BREAKING OUT OF SEVERE DESULTORY BATTLES NOT FAR FROM AURANDRECALLIO. WHAT CAME OF THEM.....

In many acts in this story we can get a glimpse indeed of the extreme boldness, the readiness of resource and especially the dogged determination which made general Hanson ivian such a power in war and such a powerful leader of the Angelinian armies. He was the "Grant of the Angelinian armies, and though of course he lost severe battles he nevertheless was such a very obstinate man that no general in the war on either side won more battles than he did.

On the morning of December 27th the telegraph had flashed over the entire rebel country around ivian wickey which gave warning of the concentration of armies around or near Aurandrecallio. General Hancock Johnston being in the main danger urgently begged for seven seventy million volunteers or reinforcements and that evening the rebel generals headquarters and his outposts was packed with an excited crowd of rebel generals and other officers as well as men. General Manley himself being known as an able general was then called upon to preside on the convention. This was not the kind of duty for which he had been prepared for but he said with much embarrassment and some prompting:

"I made out, to announce the object of the meeting, to declare to you all that general Hanson ivian though defeated at Ev n Evangelinia Grania had withdrawn from that point only to mean as a more important and still was weaker point of the siege. Things worse to complicate is that the dreaded Concentinian Armyburg is near Jennie wiy n ivian having defeated us there also and our cause is in danger unless general Hanson's plans can be frustrated."

Big forces of troops were called for, other companies were brought immediately to the spot of the threatening danger and many of the officers were ordered to take command.

Since his concentration at or near Aurandrecallio during the early part of the latter month of December general Hanson ivian first real battle of any severity was at Belmont gun about twenty miles below gun junction with the Sunbeam river which he his right wing thus engaged won after four hours of most hard fighting. After the first action of the battle on the first half an hour the rebels which had been reinforced, received even artillery and there had been extreme danger indeed that a portion of general Hanson's left wing could be cut off from the main division of Angelinians and from the wooded country from which they had come. The generals perceived the situation, and exclaimed in telegraphic telegraphing to Hanson:

"We are surrounded by the rebel troops."

"Well," replied general Hanson "Why don't you cut your way out then? If you had cut your way in and now cut your way out and show the rebels you ain't afraid to fight."

And they did. At other sections of the line it was a time indeed of weary waiting, which for the time severely tried the spirit of the whole christian army.

Attention was chiefly concentrated upon the whole region of Belmonts Run, where general Hanson hearing of the action going on along his left wing had been reorganizing the splendid army thus driven into confusion by a rebel onslaught, which another commander led to final victory. Knowing what was going on at his left general Hanson determined to relieve the pressure by pushing forward against general George Henrys glandelinian troops and general Donaldsons whose lines though a blunder of the main rebel leader was about two miles apart from each other, on the Gale creek and the Sunbeam, or near where these two small little rivers crossed the line divided dividing the opposing lines from each other. He had told one of his generals of his plan of attacking these important rebel divisions by land forces and cooperating at the same time with a fleet of gunboats and warships, and also Merrimac and monitors under Commodore Stanok. It was a bitter conflict.

Amid a storm of sleet and snow the men under heavy fire pushed doggedly along the snow covered roads and fields, and stormed and captured general Henrys works, as a severe engagement of an hours duration and helped by the fire of the gunboats and other war craft. At the same time general Kindermine Hanson's orders turned his attention to general Donaldsons lines of wheelers which had been immediately reinforced by a large part of the garrison which had been sent from Aurandrecallio. This column was also under the commands of generals Buckenorton, Floyd Wacker, and Izner Myletze and general Jun Jinger with twenty million men. For three hours three desperate attacks along a ten mile front was kept up, and general Buckenorton who having been once a friend of general Kindermine when a little boy and who knew that he and Hanson together were very obstinate men found that so save his troops from destruction he had to withdraw and the works were speedily carried.

with the capture of these works followed the capture or destruction of one million five hundred and fifteen thousand glandelinians, besides thirty thousand five hundred horses, six hundred and sixty five cannon, a great quantity of small arms and military stores. It was the first most splendid christian victory any where around ivian wickey and the whole besieging christian army and even the christian nation itself was electrified.

The main section of the great battle was fought by general Hanson himself with a certain select section of his army against the glandelinians known as the Yungaboos. In this battle general Roswell Gustar Johnston Hanson's a friend of general Lindernines when a little boy and who knew that he and Hanson together were very obstinate men found that so save his troops from destruction he had to withdraw and the works were speedily carried with the capture of these works followed the capture or destruction of one million five hundred and fifteen thousand glandelinians, besides thirty thousand five hundred horses, six hundred and sixty five cannon, a great quantity of small arms and military stores. It was the first most splendid christian victory any where around ivian wickey and the whole besieging christian army and even the christian nation itself was electrified.

The main section of the great battle was fought by general Hanson himself with a certain secto section of his army against the glanc glandelini re known as the yungaboos. In this battle general goowell guster Johnston Hansons chief lieutenant showed great gallantry and in indeed these two christian generals tested each others qualities in the first greatest trial which either generals had been exposed. The battle was one of the first turning points of the siege of ivian wickey. The rebels under general Albert Maldon convention one of the best rebel generals and the highest general of all glandelinian commanders next to go-Hollester Johnston attacked general goowell guster Johnston's army at Tin Woodmans gun. All those four hours at this point the battle raged with unceasing and most savage fury. The brave glandelinian general was killed, but for the first three hours the Angolinian forces under general goowell guster Johnston demoralized by the wounding of their commander was driven back with great loss, and of for a time during a commingled confusion of confusion the r lines were a mile and a half to the rear of their positions which they had a few hours before.

A whole christian encampment of tents, by the million, a city of barracks, and many big guns and a long line of earthworks had been captured by the rebels and the barracks set on fire. General Hanson ivian at that time had just come to his headquarters tent during the time of the disaster when to say any but the most bravest and most sanguine men would have thought the battle was lost but general Hanson said;

"It has been tough work to day but we will have the position back in another hour my name is not Hanson ivian."
When his generals and other staff heard of this they were as fully persuaded of the results of the next hours contest as when the victory had been actually won. The next hour after dreadful fighting of redoubled savagery, the tide turned in favor of the Angolinian forces. In the afternoon of that fourth hour of carriage general Hanson ivian led a tremendous counter charge against the rebel lines, under which they gradually broke, and were driven back with horrible loss. Night found the Angolinian armies again in possession of the field after one of the severest battles of the siege around worna Catherine.

Nevertheless the situation of the whole siege with its slow progress to an ending and results was full of gloom for the christian armies and the world in general. The glandelinian cause looked as it was seemed to be further advanced than at the beginning of the rebellion. Many of the Angolinian authorities even despaired of ever seeing the recapture of ivian wickey, and even despaired of ever saving Angolinia's Holy Cause. Although general Hanson ivian and some of his greatest generals never lost faith in the final triumph of the Holy and righteous cause, the Angolinian governments and even the authorities and even the world itself on account of the already passed Christmas sorrow and other incidents of regrettable consequences were uneasy and terribly anxious. Even many of the authorities of Calverinia and even Angolinia from discouragement, may even in Calvernia itself went against the parties which advocated the carrying on of the tremendous war. Voluntary enlistments had even ceased, the draft was a fiercely opposed throughout the states and it became necessary to restore the spirit of the conscription. Unless a most great success came to restore the spirit of the people of the Angolinian states it seemed utterly probably that the enforced draft itself would be resisted as fiercely as the rebels resisted the Angolinians themselves, that immense numbers of men would even begin to desert, and that the power to capture and punish deserters would be lost. In a word it was positive that a very great success was absolutely necessary to prevent any of the hundreds of Angolinian armies and the Angolinian cause itself from fairly going to pieces.

It was even general Hansons main conviction that his own armies, and armies elsewhere throughout Calverinia must at all hazards "go forward to most decisive victories.".....

THE FIRST ATTEMPTS UPON FORTRESS AURANDEACALLIO AND ITS RESULTS.

Before I begin with the actions I must give a slight description of Aurandecallio one of the Gederline fortresses and how it was situated. This fortress looking like a literal town of concrete fortresses and barracks, and encampments and high railroads of breastworks, abatis and lines of great cannons stood on a long high bluff on the western banks of the great Sunbenn Creek or river and stretched toward Jennie, Vivian and just at the point where the small river pursues a winding course through its fertile fertile and paradise like valley and empties into the great woman Run river itself. From this point ran the Mio-Hollester and Pa Pandora Main Line of railroad going to the west from west, and from the opposite shore the Abbeannin, Gondolin, and Calverline ran southwestward through the rich level wooded country of Vivian Wickes. All the rebel works even here were strongly fortified and from this high elevation it commanded not only the Sunbenn Creek in both directions but also both opposite sides of the woman Run as well and all approaches from Jennie, Vivian and Glorinda, which was only two miles away. So long as this gigantic fortress was held by the Confederate armies of the glandelinians, no point of the woman gun river could be opened to navigation, or neither could the full of Vivian Wickes be brought about, and the line of railroads running east and south kept communication open between the western, eastern, southern and northern parts of the glandelinian Confederacy of Vivian Wickes, and Calverline. Now to capture Vivian Wickes main and real strongest fortress of all was a great problem, but it was one which general Hanson determined should be solved at any cost.

For all the time since his advance to Vivian Wickes, over eight months altogether general Hanson Vivian had worked at this problem. During his advance from Abbeannin to Vivian Wickes after his repulse at the battle of Calverline Hills general Hanson and many of his commanders and even general Conrad from Aronburg had formed plan after plan, and so had the Angelinian authorities but only to be forced to give them up. At the first arrival of his armies general Conrad from Aronburg had sent general Viviananna to make a direct attack at the only place where it may have been surely practicable to make a landing but failed most terribly. Even general Hanson's besiegers had spent weeks and months in cutting a canal and putting bridges across the neck of the river Peninsula, formed by the great bend in the woman river going through Vivian Wickes in a way to separate woman from Aronburg and Pullio Gallo from Aronburg, so as to bring the main besieging fleet of Christian ships through without undergoing the fire of the rebel batteries of many hundreds of thousands of guns, but the rebels made a flood which destroyed the work, and then launched an assault which resulted in a complete destruction of one part of Hanson's army and frustrated all his plans entirely. Meanwhile during the beginning of the winter many of the troops had been ill with diseases caused by the way he hurled bombarded with disease germs, and many had died. Here had been such clamor even at the Abbeannin authorities to have general Hanson removed for his own health, as his own exertions was overworking the poor general, but as the general refused to allow himself to be removed unless a better general could be put in his place he remained. He nevertheless had great faith in his superior general Hanson Vivian and the authorities hoped he would take proper time to work out the great problem—how to get below, and to the rear of Aurandecallio on the two rivers without placing his troops in danger from the fire of fortress Angelina or Gertrude Angelina as she is probably called and also from the fire of the fortress Thumbelina and Vivian. This seemed at first to be at last accomplished. On a dark night December twenty eighth a large fleet of Angelinian gunboats, warships, monitors and transports were successfully ran past the batteries through the ice cakes floating in the river, although every one of them more than a score of thousands of every description in one long line thirty miles long was more or less damaged by the guns, and a number of transports sunk. No lives however were lost on this stirring occasion. At the same time the fleet ran past the batteries of Vivian Wickes forts general Hanson ordered a portion of his troops across the peculiar peninsula and then sending artillery to be taken over the two creeks and on December thirtieth the whole force of artillery was landed on the woman gun river side on high ground beyond the main rebel lines, and at a point he had hoped he could reach the enemy. The railroad running east and west from Vivian Wickes connected it with Aronburg, while which to the Angelinians had been a very important railway-centre, and from it, and even from Calverline and her underground railroads Vivian Wickes was supplied. General Hanson not wishing to delay any time made his movements with the greatest rapidity. He fought in quick succession a succession of small battles or skirmishes by which a small portion of rebels works under general Jackson were captured, then turned westward, he attacked the rebel forces under general Mio-Alister Stank himself drove his troops back a mile, cut off some of his supplies, and started to lay siege to Aurandecallio and at the same time thrown shells by the hundred score per day into woman Catherine and the fortress itself. He was then under desultory fire from Silverbell, Turner Hill, Gertrude Angelina, and fortress Vivian but he replied and on one occasion started an artillery duel nearly equally to the violence of the bombardment by the fleets of Thumbelina which was going on at the same time with really the purpose to help general Hanson in his plans to prevent Thumbelina throwing too many shells at Hanson.

Indeed indeed when Hanson's movements were learned not only the whole nation but the eyes of the whole anxious world was now centred on Aurandecallio the main stretch of the Lucif in Jackson fortresses in person over twenty two thousand two hundred guns of heavy calibre, mortars, and knapsack and calibre were brought to bear upon the regions around Aurandecallio, besides the batteries of the fleet. Even in an default of bigger mortar, guns were improvised by boring out tough log logs, strongly bound with iron and iron bands, which also did good service. The troops of rebels in the outer sections of the fortresses had to build dugouts and steep trenches also like that in the last European war and even seek shelter in the main fortresses, and in caves to escape the storm of shot and shell.

But with food of all kinds failing to become scarce on account of the underground tunnels the rebels had to keep up the horror, and at this time in the whole world flour could be sold at five to twenty dollars a pound, molasses at twelve dollars a gallon and other food stuffs at outrageous prices.

The endurance and devotion and devotion of the rebel soldiers to their many generals were wonderful and though the siege and bombardment of woman Catherine, and Aurandecallio, and Thumbelina by both the army and fleet was rigidly and relentlessly maintained there nevertheless seemed to be no end but to force matters by a terrific assault. One rebel division however which happened to be surrounded and cut off from help and provisions of any kind, soon displayed flags of truce on their works, and the rebel general who refused to prolong the siege sent a message to general Hanson asking for an armistice, and proposing that the prisoners be appointed to arrange terms of surrender. General Hanson refused his request demanding only an unconditional surrender with the stern warning that he was preparing to move troops at once upon all portions of rebel works. So at an hour after general Hanson and the rebel commander met under weeping willow trees between the two lines of armies and immediately arranged the terms of surrender. It took six hours for this rebel division to march out in rank file and at a stack their arms. There were surrendered three hundred and thirty five thousand men, two thousand two hundred and fifty five cannon, and a great quantity of arms and ammunition and other materials of war.

But the main moral advantage to the cause of the Angelinian nation was far beyond any material gain as it goes. The fall of this division of glandelinians carrying with it general Hudson's brigade half a mile beyond which surrendered to general Jack Evans did not bring the main results for the situation at Aurandecallio. Nevertheless the new news of these two great Christian victories came to the main armies, and throughout the whole country of Glorinda on the same day with the news of the results of Thumbelina, the rejoicing of general Hanson and Evans great triumph was indeed indescribable. This caused the heavy load of worries to be lifted off the minds of the members of the Angelinian and Abbeannin governments, the Angelinians and loyal Calverlinians took heart, and even like good Christians resolved again to prosecute the war to its finish with greater energy than ever. The name of general Hanson Vivian and general Jack Evans was on every tongue. It was everywhere felt throughout not only the warring states and countries but throughout the whole world itself, that they were the foremost men of the siege.

Early that following morning general Hanson Vivian paid general Robert Vivian his brother another important visit near Jennie, Vivian and not far from Carbondale and while there indeed had a narrow escape from death, riding one day throughout the lines when the main artillery duels were unusually active his horse immediately took fright at the near explosion of a shell, and in running away with him came into collision with a gun carriage, throwing himself down and almost falling his his rider. Hanson was considerably wounded but he to retain the results thus gained had to stick to his command.

BIO TURNER HILL AND TURNER RUN.

The region of Turner Hill lied layed in the beautiful valley or near the South of the woman gun river fronting the seacoast south of Vivian Wickes. This was usually an important rebel stronghold and directly south the front of the woman river's hill rose abruptly to the height of one thousand two hundred feet above its own base affording a most magnificent view indeed which extends into six different sections of Vivian Wickes, and the woman gun river of its winding course and deltas through the woman city. Two miles and a half to the south running from east to east to west was the dividing crest of Evangelina Granda Heights, five hundred and sixty feet high above sea level, a literal stronghold of the generals. These sections were still occupied by portions of the armies under general Manley under general Palmer, and his commanding positions, strengthened by more fortifications was now considered completely impregnable. Indeed the masterful battle of woman Catherine and Evangelina Granda had left most of general Hanson's armies for a time before its withdrawal to the other region near Aurandecallio in a most perilous situation indeed.

General Thomas Greathart-a portion of general Hanson's army was left behind in its movements toward Surandecallio was hounded in by the Glandelinian forces, and his men and horses were reported almost starving. The whole Christian army under Greathart was already on quarter rations. Even most of all his ammunition was completely exhausted, and the troops were short of uniforms, clothing and provisions of other kinds. Scores of thousands of army horses and mules worn out and even starved or killed in battle lay dead along the snow covered roads. The town of Searostrow not far from Vivian Wickey and under the siege occupied by the Christian army was too strongly fortified for general Balmers to take it by storm or assaults but every day shells from his batteries upon the heights of Turner Hill had been thrown into the town and into general Greathart's army. This was indeed the situation when general Hanson, Vivian Wickey and some from his severe accident, arrived back toward his lines near Surandecallio. Learning of the condition of Greathart's army and having also missed him and the troops he had wrote to Great Heart immediately;

"For God's sake and for the sake of phristia nity and for Childrens Freedom Freedom, hold the region of Turner gun at all hazards. I will be there as soon as possible with a troop of soldiers."

While general Hanson placed general Kindernine in main charge of the army once more he moved rapidly with the other part toward Turner gun and indeed his movements was more rapid and decisive than was either expected by Greathart of Balmers. He ordered the troops he had brought concentrated before Searostrow, and while he was fighting a sanguinary two hours battle at Hatchleton which broke general Balmers hold for a while on Turner Run below a and shortened at the same time the Angelinian supplies and relieved the answer from general Greathart;

"We will hold Turner Region and the town until we starve or suffer annihilation."

It was a brave reply but good to Hanson quickness he did not need to make such a sacrifice and by his prompt and vigorous preparations, he soon had general Greathart's troops lifted out of the demoralized conditions which they had sunk after the defeat at Wornossinia. One more day after his arrival were fought the furious memorable battles of Turners Hill and Turners Run by which a portion of the strongest of Balmers troops were driven back to the heights, with their hold on the region partly broken up and a large number of prisoners and guns captured. Nothing in the history of the siege of Vivian Wickey or the actions of the war itself was indeed more inspiring and thrilling than the furious impetuous bravery with which hundreds of Angelinian and Abbeisamian troops fought their way across the region under the fire of millions of muskets and thousands of cannon, and under a more severe fire pushed and drove their way up the steep mountain sides, bristling with cannons and teeming with musketry, and after five charges each of half an hours duration finally drove the rebels out of their works at the point of the bayonets and drove them pell mell up to the heights of Evangelinia Granis. One of general Balmers staff officers declared in one of his writings to general Manley;

"It was considered that our positions in the lower valley itself was perfectly impregnable, that the top of the hill teamed with cannon, and fortified works, and sandbags, and had a long line of abatis in front, while scores of thousands of rifle pits were scattered all up the sides of the mountain forming the deadliest ambushes. When I had seen the National troops in red and purple uniforms after capturing the positions in the lower sections at the base and then come up the sides of the mountains like swarms of ants, toward our main positions I and my men and officers could hardly believe our eyes. It was believed that every man of the Angelinians must have been either drunk, reckless of life, or crazy. We shot them down in countless numbers and tore immense gaps in their lines but nothing could check them and over they came and drove all before us."..... them.

Indeed I don't believe any history could have any parallel for sublimity and pictorial picturesqueness of effect for any battle whatever, while the consequences, which were the division of the main Glandelinian Gonde Confederacy in the west, was inestimable. These victorious assaults had been led by general Jack Evans himself, and after his great successes at Turner Hill and Turner Run the popular demand came that he should be put at the head of all the armies at Vivian Wickey, and these demands became completely irresistible. Elsewhere the magnificent army of Angelinia after nearly a year of fighting throughout all parts of Galverinia, and some parts of Angelinian had been barely able to turn back from the north or south the terrible tide of Glandelinian Invasion, and other armies seemed apparently as far as ever from capturing Crowley, Galverine, Vainity Fair, and Vivian Wickey.....

In the west and east on the other hand now, general Hanson Vivian though having been repulsed at Evangelinia Granis, or Lieghburg, landing also in two of the first most desperate battles of the war, had now begun to win victory after victory, had driven off the forces out of Garbondolor, Jomde Vivian, and was now nearing all approach to Surandecallio and general Jackson Evans had captured Turners Hill and Turners Run, and a portion of Hanson's army had taken Ann Aronburg, opened up a part of the Turner gun, the whole of gun Beas Creek, and divided the Glandelinian confederacy in four parts in Vivian Wickey in both the west north, east and south. In response to the call for general Jack Evans the hero and friend of Violet and her sisters governor Hanson Vivian revived the Angelinian grade of Lieutenant general which had been held only by one commander general Herdrude Gerogea who had been retired, and general Jackson Evans the hero of Turner Hill and Turners Run, and other great battles was nominated by general Hanson Vivian, confirmed by the Gal Loyal Galverinian and Angelinian and Abbeisamian government authorities, and under general Hanson placed in command of all the armies of the nation.

The relief of general Hanson Vivian in having such men as general Jack Evans and his brother, and Goncentinian Aronburg and other great generals under him was very great as great as anything that would be anxiously expected and suddenly came.

"General Jackson Evans, My brother, Kindernine, and Goncentinian Aronburg and many of my generals under me are the best generals I or the nation itself have ever had." He remarked once to Gertrude Angeline and even to Jomde Turner and his sisters Violet and her sisters. "You little girls having had many experiences during the war already know how it has been with all the rest. As soon as I had put generals in command of the army at any point of the field they would always come to me, Goncentinian Aronburg, Evans, Kindernine or Hanson with their plans, and even have as much nerve as to say 'Now I don't believe we can really do it at all, you see the rebels are very stubborn, but any way if you say so we will have to try it on.' and so put the full responsibility of success or failure upon me and them. They all wanted me to be the general. From their ways I have had to relieve them of their commands as you know. Now it is not so like this with any of my generals such as you are now experienced with here at Vivian Wickey. Whether general Hanson or Goncentinian Aronburg or your friend and guardian or others have even told me what any of their plans have been or are. I or even Hanson do not know and we do not want to know. I am glad and even happy as a free bird to find men who can go ahead and do things without me. When any of the rest had set out on campaigns, they would always look over every matter and always pick out some one thing or other they declared they were short of, and which they surely knew that under any conditions whatever I or the national government could not give them, and then they would go on and tell they they could not hope to win any battles unless they had it, and it was most generally cavalry and artillery. Now when general Jack Evans my best general next to Goncentinian Aronburg and others took hold I was waiting to see what his pet impossibility would be, and I reckoned it would be cavalry, or course we did not have even enough horses to mount what men we had.

At the time I began my campaign for Vivian Wickey as you little girls surely know there were fifteen million men up at Abbeisamian waiting for me to march down and join them and as they were all cavalry there were no horses to put them on. I placed Evans in command and expected him to ask me for horses but he did not. Instead Evans sent to me also about those very men, just as I had indeed expected but to my joyful surprise what he wanted to know was whether he should make an infantry of them, and if not he would like to use them as reserves or disband them as home guards. He has never asked impossibilities of me and he and others even like Burger for instance we were the first generals that I have seen that did not, and not only that but they have even given me much advice that saved me many a disaster."
